bet Gabius has been promised by the king a sum of ten thousand talents for this service, and accordingly set at naught both the senate and the Sibyl. His government of the province was marked in other respects by the most shameful venality and oppression. He returned to Rome in 84. He was accused of maiestas or high treason, on account of his restoration of Ptolemy Auletes, in defiance of the Sibyl and the authority of the senate. He was acquitted on this charge; but he was forthwith accused of repetundæ, for the illegal receipt of ten thousand talents from Ptolemy. He was defended by Cicero, who had been persuaded by Pompey, much against his will, to undertake the defence. Gabinius, however, was condemned on this charge, and went into exile. He was recalled from exile by Cæsar in 49, and in the following year (48) was sent into Illyricum by Cæsar with some newly-levied troops, in order to re-enforce Q. Cornificius. He died in Illyricum about the end of 48, or the beginning of the following year.

GADĀRA (Γάδαρα: Γαδάρησις; now Um-Keis), a large fortified city of Palestine, one of the ten which formed the Decapolis in Perea, stood a little south of the Hieromax (now Yarmuk), an eastern tributary of the Jordan. The surrounding district, southeast of the Lake of Tiberias, was called Gadāria, and was very fertile. Gadara was probably favored by the Greek kings of Syria, as it is sometimes called Antiochia and Sciencia; it was restored by Pompey; Augustus presented it to King Herod, after whose death it was assigned to the province of Syria. It was made the seat of a Christian bishopric. There were celebrated baths in its neighborhood, at Amatha.

GADĀS (ἡ Γάδαιρα: Γαδαίσις, Gaditānus: now Gadiz), a very ancient town in Hispania Bætica, west of the Pillars of Hercules, founded by the Phœnicians, and one of the chief seats of their commerce in the west of Europe, was situated on a small island of the same name (now Ile de León), separated from the main land by a narrow channel, which in its narrowest part was only the breadth of a stadium, and over which a bridge was built. Herodotus says (iv. 8) that the island of Erythia was close to Gadeira; whence most later writers supposed the island of Gades to be the same as the mythical island of Erythia, from which Hercules carried off the oxen of Geryon. A new town was built by Cornelius Balbus, a native of Gades, and the circumference of the old and new towns together was only twenty stadia. There were, however, many of the citizens dwelling on the main land opposite the island, as well as on a smaller island (S. Sebastian or Trocadero) in the immediate neighborhood of the larger one. After the first Punic war Gades came into the hands of the Carthaginians; and in the second Punic war it surrendered of its own accord to the Romans. Its inhabitants received the Roman franchise from Julius Cæsar. It became a municipium, and was called Augusta urbs Julia Gadiensis. Gades was from the earliest to the latest times an important commercial town. Its inhabitants were wealthy, luxurious, and sensuous; and their lascivious dances were celebrated at Rome. (Juv. xi. 162) Gades possessed celebrated temples of Saturn (Oronus) and Hercules. Its drinking water was as bad in antiquity as it is in the present day. Gades gave its name to the FÆTUM GADITANUM, the straits at the entrance of the Mediterranean, between Europe and Africa (now Straits of Gibraltar.)

GÆA or GÆ (Γαῖα or Γῆ), the personification of the earth. Homer describes her as a divine being, to whom black sheep were sacrificed, and who was invoked by persons taking oaths; and he calls her the mother of Erechtheus and Tityus. In Hesiod she is the first being that sprang from Chaos, and gave birth to Uranus (Cœlus) and Pontus. By Uranus (Cœlus) she became the mother of Oceanus, Cœus, Crîus, Hyperion, Iapetus, Thia, Rhea, Themis, Mnemosyne, Phœbe, Tethys, Saturn (Cronos), the Cyclopes, Broutes, Steropes, Arges, Cottus, Briareus, and Gyges. These children were hated by their father, and Gæ (Terra) therefore concealed them in the bosom of the earth; but she made a large iron sickle, gave it to her sons, and requested them to take vengeance upon their father Cronos (Saturn) undertook the task, and mutilated Uranus (Cœlus). The drops of blood which fell from him upon the earth (Gæ) became the seeds of the Erinyes, the Gigantes, and the Melian nymphs. Subsequently Gæ (Terra) became, by Pontus, the mother of Nereus, Thaumæs, Phœreys, Ceto, and Eurybia. Gæ (Terra) belonged to the deities of the nether world (θεοὶ ᾗδάνιοι) and hence she is frequently mentioned where they are invoked. The surnames and epithets given to her have more or less reference to her character as the all-producing and all-nourishing mother (ἡ μήτηρ ὅλης γένεως). Her worship appears to have been universal among the Greeks, and she had temples or altars in almost all the cities of Greece. At Rome the earth was worshipped under the name of Tellus (which is only a variation of Terra). She was regarded by the Romans also as one of the deities of the nether world (Inferi), and is mentioned in connection with Dis and the Manes. A temple was built to her by the consul P. Sempronius Sophus, in B. C. 304. Her festival was celebrated on the 15th of April, and was called Fordicidia or Horcididia. The sacrifice, consisting of cows, was offered up in the Capitol in the presence of the Vestals.

GÆSON, GÆSUS, or GÆSSUS (Γαῖσος) a river of Ionia in Asia Minor, falling into the Gulf of Mæander near the promontory of Mycale.

GÆTULIA (Γαῖτωλία), the interior of Northern Africa, south of Mauretania, Numidia, and the region bordering on the Syrtis, reaching to the Atlantic Ocean on the west, and of very indefinite extent toward the east and the south. The people included under the name Gætuli (Γαῖτοιοι), in its widest sense, were the inhabitants of the region between the countries just mentioned and the Great Desert, and also in the Oases of the latter, and nearly as far south as the River Niger. They were a great nomad race, including several tribes, the chief of whom were the Autololes and Pharusii on the western coast, the Daræ, or Gætuli-Daræ, in the steppes of the Great Atlas, and the Melanogætuli, a black race resulting from the intermixture of the Gætuli with their southern neighbors, the Nigritæ. The pure Gætulians were not an Ethiopic (i. e., negro), but a Libyan race, and were most probably of Asiatic origin. They are supposed to have been the ancestors of the Berberæ.

GAIVS or CAIVS, a celebrated Roman jurist, wrote under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. His works were very numerous, and great use was made of them in the compilation of the Digest. One of his most celebrated works was an elementary treatise on Roman law, entitled Institutiones, in four books. This work was for a long time the ordinary text book used by those who were commencing the study of the Roman law; but it went out of use after the compilation of the Institutiones of Justinian, and was finally lost. This long lost work was discovered by Niebuhr in 1816 in the library of the Chapter at Verona. The MS. containing Gaius was a palimpsest one. The original writing of Gaius had on some pages been washed out, and on others scratched out, and the whole was re-written with the Letters of St. Jerome. The task of deciphering the original MS. was a very difficult one and some parts were completely destroyed. It was first published by Göschel in 1821: a second edition appeared in 1824, and a third in 1842.

GAGÆS (Γάγας), a town on the coast of Lycia, east of Myra, whence was obtained the mineral called Gagætes lapis, that is jet, or, as it is still called in German, gagat.

GÁLĀRIA (Γαλαρία: Γαλάρης: in the eastern part of modern Anadolî and the western part of Rumîli), a country of Asia Minor, composed of parts of Phrygia and Cappadocia, and bounded on the west, south, and southeast by those countries, and on the northeast, north, and northwest by Pontus, Paphlagonia, and Bithynia. It derived its name from its inhabitants, who were Gauls that had invaded and settled in Asia Minor at various periods during the third century B.C. First, a portion of the army which Brennus led against Greece, separated from the main body, and marched into Thrace, and, having crossed forward as far as the shores of the Propontis, some of them crossed the Hellespont on their own account, while others, who had reached Byzantium, were invited to pass the Bosphorus by Nicomedes I., king of Bithynia, who required their aid against his brother Zippontus (B.C. 279.) They speedily overran all Asia Minor within the Taurus, and exacted tribute from its various princes, and served as mercenaries not only in the armies of these princes, but also of the kings of Syria and Egypt; and, according to one account, a body of them found their way to Babylon. During their ascendancy, other bodies of Gauls followed them into Asia. Their progress was at length checked by the arms of the kings of Persia: Eumenes fought against them with various fortune; but Attalus I. gained a complete victory over them (B.C. 280), and compelled them to settle down within the limits of the country thenceforth called Galatia, and also, on account of the mixture of Greeks with the Celtic inhabitants, which speedily took place, Græco-Galatia and Gallogræcia. The people of Galatia adopted to a great extent Greek habits and manners and religious observances, but preserved their own language, which is spoken of as resembling that of the Treviri. They retained also, their political divisions and forms of government. They consisted of three great tribes, the Tolistobogî, the Trocmi, and the Tectosages, each subdivided into four parts, called by the Greeks τετραρχίαι. At the head of each of these twelve tetrarchies was a chief, or tetrarch, who appointed the chief magistrate (dux, στράτηγος), and the commander of the army (στρατοπύλας), and two lieutenant generals (ἐκαστοπαρχοὶ). The twelve tetrarchs together had the general government of the country, but their power was checked by an assistant senate of three hundred, who met in a place called Drymnæum (probably, Drymnæum, i. e., the oak-grove), and had jurisdiction in all capital cases. This form of government had a natural tendency to monarchy, according as either of the twelve tetrarchs became more powerful than the rest, especially under the protection of the Romans to whom Galatia became virtually subject as the result of the campaign which the consul C. Manlius undertook against the Gauls, to punish them for the assistance they had given to Antiochus the Great (B.C. 189). At length one of the tetrarchs, DEIOTARUS, was rewarded for his services to the Romans in the Mithradatic war by the title of king, together with a grant of Pontus and Armenia Minor; and after the death of his successor Amyntas, Galatia was made by Augustus a Roman province (B.C. 26). It was soon after enlarged by the addition of Paphlagonia. Under Constantine it was restricted to its old limits, and under Valens it was divided into two provinces, Galatia Prima and Galatia Secunda. The country was beautiful and fertile, being watered by the rivers Halys and Sangarius. Its only important cities were, in the southwest, PESSINUS, the capital of the Tolistobogî; in the centre, ANOTRA, the capital of the Tectosages; and in the northeast, TAVIUM, the capital of the Trocmi. From the Epistle of St. Paul to the Galatians, we learn not only that many Christian churches had been formed in Galatia during the apostolic age, but also that those churches consisted, in great part, of Jewish converts.

GALAXIUS (Γαλαξίος), a small river in Boeotia on which stood a temple of Apollo Galanix: it derived its name from its milky color, which was owing to the chalky nature of the soil through which it flowed.

GALBA, SULPICIUS, patricianus. 1. P., consul B.C. 211, received Macedonia as his province where he remained as proconsul till 204, and carried on the war against Philip. In 200 he was consul a second time, and again obtained Macedonia as his province; but he was unable to accomplish any thing of importance against Philip, and was succeeded in the command in the following year by Villius Tappulus. He was one of the ten commissioners sent to Greece in 196, after the defeat of Philip by Flaminius, and was one of the ambassadors sent to Antioch in 198.—2. SEXTUS, was prætor 161 and arrived

Spain as his province. His name is infamous on account of his treacherous and atrocious murder of the Lusitanians, with their wives and children, who had surrendered to him on the promise of receiving grants of land. Viriathus was one of the few Lusitanians who escaped from the bloody scene. Vid. VIRIATHUS. On his return to Rome in 149, he was brought to trial on account of his horrible massacre of the Lusitanians. His conduct was denounced in the strongest terms by Cato, who was then eighty-five years old, but he was nevertheless acquitted. He was consul 144. Cicero praises his oratory in the highest terms.—3. SÆA, great-grandfather of the Emperor Galba, served under Cæsar in the Gallic war, and was prætor in 54. After Cæsar's death he served against Antony in the war of Mutina.—4. C., father of the Emperor Galba, was consul in A.D. 22.

GALBA, SÆA. SULPICIUS, Roman emperor from June, A.D. 68, to January, A.D. 69. He was born near Terracina, on the 24th of December, B.C. 2. Both Augustus and Tiberius are said to have told him that one day he would be at the head of the Roman world, from which we must infer that he was a young man of more than ordinary talents. From his parents he inherited great wealth. He was invested with the curule offices before attaining the legitimate age. He was prætor A.D. 20, and consul 33. After his consulship he had the government of Gaul 39, where he carried on a successful war against the Germans, and restored discipline among the troops. On the death of Caligula many of his friends urged him to seize the empire, but he preferred living in a private station. Claudius intrusted him, in 45, with the administration of Africa, which he governed with wisdom and integrity. In the reign of Nero he lived for several years in retirement, through fear of becoming the victim of the tyrant's suspicion; but in 61 Nero gave him the government of Hispania Tarraconensis, where he remained for eight years. In 68 Vindex rebelled in Gaul. About the same time Galba was informed that Nero had sent secret orders for his assassination. He therefore resolved at once to follow the example of Vindex; but he did not assume the imperial title, and professed to act only as the legate of the Roman senate and people. Shortly afterward Nero was murdered; and Galba thereupon proceeded to Rome, where he was acknowledged as emperor. But his severity and avarice soon made him unpopular with his new subjects, and especially with the soldiers. His powers had also become enfeebled by age, and he was completely under the sway of favorites, who perpetrated many enormities in his name. Perceiving the weakness of his government, he adopted Piso Licinianus, a noble young Roman, as his successor. But this only hastened his ruin. Otho, who had hoped to be adopted by Galba, formed a conspiracy among the soldiers, who rose in rebellion six days after the adoption of Piso. Galba was murdered, and Otho was proclaimed emperor.

GALBVS, CLAUDIUS, commonly called GALEN, a very celebrated physician, whose works have had a longer and more extensive influence on the different branches of medical science than those of any other individual either in ancient or modern times. He was born at Pergamum in A.D. 130. His father Nicon, who was an architect and geometrician, carefully superintended his education. In his seventeenth year (146), his father, who had hitherto destined him to be a philosopher, altered his intentions, and, in consequence of a dream, chose for him the profession of medicine. He at first studied medicine in his native city. In his twentieth year (149) he lost his father, and about the same time he went to Smyrna for the purpose of studying under Pelops the physician, and Albinus the Platonic philosopher. He afterward studied at Corinth and Alexandria. He returned to Pergamum in his twenty-ninth year (158), and was immediately appointed physician to the school of gladiators, an office which he filled with great reputation and success. In 164 he quitted his native country on account of some popular commotions, and went to Rome for the first time. Here he stayed about four years, and gained great reputation from his skill in anatomy and medicine. He returned to Pergamum in 168, but had scarcely settled there when he received a summons from the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus to attend them at Aquileia in Venetia. From Aquileia Galen followed M. Aurelius to Rome in 170. When the emperor again set out to conduct the war on the Danube, Galen with difficulty obtained permission to be left behind at Rome, alleging that such was the will of Æsculapius. Before leaving the city the emperor committed to the medical care of Galen his son Commodus, who was then nine years of age. Galen stayed at Rome some years, during which time he employed himself in lecturing, writing, and practicing with great success. He subsequently returned to Pergamum, but whether he again visited Rome is uncertain. He is said to have died in the year 200, at the age of seventy, in the reign of Septimius Severus; but it is not improbable that he lived some years longer. Galen wrote a great number of works on medical and philosophical subjects. The works still extant under the name of Galen consist of eighty-three treatises acknowledged to be genuine; nineteen whose genuineness has been doubted; forty-five undoubtedly spurious; nineteen fragments; and fifteen commentaries on different works of Hippocrates. Galen attached himself exclusively to none of the medical sects into which the profession was divided, but chose from the tenets of each what he believed to be good and true, and called those persons slaves who designated themselves as followers of Hippocrates, Praxagoras, or any other man. The best edition of his works is by Kühn, Lipsæ, 1821-1833, 20 vols. 8vo.

GALÆUS (now Galeo), a river in the south of Italy, flows into the Gulf of Tarentum through the meadows where the sheep fed whose wool was so celebrated in antiquity (dulce pellitis ovibus Galæi flumen, Hor., Carmin. i., 6, 10).

GALÆUS (Γαλεός), that is, "the liard," and of Apollo and Themisto, the daughter of the Hyperborean king Zabius. In pursuance of an oracle of the Dodonean Zeus, Galeus emigrated to Sicily, where he built a sanctuary to his father Apollo. The GALEOTÆ, a family of Sicilian soothsayers, derived their origin from him. The principal seat of the Galeotæ was the town of Hybla, which was hence called GALEOTIS or GALEATIS.

GALLILÆA (Γαλιλαία), at the birth of Christ, was the northernmost of the three divisions of Palestine west of the Jordan. It lay between the Jordan and the Mediterranean on the east and west, and the mountains of Hermon and Carmel on the north and south. It was divided into Upper or North Galilee, and Lower or South Galilee. It was very fertile and densely peopled; but its inhabitants were a mixed race of Jews, Syrians, Phœnicians, Greeks, and others, and were therefore despised by the Jews of Judæa. Vid PALÆSTINA.

GALINTIAS or GALANTHIS (Ογ. Μετ. ix, 306), daughter of Proetus of Thebes and a friend of Alcmena. When Alcmena was on the point of giving birth to Hercules, and the Moera and Nithyia, at the request of Juno (Hera), were endeavoring to delay the birth, Galinthias suddenly rushed in with the false report that Alcmena had given birth to a son. The hostile goddesses were surprised at this information that they dropped their arms. Thus the charm was broken, and Alcmena was enabled to give birth to Hercules. The deluded goddesses avenged the deception practiced upon them by metamorphosing Galinthias into a weasel or cat (γαλῆ). Hecate, however, took pity upon her, and made her her attendant, and Hercules afterward erected a sanctuary to her. At Thebes it was customary at the festival of Hercules first to offer sacrifices to Galinthias.

GALLA. 1. Wife of Constantius, son of the Emperor Constantine Chlorus. She was the mother of Gallus Cæsar. Vid GALLUS.—2. Daughter of the Emperor Valentinian I, and second wife of Theodosius the Great.—3. GALLA PLACIDIA, or simply PLACIDIA, daughter of Theodosius the Great by No. 2. She fell into the hands of Avarie when he took Rome, A.D. 410; and Ataulphus, the Gothic king, married her in 414. After the death of Ataulphus she was restored to Honorius; and in 417 she was married to Constantius, to whom she bore the Emperor Valentinian III. During the minority of the latter she governed the Western empire. She died about 450.

GALLÆCIA, the country of the GALLÆCI (Καλλαικοί), in the north of Spain, between the Astures and the Durius, was in earlier times included in Lusitania. Gallæcia was sometimes used in a wider sense to include the country of the Astures and the Cantabri. It produced tin, gold, and a precious stone called gemma Gallæcia. Its inhabitants were some of the most uncivilized in Spain. They were defeated with great slaughter by D. Brutus, consul B.C. 138, who obtained in consequence the surname of Gallæceus.

GALLIA (ἡ Κελτική, Γαλατία), was used before the time of Julius Cæsar to indicate all the land inhabited by the Galli or Celta; and consequently included not only the later Gaul and the north of Italy, but a part of Spain, the greater part of Germany, the British Isles, and other countries. The early history of the Celtic race, and their various settlements in different parts of Europe, are related under CELTÆ. 1. GALLIA, also called GALLIA TRANSALPINA or GALLIA ULTERIOR, to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina, or the north of Italy. GALLIA BRACCATA and GALLIA COMATA are also used in contradistinction to Gallia Togata or the north of Italy, but these names are not identical with the whole of Gallia Transalpina. Gallia Braccata was the part of the country first subdued by the Romans, the later Provincia, and was so called because the inhabitants wore breeches or trowsers. Gallia Comata was the remainder of the country, excluding Gallia Braccata, and derived its name from the inhabitants wearing their hair long. The Romans were acquainted with only a small portion of Transalpine Gaul till the time of Cæsar. In the time of Augustus it was bounded on the south by the Pyrenees and the Mediterranean; on the east by the River Varus and the Alps, which separated it from Italy, and by the River Rhine, which separated it from Germany; on the north by the German Ocean and the English Channel; and on the west by the Atlantic; thus including not only the whole of France and Belgium, but a part of Holland, a great part of Switzerland, and all the provinces of Germany west of the Rhine. The greater part of this country is a plain, well watered by numerous rivers. The principal mountains were Mons CENOMANUS or Gebenna in the south; the lofty range of Mons JURA in the east, separating the Sequani and the Helvetii; Mons VOEGETUS or Voessus, a continuation of the Jura. The chief forest was the Silva ARDUNNA, extending from the Rhine and the Treviri as far as the Scheldt. The principal rivers were, in the east and north, the RHEVUS (now Rhine), with its tributaries the MOEA (now Maas) and MOSELLA (now Moselle); the SEQUANA (now Seine), with its tributary the MATRONA; in the centre the LIGERIS (now Loire); in the west, the GARUMNA (now Garonne); and in the south the RHODANUS (now Rhone). The country was celebrated for its fertility in ancient times, and possessed a numerous and warlike population. The Greeks, at a very early period, became acquainted with the southern coast of Gaul, where they founded, in B.C. 600, the important town of MASSILIA, which in its turn founded several colonies, and exercised a kind of supremacy over the neighboring districts. The Romans did not attempt to make any conquests in Transalpine Gaul till they had finally conquered not only Africa, but Greece and a great part of Western Asia. In B.C. 125 the consul M. Fulvius Flaccus commenced the subjugation of the Salluvii in the south of Gaul. In the next three years (124-122) the Salluvii were completely subdued by Sextus Calvinus, and the colony of Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix) was founded in their country. In 121 the Allobroges were defeated by the proconsul Domitius Ahenobarbus; and in the same year Q. Fabius Maximus gained a great victory over the united forces of the Allobroges and Arverni, at the confluence of the Isara and the Rhone. The south of Gaul was now under a Roman province and in 118 was founded the colony of Narbo Martius (now Narbonne), which was the chief town of the province. In Caesar's Commentaries the Roman province is called simply Provincia, in contradistinction to the rest of the country; hence comes the modern name of Provence. The rest of the country was subdued by Caesar after a struggle of several years (58-50). At this time Gaul was divided into three parts, Aquitania, Celtica, and Belgica, according to the three different races by which it was inhabited. The Aquitani dwelt in the southwest, between the Pyrenees and the Garumna; the Celts, or Galli proper, in the centre and west, between the Garumna and the Sequana and the Matrona; and the Belges in the northeast, between the two last-mentioned rivers and the Rhine. The different tribes inhabiting Aquitania and Belgica are given elsewhere. Vid. AQUITANIA, BELGÆ. The most important tribes of the Celts or Galli were, 1. Between the Sequana and the Liger: the ARVERNI, the name of all the tribes dwelling on the coast between the mouths of these two rivers; the AULESCI, dwelling inland close to the Armorici; the NAMNETES, ANDROCAVI or ANDER, on the banks of the Liger; east of them the CALETES; and on the Sequana, the PARISI, SENONES, and TRICASSES.—2. Between the Liger and the Garumna: on the coast the PICTONES and SANTONES; inland the TURONES, probably on both sides of the Liger, the BITHUNES CUBI, LEMOVICES, PETROCORI, and CADURCI; east of these, in the mountains of Cebenna, the powerful AVERNI (in the modern Auvergne); and west of them the RUTENI.—3. On the Rhone and in the surrounding country: between the Rhone and the Pyrenees, the VOLGES; between the Rhone and the Alps, the SALYSES or SALLUVI; north of them the CAVARES; between the Rhone, the Isara, and the Alps, the ALLOBROGES; and further north the ÆDUI, SEQUANI, and BELGÆ, three of the most powerful people in all Gaul. Augustus divided Gaul into four provinces: 1. Gallia Narbonensis, the same as the old Provincia. 2. G. Aquitanica, which extended from the Pyrenees to the Liger. 3. C. Lugdunensis, the country between the Liger, the Sequana and the Arar, so called from the colony of Lugdunum (now Lyon), founded by Maximus Planctus. 4. G. Belgica, the country between the Sequana, the Arar, and the Rhine. Shortly afterward the portion of Belgica bordering on the Rhine, and inhabited by German tribes, was subdivided into two new provinces, called Germania Prima and Secunda, or Germania Superior and Inferior. At a later time the provinces of Gaul were still further subdivided, till at length, under the Emperor Gratian, they reached the number of seventeen. Gallia Narbonensis belonged to the senate, and was governed by a proconsul; the other provinces belonged to the emperor, and were governed by imperial legati. After the time of Claudius, when a formidable insurrection of the Gauls was suppressed, the country became more and more Romanized. The Latin language gradually became the language of the inhabitants, and Roman civilization took deep root in all parts of the country. The rhetoricians and poets of Gaul occupy a distinguished place in the later history of Roman literature and Burgundians, Narbo, Lugdunum, and other towns, possessed schools, in which literature and philosophy were cultivated with success. On the dissolution of the Roman empire, Gaul, like the other Roman provinces, was overrun by barbarians, and the greater part of it finally became subject to the Franks or Franks under their king Clovis, about A.D. 496.—2. GALLIA CISALPINA, also called G. Citerior and G. Togata, a Roman province in the north of Italy, was bounded on the west by Liguria and Gallia Narbonensis (from which it was separated by the Alps), on the north by Rætia and Noricum, on the east by the Adriatic and Venetia (from which it was separated by the Athesis), and on the south by Etruria and Umbria (from which it was separated by the River Rubico). It was divided by the Po into GALLIA TRANSPADANA, also called ITALIA TRANSPADANA, in the north, and GALLIA CISPADANA in the south. The greater part of the country is a vast plain, drained by the PADUS (now Po) and its affluents, and has always been one of the most fertile countries of Europe. It was originally inhabited by Ligurians, Umbrians, Etruscans, and other races; but its fertility attracted the Gauls, who at different periods crossed the Alps, and settled in the country, after expelling the original inhabitants. We have mention of five distinct immigrations of Gauls into the north of Italy. The first was in the reign of Tarquinius Priscus, and is said to have been led by Bellovesus, who settled with his followers in the country of the Insubres, and built Milan. The second consisted of the Cenomani, who settled in the neighborhood of Brixia and Verona. The third of the Salluvii, who pressed forward as far as the Ticinus. The fourth of the Boii and Lingones, who crossed the Po, and took possession of the country as far as the Apennines, driving out the Etruscans and Umbrians. The fifth immigration was the most important, consisting of the warlike race of the Senones, who invaded Italy in immense numbers, under the command of Brennus, and took Rome in B.C. 390. Part of them subsequently recrossed the Alps and returned home; but a great number of them remained in the north of Italy, and were for more than a century a source of terror to the Romans. After the first Punic war the Romans resolved to make a vigorous effort to subdue their dangerous neighbors. In the course of four years (225-222) the whole country was conquered, and upon the conclusion of the war (222) was reduced to the form of a Roman province. The inhabitants, however, did not bear the yoke patiently, and it was not till after the final defeat of the Boii, in 191, that the country became submissive to the Romans. The most important tribes were: in Gallia Transpadana, in the direction of west to east, the TAURINI, SALASSI, LIBICI, INSUBRES, CENOMANI; in G. Cispadana, in the same direction, the BOII, LINGONES, SENONES.

GALLIENUS, with his full name, P. LICINIVS VALERIANVS EGNATIVS GALLIENVS, Roman emperor A.D. 260-268. He succeeded his father Valerian when the latter was taken prisoner by the Persians in 260, but he had previously reigned in conjunction with his father, from his accession in 253. Gallienus was indolent, profligate, and indifferent to the public welfare, and his reign was one of the most ignoble and disastrous in the history of Rome. The barbarians ravaged the fairest portion of the empire, and the inhabitants were swept away by one of the most frightful plagues recorded in history. This pestilence followed a long-protracted famine. When it was at its greatest height, five thousand sick are said to have perished daily at Rome; and, after the scourge had passed away, it was found that the inhabitants of Alexandria were diminished by nearly two thirds. The complete dissolution of the empire was averted mainly by a series of internal rebellions. In every district able officers sprang up, who asserted and strove to maintain the dignity of independent princes. The armies levied by these usurpers, who are commonly distinguished as The Thirty Tyrants, in many cases arrested the progress of the invaders, and restored order in the provinces which they governed. Gallienus was at length slain by his own soldiers in 268, while besieging Milan, in which the usurper Aureolus had taken refuge.

GALLINARIA. 1. (Now Gallinara), an island off the coast of Liguria, celebrated for its number of hens; whence its name.—2. SILVA, a forest of pine-trees near Cumæ in Campania.

GALLIO, JUNIUS. 1. A Roman rhetorician, and a friend of M. Annæus Seneca, the rhetorician, whose son he adopted. He was put to death by Nero. In early life he had been a friend of Ovid (Ex Pont., iv., 11.).—2. Son of the rhetorician M. Annæus Seneca, and an elder brother of the philosopher Seneca, was adopted by No. 1.

GALLIUS, Q., was a candidate for the prætorship in B.C. 64, and was accused of ambitus or bribery by M. Calpurnius. He was defended on that occasion by Cicero in an oration of which a few fragments have come down to us. He was prætor urbanus B.C. 63, and presided at the trial of C. Cornelius. He left two sons, Q. GALLIUS, who was prætor in 48, and was put to death by the triumvirs; and M. GALLIUS, who is mentioned as one of Antony's partisans, in 43.

GALLURÆSIA. Vid GALATIA.

GALLONIUS, a public crier at Rome, probably contemporary with the younger Scipio, whose wealth and gluttony passed into the proverb "to live like Gallonius." He was satirized by Horace (Sat., ii., 2, 46).

GALLUS, ÆLIUS. 1. A jurist, contemporary with Cicero and Varro, though probably rather older than either. He was the author of a treatise, De Verborum, quæ ad Jus Civile pertinent, Significatione, which is frequently cited by the grammarians.—2. An intimate friend of the geographer Strabo, was præfect of Egypt in the reign of Augustus. In B.C. 24 he invaded Arabia, and after his army had suffered dreadfully from the heat and want of water, he was obliged to retreat with great loss.

GALLUS, L. ANICIUS, prætor B.C. 168, conducted the war against Gentius, king of the Illyrians, whom he compelled to submit to the Romans.

and the instructor of Serv. Sulpicius. He was prætor along with Cicero B.C. 66. He is also cited by the jurists in the Digest, but there is no direct extract from his own works in the Digest.

GALLUS SALONINUS, L. AULIUS, son of C. AULIUS Pollio, was consul B.C. 8. He was hated by Tiberius because he had married Vipsania, the former wife of Tiberius. In A.D. 56 Tiberius got the senate to sentence him to death and kept him imprisoned for three years on the most scanty supply of food. He died in prison of starvation, but whether his death was compulsory or voluntary is unknown. Gallus wrote a work, entitled De Comparatione patris ac Caesaris, which was unfavorable to the latter, and against which the Emperor Claudius wrote his defence of Cicero.

GALLUS, L. CANINIUS, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 56, when he supported the views of Pompey. During the civil war he appears to have remained neutral. He died in 44.

GALLUS, CÆSTRUS, governor of Syria (legatus A.D. 64, 65), under whom the Jews broke out into the rebellion which ended in the destruction of their city and temple by Titus.

GALLUS, CONSTANTIUS, son of Julius Constantius and Galla, grandson of Constantine Chlorus, nephew of Constantine the Great, and eldest brother, by a different mother, of Julian the Apostate. In A.D. 351 he was named Cæsar by Constantius II., and was left in the command of the East, where he conducted himself with the greatest haughtiness and cruelty. In 354 he went to the West to meet Constantine at Milan, but was arrested at Petovio in Pannonia, and sent to Pola in Istria, where he was beheaded in a prison.

GALLUS, C. CORNELIUS, was born at Forum Julii (now Freges) in Gaul, of poor parents about B.C. 66. He went to Italy at an early age, and began his career as a poet when he was about twenty. He had already attained considerable distinction at the time of Cæsar's death, 44; and upon the arrival of Octavianus in Italy after that event, Gallus embraced his party, and soon acquired great influence with him. In 41 he was one of the triumviri appointed by Octavianus to distribute lands in the north of Italy among his veterans, and on that occasion he afforded protection to the inhabitants of Mantua and to Virgil. He afterward accompanied Octavianus to the battle of Actium, 31, and commanded a detachment of the army. After the battle, Gallus was sent with the army to Egypt, in pursuit of Antony; and when Egypt was made a Roman province, Octavianus appointed Gallus the first præfect of the province. He remained in Egypt for nearly four years; but he incurred at length the enmity of Octavianus, though the exact nature of his offences is uncertain. According to some accounts, he spoke of the emperor in an offensive and insulting manner; he erected numerous statues of himself in Egypt, and had his own exploits inscribed on the pyramids. The senate deprived him of his estates, and sent him into exile; whereupon he put an end to his life by throwing himself upon his own sword, B.C. 26. The intimate friendship existing between Gallus and the most eminent men of the time as Annus Pollio, Virgil, Varus, and Ovid, and the high praise they bestow upon him prove that he was a man of great intellectual powers and acquirements. Ovid (Trist., iv., 10, 5) assigns to him the first place among the Roman elegiac poets; and we know that he wrote a collection of elegies in four books, the principal subject of which was his love of Lycoris. But all his productions have perished; for the four epigrams in the Latin Anthology attributed to Gallus could not have been written by a contemporary of Augustus. Gallus translated into Latin the poems of Euphorion of Chalcis, but this translation is also lost. Some critics attribute to him the poem Ciris, usually printed among the works of Virgil, but the arguments do not appear satisfactory.

GALLUS, SULPICIUS, a distinguished orator, was praetor B.C. 169, and consul 166, when he fought against the Ligurians. In 168 he served as tribune of the soldiers under Emilius Paulus in Macedonia, and during this campaign predicted an eclipse of the moon.

GALLUS, TREBONIUS, Roman emperor A.D. 251-254. His full name was C. VINIUS TREBONIUS GALLUS. He served under Decius in the campaigns against the Goths, 251, and he is said to have contributed by his treachery to the disastrous issue of the battle, which proved fatal to Decius and his son Herennius. Gallus was thereupon elected emperor, and Hostilianus, the surviving son of Decius, was nominated his colleague. He purchased a peace of the Goths by allowing them to retain their plunder, and promising them a fixed annual tribute. In 253 the Goths again invaded the Roman dominions, but they were driven back by Emilianus, whose troops proclaimed him emperor in Moesia. Emilianus thereupon marched into Italy; and Gallus was put to death by his own soldiers, together with his son Volusianus, before any collision had taken place between the opposing armies. The name of Gallus is associated with nothing but cowardice and dishonor. In addition to the misery produced by the incursions of the barbarians during this reign, a deadly pestilence broke out 252, and continued its ravages over every part of the empire for fifteen years.

GALLUS. 1. A river in Bithynia, rising near Nedra, on the borders of Phrygia, and falling into the Sangarius near Leuce (now Lefke).—2. A river in Galatia, which also fell into the Sangarius near Pessinus. From it the priests of Cybele are said to have obtained their name of Galli.

GALLI (γαμήλιοι θεοί), that is, the divinities protecting and presiding over marriage. These divinities are usually regarded as the protectors of marriage. Respecting the festival of the Gallia, vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

GANDARAE (Γανδαράι), an Indian people in the Pamiriana, on the northwest of the Punjab, between the rivers Indus and Susatua. Under Xerxes they were subjects of the Persian empire. Their country was called Gandaritis (Γανδαρίτις).

GANDARINAE or GANDARITAE (Γανδαρίναι, Γανδαρίται), an Indian people, in the middle of the Punjab, between the rivers Acesines (now Jhelum) and Hydrates (now Rosse), whose king, at the time of Alexander's invasion, was a cousin and namesake of the celebrated Poros. Whether they were different from the GANDARAE is uncertain. Sanscrit writers mention the Ghandara in the centre of the Punjab.

GANGARIDAE (Γαγγαρίδαι), an Indian people about the mouths of the Ganges.

GANGES (Γάγγης: now Ganges or Ganga), the greatest river of India, which it divided into the two parts named by the ancients India intra Gangem (now Hindustan) and India extra Gangem (now Burmah, Cochinchina, Siam, and the Malay Peninsula). It rises in the highest part of the Emodi Montes (now Himalaya) and flows in a general southerly direction till it falls by several mouths into the head of the Gangitic Sinus (now Bay of Bengal). Like the Nile, it overflows its banks periodically, and these inundations render its valley the most fertile part of India. The knowledge of the ancients respecting it was very imperfect, and they give very various accounts of its source, its size, and the number of its mouths. The breadth which Diodorus Siculus assigns to it in the lower part of its course, thirty-two stadia, or about three miles, is perfectly correct. The following rivers are mentioned as its tributaries: Cainas, Jomanes or Diamunna, Sarabua, Condochates, Cedanes, Cosogaeus or Cosocanus, Erannoboea, Sonus or Soas, Sittocestia, Solomatia, Sambua, Magon, Agorania, Omalia, Comme nases, Cacuthis, Andomatia, Amystia, Oxyrnagia and Erhenysia. The name is also applied to a city in the interior of India, on the Gangea, where it makes its great bend to the eastward, perhaps Allahabad.

GANGRA (Γάγγρα: now Kankari), a city of Paphlagonia, near the confines of Galatia, was originally a fortress; in the time of King Deiotarus, a royal residence; and under the later emperors, the capital of Paphlagonia.

GANOS (Γάνος), a fortress in Thrace, on the Propontis.

GANYMEDES (Γανυμήδης), son of Tros and Callichroe, and brother of Ilus and Assaracus, was the most beautiful of all mortals, and was carried off by the gods that he might fill the cup of Jupiter (Zeus), and live among the eternal gods. This is the Homeric account; but other traditions give different details. Some call him son of Laomedon, others son of Ilus, and others again, of Eriothionius or Assaracus. The manner in which he was carried away from the earth is likewise differently described; for while Homer mentions the gods in general, later writers state that Jupiter (Zeus) himself carried him off, either in his natural shape, or in the form of an eagle, or by means of his eagle. There is, further, no agreement as to the place where the event occurred; though later writers usually represent him as carried off from Mount Ida (captus ab Ida, Hor. Carm., iv., 4). The early legend simply states that Ganymedes was carried off that he might be the cup-bearer of Jupiter (Zeus), in which office he was conceived to have succeeded Hebe; but later writers describe him as the beloved and favorite of Jupiter (Zeus), without allusion to his office. Jupiter (Zeus) compensated the father for his loss by a pair of divine horses. Astronomers have placed Ganymedes among the stars under the name of Aquarius. The Romans called him by a corrupt form of his name, CATAMITUS.

GĀRĀMA. Vid. GARAMANTES.

GĀRĀMANTES (Γαρίμαντες), the southernmost people known to the ancients in Northern Africa, dwelt far south of the Great Syrtis, in the region called Phazania (now Fazan), where they had a capital city, GĀRĀMĀ (Γάραμα: now Mourzouk, latitude 26° 53' north, longitude 14° 10' east). They are mentioned by Herodotus as a weak, unwarlike people; he places them nineteen days' journey from Æthiopia and the shores of the Indian Ocean, fifteen days' journey from Ammonium, and thirty days' journey from Egypt. The Romans obtained fresh knowledge of them by the expedition of Cornelius Balbus into their country in B.C. 48.

GARGĀNUS MONS (now Monte Gargano), a mountain and promontory in Apulia, on which were oak forests (querceda Gargani, Hor., Carm., ii, 9, 7).

[GARGAPHIA (Γαργaphία), a fountain in a valley near Plataeae in Boeotia; in the second Persian war Mardonius caused its waters to be poisoned in order to destroy the Greeks who had encamped in its vicinity.]

GAROLĀĀ, -OS or -US Γάρλαα, -ον, -ος: Garlapēus. 1. (Now Kaz-Dagh), the southern summit of Mount Ida, in the Troad.—2. A city at the foot of Mount Ida, on the shore of the Gulf of Adramyttium, between Assus and Antandrus; said to have been founded originally on the summit of the mountain by the Leleges; afterward colonized from Miletus; and removed to the lower site on account of the inclemency of its situation on the mountain. Its neighborhood was rich in corn.

GARGETTUS (Γαργηττός: Γαργήττιος) a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeis, on the northwestern slope of Mount Hymettus; the birth-place of the philosopher Epicurus.

GARTES, a people in Aquitania, neighbors of the Ausci, in the modern Comté de Gaves.

GAROCĒLI, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, near Mount Cenis, in the neighborhood of St. Jean de Maurienne.

GARĀLURĪA or -ITIS (Γαρλαυρία or -ιτις), a praefectura in Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia and Tyanitis. Its chief town was called Γαρλαυρία.

GARĒLLI, a people of Liguria in the Apennines.

GARUMNA (now Garonne), one of the chief rivers of Gaul, rises in the Pyrenees, flows northwest through Aquitania, and becomes a bay of the sea below Burdigala (now Bordeaux).

GARUMNI, a people in Aquitania, on the Garonna.

GATHĒZ (Γαθῆας), a town in Arcadia, on the GATHRATAS, a river which flows into Alpheus, west-southwest of Megalopolis.

[GAUDA, a Numidian, son of Mastanabal, half brother to Jugurtha, had been named by his uncle Micipsa as heir to the kingdom should Adherbal, Hiempsal, and Jugurtha die without issue.]

[GAUDOS. Vid. GAULOS.]

GAΓOΛMĒLA (τὰ Γαγγάμλα: now Kermalie), a village in the district of Aturia in Amyra, the scene of the last and decisive battle between Alexander and Darius Codomannus, B.C. 331, commonly called the battle of ARBELA.

GAULANITIS (Γαύλα- or -ωνίτις: now Jeslan), a district in the north of Palestine, on the eastern side of the Lake of Tiberias, as far south as the River Hieromax, named from the town of Golan (Γαύλωνα).

GAULOS (Γαῦλος: Γαυλίτης: now Gazze). 1. An island in the Sicilian Sea, near Melite (now Malta).—[2. Or GAUDOS, an island opposite Hierapytna in Crete, supposed by some to be the island of Calypso.]

GAURĒKLĒON, GAURĒLĒON. Vid. ANDROS.

GAURUS MONS, GAURANUS or -NI M. (now Monte Gaurro), a volcanic range of mountains in Campania, between Cumæ and Neapolis, in the neighborhood of Puteoli, which produced good wine, and was memorable for the defeat of the Samnites by M. Valerius Corvus, B.C. 343.

GAZA (Γάζα). 1. (Now Ghuzzeh), the last city on the southwestern frontier of Palestine, and the key of the country on the side of Egypt, stood on an eminence about two miles from the sea, and was, from the very earliest times of which we have any record, very strongly fortified. It was one of the five cities of the Philistines; and, though taken from them more than once by the Jews, was each time recovered. It was taken by Cyrus the Great, and remained in the hands of the Persians till the time of Alexander, who only gained possession of it after an obstinate defence of several months. In B.C. 315 it fell into the power of Ptolemy, the son of Lagos, as the result of his victory over Demetrius before the city, and was destroyed by him. But it again recovered, and was possessed alternately by the kings of Syria and Egypt, during their prolonged wars, and afterward by the Ammonian princes of Judaea, one of whom, Alexander Jannæus, again destroyed it, B.C. 96. It was rebuilt by Gabinius; given by Augustus to Herod the Great; and, after Herod's death, united to the Roman province of Syria. In A.D. 65 it was again destroyed in an insurrection of its Jewish inhabitants; but it recovered once more, and remained a flourishing city till it fell into the hands of the Arabs in A.D. 634. In addition to its importance as a military post, it possessed an extensive commerce, carried on through its port, Majuma or CONSTANTIA.—2. (Now Ghazs), a city in the Persian province of Sogdiana, between Alexandria and Cyropolis; one of the seven cities which rebelled against Alexander in B.C. 328.

GĀLĀGA (Γάλαα: now Tubrees), a city in the north of Media Atropatene, equidistant from Artaxata and Ecbatana, was a summer residence of the kings of Media.

GAZICRA (Γαζιοῦρα), a city in Pontus Galaticus, on the River Iris, below Amasia, was the ancient residence of the kings of Pontus; but at Strabo's time it had fallen to decay.

Gēlāiās (Γεδάληα), the district of Arabia Petraea around the city of Petra.

GERENA MONS. Vid. CEBENNA.

Γεδρωσία (Γεδρωσία and Γεδρωσία: southern part of Beloochistan), the furthest province of the Persian empire on the southeast, and one of the subdivisions of ARIANA, was bounded to the west by Carmania, on the north by Drangiana and Arachosia, on the east by India (or, to the country about the lower course of the Indus was called, Indo-Scythia), and on the south by the Mare Erythraeum, or Indian Ocean. It is formed by a succession of sandy steppes, rising from the sea-coast toward the table-land of ARIANA, and produced little besides aromatic herbs. The strip of land between the coast and the lowest mountain range is watered by several rivers, the chief of which was called Arabia Deserta; but even this district is for the most part only a series of salt marshes. Gedrosia is known in history chiefly through the distress suffered for want of water, in passing through it, by the armies of Cyrus and of Alexander. The inhabitants were divided by the Greek writers into two races, the Ichthyophagi in the sea-coast, and the Gedrosi in the interior. The latter were a wild nomadic people, whom even Alexander was only able to reduce to a temporary subjection. The whole country was divided into eight districts. Its chief cities were Rhachia and Pura, or Parsia.

GERENA GENS, traced its origin to the mythical Gyus, one of the companions of Aeneas. It was one of the most distinguished Alban houses, transplanted to Rome on the destruction of Alba by Tullius Hostilius, and enrolled among the Roman patricians. There appears to have been only one family in this gens, that of Macrinus, many members of which filled the highest offices in the state in the early times of the republic.

GELA (ἡ Γέλα, Ion. Γέλη: Γελῶς, Gelensis: ruins at Terra Nuova), a city on the southern coast of Sicily, on a river of the same name (now Fiume di Terra Nuova), founded by Rhodiens from Lindos, and by Cretans, B.C. 690. It soon obtained great power and wealth; and in 562 it founded Agrigentum, which, however, became more powerful than the mother city. Like the other cities of Sicily, it was subject to tyrants, of whom the most important were Hierocles, GELON, and Hieron. Gelon transported half of its inhabitants to Syracuse; the place gradually fell into decay, and in the time of Augustus was no longer inhabited. The poet Sedylus died here. North of Gela were the celebrated Campi Gelidi, which produced rich crops of wheat.

GELA. Vid. CADORIL.

GELANON (Γελάνων), king of Argos, was expelled by Danaos.

(GELAS (now Kyfi), a small river of Gallia Belgica, which empties into the Mosella (now Wiedel)).

GELDUNA (now Geld, below Cologne), a fortified place of the Ubii, on the Rhine, in Lower Germany.

GELIA GENS, plebeian, was of Samnite origin, and afterward settled at Rome. There were two generals of this name in the Samnite wars, Jellus Stator in the second Samnite war, who was defeated and taken prisoner B.C. 305, and Gellius Egnatius in the third Samnite war. Vid. EGNATIUM. The chief family of the Gellii at Rome bore the name of PUBLICOLA.

GELLICI. 1. CN., a contemporary of the Gracchi, the author of a history of Rome from the earliest epoch down to B.C. 145 at least. The work is lost, but it is frequently quoted by later writers.—2. AULUS, a Latin grammarian of good family, was probably a native of Rome. He studied rhetoric under T. Castricius and Sulpicius Apollinaris, philosophy under Calvisius Taurus and Peregrinus Proteus, and enjoyed also the friendship and instructions of Favorinus, Herodes Atticus, and Cornelius Fronto. While yet a youth, he was appointed by the praetor to act as umpire in civil causes. The precise date of his birth and death is unknown; but he must have lived under Hadrian, Antoninus Pius, and Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 117–180. He wrote a work entitled Noctes Atticae, because it was composed in a country house near Athens during the long nights of winter. It is a sort of miscellany, containing numerous extracts from Greek and Roman writers, on a variety of topics connected with history, antiquities, philosophy, and philology, interspersed with original remarks, the whole thrown together into twenty books, without any attempt at order or arrangement. The eighth book is entirely lost with the exception of the index. The best editions are by Jac. Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1706 (reprinted by Conradi, Lipsa, 1762), and by Lion, Gotting., 1824.—3. PUBLICIUS, a jurist, one of the disciples of Servius Sulpicius.

GELON (Γέλων). 1. Son of Dinomenes, tyrant of Gela, and afterward of Syracuse, was descended from one of the most illustrious families in Gela. He held the chief command of the cavalry in the service of Hippocrates, tyrant of Gela, shortly after whose death he obtained the supreme power, B.C. 491. In 485 he availed himself of the internal dissensions of Syracuse to make himself master of this city also. From this time he neglected Gela, and bent all his efforts to the aggrandizement of Syracuse, to which place he removed many of the inhabitants of the other cities of Sicily. In 480 he gained a brilliant victory at Himera over the Carthaginians, who had invaded Sicily with an army, amounting, it is said, to the incredible number of three hundred thousand men. Scarcely any of this vast host survived to carry the news to Carthage. The victory is said to have been gained on the very same day as that of Salamis. He died in 478 of a dropsy, after reigning seven years at Syracuse. He was succeeded by his brother Hieron. He is represented as a man of singular leniency and moderation, and as seeking in every way to promote the welfare of his subjects; and his name even appears to have become almost proverbial as an instance of a good monarch. A splendid tomb was erected to him by the Syracusans at the public expense, and heroic honors were decreed to his memory.—2. Son of Hieron II., king of Syracuse, who died before his father, at the age of more than fifty years. He received the title of king in the lifetime of his father.

GELONI (Γελωνοί), a Scythian people, who dwelt in Sarmatia Asiatica, to the east of the River Tanais (now Don). They were said to have been of Greek origin, and to have migrated from the shores of the Euxine; but they intermixed with the Scythians so as to lose all traces of their Hellenic race. Their chief city was called Galonus (Γαλονός).

[Γελόνος (Γελωνός). 1 Son of Hercules, and brother of Agathyrus, said to have given name to the Geloni.—2. (ἡ Γελωνός). Vid. G.—ONE.]

GEMINUS (Γεμίνος), an astronomer, was a native of Rhodes, and flourished about B.C. 77. He is the author of an extant work, entitled Εἰσαγωγή εἰς τὰ φαινόμενα, which is a descriptive treatise on elementary astronomy, with a great deal of historical allusion. It is printed in the Uranologion of Petavius, Paris, 1630, and in Halm's edition of Ptolemy, Paris, 1819.

GEMINUS, SERVILIUS. 1. P., twice consul with C. Aurelius Cotta in the first Punic war, namely, in B.C. 252 and 248. In both years he carried on war against the Carthaginians.—2. C., son of No. 1, was consul 217 with C. Flaminius, in the second Punic war, and ravaged the coast of Africa. He fell in the battle of Cannæ, 216.—3. M., also surnamed PULCR, consul 202 with Tib. Claudius Nero, obtained Etruria for his province. He is mentioned on several occasions subsequently.

GEMONIA (scalæ) or GEMONIA (gradus), a flight of steps cut out of the Aventine, down which the bodies of the criminals strangled in the prisons were dragged, and afterward thrown into the Tiber.

GENABUM or GENABUM (now Orleans), a town in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the northern bank of the Ligeris, was the chief town of the Carnutes; it was plundered and burnt by Cæsar, but subsequently rebuilt. In later times it was called Civitas Aurelianorum or Aurelianensis Urbs, whence its modern name.

GENAUNI, a people in Vindelicis, the inhabitants of the Alpine valley, now called Valle di Non, were subdued by Drusus. (Hor., Carm. v., 11, 10).

GENESIUS, JOSEPHUS, lived about A.D. 940, and wrote in four books a history of the Byzantine emperors, from A.D. 813 to 886, consequently of the reigns of Leo V., Michael II., Theophilus, Michael III., and Basil I. Edited by Leobmann, Bonn, 1834.

GENETÆUS (Γενεταῖος), a surname of Jupiter (Zeus), from Cape Genetus on the Euxine, where he was worshipped as εὐχέεινος, i. e., "the hospitable."

GENETILLIS (Γενετυλλίς), the protectress of births, occurs both as a surname of Venus (Aphrodite), and as a distinct divinity and a companion of Venus (Aphrodite). We also find the plural Γενετυλλίδες or Γενεταίδες, as a class of divinities presiding over generation and birth, and as companions of Venus (Aphrodite) Colias.

GENÈVA or GENÈVA (Genevensis; now Geneva), the last town of the Allobroges, on the frontiers of the Helvetii, was situated on the southern bank of the Rhone, at the spot where the river flowed out of the Lacus Lemannus. There was a bridge here over the Rhone.

GENITRIX, that is, "the mother," is used by Ovid (Mét. xiv., 586) as a surname of Cybele, in the place of mater, or magna mater; but it is 224 better known as a surname of Venus, in whom Cæsar dedicated a temple at Rome to the mother of the Julia Gena.

GENIUS, a protecting spirit, analogous to the guardian angels invoked by the Church of Rome. The belief in such spirits existed both in Greece and at Rome. The Greeks called them δαίμονες, Dæmons, and appear to have believed in them from the earliest times, though Homer does not mention them. Hesiod says that the Dæmons were thirty thousand in number, and that they dwelled on earth unseen by mortals, as the ministers of Jupiter (Zeus), and as the guardians of men and of justice. He further conceives them to be the souls of righteous men who lived in the Golden Age of the world. The Greek philosophers took up this idea, and developed a complete theory of dæmons. Thus we read in Plato that dæmons are assigned to men at the moment of their birth, that they accompany men through life, and after death conduct their souls to Hades. Pindar, in several passages, speaks of γενεθλίος δαίμων, that is, the spirit watching over the fate of man from the hour of his birth. The dæmons are further described as the ministers and companions of the gods who carry the prayers of men to the gods, and the gifts of the gods to men, and accordingly float in immense numbers in the space between heaven and earth. There was also a distinct class of dæmons, who were exclusively the ministers of the gods. The Romans seem to have received their notions respecting the genii from the Etruscans, though the name Genius itself is Latin (it is connected with gignere, genet, and equivalent in meaning to generator or father). The genii of the Romans are the powers which produce life (dis genitales), and accompany man through it as his second or spiritual self. They were further not confined to man, but every living being, animal as well as man, and every place, had its genius. Every human being at his birth obtained (sortitur) a genius, whom he worshipped as sacculus or sacranus, deus, especially on his birth-day, with libations of wine, incense, and garlands of flowers. The bridal bed was sacred to the genius, on account of his connection with generation, and the bed itself was called lectus genialis. On other merry occasions, also, sacrifices were offered to the genius, and to indulge in merriment was not unfrequently expressed by genio indulgere, genium curare or placare. The whole body of the Roman people had its own genius, who is often seen represented on coins of Hadrian and Trajan. He was worshipped on sad as well as joyous occasions; thus sacrifices were offered to him at the beginning of the second year of the war with Hannibal. The genii are usually represented in works of art as winged beings. The genius of a place appears in the form of a serpent eating fruit placed before him.

GENSERIC, king of the Vandals, and the most terrible of all the barbarian invaders of the empire. In A.D. 429 he crossed over from Spain to Africa, and ravaged the country with frightful severity. Hippo was taken by him in 431, but Carthage did not fall into his hands till 439. Having thus become master of the whole of the northwest of Africa, he attacked Italy itself. In 455 he took Rome and plundered it for four seven days, and in the same year he destroyed Capua, Nola, and Neapolis. Twice the empire endeavored to revenge itself, and twice it failed: the first was the attempt of the Western emperor Majorian (457), whose fleet was destroyed in the Bay of Carthage. The second was the expedition sent by the Eastern emperor Leo (468), which was also baffled by the burning of the fleet off Bonn. Genseric died in 477, at a great age. He was an Arian; and in the cruelties exercised under his orders against his Catholic subjects he exhibited the first instance of persecution carried on upon a large scale by one body of Christians against another.

Gentius, son of Pleuratus, a king of the Illyrians. As early as B.C. 180 he had given offence to the Romans on account of the piracies of his subjects; and in 168 he entered into an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia. In the following year the prætor L. Anicius Gallus was sent against him. The war was finished within thirty days. Gentius was defeated in battle, and then surrendered himself to Anicius, who carried him to Rome to adorn his triumph. He was afterward kept as a prisoner at Spoletium.

GENUA (Genova, Genoa, Genoensis: now Genoa), an important commercial town in Liguria, situated at the extremity of the Ligurian Gulf (now Gulf of Genoa), was in the possession of the Romans at the beginning of the second Punic war, but toward the end of the war was held for some time by the Carthaginian Mago. It was a Roman municipium, but it did not become of political importance till the Middle Ages, when it was commonly called Janua.

GENCIA GENA, patrician, of which the principal families bore the names of AVENTINENSIS and ACCURANA.

GENTEUS (now Iakus), a river in Greek Illyria, north of the Apsus.

GERATIAI (Γεραιαί), an Athenian family, to which Harmodius and Aristogiton belonged. They said that they came originally from Eretria in Euboea. Herodotus believed them to be Phœnician descent, to have followed Cadmus into Boeotia, and from thence to have emigrated to Athens. They dwelt on the banks of the Cephissus, which separated the territory of Athens from that of Eleusis, and their name was said to have been derived from the bridge (γέφυρα) which was built over the river at this point. Such a notion, however, is quite untenable, since "bridge" appears to have been a comparatively recent meaning of γέφυρα. We find that there were temples at Athens belonging peculiarly to the Gephyraei, to the exclusion of the rest of the Athenians, especially one to Ceres (Demeter) Achæa, whose worship they seem to have brought with them from Boeotia.

GERMA, a Gothic people, who came from Scandinavia, and first settled in the country between the Oder and the Vistula, from which they expelled the Burgundiones. Subsequently they joined the numerous hosts of Attila; and after his death they settled in Dacia, on the banks of the Danube. As they were dangerous neighbors to the Eastern empire, Justinian invoked the aid of the Langobardi or Lombards, who conquered the Gepides and destroyed their kingdom.

GER or GIR (Γερ: now Ghis or Maïsoy), a river of Gætulia in Africa, south of Mauretania Cæsariensis, flowing southeast from the southern slope of Mount Atlas till it is lost in the desert. It first became known to the Romans through the expedition of Suetonius Paulinus in the reign of Nero.

GERASTUS (Γεραστός: Γεραστίας: now Cape Mandili), a promontory and harbor at the southern extremity of Euboea, with a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), in whose honor the festival of the Gerastia (Γεραστία) was here celebrated.

GERANEA (ἡ Γεράνεια), a range of mountains, beginning at the southwestern slope of Cithæron, and running along the western coast of Megaris till it terminated in the promontory Olmias in the Corinthian territory; but the name is sometimes confined to the mountain in the Corinthian territory.

GERENIA (Γερηνία), an ancient town in Messenia, the birth-place of Nestor, who is hence called Gerenian (Γερηνίως). It was regarded by some as the same place as the Homeric Enopæ.

GERGIA, or GERGITHA, or -IA, or -US (Γέργης, Γέργυθα, or -ας, or -ος: Γεργίθιος), a town in the Troad, north of the Scamander, inhabited by Teucrians. Attalus removed the inhabitants to the sources of the Caïcus, where mention is made of a place called Gergætha or Gergithion in the territory of Cyme.

GERGŌVIA. 1. A fortified town of the Arverni in Gaul, situated on a high and inaccessible hill, west or southwest of the Elaver (now Allier). Its site is uncertain; but it was probably in the neighborhood of the modern Clermont.—2. A town of the Boii in Gaul, of uncertain site.

GERMA (Γέρμα), the name of three cities in Asia Minor. 1. (Ruins at Germaslu) in Mysia Minor, near Oxyzus.—2. (Now Yermatepe) in Mysia, between Pergamus and Thyatira.—3. (Now Yerma) in Galatia, between Possinus and Ancyra; a colonia.

GERMÂNIA, was bounded by the Rhine on the west, by the Vistula and the Carpathian Mountains on the east, by the Danube on the south, and by the German Ocean and the Baltic on the north. It thus included much more than modern Germany on the north and east, but much less in the west and south. The north and northeast of Gallia Belgica were likewise called Germania Prima and Secunda under the Roman emperors (vid. p. 319, a); and it was in contradistinction to these provinces that Germania proper was also called GERMANIA MAGNA or G. TRANSRHENANA, or G. BARNABA. It was not till Cæsar's campaigns in Gaul (B.C. 53–50) that the Romans obtained any accurate knowledge of the country. The Roman writers represent Germany as a dismal land, covered for the most part with forests and swamps, producing little corn, and subject to intense frosts and almost eternal winter. Although these accounts are probably exaggerated, yet there can be no doubt, that, before the immense woods were cleared and the morasses drained, the climate of Germany was much colder than it is at present. The north of Germany is a vast plain, but in the south there are many mountains, which were covered in antiquity with vast forests, and thus were frequently called Silvæ. Of these the most important was the HERCYNIA SILVA. The chief rivers were the RHENUS (now Rhine), DANUBIUS (now Danube), VISTULA, AMISIA (now Emu), VISURIA (now Weser), ALBIS (now Elbe), VIADUS (now Oder). The inhabitants were called GERMANI by the Romans. Tacitus says (German, 2) that Germani was the name of the Tungri, who were the first German people that crossed the Rhine. It would seem that this name properly belonged only to those tribes who were settled in Gaul; and as these were the first German tribes with which the Romans came into contact, they extended the name to the whole nation. The etymology of the name is uncertain. Some modern writers derive it from the German ger, gner, Heer, Wehr, so that the word would be equivalent to Wehrman, Wehrmänner, that is, warriors. The Germans themselves do not appear to have used any one name to indicate the whole nation; for there is no reason to believe, as some have done, that the name Teutones (i. e., Teuten, Deutsche) was the general name of the nation in the time of the Romans. The Germans regarded themselves as indigenous in the country; but there can be no doubt that they were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who, along with the Celts, migrated into Europe from the Caucasus and the countries around the Black and Caspian Seas at a period long anterior to historical records. They are described as a people of high stature and of great bodily strength, with fair complexions, blue eyes, and yellow or red hair. Notwithstanding the severity of their climate, they wore little clothing, and their children went entirely naked. They had scarcely any defensive armor: their chief offensive weapon was the franca, a long spear with a narrow iron point, which they either darted from a distance or pushed in close combat. Their houses were only low huts, made of rough timber, and thatched with straw. A number of these were of course often built near each other; but they could not be said to have any towns properly so called. Many of their tribes were nomad, and every year changed their place of abode. The men found their chief delight in the perils and excitement of war. In peace they passed their lives in listless indolence, only varied by deep gaming and excessive drinking. Their chief drink was beer, and their carouses frequently ended in bloody brawls. The women were held in high honor. Their chastity was without reproach. They accompanied their husbands to battle, and cheered them on by their presence, and frequently by their example as well. Both sexes were equally distinguished for their unconquerable love of liberty; and the women frequently destroyed both themselves and their children rather than fall into the power of their husbands' conquerors. In each tribe we find the people divided into four classes: the nobles; the freemen; the freedmen or vassals; and the slaves. All questions relating to peace and war, and the general interests of the tribe, were decided in the popular assembly, in which each freeman had a right to take part. In these assemblies a king was elected from among the nobles; but his power was very limited, and he only acted as the supreme magistrate in time of peace; for when a war broke out, the people elected a distinguished warrior as their leader, upon whom the prerogatives of the king devolved. The religion of the Germans is known to us only from the Greek and Roman writers, who have confused the subject by seeking to identify the gods of the Germans with their own divinities. We know that they worshipped the sun, the moon, and the stars. They are also said to have paid especial honor to Mercury, who was probably the German Woden or Od-á. Their other chief divinities were Iais (probably Freia, the wife of Odin); Mars (Tyr or Zio, the German god of war); the mother of the gods, called Nerthus (less correctly Herthius or Hertha); and Jupiter (Thor, or the god of Thunder). The worship of the gods was simple. They had both priests and priestesses to attend to their service; and some of the priestesses, such as Veleda among the Bructeri, were celebrated throughout Germany for their prophetic powers. The Germani first appear in history in the campaigns of the Cimbri and Teutones (B.C. 118), the latter of whom were undoubtedly a Germanic people. Vid. Teutones. About fifty years afterward, Arminius, a German chief, crossed the Rhine, with a vast host of Germans, and subdued a great part of Gaul; but he was defeated by Cæsar with great slaughter (58), and drives beyond the Rhine. Cæsar twice crossed this river (55, 53), but made no permanent conquest on the eastern bank. In the reign of Augustus, his step-son, Drusus, carried on war in Germany with great success for four years (13-9) and penetrated as far as the Elbe. On his death (9), his brother Tiberius succeeded to the command; and under him the country between the Rhine and the Visurgie (now Weser) was entirely subjugated, and bid fair to become a Roman province. But in A.D. 9, the impious and tyrannical conduct of the Roman governor Quintilius Varus, provoked a general insurrection of the various German tribes, headed by Arminius, the Cheruscan. Varus and his legions were defeated and destroyed, and the Romans lost all their conquests east of the Rhine. Vid. VARUS. The defeat of Varus was avenged by the successful campaigns of Germanicus, who would probably have recovered the Roman dominions east of the river, had not the jealousy of Tiberius recalled him to Rome, A.D. 16. From this time the Romans abandoned all further attempts to conquer Germany; but, in consequence of the civil dissensions which broke out in Germany soon after the departure of Tiberius, they were enabled to obtain peaceable possession of a large portion of the southwest of Germany, between the Rhine and the Danube, to which they gave the name of the AGRI DECUMATATI. Vid. p. 38, b. On the death of Nero, several of the tribes in Western Germany joined the Batavi in their insurrection against the Romans (A.D. 69-71). Domitian and Trajan had to repel the attacks of some German tribes; but in the reign of Antoninus Pius the Marcomanni, joined by various other tribes, made a more formidable attack upon the Roman dominions, and threatened the empire with destruction. From this time the Romans were often called upon to defend the left bank of the Rhine against their dangerous neighbors, especially against the two powerful confederations as the Alamanni and Franks (vid. ALAMANNI, FRANKI); and in the fourth and fifth centuries the Germans obtained possession of some of the finest provinces of the empire. The Germans are divided by Tacitus into three great tribes: 1. Ingvæones, on the Ocean. 2. Hermiones, inhabiting the central parts. 3. Isæones, in the remainder of Germany, consequently in the eastern and southern parts. These three names were said to be derived from the three sons of Mannus, the son of Tuison. Pliny makes five divisions: 1. Vindili, including Burgundiones, Varini, Catti, and Guttones. 2. Ingvæones, including Cimabri, Teutones, and Chauci. 3. Isæones, including the midland Cimabri. 4. Hermiones, including the Suevi, Hermunduri, Chatti, and Cherusci. 5. Provinciæ et Bastarnæ, bordering on the Dacians. But whether we adopt the division of Tacitus or Pliny, we ought to add the inhabitants of the Scandinavian peninsula, the Illeiviones, divided into the Simones and Sitones. It is difficult to fix with accuracy the position of the various tribes, as they frequently migrated from one spot to another. An account of each is given under the name of the tribe. Vid. CHAUCI, CHERUSCI, CIMBRI, SUEVI, &c.

GERMANIUS CARBAR, son of Nero Claudius Drusus and Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir Antony, was born B.C. 16. He was adopted by his uncle Tiberius in the lifetime of Augustus, and was raised at an early age to the honors of the state. He assisted Tiberius in the war against the Pannonians and Dalmatians (A.D. 7-10), and also fought along with Tiberius against the Germans in the two following years (11, 12). He had the command of the legions in Germany when the alarming mutiny broke out among the troops in Germany and Illyricum, upon the death of Augustus (14). Germanicus was a favorite with the soldiers, and they offered to place him at the head of the empire; but he rejected their proposal, and exerted all his influence to quell the mutiny, and reconcile them to their new sovereign. After restoring order among the troops, he crossed the Rhine, and laid waste the country of the Marci with fire and sword. In the following year (15) he again crossed the Rhine, and marched into the interior of the country. He penetrated as far as the Saltus Teutoburgiensis, north of the Lippe, in which forest the army of Quintilius Varus had been destroyed by the Germans. Here his troops gathered up the bones of their ill-fated comrades, and paid the last honors to their memory. But meantime Arminius had collected a formidable army with which he attacked the Romans; and it was not without considerable loss that Germanicus made good his retreat to the Rhine. It was in this campaign that Thueselda, the wife of Arminius, fell into the hands of Germanicus. Vid. ARMINIUS. Next year (16) Germanicus placed his troops on board a fleet of one thousand vessels, and sailed through the canal of his father, Drusus (vid. p. 278, a), and the Zuydersee to the ocean and from thence to the mouth of the Amnis (now Emis), where he landed his forces. After crossing the Emis and the Waser, he fought two battles with Arminius, in both of which the Germans were completely defeated. The Germans could no longer offer him any effectual resistance, and Germanicus needed only another year to reduce completely the whole country between the Rhine and the Elbe. But the jealousy of Tiberius saved Germany. Upon pretence of the dangerous state of affairs in the East, the emperor recalled Germanicus to Rome which he entered in triumph on the 26th of May A.D. 17. In the same year all the eastern provinces were assigned to Germanicus; but Tiberius placed Cn. Piso in command of Syria, with secret instructions to check and thwart Germanicus. Piso soon showed his hostility to Germanicus; and his wife, Plancia, in like manner, did every thing in her power to annoy Agrippina, the wife of Germanicus. In 18, Germanicus proceeded to Armenia, where he placed Zeno on the throne, and in the following year (19) he visited Egypt, and on his return he was seized with a dangerous illness, of which he died. He believed that he had been poisoned by Piso, and shortly before he died he summoned his friends, and called upon them to avenge his murder. He was deeply and sincerely lamented by the Roman people; and Tiberius was obliged to sacrifice Piso to the public indignation. Vid. PISO. By Agrippina he had nine children, of whom six survived him. Of these the most notorious were the Emperor Caligula, and Agrippina, the mother of Nero. Germanicus was an author of some repute. He wrote several poetical works. We still possess the remains of his Latin translation of the Phænomena of Aratus. The latest edition of this work is by Oralli, at the end of his Phædrus, Zurich, 1831.

GERMANICIA or GERMANICA (Γερμανικία Καυκάσια Γερμανική), a town in the Syrian provinces of Commagene, near the borders of Cappadocia: the birth-place of the heretic Nestorius.

GERRA (Γέρρα: near El-Katif), one of the chief cities of Arabia and India, stood on the northeastern coast of Arabia, and a great emporium for the trade of Arabia Felix, two hundred stadia (twenty geographical miles) from the shore of the Sinus Gerraicus or Gerraicus (now Ebnah Bay), a bay on the western side of the Persian Gulf, two thousand four hundred stadia (two hundred and forty geographical miles—4° of lat.) from the mouth of the Tigris. The city was five Roman miles in circuit. The inhabitants, called Gerrai (Γερραι), were said to have been originally Chaldeans, who were driven out of Babylon. There was a small place of the same name on the northeastern frontier of Egypt, between Pelusium and Mount Casius, fifty stadia or eight Roman miles from the former.

GERRHUS (Γέρρος), a river of Scythia, flowing through a country of the same name, was a branch of the Borysthenes, and flowed into the Hapacryia, dividing the country of the Nomad Scythians from that of the Royal Scythians.

GERUNDA (now Gerona), a town of the Ausetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Tarraco to Narbo in Gaul.

[GERANIUM, is named by Livy, in his account of the second Punic war, as an ancient decayed city of the Samnites.]

GERATON or GERATONES (Γεράτων), son of Phry

saor and Gallirrhô, a monster with three heads, or, according to others, with three bodies united together, was a king in Spain, and possessed magnificent oxen, which Hercules carried away. For details, vid HERCULES.

GESORIAUM (now Boulogne), a port of the Morini in Gallia Belgica, at which persons usually embarked to cross over to Britain: it was subsequently called BONONIA, whence its modern name.

GESIUS FLORUS. VID FLORUS.

GETA. SEPTIMIUS, brother of Caracalla, by whom he was assassinated, A.D. 212. For details, vid CARACALLA.

GETÆ, a Thracian people, called Daci by the Romans. Herodotus and Thucydides place them south of the Ister (now Danube), near its mouth, but in the time of Alexander the Great they dwelt beyond this river and north of the Triballi. They were driven by the Sarmatians further west toward Germany. For their later history, vid DACIA.

GIGANTES (Γίγαντες), the giants. According to Homer, they were a gigantic and savage race of men, dwelling in the distant west, in the island of Thrinacia, and were destroyed on account of their insolence toward the gods. Hesiod considers them as divine beings, who sprang from the blood that fell from Cœlus (Uranus) upon the earth, so that Terra (Ge) (the earth) was their mother. Neither Homer nor Hesiod knows any thing about their contest with the gods. Later poets and mythographers frequently confound them with the Titans, and represent them as enemies of Jupiter (Zeus) and the gods, whose abode on Olympus they attempt to take by storm. Their battle with the gods seems to be only an imitation of the revolt of the Titans against Uranus. Terra (Ge), it is said, indignant at the fate of her former children, the Titans, gave birth to the Gigantes, who were beings of a monstrous size, with fearful countenances and the tails of dragons. They were born, according to some, in the Phlegrean plains in Sicily, Campania, or Arcadia, and, according to others, in the Thracian Pallene. In their native land they made an attack upon heaven, being armed with huge rocks and trunks of trees. The gods were told that they could not conquer the giants without the assistance of a mortal, whereupon they summoned Hercules to their aid. The giants Alcyoneus and Porphyrius distinguished themselves above their brethren. Alcyoneus was immortal so long as he fought in his native land; but Hercules dragged him away to a foreign land, and thus killed him. Porphyrius was killed by the lightning of Jupiter (Zeus) and the arrows of Hercules. The other giants, whose number is said to have been twenty-four, were then killed one after another by the gods and Hercules, and some of them were buried by their conquerors under (volcanic) islands. It is worthy of remark, that most writers place the giants in volcanic districts; and it is probable that the story of their contest with the gods took its origin from volcanic convulsions.

GIΘONIS (Γίθωνος; Γυθώνος), a town and promontory of Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf. [GILBOA MORA, a sterile range of hills to the south and south east of Tabor, bounding the valley of the Jordan on the west for many miles.]

GILDO or GILDON, a Moorish chieftain, governor of Africa for some years as a subject of the Western empire; but in A.D. 397 he transferred his allegiance to the Eastern empire, and the Emperor Arcadius accepted him as a subject. Stilicho, guardian of Honorius, sent an army against him. Gildo was defeated; and being taken prisoner, he put an end to his own life by hanging himself (398). The history of this war forms the subject of one of Claudian's poems (De Bello Gildonico).

GINDÆUS (Γινδαρος; now Gindaries), a very strong fortress in the district of Cyrrhestes in Syria, northeast of Antioch.

[GIR. VID GER.]

GISSA, a city on the island of Meninx (now Jerba), at the southern extremity of the Lesser Syrtia, in northern Africa: celebrated for its manufactures of purple.

GISSO or GISSO (Γίσκων or Γέσκων). 1. Son of Hamilcar, who was defeated and killed in the battle of Himera, B.C. 480. In consequence of this calamity, Gisso was banished from Carthage. He died at Selinus in Sicily.—2. Son of Hanno, was in exile when the Carthaginians were defeated at the River Crimisus by Timoleon, 339. He was then recalled from exile, and sent to oppose Timoleon, but was unable to accomplish any thing of importance.—3. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Lilybœum at the end of the first Punic war. After the conclusion of peace, 241, he was deputed by the government to treat with the mercenaries who had risen in revolt, but he was seized by them and put to death.

GRILOAS (Γριλάδας), a Lacedæmonian architect, statuary, and poet. He completed the temple of Minerva (Athena) Poliouchos at Sparta, and ornamented it with works in bronze, from which it was called the Brazen House, and hence the goddess received the surname of Χαλκιδίονος. He composed a hymn to the goddess, besides other poems. He flourished about B.C. 516, and is the last Spartan artist of any distinction.

GLABRIO, ACILIUS, plebeian. 1. C., quaestor B.C. 203, and tribune of the plebs 197. He acted as interpreter to the Athenian embassy in 155, when the three philosophers, Carneades, Diogenes, and Critolaus, came as envoys to Rome. He wrote in Greek a history of Rome from the earliest period to his own time. It was translated into Latin by one Claudius, and his version is cited by Livy, under the titles of Annales Aciliani (xv., 39) and Libri Aciliani (xxv., 14).—2. M., tribune of the plebs 201 prætor 196, and consul 191. In his consulship he defeated Antiochus at Thermopylae, and subsequently the Ætolians likewise.—3. M., married a daughter of M. Attilius Scaurus, consul 118, whom Sulla, in 93, compelled him to divorce. Glabrio was prætor urbanus in 70, when he presided at the impeachment of Verres. He was consul in 67, and in the following year præconsul of Cilicia. He succeeded L. Lucullus in the command of the war against Mithradates, but remained inactive in Bithynia. He was superseded by Cn. Pompey.—4. M^r, son of No. 3, was born in the house of Cn. Pompey, B.C. 91, who married his mother after her compulsory divorce from the elder Glabrio. Emilia died in giving birth to him. In the civil war, Glabrio was one of Caesar's lieutenants, commanded the garrison of Oricum in Epirus in 48, and was stationed in Sicily in 46. He was twice defended on capital charges by Cicero, and acquitted.

CLANIS, more usually written CLANUM.

CLANUM LIVII (ruins near St. Renny), a town of the Salys in Gallia Narbonensis.

GLAPHYRA. Vid. ARCHELAUS, No. 6.

GLAUCE (Γλαύκη). 1. One of the Nereides, the name Glaucē being only a personification of the color of the sea.—2. Daughter of Creon of Corinth, also called Cressa. For details, vid. CREON.

GLAUCIA, C. SERVILIUS, prætor B.C. 100, the chief supporter of Saturninus, with whom he was put to death in this year. Vid. SATURNINUS.

GLAUCIAS (Γλαυκίας). 1. King of the Taulantians, one of the Illyrian tribes, fought against Alexander the Great, B.C. 336. In 316 he afforded an asylum to the infant Pyrrhus, and refused to surrender him to Cassander. In 307 he invaded Epirus, and placed Pyrrhus, then twelve years old, upon the throne.—2. A Greek physician, who probably lived in the third or second century B.C.—3. A statuary of Ægina, who made the bronze chariot and statue of Gellon, flourished B.C. 488.

GLAUCON (Γλαύκων). 1. Son of Critias, brother of Callicles, and father of Charmides and of Plato's mother, Perictione.—2. Brother of Plato, who makes him one of the speakers in the Republic.

GLAUCUS (Γλαύκος). 1. Grandson of Æolus, son of Sisypheus and Merope, and father of Bellerophon. He lived at Potnia, despised the power of Venus (Aphrodite), and did not allow his mares to breed, that they might be the stronger for the horse-race. According to others, he fed them with human flesh. This excited the anger of Venus (Aphrodite), who destroyed him. According to some accounts, his horses became frightened and threw him out of his chariot, as he was contending in the funeral games celebrated by Acæstus in honor of his father Pelias. According to others, his horses tore him to pieces, having drunk from the waters of a sacred well in Boeotia, in consequence of which they were seized with madness. Glaucus of Potnia (Γλαύκος Ποτνιαίος) was the title of one of the lost tragedies of Æschylus.—2. Son of Hippolochus, and grandson of Bellerophon, was a Lycian prince, and assisted Priam in the Trojan war. He was connected with Diomedes by ties of hospitality; and when they recognised one another in the battle, they abstained from fighting, and exchanged arms with one another. Glaucus was slain by Ajax.—3. Son of the Meconian sine Ægyptus, whom he succeeded on the throne.—

4. One of the sons of the Cretan king Minos by Pasiphaë or Orete. When a boy, he fell into a cask full of honey, and was smothered. Minos searched for his son in vain, and was at length informed by Apollo or the Curetes that the person who should devise the most appropriate comparison between a cow, which could assume three different colors, and any other object, would find the boy. The soothsayer Polydus of Argos solved the problem by likening the cow to a mulberry, which is at first white, then red, and in the end black. By his prophetic powers he then discovered the boy. Minos now required Polydus to restore his son to life; but as he could not accomplish this Minos ordered him to be entombed alive with the body of Glaucus. When Polydus was thus shut up in the vault, he saw a serpent approaching the dead body, and killed the reptile. Presently another serpent came, and placed a herb upon the dead serpent, which was thereby restored to life. Thereupon Polydus covered the body of Glaucus with the same herb, and the boy at once rose into life again. The story of Glaucus and Polydus was a favorite subject with the ancient poets and authors.—5. Of Anthedon in Boeotia, a fisherman, who became immortal by eating a part of the divine herb which Saturn (Cronos) had sown. His parentage is differently stated: some called his father Copeus, others Polybus, the husband of Euboea, and others, again, Anthedon or Neptune (Poseidon). He was further said to have been a clever diver, to have built the ship Argo, and to have accompanied the Argonauts as their steersman. In the sea-fight of Jason against the Tyrrhenians, Glaucus alone remained unhurt; he sank to the bottom of the sea, where he was visible to none save Jason. From this moment he became a marine deity, and was of service to the Argonauts. The story of his sinking or leaping into the sea was variously modified in the different traditions. There was a belief in Greece that once in every year Glaucus visited all the coasts and islands, accompanied by marine monsters, and gave his prophecies. Fishermen and sailors paid particular reverence to him, and watched his oracles, which were believed to be very trustworthy. He is said to have even instructed Apollo in the prophetic art. Some writers stated that he dwelt in Delos, where he prophesied in conjunction with the nymphs; but the place of his abode varied in different traditions. The stories about his various loves were favorite subjects with the ancient poets.—6. Of Chios, a statuary in metal, distinguished as the inventor of the art of soldering metals (κόλλησις), flourished B.C. 490. His most noted work was an iron base (ὑποκρηνημίδιον), which, with the silver bowl it supported, was presented to the temple at Delphi by Alyattes, king of Lydia.

GLAUCUS (Γλαύκος). 1. A small river of Phrygia, falling into the Mæander near Eumenia.—2. A small river of Lycia, on the borders of Caria, flowing into the Sinus Glaucus (now Gulf of Makri).

GLAUKIA (now Ameland), an island off the east of the Frisii, so called from "gleesum" or amber which was found there: its proper name was Austeravia.

GLIAS (Γλίσις: Γλισάντιος), an ancient town in Boeotia, on Mount Hypaton. It was in ruins to the time of Pausanias.

GLYCAS, MICHAEL, a Byzantine historian, the author of a work entitled Annals (Βιβλίος χρονιᾶς), containing the history of the world from the creation to the death of Alexis I. Comnenus, A.D. 1118. Edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836.

GLYCEA (Γλυκερά), "the sweet one," a favorite name of hetairæ. The most celebrated hetairæ of this name are, 1. The daughter of Thalesias, and the mistress of Harpalus.—2. Of Sicyon, and the mistress of Pausanias.—3. A favorite of Horace.

GLYCEIUS, became emperor of the West A.D. 473, after the death of Olybrius, by the assistance of Gundobald the Burgundian. But the Byzantine court did not acknowledge Glyceius, and proclaimed Julius Nepos emperor, by whom Glyceius was dethroned (474), and compelled to become a priest. He was appointed bishop of Salona in Dalmatia.

GLYCON (Γλύκων) an Athenian sculptor, known to us by the magnificent colossal marble statue of Hercules, commonly called the "Farnese Hercules." It was found in the baths of Caracalla, and after adorning the Farnese palace for some time, was removed to the royal museum at Naples. It represents the hero resting on his club after one of his labors. The swollen muscles admirably express repose after severe exertion. Glycon probably lived under the early Roman emperors.

GNIPHO, M. ANTONIUS, a Roman rhetorician, was born B.C. 114, in Gaul, but studied at Alexandria. He afterward established a school at Rome, which was attended by many distinguished men, and among others by Cicero, when he was prætor.

GNOSUS, GNOSUS. Vid. CROSUS.

GOBRYAS (Γωβρύας), a noble Persian, one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian. He accompanied Darius into Scythia. He was doubly related to Darius by marriage; Darius married the daughter of Gobryas, and Gobryas married the sister of Darius.

[GOGGANA (Γόγγα, now Kongun or Cogun), a place in the Persian district Persia.]

GOLAI (Γολαί: Γόλγιοι), a town in Cyprus, of uncertain site, was a Sicyonian colony, and one of the chief seats of the worship of Aphrodite (Venus).

GOMPHI (Γόμφοι: Γομφεῖς), a town in Hætimotis in Thessaly, was a strong fortress on the confines of Epirus, and commanded the chief pass between Thessaly and Epirus: it was taken and destroyed by Cæsar (B.C. 48), but was afterward rebuilt.

GONNI, GONNUS (Γόννοι, Γόννος: Γόννιος), a strongly fortified town of the Perrhæbi in Thessaly, on the River Peneus, and at the entrance of the Vale of Tempe, was, from its position, of great military importance: but it is not mentioned after the time of the wars between the Macedonians and Romans.

GORDIANUS, M. ANTONIUS, the name of three Roman emperors, father, son, and grandson. 1. Surnamed AFRICANUS, son of Marcus Marcellus and Ulpia Gordiana, possessed a princely fortune, and was distinguished alike by moral and intellectual excellence. In his first consulship, A.D. 218, he was the colleague of Caracalla; in his second, of Alexander Severus, and soon afterward was nominated præconsul of Africa. After governing Africa for several years with justice and integrity, a rebellion broke out in the province in consequence of the tyranny of the procurator of Maximinus. The ring-leaders of the conspiracy compelled Gordian, who was now in his eightieth year, to assume the imperial title. He entered on his new duties at Carthage in the month of February, associated his son with him in the empire, and dispatched letters to Rome announcing his elevation. Gordianus and his son were at once proclaimed Augusti by the senate, and preparations were made in Italy to resist Maximinus. But meantime a certain Capellianus, procurator of Numidia, refused to acknowledge the authority of the Gordians, and marched against them. The younger Gordianus was defeated by him and slain in the battle; and his aged father thereupon put an end to his own life, after reigning less than two months.—2. Son of the preceding and of Fabia Orestilla, was born A.D. 192, was associated with his father in the purple, and fell in battle, as recorded above.—3. Grandson of the elder Gordianus, either by a daughter or by the younger Gordianus. The soldiers proclaimed him emperor in July, A.D. 238, after the murder of Balbinus and Pupienus, although he was a mere boy, probably not more than twelve years old. He reigned six years, from 238 to 244. In 241 he married the daughter of Mithridates, and in the same year set out for the east to carry on the war against the Persians. With the assistance of Mithridates, he defeated the Persians in 242. Mithridates died in the following year; and Philippos, whom Gordian had taken into his confidence, excited discontent among the soldiers, who at length rose in open mutiny, and assassinated Gordian in Mesopotamia, 244. He was succeeded by PHILIPPUS.

GORDIUM (Γόρδιον, Γορδιόν Κώμη), the ancient capital of Phrygia, the royal residence of the kings of the dynasty of Gordius, and the scene of Alexander's celebrated exploit of "cutting the Gordian knot." Vid. GORDIUS. It was situated in the west of that part of Phrygia which was afterward called Galatia, north of Pessinus, on the northern bank of the Sangarius. In the reign of Augustus it received the name of Jalio polis (Ιουλιούπολις).

GORDIUS (Γόρδιος), an ancient king of Phrygia, and father of Midas, was originally a poor peasant. Internal disturbances having broken out in Phrygia, an oracle informed the inhabitants that a wagon would bring them a king, who should at the same time put an end to the disturbances. When the people were deliberating on these points, Gordius, with his wife and son, suddenly appeared riding in his wagon in the assembly of the people, who at once acknowledged him as king. Gordius, out of gratitude, dedicated his chariot to Jupiter (Zeus) in the acropolis of Gordium. The pole was fastened to the yoke by a knot of bark; and an oracle declared that whatsoever should untie the knot should reign over all Asia. Alexander, on his arrival at Gordium, cut the knot with his sword and applied the oracle to himself.

GORDIUTICHOS (Γορδιού τειχος) a town in Caria, near the borders of Phrygia, between Antiochia and Masandrum and Tabas.

GORDYÆ. Vid. GORDYENE.

GORDYÆ MONTES (ἡ ὄρος Γορδύων): now Mountains of Kurdistan, the name given by Strabo to the northern part of the broad belt of mountains which separates the Tigris Valley from the great table-land of Iran, and which divided Mesopotamia and Assyria from Armenia and Media. They are connected with the mountains of Armenia at Ararat, whence they run southeast between the Araxes Palus (now Lake Van) and the sources of the Tigris and its upper confluent as far as the confines of Media, where the chain turns more to the south and was called Zagros.

GORDYENE or CORDUENE (Γορδύνη, Κορδουή), a mountainous district in the south of Armenia Major, between the Araxes Palus (now Lake Van) and the GORDYÆ MONTES. After the Mithradatic war, it was assigned by Pompey to Tigranes, with whom its possession had been disputed by the Parthian king Phraates. Trajan added it to the Roman empire; and it formed afterward a constant object of contention between the Romans and the Parthian and Persian kings, but was for the most part virtually independent. Its warlike inhabitants, called Γορδύωνες or Corduēni, were no doubt the same people as the CARDUENS of the earlier Greek geographers, and the Kurds of modern times.

GORGÆ (Γόργη), daughter of Œneus and Althea. She and her sister Deianira alone retained their original form, when their other sisters were metamorphosed by Diana (Artemis) into birds.

GORGAS (Γόργας). 1. Of Leontini, in Sicily, a celebrated rhetorician and orator, sophist and philosopher, was born about B.C. 480, and is said to have lived one hundred and five years, or even one hundred and nine years. Of his early life we have no particulars; but when he was of advanced age (B.C. 427) he was sent by his fellow-citizens as ambassador to Athens, for the purpose of soliciting its protection against Syracuse. He seems to have returned to Leontini only for a short time, and to have spent the remaining years of his vigorous old age in the towns of Greece Proper, especially at Athens and the Thessalian Larissa, enjoying honor every where as an orator and teacher of rhetoric. The common statement that Pericles and the historian Thucydides were among his pupils can not be true, as he did not go to Athens till after the death of Pericles; but Alcibiades, Alcidamas, Æschines, and Antisthenes are called either pupils or imitators of Gorgias, and his oratory must have had great influence upon the rhetorician Isocrates. The high estimation in which he was held at Athens appears from the way in which he is introduced in the dialogue of Plato, which bears his name. The eloquence of Gorgias was chiefly calculated to tickle the ear by antitheses, alliterations, the symmetry of its parts, and similar artifices. Two declamations have come down to us under the name of Gorgias, viz. the Apology of Polus, and the Encomium on Helena, the genuineness of which is doubtful. Besides his orations, which were mostly what the Greeks called Epidictic or speeches for display, such as his oration addressed to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, Gorgias also wrote loci communes, probably as rhetorical exercises; a work on dissimilar and homogeneous words, and another on rhetoric. The works of Gorgias did not even contain the elements of a scientific theory of oratory any more than his oral instructions. He confined himself to teaching his pupils a variety of rhetorical artifices, and made them learn by heart certain formulas relative to them. —2. Of Athens, gave instruction in rhetoric to young M. Cicero when he was at Athens. He wrote a rhetorical work, a Latin abridgment of which by Rutilius Lupus is still extant, under the title De Figuris Sententiarum et Elocutionis.

GORGEO and GORGONES (Γοργώ and Γοργόνες). Homer mentions only one Gorgo, who appears in the Odyssey (xi, 638) as one of the frightful phantoms in Hades: in the Iliad the agie of Athens (Minerva) contains the head of Gorgo the terror of her enemies. Hesiod mentions three Gorgones, STENO, EURYLE, and MEDUSA, daughters of Phorcys and Ceto, whence they are sometimes called PHORCIDES. Hesiod placed them in the far west in the Ocean, in the neighborhood of Night and the Heesperides; but later traditions transferred them to Libya. They were frightful beings; instead of hair, their heads were covered with hissing serpents; and they had wings, brazen claws, and enormous teeth. Medusa, who alone of her sisters was mortal, was, according to some legends, at first a beautiful maiden, but her hair was changed into serpents by Athens (Minerva) in consequence of her having become by Poseidon the mother of Chrysaor and Pegasus in one of Athens's (Minerva's) temples. Her head now became so fearful that every one who looked at it was changed into stone. Hence the great difficulty which Perceus had in killing her. Vid. PERSEUS. Athens (Minerva) afterward placed the head in the centre of her shield or breast-plate.

[GORGOS (Γόργος). 1. Son of Charis, a king of Salamis in Cyprus: he joined Xerxes in his invasion of Greece.—2. Son of Oypealus, founder of Ambracia.]

GORTYN, GORTYNA (Γόρτυν, Γόρτυνα Γορτύνηος). 1. Ruins near Bagios Dikea, six miles from the foot of Mount Ida, one of the most ancient cities in Crete, on the River Lethæus, ninety stadia from its harbor Lebén, and one hundred and thirty stadia from its other harbor Metalia. It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Europa, whence it was called Holotis; and it was subsequently peopled by Minyans and Tyrrhene-Pelasgians, whence it also bore the name of Larissa. It was the second city in Crete, being only inferior to Cnossus.

and as the decline of the latter place under the Romans, it became the metropolis of the island.—2. Also GORTYS (ruins near Atrikolo), a town in Arcadia, on the River Gortynia, a tributary of the Alpheus.

GOths, GOTHONES, GUTHONES, a powerful German people, who played an important part in the overthrow of the Roman empire. They originally dwelt on the Prussian coast of the Baltic, at the mouth of the Vistula, where they are placed by Tacitus; but they afterward migrated south, and at the beginning of the third century they appear on the coasts of the Black Sea, where Caracalla encountered them on his march to the East. In the reign of the Emperor Philippus (A.D. 244-249), they obtained possession of a great part of the Roman province of Dacia; and in consequence of their settling in the countries formerly inhabited by the Getæ and Scythians, they are frequently called both Getæ and Scythians by later writers. From the time of Philippus the attacks of the Goths against the Roman empire became more frequent and more destructive. In A.D. 272 the Emperor Aurelian surrendered to them the whole of Dacia. It is about this time that we find them separated into two great divisions, the Ostrogoths or Eastern Goths, and the Visigoths or Western Goths. The Ostrogoths settled in Mœsia and Pannonia, while the Visigoths remained north of the Danube. The Visigoths, under their king Alaric, invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome (410). A few years afterward they settled permanently in the southwest of Gaul, and established a kingdom, of which Tolosa was the capital. From thence they invaded Spain, where they also founded a kingdom, which lasted for more than two centuries, till it was overthrown by the Arabs. The Ostrogoths meantime had extended their dominions almost up to the gates of Constantinople; and the Emperor Zeno was glad to get rid of them by giving them permission to invade and conquer Italy. Under their king Theodoric the Great they obtained possession of the whole of Italy (493). Theodoric took the title of King of Italy, and an Ostrogothic dynasty reigned in the country till it was destroyed by Narses, the general of Justinian, A.D. 553. The Ostrogoths embraced Christianity at an early period; and it was for their use that Ulphilas translated the sacred Scriptures into Gothic, about the middle of the fourth century.

GOTHINI, a Celtic people in the southeast of Germany, subject to the Quadi.

GRACCHANUS, M. JUVENIS, assumed his cognomen on account of his friendship with C. Gracchus. He wrote a work, De Potestatibus, which gave an account of the Roman constitution and magistracies from the time of the kings. It was addressed to T. Pomponius Atticus, the father of Cicero's friend. This work, which appears to have been one of great value, is lost, but some parts of it are cited by Joannes Lydus. Vid. LYDUS.

GRACCHUS, SEMPRONIUS, plebeian. 1. TIBERIUS, a distinguished general in the second

Punic war. In B.C. 216 he was magister equitum to the dictator M. Junius Pera; in 215 consul for the first time; and in 213 consul for the second time. In 212 he fell in battle against Mago, at Campi Veteres, in Lucania. His body was sent to Hannibal, who honored it with a magnificent burial.—2. TIBERIUS, was tribune of the plebs in 187; and although personally hostile to P. Scipio Africanus, he defended him against the attacks of the other tribunes, for which he received the thanks of the aristocratic party. Soon after this occurrence Gracchus was rewarded with the hand of Cornelia, the youngest daughter of P. Scipio Africanus. In 181 he was prætor, and received Hispania Citerior as his province, where he carried on the war with great success against the Celtiberians. After defeating them in battle, he gained their confidence by his justice and kindness. He returned to Rome in 178; and was consul 177, when he was sent against the Sardinians, who revolted. He reduced them to complete submission in 176, and returned to Rome in 175. He brought with him so large a number of captives that they were sold for a mere trifle which gave rise to the proverb Sardi evades. In 169 he was censor with C. Claudius Pulcher and was consul a second time in 168. He had twelve children by Cornelia, all of whom died at an early age except the two tribunes, Tiberius and Caius, and a daughter, Cornelia, who was married to P. Scipio Africanus the younger.—3. TIBERIUS, elder son of No. 2, lost his father at an early age. He was educated, together with his brother Caius, by his illustrious mother Cornelia, who made it the object of her life to render her sons worthy of their father and of her own ancestors. She was assisted in the education of her children by eminent Greeks, who exercised great influence upon the minds of the two brothers, and among whom we have especial mention of Diophanes of Mytilene, Menelaus of Marathon, and Blossius of Cumæ. Tiberius was nine years older than his brother Caius, and although they grew up under the same influence, and their characters resembled each other in the main outlines, yet they differed from each other in several important particulars. Tiberius was inferior to his brother in talent, but surpassed him in the amiable traits of his gentle nature: the simplicity of his demeanor, and his calm dignity, won for him the hearts of the people. His eloquence, too, formed a strong contrast with the passionate and impetuous harangues of Caius; for it was temperate, graceful, persuasive, and, proceeding as it did from the fullness of his own heart, it found a ready entrance into the hearts of his hearers. Tiberius served in Africa under P. Scipio Africanus the younger, who had married his sister, and was present at the destruction of Carthage (146). In 137 he was quaestor, and in that capacity he accompanied the consul Hostilius Mancinus, to Hispania Citerior, where he gained both the affection of the Roman soldiers, and the esteem and confidence of the victorious enemy. The distressed condition of the Roman people had deeply excited the sympathies of Tiberius. As he travelled through Etruria on his journey to Spain, he observed with grief and indignation the deserted state of that fertile country; thousands of foreign slaves in chains were employed in cultivating the land and tending the flocks upon the immense estates of the wealthy, while the poorer classes of Roman citizens, who were thus thrown out of employment, had scarcely their daily bread or a shod of earth to call their own. He resolved to use every effort to remedy this state of things, by endeavoring to create an industrious middle class of agriculturists, and to put a check upon the unbounded avarice of the ruling party, whose covetousness, combined with the disasters of the second Punic war, had completely destroyed the middle class of small land-owners. With this view, he offered himself as a candidate for the tribuneship, and obtained it for the year 133. The agrarian law of Licinius, which enacted that no one should possess more than five hundred jugera of public land, had never been repealed, but had for a long series of years been totally disregarded. The first measure, therefore, of Tiberius was to propose a bill to the people, renewing and enforcing the Licinian law, but with the modification that besides the five hundred jugera allowed by that law, any one might possess two hundred and fifty jugera of the public land for each of his sons. This clause, however, seems to have been limited to two, so that a father of two sons might occupy one thousand jugera of public land. The surplus was to be taken from them and distributed in small farms among the poor citizens. The business of measuring and distributing the land was to be intrusted to triumvirs, who were to be elected as a permanent magistracy. The measure encountered the most vehement opposition from the senate and the aristocracy, and they got one of the tribunes, M. Octavius, to put his intercessio or veto upon the bill. When neither persuasions nor threats would induce Octavius to withdraw his opposition, the people, upon the proposition of Tiberius, deposed Octavius from his office. The law was then passed; and the triumvirs appointed to carry it into execution were Tib. Gracchus, App. Claudius, his father-in-law, and his brother C. Gracchus, who was then little more than twenty years old, and was serving in the camp of P. Scipio at Numantia. About this time Attalus died, bequeathing his kingdom and his property to the Roman people. Gracchus thereupon proposed that this property should be distributed among the people, to enable the poor, who were to receive lands, to purchase the necessary implements, cattle, and the like. When the time came for the election of the tribunes for the following year, Tiberius again offered himself as a candidate. The senate declared that it was illegal for any one to hold this office for two consecutive years; but Tiberius paid no attention to the objection. While the tribes were voting, a band of senators, headed by P. Scipio Nasica, rushed from the senate house into the forum and attacked the people. Tiberius was killed as he was attempting to escape. He was probably about thirty-five years of age at the time of his death. Whatever were the errors of Tiberius in legislation, his motives were pure; and he died the death of a martyr in the protection of the poor and oppressed. All the reforms that have for many centuries been thrown upon Tiberius and his brother Caius arose from party prejudice, and more especially from a mis understanding of the nature of a Roman agrarian law, which did not deal with private property, but only with the public land of the state. Vid. Dict. of Ant. art. AGRARIÆ LEGES.—C. brother of No. 2, was in Spain at the time of his brother's murder, as has been already stated. He returned to Rome in the following year (132), but kept aloof from public affairs for some years. In 126 he was questor, and went to Sardinia, under the consul L. Aurelius Cotta, and there gained the approbation of his superiors and the attachment of the soldiers. The senate attempted to keep him in Sardinia, dreading his popularity in Rome; but after he had remained there two years, he left the province without leave, and returned to the city in 124. Urged on by the popular wish, and by the desire of avenging the cause of his murdered brother, he became a candidate for the tribuneship of the plebs, and was elected for the year 123. His reforms were far more extensive than his brother's, and such was his influence with the people that he carried all he proposed; and the senate were deprived of some of their most important privileges. His first measure was the renewal of the agrarian law of his brother. He next carried several laws for the amelioration of the condition of the poor, enacting that the soldiers should be equipped at the expense of the republic; that no person under the age of seventeen should be drafted for the army; and that every month corn should be sold at a low fixed price to the poor. In order to weaken the power of the senate, he enacted, that the judges in the judicia publica, who had hitherto been elected from the senate, should in future be chosen from the equites; and that in every year, before the consuls were elected, the senate should determine the two provinces which the consuls should have. No branch of the public administration appears to have escaped his notice. He gave a regular organization to the province of Asia, which had for many years been left unsettled. In order to facilitate intercourse between the several parts of Italy, and at the same time to give employment to the poor, he made new roads in all directions, repaired the old ones, and set up mile-stones along them. Caius was elected tribune again for the following year, 122. The senate, finding it impossible to resist the measures of Caius, resolved, if possible, to destroy his influence with the people, that they might retain the government in their own hands. For this purpose they persuaded M. Livius Drusus, one of the colleagues of Caius, to propose measures still more popular than those of Caius. The people allowed themselves to be duped by the treacherous agent of the senate, and the popularity of Caius gradually waned. During his absence in Africa, whither he had gone as one of the triumvirs to establish a colony at Carthage, in accordance with one of his own laws, his party had been considerably weakened by the influence of Drusus and the aristocracy, and many of his friends had deserted his cause. He failed in obtaining the tribuneship for the following year (121); and when his year of office expired, his enemies began to repeal several of his enactments. Caius appeared in the forum to oppose these proceedings. One of the attendants of the consul Opimius was slain by the friends of Caius. Opimius gladly availed himself of this pretext to persuade the senate to confer upon him unlimited power to act as he thought best for the good of the republic. Fulvius Flaccus, and the other friends of Caius, called upon him to repel force by force; but he refused to arm, and while his friends fought in his defence, he fled to the grove of the Furies, where he fell by the hands of his slave, whom he had commanded to put him to death. The bodies of the slain, whose number is said to have amounted to three thousand, were thrown into the Tiber, their property was confiscated, and their houses demolished. All the other friends of Gracchus who fell into the hands of their enemies were thrown into prison, and there strangled.

GRADIVUS, i. e., the marching (probably from gradior), a surname of Mars, who is hence called gradivus pater and rex gradivus. Mars Gracivus had a temple outside the porta Capena on the Appian road, and it is said that King Numa appointed twelve Salii as priests of this god.

GRÆÆ (Γραιαί), that is, "the old women," daughters of Phoreys and Ceto, were three in number, Pephredo, Enyo, and Dino, and were also called Phorcydes. They had gray hair from their birth; and had only one tooth and one eye in common, which they borrowed from each other when they wanted them. They were, perhaps, marine deities, like the other children of Phoreya.

GRÆCIA or HELLAS (ἡ Ἑλλάς), a country in Europe, the inhabitants of which were called GRÆCI or HELLÆNES (Ἑλλᾶνες). Among the Greeks Hellas did not signify any particular country, bounded by certain geographical limits, but was used in general to signify the abode of the Hellenes, wherever they might happen to be settled. Thus the Greek colonies of Cyrene in Africa, of Syracuse in Sicily, of Tarentum in Italy, and of Smyrna in Asia, are said to be in Hellas. In the most ancient times Hellas was a small district of Phthiotis in Thessaly, in which was situated a town of the same name. As the inhabitants of this district, the Hellenes, gradually spread over the surrounding country, their name was adopted by other tribes, who became assimilated in language, manners, and customs to the original Hellenes, till at length the whole of the north of Greece, from the Ceraunian and Cambunian Mountains to the Corinthian isthmus, was designated by the name of Hellas.* Peloponnesus was generally spoken of during the flourishing times of Greek independence as distinct from Hellas proper; but subsequently Peloponnesus and the Greek islands were also included under the general name of Hellas, in opposition to the land of the barbarians. Still later, even Macedonia, and the southern part of Illyria, were sometimes reckoned part of Hellas. The Romans called the land of the Hellenes Græcia, whence we have derived the name of Greece. They probably gave this name to the country from their first becoming acquainted with the tribe of the Græci who were said to be descended from Grecus a son of Thessalus, and who appear at an early period to have dwelt on the western coast of Epirus. Hellas or Greece proper, including Peloponnesus, lies between the thirty-sixth and forty-sixth degrees of north latitude, and between the twenty-first and twenty-sixth degrees of east longitude. Its greatest length from Mount Olympus to Cape Tamarus is about two hundred and fifty English miles; its greatest breadth from the western coast of Acarnania to Marathon in Attica is about one hundred and eighty miles. Its area is somewhat less than that of Portugal. On the north it was separated by the Cambunian and Ceraunian Mountains from Macedonia and Illyria; and on the other three sides it is bounded by the sea, namely, by the Ionian Sea on the west, and by the Ægean on the east and south. It is one of the most mountainous countries of Europe, and possesses few extensive plains and few continuous valleys. The inhabitants were thus separated from one another by barriers which it was not easy to surmount, and were naturally led to form separate political communities. At a later time the north of Greece was generally divided into ten districts: EPIRUS, THESSALIA, ACARNANIA, ÆTOLIA, DORIS, LOCRIA, PHOCIA, BOEOTIA, ATTICA, and MEGARIS. The south of Greece or Peloponnesus was usually divided into ten districts likewise: CORINTHIA, SIOYONIA, PHILASIA, ACHAIA, ELIS, MESSENIA, LACONICA, CYNURIA, ARGOLIS, and ARCADIA. An account of the geography, early inhabitants, and history of each of these districts is given in separate articles. It is only necessary to remark here that, before the Hellenes had spread over the country, it was inhabited by various tribes, whom the Greeks call by the general name of barbarians. Of these the most celebrated were the Pelasgians, who had settled in most parts of Greece, and from whom a considerable part of the Greek population was undoubtedly descended. These Pelasgians were a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, and spoke a language akin to that of the Hellenes, whence the amalgamation of the two races was rendered much easier. Vid. PELASGI. The Hellenes traced their origin to a mythical ancestor Hellen, from whose sons and grandsons they were divided into the four great tribes of Dorians, Æolians, Achæans, and Ionians. Vid. HELLEN.

GRÆCIA MAGNA or G. MAJOR (ἡ μεγάλη Ἑλλάς), a name given to the districts in the south of Italy, inhabited by the Greeks. This name was never used simply to indicate the south of Italy; it was always confined to the Greek cities and their territories, and did not include the surrounding districts, inhabited by the Italian tribes. It appears to have been applied chiefly to the cities on the Tarantine Gulf, Tarentum, Sybaris, Croton, Caulonia, Siris (Hercleæ), Metapontum, Locri, and Rhegium; but it also included the Greek cities on the western coast, such as Cumæ and Neapolis. Strabo extends the appellation even to the Greek cities of Sicily.—The origin of the name is doubtful whether it was given to the Greek cities by the Italian tribes from their admiring the magnificence

* Epirus is, for the sake of convenience, usually included in Hellas by modern geographers, but was excluded by the Greeks themselves, as the Epirots were not regarded as genuine Hellenes.

source of these cities, or whether it was assumed by the inhabitants themselves out of vanity and ostentation, to show their superiority to the mother country.

GRAMPIUS MONS (Grampian Hills), a range of mountains in Britannia Barbaria or Caledonia, separating the Highlands and Lowlands of Scotland. Agricola penetrated as far as these mountains, and defeated Galgacus at their foot.

GRANIOS (Γρανίος: now Koia-Chai), a river of Mysia Minor, rising in Mount Cotylus, the northern summit of Ida, flowing northeast through the plain of Adrastes, and falling into the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara) east of Priapus: memorable as the scene of the first of the three great victories by which Alexander the Great overthrew the Persian empire (B.C. 334), and, in a less degree, for a victory gained upon its banks by Lucullus over Mithradates, B.C. 73.

GRANIS (Γρανίς: now Khiah), a river of Persia, with a royal palace on its banks. It fell into the Persian Gulf near Tases.

GRANIUS, Q., a clerk employed by the auctioneers at Rome to collect the money at sales, lived about B.C. 110. Although his occupation was humble, his wit and caustic humor rendered him famous among his contemporaries, and have transmitted his name to posterity.

GRANUA (Γρανυία: now Grana), a river in the land of the Quadi and the southeast of Germany, and a tributary of the Danube, on the banks of which Marcus Aurelius wrote the first book of his Meditations.

GRATIANUS. 1. Emperor of the Western Empire, A.D. 367-383, son of Valentinian I., was raised by his father to the rank of Augustus in 367, when he was only eight years old. On the death of Valentinian in 375, Gratian did not succeed to the sole sovereignty, as Valentinian II., the half-brother of Augustus, was proclaimed Augustus by the troops. By the death of his uncle, Valens (378), the Eastern empire devolved upon him; but the danger to which the East was exposed from the Goths led Gratian to send for Theodosius, and appoint him emperor of the East (379). Gratian was fond of quiet and repose, and was greatly under the influence of ecclesiastics, especially of Ambrose of Milan. He became unpopular with the army. Maximus was declared emperor in Britain, and crossed over to Gaul, where he defeated Gratian, who was overtaken and slain in his flight after the battle.—2. A usurper, who assumed the purple in Britain, and was murdered by his troops about four months after his elevation (407). He was succeeded by Constantine. Vid. CONSTANTINUS, No. 3.

GRATIANUM COLLES (Χαρίτων λόφος, Herod, iv., 175: now Hills of Turkomak), a range of wooded hills running parallel to the coast of Northern Africa, between the Syrtes, and containing the source of the Cyrtus and the other small rivers of that coast.

GRATIUS FALISCUS. Vid. FALISCUS.

GRATVS, VALENTIVS, procurator of Judaea from A.D. 15 to 27, and the immediate predecessor of Pontius Pilate.

GRAVINUM, an ancient city of Etruria, subject to Tarquinii, was colonized by the Romans B.C. 183, and received new colonists under Augustus. It was situated in the Maremma, and its air was unhealthy (intempesta Gravisca, Virg., Æn., x. 184); whence the ancients ridiculously derived its name from air gravis. Its ruins are on the right bank of the River Marta, about two miles from the sea, where are the remains of a magnificent arch.

GRÆGORIUS, NIKÉPHORUS, one of the most important Byzantine historians, was born about A.D. 1295, and died about 1359. His principal work is entitled Historia Byzantina. It is in thirty-eight books, of which only twenty-four have been printed. It begins with the capture of Constantinople by the Latins in 1204, and goes down to 1359; the twenty-four printed books contain the period from 1204 to 1351. Edited by Schopen, Bonn, 1829.

GRÆGORIUS (Γρηγόριος). 1. Surnamed NAXIANZENSIS, and usually called GREGORY NAXIANZENSIS, was born in a village near Nazianzus, in Cappadocia, about A.D. 329. His father took the greatest pains with his education, and he afterward prosecuted his studies at Athens, where he earned the greatest reputation for his knowledge of rhetoric, philosophy, and mathematics. Among his fellow-students was Julian, the future emperor, and Basil, with the latter of whom he formed a most intimate friendship. Gregory appears to have remained at Athens about six years (350-356), and then returned home. Having received ordination, he continued to reside at Nazianzus, where he discharged his duties as a presbyter, and assisted his aged father, who was bishop of the town. In 372 he was associated with his father in the bishopric, but after the death of the latter in 374, he refused to continue Bishop of Nazianzus, as he was averse from public life, and fond of solitary meditation. After living some years in retirement he was summoned to Constantinople in 379, in order to defend the orthodox faith against the Arians and other heretics. In 380 he was made bishop of Constantinople by the Emperor Theodosius; but he resigned the office in the following year (381), and withdrew altogether from public life. He lived in solitude at his paternal estate at Nazianzus, and there he died in 389 or 390. His extant works are, 1. Orationes or Sermons; 2. Letters; 3. Poems. His discourses, though sometimes really eloquent, are generally nothing more than favorable specimens of the rhetoric of the schools. He is more earnest than Chrysostom, but not so ornamental. He is more artificial but also more attractive than Basil. Edited by Morell, Paris, 8 vols. fol., 1609-1611, reprinted 1680. Of the Benedictine edition, only the first volume, containing the discourses, was published, Paris, 1778.—2. NYSSÆNUS, bishop of Nyssa in Cappadocia, was the younger brother of Basil, and was born at Caesarea, in Cappadocia, about 331. He was made bishop of Nyssa about 373, and, like his brother Basil and their friend Gregory Nazianzen, was one of the pillars of orthodoxy. He died soon after 394. Like his brother, he was an eminent rhetorician, but his oratory often offends by its extravagance. His works are edited by Morell and Gretser, 3 vols. fol., Paris, 1615-1618.—3. Surnamed THAUMATURGUS, from his miracles, was born at Noemsarea, in Cappadocia, of heathen parents. He was converted to Christianity by Origen about 234, and subsequently became the bishop of his native town. He died soon after 265. His works are not numerous. The best edition is the one published at Paris, 1622.

GRUNDI, a people in Gallia Belgica, subject to the Nervii, north of the Scheldt.

GRUMENTUM (Grumentinus: now Il Palazzo), a town in the interior of Lucania, on the road from Beneventum to Heraclea, frequently mentioned in the second Punic war.

GRYLLUS (Γρύλλος), elder son of Xenophon, fell at the battle of Mantinea, B.C. 362, after he had, according to some accounts, given Epaminondas his mortal wound.

[ΓΡΥΝΤΑ. 1. A Centaur, who slew Broteas and Oreon, and was himself slain by Exadius at the nuptials of Pirithous.—2. Appellation of Apollo. Vid. ΓΑΥΝΙΑ.]

GRYNIA or IUM (Γρύνεια, Γρίνιον), a very ancient fortified city on the coast of the Sinus Elniticus, in the south of Mysia, between Elea and Myrina, seventy stadia from the former and forty from the latter: celebrated for its temple and oracle of Apollo, who is hence called Grynaeus Apollo (Virg., Æn. iv, 345). It possessed also a good harbor. Parmenion, the general of Alexander, destroyed the city and sold the inhabitants as slaves. It was never again restored.

GRYPS or GRYPUS (Γρύψ), a griffin, a fabulous animal, dwelling in the Rhipsean Mountains, between the Hyperboreans and the one-eyed Arimaspians, and guarding the gold of the north. The Arimaspians mounted on horseback, and attempted to steal the gold, and hence arose the hostility between the horse and the griffin. The body of the griffin was that of a lion, while the head and wings were those of an eagle. It is probable that the origin of the belief in griffins must be looked for in the East, where it seems to have been very ancient. They are also mentioned among the fabulous animals which guarded the gold of India.

GRUBINI or GURBANI, a people of Germany, probably of the same race as the Sygambri, crossed the Rhine, and settled on its left bank, between the Ubii and Batavi.

GULUBA, a Numidian, second son of Masinissa, and brother to Micipsa and Mastanabal. On the death of Masinissa in B.C. 149, he succeeded, along with his brothers, to the dominions of their father. He left a son named MASURA.

GURPAIUS (Γουρπαίος, Γαρρφαίος), a river of India, flowing through the country of the Gurmi (to the northwest of the Punjab) into the Caphen.

GUTHONES. Vid. GOTH.

GYARUS or GYARA (ἡ Γῆρας, τὰ Γῆρα: Γυάρης: now Chisra or Jura), one of the Cyclades, a small island southwest of Andros, poor and unproductive, and inhabited only by fishermen. Under the Roman emperors it was a place of banishment (Aude aliquis brevibus Gyaris et carcere dignum, Juv., i, 78).

[ΓΥΑΣ. 1. A Trojan companion of Æneas] distinguished himself at the funeral games celebrated in honor of Anchises.—2. A Rutulian son of Melanion, slain by Æneas in Italy.]

GYES or GYES (Γύης, Γύγης), son of Uranus (Heaven) and Ge (Earth), one of the giants with one hundred hands, who made war upon the gods.

GYEUS LACUS (ἡ Γυγαίη λίμνη: now Lake of Marmora), a small lake in Lydia, between the rivers Hermus and Hyllus, north of Sardis, the necropolis of which city was on its banks. It was afterward called Coloe.

GYGES (Γύγης). 1. The first king of Lydia of the dynasty of the Mermonadae, dethroned Candaules, and succeeded to the kingdom, as related under CANDAULES. He reigned B.C. 716-678. He sent magnificent presents to Delphi, and carried on various wars with the cities of Asia Minor, such as Miletus, Smyrna, Colophon, and Magnesia. "The riches of Gyges" became a proverb.—[2. A companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

GYLIPIUS (Γύλιππος), a Spartan, son of Cleandridas, was sent as the Spartan commander to Syracuse, to oppose the Athenians, B.C. 414. Under his command the Syracusans annihilated the great Athenian armament, and took Demosthenes and Nicias prisoners, 413. In 404 he was commissioned by Lysander, after the capture of Athens, to carry home the treasure; but, by opening the seams of the sacks underneath, he abstracted a considerable portion. The theft was discovered, and Gylippus went at once into exile. The syllable Γυλ- in the name of Gylippus is probably identical with the Latin Gilius. GYMNÆIAE. Vid. BALEARES.

GYNECOPOLIS (Γυναικόπολις, or Γυναικῶν πόλις), a city in the Delta of Egypt, on the western bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Momemphis. It was the capital of the Nomos Gynecopolites.

GYNDUS (Γύνδης), a river of Assyria, rising in the country of the Matien (in the mountains of Kurdistan), and flowing into the Tigris, celebrated through the story that Cyrus the Great drew off its waters by three hundred and sixty channels. (Herod., i, 189). It is very difficult to identify this river: perhaps it is the same as the Delas or Silla (now Diala), which falls into the Tigris just above Ctesiphon and Seleucia. It is also doubtful whether the Sindes or Tactu (Aen., xi, 10) is the same river.

[ΓΥΡΑΕ (Γυρὰι πέτραι), certain rocks in the Icarian Sea, or, as others suppose, in the Ægean, mentioned in the Odyssey.]

GYRTON, GYRTONA (Γυρτόν, Γυρτόνη: Γυρτόνης: ruins near Tatari), an ancient town in Pelagiotia in Thessaly, on the Peneus.

GYTHEUM, GYTHIUM (τὸ Γέθειον, Γέθειον: Γεθύτης: now Palaeopolis near Marathonis), an ancient town on the coast of Laconia, founded by the Achæans, lay near the head of the Læmnia Bay, southwest of the mouth of the River Eurotas. It served as the harbor of Sparta, and was important in a military point of view. In the Persian war the Lacedæmonian fleet was stationed at Gytheum, and here the Athenians under Tolmides burned the Lacedæmonian arsenal, B.C. 455. After the battle of Leuctra (370) it was taken by Epaminondas. In 195 it was taken by Flamininus, and made independent of

GYZANTES (Γύζαντες), a people in the western part of Libya (Northern Africa), whose country was rich in honey and wax. They seem to have dwelt in Bysacium.

H.

Hades or PLUTO (Ἅιδης, Πλούτων, or postally Ἄϊδης, Αἰδωνεύς, Πλουρεύς) the God of the Nether World. Plato observes that people preferred calling him Pluto (the giver of wealth) to pronouncing the dreaded name of Hades or Aides. Hence we find that in ordinary life and in the mysteries the name Pluto became generally established, while the poets preferred the ancient name Aides or the form Pluteus. The Roman poets use the names Dis, Orcus, and Tartarus, as synonymous with Pluto, for the god of the Nether World. Hades was son of Saturn (Cronus) and Rhea, and brother of Jupiter (Zeus) and Neptune (Poseidon). His wife was Persephone or Proserpina, the daughter of Ceres (Demeter), whom he carried off from the upper world, as is related elsewhere. Vid. p. 248. a. In the division of the world among the three brothers, Hades (Pluto) obtained the Nether World, the abode of the shades, over which he ruled. Hence he is called the infernal Jupiter (Zeus) (Ζεὺς καταχθόνιος), or the lord of the shades (δνατορ ἐνέρων). He possessed a helmet which rendered the wearer invisible, and later traditions stated that this helmet was given him as a present by the Cyclopes after their delivery from Tartarus. Ancient story mentions both gods and men who were honored by Hades (Pluto) with the temporary use of this helmet. His character is described as fierce and inexorable, whence of all the gods he was most hated by mortals. He kept the gates of the lower world closed (and is therefore called Πυλάρτης), that no shades might be able to escape or return to the region of light. When mortals invoked him, they struck the earth with their hands; the sacrifices which were offered to him and Persephone (Proserpina) consisted of black sheep; and the person who offered the sacrifice had to turn away his face. The ensign of his power was a staff, with which, like Hermes (Mercury), he drove the shades into the lower world. There he sat upon a throne with his consort Persephone (Proserpina). Like the other gods, he was not a faithful husband; the Furies are called his daughters; the nymph Mintho, whom he loved, was metamorphosed by Persephone (Proserpina) into a plant called mint; and the nymph Leuco, with whom he was likewise in love, was changed by him after her death into a white poplar, and transferred to Elysium. Being the king of the lower world, Pluto is the giver of all the blessings that come from the earth: he is the possessor and giver of all the metals contained in the earth, and Leuco his name Pluto. He bears several surnames referring to his ultimately assembling all mortals in his kingdom, and bringing them to rest and peace; such as Πόλυδωμον, Polydecton, Clymenus, &c. He was worshipped throughout Greece and Italy. We possess few representations of this divinity but in those which still exist, he resembles his brother Jupiter (Zeus) and Neptune (Poseidon), except that his hair falls down his forehead, and that his appearance is dark and gloomy. His ordinary attributes are the key of Hades and Cerberus. In Homer Aides is invariably the name of the god; but in later times it was transferred to his house, his abode or kingdom, so that it became a name for the nether world.

HADRINOPOLIS (Ἀδριανόπολις: Ἀδριανουπόλις; now Adrianople), a town in Thrace, on the right bank of the Hebrus, in an extensive plain founded by the Emperor Hadrian. It was strongly fortified; possessed an extensive commerce; and in the Middle Ages was the most important town in the country after Constantinople.

HADRINOTIS or -IS (Ἀδριανούθισσα), a city in Mysia, between Pergamus and Miletopolis, founded by the Emperor Hadrian.

HADRIANUS, P. ÆLIUS, usually called HADRIAN, Roman emperor A.D. 117-138, was born at Rome, A.D. 76. He lost his father at the age of ten, and was brought up by his kinsman Ulpius Trajanus (afterward emperor) and by Cælius Attianus. From an early age he studied with zeal the Greek language and literature. At the age of fifteen he went to Spain, where he entered upon his military career; and he subsequently served as military tribune in Lower Moesia. After the elevation of Trajan to the throne (98), he married Julia Sabina, a granddaughter of Trajan's sister Marciana. This marriage was brought about through the influence of Plotina, the wife of Trajan; and from this time Hadrian rose rapidly in the emperor's favor. He was raised successively to the quaestorship (101), praetorship (107), and consulship (109). He accompanied Trajan in most of his expeditions, and distinguished himself in the second war against the Dacians, 104-106; was made governor of Pannonia in 108, and subsequently fought under Trajan against the Parthians. When Trajan's serious illness obliged him to leave the East, he placed Hadrian at the head of the army. Trajan died at Cilicia on his journey to Rome (117). Hadrian, who pretended that he had been adopted by Trajan, was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Syria, and the senate ratified the election. Hadrian's first care was to make peace with the Parthians, which he obtained by relinquishing the conquests of Trajan east of the Euphrates. He returned to Rome in 118; but almost immediately afterward set out for Moesia, in consequence of the invasion of this province by the Sarmatians. After making peace with the Sarmatians, and suppressing a formidable conspiracy which had been formed against his life by some of the most distinguished Roman nobles, all of whom he put to death, he returned to Rome in the course of the same year. He sought to gain the good will of the senate by gladiatorial exhibitions and liberal largesses, and he also cancelled all arrears of taxes due to the state for the last fifteen years. The remainder of Hadrian's reign was disturbed by few wars. He spent the greater part of his reign in travelling through the various provinces of the empire, in order that he might inspect personally the state of affairs in the provinces, and apply the necessary remedies wherever mismanagement was discovered. He commenced these travels in 119, visiting first Gaul, Germany, and Britain, in the latter of which countries he caused a wall to be built from the Solway to the mouth of the River Tyne. He afterward visited Spain, Africa, and the East, and took up his residence at Athens for three years (123-126). Athens was his favorite city, and he conferred upon its inhabitants many privileges. The most important war during his reign was that against the Jews, which broke out in 131. The Jews had revolted in consequence of the establishment of a colony, under the name of Ælia Capitolina, on the site of Jerusalem, and of their having been forbidden to practice the rite of circumcision. The war was carried on by the Jews as a national struggle with the most desperate fury, and was not brought to an end till 136, after the country had been nearly reduced to a wilderness. During the last few years of Hadrian's life, his health failed. He became suspicious and cruel, and put to death several persons of distinction. As he had no children, he adopted L. Ælius Verus, and gave him the title of Cæsar in 136. Verus died on the first of January, 138, whereupon Hadrian adopted Antoninus, afterward surnamed Pius, and conferred upon him likewise the title of Cæsar. In July in the same year, Hadrian himself died, in his sixty-second year, and was succeeded by ANTONINUS. The reign of Hadrian may be regarded as one of the happiest periods in Roman history. His policy was to preserve peace with foreign nations, and not to extend the boundaries of the empire, but to secure the old provinces, and promote their welfare. He paid particular attention to the administration of justice in the provinces as well as in Italy. His reign forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. It was at Hadrian's command that the jurist Silvius Julianus drew up the edictum perpetuum, which formed a fixed code of laws. Some of the laws promulgated by Hadrian are of a truly humane character, and aimed at improving the public morality of the time. The various cities which he visited received marks of his favor or liberality; in many places he built aqueducts, and in others harbors or other public buildings, either for use or ornament. But what has rendered his name more illustrious than any thing else are the numerous and magnificent architectural works which he planned and commenced during his travels, especially at Athens, in the southwestern part of which he built an entirely new city, Adrianopolis. We can not here enter into an account of the numerous buildings he erected; it is sufficient to direct attention to his villa at Tibur, which has been a real mine of treasures of art, and his mausoleum at Rome, which forms the groundwork of the present Castle of St. Angelo. Hadrian was a patron of learning and literature as well as of the arts, and he cultivated the society of poets, scholars, rhetoricians, and philosophers. He founded at Rome a scientific institution under the name of Athenæum, which continued to flourish for a long time after him. He was himself an author, and wrote numerous works, both in prose and in verse, all of which are lost, with the exception of a few epigrams in the Greek and Latin Anthologies.

HADROMETUM or ADROMETUM (Ἀδρόμη: now Hammelm), a flourishing city founded by the Phœnicians in northern Africa, on the eastern coast of Byzacena, of which district it was the capital under the Romans. Trajan made it a colony; and it was afterward called Justiniana opolis.

[HÆDILIA (Mons), a mountain of Italy, near Horace's Sabine farm, infested by wolves. (Hædilis lupo, Hor. Carm., l. 17, 9.)]

HÆMON (Ἄμων). 1. Son of Pelæus and father of Thessalus, from whom the ancient name of Thessaly, Hæmonia or Æmonia, was believed to be derived. The Roman poets frequently use the adjective Hæmonius as equivalent to Thessalian.—2. Son of Lycæon, and the reputed founder of Hæmonia in Arcadia.—3. Son of Oreon of Thebes, was destroyed, according to some accounts, by the sphinx; but, according to other traditions, he was in love with Antigone, and killed himself on hearing that she was condemned by his father to be entombed alive.

HÆMŌNIA (Ἀμυνία). Vid. HÆMON, No. 1.

HÆMUS (Ἄμος), son of Boreas and Orithyia, husband of Rhodope, and father of Hebrus. As he and his wife presumed to assume the names of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera), both were metamorphosed into mountains.

HÆMUS (ὁ Ἄμος, τὸ Ἄμυν: now Balkan), a lofty range of mountains, separating Thrace and Mœsia, extended from Mount Scymnus, or, according to Herodotus, from Mount Rhodope on the west to the Black Sea on the east. The name is probably connected with the Sanscrit hmas (whence comes the word Himalaya), the Greek χρῆμα, and the Latin hians; and the mountains were so called on account of their cold and snowy climate. The height of these mountains was greatly exaggerated by the ancients: the mean height does not exceed three thousand or four thousand feet above the sea. There are several passes over them; but the one most used in antiquity was in the western part of the range, called "Succi" or "Succorum angustia," also "Porta Trajani" (now Sredz Dardani), between Philippopolis and Serdica. The later province of "Hæmimontus" in Thrace derived its name from this mountain.

HÆONTES (Ἄγνοις, οὐνοῖς: Ἀγνοῖσιος: near Markopulo), a demus in Attica, west of Pneumia, belonging to the tribe Acamantis.

HALÆ (Ἀλαί, Ἄλαι, Ἄλαι: Ἀλαρινίς). 1. H. ARAPHENIDÆS (Ἀραφηνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeia, was situated on the eastern coast of Attica, and served as the harbor of Brauron: it possessed a temple of Diana (Artemis).—2. H. ÆXŌNIDÆS (Ἀξυνίδες), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Cecropia, situated on the western coast.—3. A town, formerly of the Opuntii Loori, afterward of Boeotia, situated on the Opuntian Gulf.

[HALOTŌNE. Vid. ALŌTŌNE.]

HALER (Ἁλῆς). 1. A river of Ionica in Asia Minor, near Colophon, celebrated for the coldness of its water.—2. A river in the island of Cra.

HALESA ('Αλαίσα: Halæsius: now Torre di Pittineo), a town on the northern coast of Sicily, on the River HALÆSUS (now Pittineo), was founded by the Greek mercenaries of Archonides, a chief of the Siculi, and was originally called ANOMONÆUS. It became a place of considerable importance, and was in later times a municipium, exempt from taxes.

HALÆSUS, a chief of the Auruncans and Oscans, the son of a soothsayer, and an ally of Turnus, was slain by Pallas. He came to Italy from Argos in Greece, whence he is called Agamemnonius, Arctus, or Argolicus. He is said to have founded the town of Falerii.

HALÆX. Vid. ALEX.

HALIACMON ('Αλιάκμων: now Vistritsa Indjov), an important river in Macedonia, rises in the Thymphaean Mountains, flows first southeast through Elimeia, then northeast, forming the boundary between Eordæa and Pieria, and falls into the Thermaic Gulf in Bottissia. Caesar (B. C. iii, 36) incorrectly makes it the boundary between Macedonia and Thessaly.

HALIARUS ('Αλιάρος: 'Αλιῦριος: now Masi), an ancient town in Boeotia, on the south of the lake Copais. It was destroyed by Xerxes in his invasion of Greece (B.C. 480), but was rebuilt, and appears as an important place in the Peloponnesian war. Under its walls Lyander lost his life (395). It was destroyed by the Romans (111), because it supported Perseus, king of Macedonia, and its territory was given to the Athenians.

HALIAS ('Αλιός: 'Αλιεύς: now Haliza), a district on the coast of Argolia, between Asine and Hermione, so called because fishing was the chief occupation of its inhabitants. Their town was called HALIZ ('Αλιζή) or HALIÆS ('Αλιεύς).

HALICARNASSUS ('Αλικαρνασσός, Ion. 'Αλικαρνασός: 'Αλικαρνασσεύς, Halicarnassensis, Halicarnassius: ruins at Budrum), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, stood in the southwestern part of Caria, on the northern coast of the Sinus Ceramæus, opposite to the island of Cos. It was said to have been founded by Dorians from Tarsena, and was at first called Zephyra. It was one of the six cities that originally formed the Dorian Hexapolis, but it was early excluded from the confederacy, as a punishment for the isolation, by one of its citizens, of a law consecrated with the common worship of the Triopian Apollo. (Herod. i, 144.) With the rest of the coast of Asia Minor, it fell under the dominion of the Persians, at an early period of whose rule Lygdamis made himself tyrant of the city, and founded a dynasty which lasted for some generations. His daughter Artemisia assisted Xerxes in his expedition against Greece. Vid. ARTEMISIA, No. 1. Her grandson, Lygdamis, was overthrown by a revolution, in which Herodotus is said to have taken part. Vid. HERODOTUS. In the Peloponnesian war, we find Halicarnassus, with the other Dorian cities of Caria, on the side of the Athenians; but we do not know what was its form of government, until the re-establishment, by HECATOMNUS, of a tyranny ruling over all Caria, with its capital first at Mylasa, and afterward at Halicarnassus, and virtually independent of Persia; before B.C. 380. It seems not unlikely that both this and the older dynasty of tyrants of Halicarnasus were a race of native Carian princes, whose ascendancy at Halicarnassus may be accounted for by the prevalence of the Carian element in its population at an early period. Hecatomnus left three sons and two daughters, who all succeeded to his throne in the following order: Mausolus, Artemisia, Idricus, Ada, Pixodarus, and Ada again. In B.C. 334, Alexander took the city, after an obstinate defense by the Persian general Memnon, and destroyed it. From this blow it never recovered, although it continued to be celebrated for the Mausoleum, a magnificent edifice which Artemisia II. built as a tomb for Mausolus, and which was adorned with the works of the most eminent Greek sculptors of the age. Fragments of these sculptures, which were discovered built into the walls of the citadel of Budrum, are now in the British Museum. With the rest of Caria, Halicarnassus was assigned by the Romans, after their victory over Antiochus the Great, to the government of Rhodes, and was afterward united to the province of Asia. The city was very strongly fortified, and had a fine harbor, which was protected by the island of ANOMONÆUS: its citadel was called Salmacis (Σαλμακίς), from the name of a spring which rose from the hill on which it stood. Halicarnassus was the birth-place of the historians HECÆDOTUS and DIONYSIUS.

HALICUSÆ ('Αλικυαί: Halicyensis: now Satomi?), a town in the northwest of Sicily, between Entella and Lilybæum, was long in the possession of the Carthaginians, and in Cicero's time was a municipium, exempt from taxes.

HALIMUS ('Αλιμύς, -ώντος: 'Αλιμούσιος) a demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontis, or the western coast, a little south of Athens.

HALIPEDON ('Αλιπέδον), a plain near the Piræus, probably between the Piræus and the Academy.

HALIRRHOTHIUS ('Αλρήρόθιος), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Euryte, attempted to violate Alcippe, daughter of Mars (Ares) and Agraulos, but was slain by Mars (Ares). Mars (Ares) was brought to trial by Neptune (Poseidon) for this murder, on the hill at Athens, which was hence called Areopagus, or the Hill of Ares (Mars).

HALITHESSES ('Αλιθήρης). 1. A son of Mentor of Ithaca, celebrated as a hero and diviner.—2. A son of Anceus and Samia, the daughter of the River Meander.]

HALIUS ('Αλιός), second son of Alcimous, distinguished himself in dancing, as described in the eighth book of the Odyssey.]

HALIUSA ('Αλιούσα: now Karasi), an island in the Argolic Gulf.

HALIZONES ('Αλιζωνες and -ας), a people of Bithynia, with a capital city Alybe ('Αλύβη), mentioned by Homer as allies of the Trojans.

HALMYDREUS. Vid. SALMYDREUS.

HALMYRIS ('Αλμυρίς, sc. λίμνη), a bay of the sea in Moesia, formed by the southern mouth of the Danube, with a town of the same name upon it.

HALONÆSUS ('Αλόνησος, 'Αλόννησος: 'Αλόνησιος, 'Αλόννησιος: now Khalidromia), an island of the Ægean Sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and east of Sciathos and Peperethos, with a town of the same name upon it. The possession of this island occasioned great disputes between Philip and the Athenians: there is a speech on this subject among the extant orations of Demosthenes, but it was probably written by Hegesippus.

HALOSIDNE (Ἀλυσίδνη), "the Sea-born," a surname of Amphitrite and Thetis.

HALUNTUM. Vid. ALUNTUM.

HALUS. Vid. ALUS.

HALYUS (Ἁλῦς: now Plataní), a river in the south of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Heraclea Minoa.

HALYS (Ἁλῦς: now Kizil-Irmak, i. e., the Red River), the greatest river of Asia Minor, rises in that part of the Anti-Taurus range called Paryadrea, on the borders of Armenia Minor and Pontus, and, after flowing west by south through Cappadocia, turns to the north and flows through Galatia to the borders of Paphlagonia, where it takes a northeastern direction, dividing Paphlagonia from Pontus, and at last falls into the Euxine (now Black Sea) between Sinope and Amisus. In early times it was a most important boundary, ethnographical as well as political. It divided the Indo-European races which peopled the western part of Asia Minor from the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) races of the rest of southwestern Asia, and it separated the Lydian empire from the Medo-Persian, until, by marching over it to meet Cyrus, Croesus began the contest which at once ended in the overthrow of the former and the extension of the latter to the Ægean Sea.

HAMADEYÄDER. Vid. NYMPHÆ.

HAMAXITUS (Ἥμαξιτός), a small town on the coast of the Troad, near the Promontory Leontæ; said to have been the first settlement of the Teucrian immigrants from Crete. The surrounding district was called Ἥμαξίτις. Lycimachus removed the inhabitants to Alexandria Troas.

HAMAXŌBHI (Ἥμαξόβιοι), a people in European Sarmatia, in the neighborhood of the Palus Mæotis, were a nomad race, as their name signifies.

HAMILCAR (Ἡμίλκαρ). The two last syllables of this name are the same as Melcarth, the tutelary deity of the Tyrians, called by the Greeks Hercules, and the name probably signifies "the gift of Melcarth." 1. Son of Hanno, or Mago, commander of the great Carthaginian expedition to Sicily, B.C. 480, which was defeated and almost destroyed by Gelon at Himera. Vid. GELON. Hamilcar fell in the battle.—2. Surnamed Rhodanus, was sent by the Carthaginians to Alexander after the fall of Tyre, B.C. 332. On his return home he was put to death by the Carthaginians for having betrayed their interests.—3. Carthaginian governor in Sicily at the time that Agathocles was rising into power. At first he supported the party at Syracuse, which had driven Agathocles into exile, but he afterward espoused the cause of Agathocles, who was thus enabled to make himself master of Syracuse, 317.—4. Son of Gisco, succeeded the preceding as Carthaginian commander in Sicily, 311. He carried on war against Agathocles, whom he defeated with great slaughter, and then obtained possession of the greater part of Sicily; but he was taken prisoner while besieging Syracuse, and was put to death by Agathocles.—5. A Carthaginian general in the first Punic war, must be carefully distinguished from the great Hamilcar Barca [§ 1. 4.] in the third year of the war (262) he succeeded Hanno in the command in Sicily, and carried on the operations by land with success. He made himself master of Enna and Cumaria, and fortified Drepanum. In 257 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet on the northern coast of Sicily, and fought a naval action with the Roman consul C. Attilius Regulus. In the following year (256), he and Hanno commanded the great Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by the two consuls M. Attilius Regulus and L. Manlius Vulso, off Economus, on the southern coast of Sicily. He was afterward one of the commanders of the land forces in Africa opposed to Regulus.—6. Surnamed Barca, an epithet supposed to be related to the Hebrew Barak, and to signify "lightning." It was merely a personal appellation, and is not to be regarded as a family name, though, from the great distinction that he obtained, we often find the name of Barcine applied either to his family or his party in the state. He was appointed to the command of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily in the eighteenth year of the first Punic war, 247. At this time the Romans were masters of the whole of Sicily, with the exception of Drepanum and Lilybæum, both of which were blockaded by them on the land side. Hamilcar established himself, with his whole army, on a mountain named Heretè (now Monte Pellegrino), in the midst of the enemy's country and in the immediate neighborhood of Panormus, one of their most important cities. Here he succeeded in maintaining his ground, to the astonishment alike of friends and foes, for nearly three years. In 244 he abruptly quitted Heretè, and took up a still stronger position at Mount Eryx, after seizing the town of this name. Here he also maintained himself in spite of all the efforts of the Romans to dislodge him. After the great naval defeat of the Carthaginians by Lutatius Catulus (241), Hamilcar, who was still at Eryx, was intrusted by the Carthaginian government with the conclusion of the peace with the Romans. On his return home, he had to carry on war in Africa with the Carthaginian mercenaries, whom he succeeded in subduing after an arduous struggle of three years (240–238). Hamilcar now formed the project of establishing in Spain a new empire, which should not only be a source of strength and wealth to Carthage, but should be the point from whence he might at a subsequent period renew hostilities against Rome. He crossed over into Spain soon after the termination of the war with the mercenaries; but we know nothing of his operations in the country, save that he obtained possession of a considerable portion of Spain, partly by force of arms, and partly by negotiation. After remaining in Spain nearly nine years, he fell in battle (229) against the Vettones. He was succeeded in the command by his son-in-law Hasdrubal. He left three sons, the celebrated Hannibal, Hasdrubal, and Mago.—7. Son of Gisco, Carthaginian governor of Melite (now Malta), which surrendered to the Romans, 218.—8. Son of Bomilcar, one of the generals in Spain, 216, with Hasdrubal and Mago, the two sons of Barca. The three generals were defeated by the two Scipios while besieging Illiturgi.—9. A Carthaginian who excited a general revolt of the Gauls in Upper Italy about 200, and took the Roman colony of Placentia. On the defeat of the Gauls by the consul Cethegus in 197, he was taken prisoner.

HANNIBAL (Ἀννίβας). The name signifies "the grace or favor of Baal," the final syllable bal, of such common occurrence in Punic names, always having reference to this tutelary deity of the Phœnicians. 1. Son of Gisco, and grandson of HAMILCAR. [No. 1]. In 409 he was sent to Sicily, at the head of a Carthaginian army, to assist the Segestans against the Selinuntines. He took Selinus, and subsequently Himera also. In 406 he again commanded a Carthaginian army in Sicily along with Himilco, but died of a pestilence while besieging Agrigentum.—2. Son of Gisco, was the Carthaginian commander at Agrigentum when it was besieged by the Romans, 262. After standing a siege of seven months, he broke through the enemy's lines, leaving the town to its fate. After this he carried on the contest by sea, and for the next year or two ravaged the coast of Italy; but in 260 he was defeated by the consul Duilius. In 259 he was sent to the defence of Sardinia. Here he was again unfortunate, and was seized by his numerous troops and put to death.—3. Son of Hamilcar (perhaps HAMILCAR, No. 5), succeeded in carrying succors of men and provisions to Lilybæum when it was besieged by the Romans, 250.—4. A general in the war of the Carthaginians against the mercenaries (240-238), was taken prisoner by the insurgents, and crucified.—5. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and one of the most illustrious generals of antiquity, was born B.C. 247. He was only nine years old when his father took him with him into Spain, and it was on this occasion that Hamilcar made him swear upon the altar eternal hostility to Rome. Child as he then was, Hannibal never forgot his vow, and his whole life was one continual struggle against the power and domination of Rome. He was early trained in arms under the eye of his father, and was present with him in the battle in which Hamilcar perished (229). Though only eighteen years old at this time, he had already displayed so much courage and capacity for war, that he was intrusted by Hasdrubal (the son-in-law and successor of Hamilcar) with the chief command of most of the military enterprises planned by that general. He secured to himself the devoted attachment of the army under his command; and, accordingly, on the assassination of Hasdrubal (221), the soldiers unanimously proclaimed their youthful leader commander-in-chief, which the government at Carthage forthwith ratified. Hannibal was at this time in the twenty-sixth year of his age. There can be no doubt that he already looked forward to the invasion and conquest of Italy as the goal of his ambition; but it was necessary for him first to complete the work which had been so ably begun by his two predecessors, and to establish the Carthaginian power as firmly as possible in Spain. In two campaigns he subdued all the country south of the Iberus, with the exception of the wealthy town of Saguntum. In the spring of 219 he proceeded to lay siege to Saguntum, which he took after a desperate resistance which lasted nearly eight months. Saguntum lay south of the Iberus, and was therefore not included under the protection of the treaty which had been made between Hasdrubal and the Romans; but as it had concluded an alliance with the Romans, the latter regarded its attack as a violation of the treaty between the two nations. On the fall of Saguntum, the Romans demanded the surrender of Hannibal; and when this demand was refused, war was declared, and thus began the long and arduous struggle called the second Punic war. In the spring of 218 Hannibal quitted his winter-quarters at New Carthage and commenced his march for Italy. He crossed the Pyrenees, and marched along the southern coast of Gaul. The Romans sent the consul P. Scipio to oppose him in Gaul; but when Scipio arrived in Gaul, he found that Hannibal had already reached the Rhone, and that it was impossible to overtake him. After Hannibal had crossed the Rhone, he continued his march up the left bank of the river as far as its confluence with the Isère. Here he struck away to the right, and commenced his passage across the Alps. He probably crossed the Alps by the pass of the Little St. Bernard, called in antiquity the Graian Alps. His army suffered much from the attacks of the Gaulish mountaineers, and from the natural difficulties of the road, which were enhanced by the lateness of the season (the beginning of October, at which time the snows have already commenced in the high Alps). So heavy were his losses, that when he at length emerged from the valley of Aosta into the plains of the Po, he had with him no more than twenty thousand foot and six thousand horse. During Hannibal's march over the Alps, P. Scipio had sent on his own army into Spain, under the command of his brother Cneius, and had himself returned to Italy. He forthwith hastened into Cisalpine Gaul, took the command of the prætor's army, which he found there, and led it against Hannibal. In the first action, which took place near the Ticinus, the cavalry and light-armed troops of the two armies were alone engaged; the Romans were completely routed, and Scipio himself severely wounded. Scipio then crossed the Po and withdrew to the hills on the left bank of the Trebia, where he was soon after joined by the other consul, Ti. Sempronius Longus. Here a second and more decisive battle was fought. The Romans were completely defeated, with heavy loss, and the remains of their army took refuge within the walls of Placentia. This battle was fought toward the end of 218. Hannibal was now joined by all the Gaulish tribes, and he was able to take up his winter-quarters in security. Early in 217 he descended by the valley of the Macra into the marshes on the banks of the Arno. In struggling through these marshes great numbers of his horses and beasts of burden perished, and he himself lost the sight of one eye by a violent attack of ophthalmia. The consul Flaminius hastened to meet him, and a battle was fought on the Lake Trasimenus, in which the Roman army was destroyed; thousands fell by the sword, among whom was the consul himself; thousands more perished in the lake, and no less than fifteen thousand prisoners tell into the hands of Hannibal. Hannibal now marched through the Apennines into Picenum, and thence into Apulia, where he spent a great part of the summer. The Romans had collected a fresh army, and placed it under the command of the dictator Fabius Maximus, who had prudently avoided a general action, and only attempted to harass and annoy the Carthaginian army. Meanwhile the Romans had made great preparations for the campaign of the following year (216). The two new consuls, L. Æmilius Paulus and C. Terentius Varro, marched into Apulia at the head of an army of little less than ninety thousand men. To this mighty host Hannibal gave battle in the plains on the right bank of the Aufidus, just below the town of Cannæ. The Roman army was again annihilated: between forty and fifty thousand men are said to have fallen in the field, among whom was the consul Æmilius Paulus, both the consuls of the preceding year, above eighty senators, and a multitude of the wealthy knights who composed the Roman cavalry. The other consul, Varro, escaped with a few horsemen to Venusia, and a small band of resolute men forced their way from the Roman camp to Canusium; all the rest were killed, dispersed, or taken prisoners. This victory was followed by the revolt from Rome of most of the nations in the south of Italy. Hannibal established his army in winter-quarters in Capua, which had espoused his side. Capua was celebrated for its wealth and luxury, and the enervating effect which these produced upon the army of Hannibal became a favorite theme of rhetorical exaggeration in later ages. The futility of such declamations is sufficiently shown by the simple fact that the superiority of that army in the field remained as decided as ever. Still it may be truly said that the winter spent at Capua, 216-215, was in great measure the turning point of Hannibal's fortune, and from this time the war assumed an altered character. The experiment of what he could effect with his single army had now been fully tried, and, notwithstanding all his victories, it had decidedly failed; for Rome was still unbowed, and still provided with the means of maintaining a protracted contest. From this time the Romans in great measure changed their plan of operations, and, instead of opposing to Hannibal one great army in the field, they hammed in his movements on all sides, and kept up an army in every province of Italy, to thwart the operations of his lieutenants, and check the rising disposition to revolt. It is impossible here to follow the complicated movements of the subsequent campaign, during which Hannibal himself frequently traversed Italy in all directions. In 215 Hannibal entered into negotiations with Philip, king of Macedonia, and Hieronymus of Syracuse, and thus sowed the seeds of two fresh wars. From 214 to 212 the Romans were busily engaged with the siege of Syracuse, which was at length taken by Marcellus in the latter of these years. In 212 Hannibal obtained possession of Tarentum; but in the following year he lost the important city of Capua, which was recovered by the Romans after a long siege. In 209 the Romans also recovered Tarentum. Hannibal's forces gradually became more and more weakened; and his only object now was to maintain his ground in the south until his brother Hasdrubal should appear in the north of Italy, as event to which he had long looked forward with anxious expectation. In 207 Hasdrubal at length crossed the Alps, and descended into Italy, but he was defeated and slain on the Metaurus. Vid. HASDRUBAL, No. 8. The defeat and death of Hasdrubal was decisive of the fate of the war in Italy. From this time Hannibal abandoned all thoughts of offensive operations, and collected together his forces within the peninsula of Bruttium. In the fastnesses of that wild and mountainous region he maintained his ground good for nearly four years (207-203). He crossed over to Africa toward the end of 203 in order to oppose P. Scipio. In the following year (202) the decisive battle was fought near Zama. Hannibal was completely defeated with great loss. All hopes of resistance were now at an end, and he was one of the first to urge the necessity of an immediate peace. The treaty between Rome and Carthage was not finally concluded until the next year (201). By this treaty Hannibal saw the object of his whole life frustrated, and Carthage effectually humbled before her imperious rival. But his enmity to Rome was unabated; and, though now more than forty-five years old, he set himself to work to prepare the means for renewing the contest at no distant period. He introduced the most beneficial reforms into the state, and restored the ruined finances; but, having provoked the enmity of a powerful party at Carthage, they denounced him to the Romans as urging on Antiochus III., king of Syria, to take up arms against Rome. Hannibal was obliged to flee from Carthage, and took refuge at the court of Antiochus, who was at this time (193) on the eve of a war with Rome. Hannibal in vain urged the necessity of carrying the war at once into Italy, instead of awaiting the Romans in Greece. On the defeat of Antiochus (190) the surrender of Hannibal was one of the conditions of the peace granted to the king. Hannibal, however, foresaw his danger, and took refuge at the court of Prusias, king of Bithynia. Here he found for some years a secure asylum; but the Romans could not be at ease so long as he lived, and T. Quintius Flamininus was at length dispatched to the court of Prusias to demand the surrender of the fugitive. The Bithynian king was unable to resist; and Hannibal, perceiving that flight was impossible, took poison, to avoid falling into the hands of his enemies, about the year 183. Of Hannibal's abilities as a general it is unnecessary to speak; all the great masters of the art of war, from Scipio to the Emperor Napoleon, have conferred in their homage to his genius. But in comparing Hannibal with any other of the great leaders of antiquity, we must ever bear in mind the peculiar circumstances in which he was placed. Feebly and grudgingly supported by the government at home, he stood alone, at the head of an army composed of mercenaries of many nations. Yet not only did he retain the attachment of these men, unshaken by any change of fortune, for a period of more than fifteen years, but he trained up army after army, and, long after the veterans that had followed ham over the Alps had dwindled into an inconsiderable remnant, his new levies were still as invincible as their predecessors.

HANNIBALLIANUS. 1. Son of Constantius Chlorus and his second wife Theodora, and half-brother of Constantine the Great. He was put to death in 337 on the death of Constantine.—2. Son of the elder, brother of the younger Delmatius, was also put to death on the death of Constantine.

HANNIBALLIS CASTRA. Vid. CASTRA, No. 2.

HANNO (Ἀννών), one of the most common names at Carthage. Only the most important persons of the name can be mentioned. 1. One of the Carthaginian generals who fought against Agathocles in Africa, B.C. 310.—2. Commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Messana at the beginning of the first Punic war, 264. In consequence of his surrendering the citadel of this city to the Romans, he was crucified on his return home.—3. Son of Hannibal, was sent to Sicily by the Carthaginians with a large force immediately after the capture of Messana, 264, where he carried on the war against the Roman consul Appius Claudius. In 262 he again commanded in Sicily, but failed in relieving Agriguntum, where Hannibal was kept besieged by the Romans. Vid. HANNIBAL, No. 2. In 256 he commanded the Carthaginian fleet, along with Hamilcar, at the great battle of Ecnomus.—4. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet, which was defeated by Lutatius Catulus off the Ægates, 241. On his return home he was crucified.—5. Surnamed the Great, apparently for his crimes in Africa. We do not, however, know against what nations of Africa his arms were directed, nor what was the occasion of the war. He was one of the commanders in the war against the mercenaries in Africa after the end of the first Punic war (240-238). From this time forward he appears to have taken no active part in any of the foreign wars or enterprises of Carthage. But his influence in her councils at home was great; he was leader of the aristocratic party, and, as such, the chief adversary of Hamilcar Barca and his family. On all occasions, from the landing of Barca in Spain till the return of Hannibal from Italy, a period of above thirty-five years, Hanno is represented as thwarting the measures of that able and powerful family, and taking the lead in opposition to the war with Rome, the great object to which all their efforts were directed. He survived the battle of Zama, 202.—6. A Carthaginian officer left in Spain by Hannibal when that general crossed the Pyrenees, 218. He was shortly afterward defeated by Publius Scipio, and taken prisoner.—7. Son of Bomilear, one of the most distinguished of Hannibal's officers. He commanded the right wing at the battle of Cannæ (216), and is frequently mentioned during the succeeding years of the war. In 203 he took the command of the Carthaginian forces in Africa, which he held till the arrival of Hannibal.—8. A Carthaginian general, who carried on the war in Sicily after the fall of Syracuse, 311. He left Sicily in the following year, when Agriguntum was betrayed to the Romans.—9. The last commander of the Carthaginian garrison at Capoa when it was besieged by the Romans (213-211).—10. A Carthaginian navigator, under whose name we possess a Periplus (περίπλους), which was originally written in the Punic language, and afterward translated into Greek. The author had held the office of suffetes, or supreme magistrate at Carthage, and he is said by Pliny to have undertaken the voyage when Carthage was in a most flourishing condition. Hence it has been conjectured that he was the same as the Hanno, the father or son of Hamilcar, who was killed at Himera, B.C. 480; but this is quite uncertain. In the Periplus itself Hanno says that he was sent out by his countrymen to undertake a voyage beyond the Pillars of Hercules, and to found Libyan-phenician towns, and that he sailed with a body of colonists to the number of thirty thousand. On his return from his voyage, he dedicated an account of it, inscribed on a tablet, in the temple of Saturn (Cronos). It is therefore presumed that our periplus is a Greek version of the contents of that Punic tablet. Edited by Falconer, Lond., 1797, with an English translation.

HARMA (τὸ Ἄρμα: 'Ἀρμαρτίς'). 1. A small place in Boeotia, near Tanagra, said to have been so called from the harma or chariot of Adrastus, which broke down here, or from the chariot of Amphiarus, who was here swallowed up by the earth along with his chariot.—2. A small place in Attica, near Phyle.

HARMILTOS (Ἀρμάρτιος), a city and promontory on the coast of Æolis in Asia Minor, on the northern side of the Sinus Hæliatus.

HARMODIUS and ARISTOGITON (Ἀρμόδιος, Ἀριστογείτων), Athenians, of the blood of the Ge-phyrææ, were the murderers of Hipparchus, brother of the tyrant Hippias, in B.C. 514. Aristogiton was strongly attached to the young and beautiful Harmodius, who returned his affection with equal warmth. Hipparchus endeavored to withdraw the youth's love to himself, and, failing in this, resolved to avenge the slight by putting upon him a public insult. Accordingly, he took care that the sister of Harmodius should be summoned to bear one of the sacred baskets in some religious procession, and when she presented herself for the purpose, he caused her to be dismissed and declared unworthy of the honor. This fresh insult determined the two friends to slay both Hipparchus and his brother Hippias as well. They communicated their plot to a few friends, and selected for their enterprise the day of the festival of the great Panathenææ, the only day on which they could appear in arms without exciting suspicion. When the appointed time arrived, the two chief conspirators observed one of their accomplices in conversation with Hippias. Believing, therefore, that they were betrayed, they slew Hipparchus. Harmodius was immediately cut down by the guards. Aristogiton at first escaped, but was afterward taken, and was put to the torture; but he died without revealing the names of any of the conspirators. Four years after this Hippias was expelled, and thenceforth Harmodius and Aristogiton obtained among the Athenians of all succeeding generations the character of patriots, deliverers, and martyrs—names often abused, indeed, but seldom more grossly than in the present case. Their deed of murderous vengeance formed a favorite subject of drinking songs. To be born of their blood was esteemed the highest of honors, and their descendants enjoyed an immunity from public burdens. Their statues, made of bronze by Antenor, were set up in the Agora. When Xerxes took the city, he carried these statues away, and new ones, the work of Calamis, were erected in 477. The original statues were afterward sent back to Athens by Alexander the Great.

HARMONIA (Ἀρμονία), daughter of Mars (Ares) and Venus (Aphrodite), or, according to others, of Jupiter (Zeus) and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, in Samothrace. When Minerva (Athena) assigned to Cadmus the government of Thebes, Jupiter (Zeus) gave him Harmonia for his wife, and all the gods of Olympus were present at the marriage. On the wedding-day Cadmus received a present of a peplos, which afterward became fatal to all who possessed it. Harmonia accompanied Cadmus when he was obliged to quit Thebes, and shared his fate. Vid. CADMUS. Polynices, who inherited the fatal necklace, gave it to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband, Amphiarus, to undertake the expedition against Thebes. Through Alcmaeon, the son of Eriphyle, the necklace came into the hands of Arsinöe, next into those of the sons of Phlegon, Pronous and Agenor, and lastly into those of the sons of Alcmaeon, Amphiotesus and Acarnan, who dedicated it in the temple of Minerva (Athena) Pronoea at Delphi.

HARPAGIA or ἸΚΜ (Ἀρπαγία or -δύιον), a small town in Mysia, between Ozyzius and Priapus, the scene of the rape of Ganymedeas, according to some legends.

HARPAΓΟΣ (Ἀρπαγός). 1. A noble Median, whose preservation of the infant Cyrus, with the events consequent upon it, are related under CYRUS. He became one of the generals of Cyrus, and conquered the Greek cities of Asia Minor.—2. A Persian general, under Darius I., took Histæus prisoner.

HARPAΛΙΩΝ (Ἀρπαλίων), a Paphlagonian, son of Pylæmenes, and guest-friend of Paris: he was slain by Meriones in the Trojan war.]

HARPAΛΟΣ (Ἀρπαλός). 1. A Macedonian of noble birth, accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia as superintendent of the treasury. After the conquest of Darius, he was left by Alexander in charge of the royal treasury, and with the administration of the wealthy satrapy of Babylon. Here, during Alexander's absence in India, he gave himself up to the most extravagant luxury and profusion, and squandered the treasures intrusted to him. When he heard that Alexander, contrary to his expectations, was returning from India, he fled from Babylon with about five thousand talents and a body of six thousand mercenaries, and crossed over to Greece, B.C. 324. He took refuge at Athens, where he employed his treasures to gain over the orators, and induce the people to support him against Alexander and his viceregent, Antipater. Among those whom he thus corrupted are said to have been Demades, Charicles, the son-in-law of Phocion, and even Demosthenes himself. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. But he failed in his general object, for Antipater having demanded his surrender from the Athenians, it was resolved to place him in confinement until the Macedonians should send for him. He succeeded in making his escape from prison, and fled to Crete where he was assassinated soon after his arrival by Thauron, one of his own officers.—2. A Greek astronomer, introduced some improvements into the cycle of CLEOSTRATUS. Harpalus lived before MÆTON.

HARPAΛΥΧΕ (Ἀρπαλύκη). 1. Daughter of Harpalycus, king in Thrace. As she lost her mother in infancy, she was brought up by her father with the milk of cows and mares, and was trained in all manly exercises. After the death of her father, she lived in the forests as a robber, being so swift in running that horses were unable to overtake her. At length she was caught in a snare by shepherds, who killed her.—2. Daughter of Olymenus and Epicæte, was seduced by her own father. To revenge herself she slew her younger brother, and served him up as food before her father. The gods changed her into a bird.

HARPAÑA (Ἀρπάνα: now Arépas), a city of Caria, on the River HARPAUS.

HARPAŪS (Ἀρπαῖος). 1. (now Arpa-Sai), a river of Caria, flowing north into the Mæander, into which it falls opposite to Nyas.—2. (now Harpa-Su), a river of Armenia Major, flowing south into the Araxes. Xenophon, who crossed it with the ten thousand Greeks, states its width as four plethra (about four hundred feet).

HARPIŊA or HARPIŊNA (Ἀρπίη, Ἀρπίην), a town in Elis Pisatis, near Olympia, said to have been called after a daughter of Æopius.

[HARPOCRATES. Vid. HORUS.

HARPOCRATĪON, VALERĪUS, a Greek grammarian of Alexandria, of uncertain date, the author of an extant dictionary to the works of the ten Attic orators, entitled Περὶ τῶν λέξεων τῶν ἑκατοῦτον, or Λεξικὸν τῶν ἑκατοῦτον βιβλίων. It contains not only explanations of legal and political terms, but also accounts of persons and things mentioned in the Attic orators, and is a work of great value. The best editions are the one published at Leipzig, 1824, and the one by Bekker, Berlin, 1833.

HARPYIÆ (Ἀρπυιᾶς), the Harpies, that is, the Robbers or Spoilers, are in Homer nothing but personified storm-winds, who are said to carry off any one who had suddenly disappeared from the earth. Thus they carried off the daughters of King Pandareus, and gave them as servants to the Erynnæes. Hesiod describes them as daughters of Thaumias by the Oceanid Electra, fair-looking and winged maidens, who surpassed winds and birds in the rapidity of their flight. But even in Æschylus they appear as ugly creatures with wings; and later writers represent them as most disgusting monsters, being birds with the heads of maidens, with long claws, and with faces pale with hunger. They were sent by the gods to torment the blind Phineus, and whenever a meal was placed before him, they darted down from the air and carried it off: later writers add, that they either devoured the food themselves, or rendered it unfit to be eaten. Phineus was delivered from them by Zetes and Calais, sons of Boreas, and two of the Argonauts. Vid. p. 91, a. Hesiod mentions two Harpies, Ocypetæ and Aello: later writers three: but low names are not the same in all accounts. Besides the two already mentioned, we find Aëtopos, Nicotboë, Ocythoë, Ocyptode, Celano, Iaboloë. Virgil places them in the islands called Strophades, in the Ionian Sea (Æn. iii. 10), where they took up their abode after they had been driven away from Phinæa. In the famous Harpy monument recently brought from Syria to England, the Harpies are represented as the act of carrying off the daughters of Pandarus.

HARPUA, a people in the army of Ariovistus B.C. 58, supposed to be the same as the Onastus mentioned by Ptolemy, and placed by him in the Chersonesus Cimbrica.

HANNIBAL ('Αννίβας), a Carthaginian name, probably signifies one whose help is Real. 1. Son of Hanno, a Carthaginian general in the first Punic war. He was one of the two generals defeated by Regulus B.C. 256. In 254 he was sent into Sicily with a large army, and remained in the island four years. In 250 he was totally defeated by Metellus, and was put to death on his return to Carthage.—2. A Carthaginian, son-in-law of Hamilcar Barca, on whose death, in 229, he succeeded to the command in Spain. He ably carried out the plans of his father-in-law for extending the Carthaginian dominions in Spain, and intrusted the conduct of most of his military enterprises to the young Hannibal. He founded New Carthage, and concluded with the Romans the celebrated treaty which fixed the Iberus as the boundary between the Carthaginian and Roman dominions. He was assassinated by a slave, whose master he had put to death (221), and was succeeded in the command by HANNIBAL.—3. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and brother of Hannibal. When Hannibal set out for Italy (218), Hasdrubal was left in the command in Spain, and there fought for some years against the two Scipios. In 207 he crossed the Alps and marched into Italy, in order to assist Hannibal; but he was defeated on the Metaurus by the consuls C. Claudius Nero and M. Livius Salinator, his army was destroyed, and he himself fell in the battle. His head was cut off and thrown into Hannibal's camp.—4. One of Hannibal's chief officers, commanded the left wing of the Carthaginian army at the battle of Cannæ (216).—5. Surnamed the Bald (Calvus), commander of the Carthaginian expedition to Sardinia in the second Punic war, 216. He was defeated by the Roman prætor T. Manlius, taken prisoner, and carried to Rome.—6. Son of Gisco, one of the Carthaginian generals in Spain during the second Punic war. He fought in Spain from 214 to 206. After he and Mago had been defeated by Scipio in the latter of these years, he crossed over to Africa, where he succeeded in obtaining the alliance of Syphax by giving him his daughter Sophonisba in marriage. In conjunction with Syphax, Hasdrubal carried on war against Masinissa, but he was defeated by Scipio, who landed in Africa in 204. He was condemned to death for his ill success by the Carthaginian government, but he still continued in arms against the Romans. On the arrival of Hannibal from Italy his sentence was reversed, but the popular feeling against him had not subsided, and in order to escape death from his enemies, he put an end to his life by poison.—7. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet in Africa in 213, must be distinguished from the preceding.—8. Surnamed the Kid (Hæcus), one of the leaders of the party at Carthage favorable to peace toward the end of the second Punic war.—9. General of the Carthaginians in the third Punic war. When the city was taken he surrendered to Scipio, who spared his life. After adorning Scipio's triumph, he spent the rest of his life in Italy.

HARNALUS, Q., a senator and rhetorician in the age of Augustus and Tiberius, died A.D. 26, in the eighty-ninth year of his age.

HÊBÊ ('Ηβή), called JUVENTAS by the Romans the goddess of youth, was a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera). She waited upon the gods, and filled their cups with nectar before Ganymedes obtained this office; and she is further represented as assisting her mother Juno (Hera) in putting the horses to her chariot, and in bathing and dressing her brother Mars (Ares). She married Hercules after he was received among the gods, and bore to him two sons, Alcxiares and Anticæta. Later traditions represent her as a divinity who had it in her power to make aged persons young again. At Rome there were several temples of Juventas. She is even said to have had a chapel on the Capitol before the temple of Jupiter was built there. ΗΕΒΕΟΜΑΙΕΥΑ. Vid. ΕΒΕΟΜΑΙΕΥΑ.

HEBRON ('Εβρών, Χεδρών 'Εβρώνιος; now El Khulil), a city in the south of Judæa, as old as the times of the patriarchs, and the first capital of the kingdom of David, who reigned there seven and a half years as king of Judah only.

HEBRUS ('Εβρος; now Maritza), the principal river in Thrace, rises in the mountains of Scymnus and Rhodope, flows first southeast and then southwest, becomes navigable for smaller vessels at Philippopolis, and for larger ones at Hadrianopolis, and falls into the Egean Sea near Ænos, after forming by another branch an estuary called STENTORIS LACUS. The Hebrus was celebrated in Greek legends. On its banks Orpheus was torn to pieces by the Thracian women; and it is frequently mentioned in connection with the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus.)

HECABE ('Εκαπή). 1. Daughter of Boreas, and one of the Hyperborean maidens, who were believed to have introduced the worship of Diana (Artemis) into Delos.—2. A surname of Diana (Artemis), signifying the goddess who hits at a distance.

HÊCÆLÊ ('Εκάλῃ), a poor old woman, who hospitably received Theseus when he had gone out for the purpose of killing the Marathonian bull. She vowed to offer to Jupiter (Zeus) a sacrifice for the safe return of the hero; but as she died before his return, Theseus ordained that the inhabitants of the Attic tetrapolis should offer a sacrifice to her and Jupiter (Zeus) HECALUS, or HECALÆUS.

HECATÆUS ('Εκαταῖος). 1. Of Miletus, one of the earliest and most distinguished Greek historians and geographers. He was the son of Hegesander, and belonged to a very ancient and murderous family. We have only a few particulars of her life. In B.C. 534 he endeavored to dissuade the countrymen from revolting from the Persians; and when this advice was disregarded, he gave them some sensible counsel respecting the conduct of the war, which was also neglected. Previous to this, Hecateus had visited Egypt and many other countries. He survived the Persian wars, and appears to have died about 476. He wrote two works: 1. Περὶ τῆς γῆς, or Περίγειος, divided into two parts, one of which contained a description of Europe, and the other of Asia, Egypt, and Libya. Both parts were subdivided into smaller sections, which are sometimes quoted under their respective names, such as Hellespontus, &c. 2. Γενεὰ γῆς or Ιστορίαι, in four books, contained an account of the poetical fables and traditions of the Greeks. His work on geography was the more important, as it embodied the results of his numerous travels. He also corrected and improved the map of the earth drawn up by ANAXIMANDER. Herodotus knew the works of Hecateus well, and frequently controverts his opinions. Hecateus wrote in the Ionic dialect in a pure and simple style. The fragments of his works are collected by Klausen, Hecataei Milesii Fragmenta, Berlin, 1831, and by C. and Th. Müller, Frag. Hist. Græc., Paris, 1841.—2. Of Abdera, a contemporary of Alexander the Great and Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, appears to have accompanied the former on his Asiatic expedition. He was a pupil of the skeptic Pyrrho, and is himself called a philosopher, critic, and grammarian. In the reign of the first Ptolemy he travelled up the Nile as far as Thebes. He was the author of several works, of which the most important were, 1. A History of Egypt. 2. A work on the Hyperboreans. 3. A history of the Jews, frequently referred to by Josephus and other ancient writers. This work was declared spurious by Origen: modern critics are divided in their opinions.

Ἥκατις (Ἥκατις), a mysterious divinity, commonly represented as a daughter of Perseus or Peres and Asteria, and hence called Perseia. She is also described as a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Ceres (Demeter), or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Phæra or Juno (Hera), or of Latona (Leto) or Tartarus. Homer does not mention her. According to the most genuine traditions, she appears to have been an ancient Thracian divinity, and a Titan, who ruled in heaven, on the earth, and in the sea, bestowing on mortals wealth, victory, wisdom, good luck to sailors and hunters, and prosperity to youth and to the flocks of cattle. She was the only one among the Titans who retained this power under the rule of Jupiter (Zeus), and she was honored by all the immortal gods. The extensive power possessed by Hecate was probably the reason that she was subsequently identified with several other divinities, and at length became a mystic goddess, to whom mysteries were celebrated in Samothrace and in Egina. In the Æmeric hymn to Ceres (Demeter) she is represented as taking an active part in the search after Proserpina (Persephone), and when the latter was found, as remaining with her as her attendant and companion. Vid. p. 248, a. She thus became a deity of the lower world, and is described in this capacity as a mighty and formidable divinity. In consequence of her being identified with other divinities, she is said to have been Selene or Luna in heaven, Artemis or Diana in earth, and Persephone or Proserpina in the lower world. Being thus, as it were, a three-fold goddess, she is described with three bodies or three heads, the one of a horse, the second of a dog, and the third of a lion. Hence her epithets Tergemina, Triformis, Triceps, &c. From her being an infernal divinity, she came to be regarded as a spectral being, who sent at night all kinds of demons and terrible phantoms from the lower world, who taught sorcery and witchcraft, and dwelt at places where two roads crossed, on tombs, and near the blood of murdered persons. She herself wandered about with the souls of the dead, and her approach was announced by the whining and howling of dogs. At Athens there were very many small statues or symbolical representations of Hecate (ἑκάστα), placed before or in houses, and on spots where two roads crossed: it would seem that people consulted such Hecates as oracles. At the close of every month dishes with food were set out for her and other avengers of evil at the points where two roads crossed; and this food was consumed by poor people. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of dogs, honey, and black female lambs.

HECATOMNUS (Ἑκατόμνους), king or dynast of Oaria in the reign of Artaxerxes III. He left three sons, Mausolus, Idriens, and Pixedarus, all of whom, in their turn, succeeded him in the sovereignty; and two daughters, Artemisia and Ada.

HECATOMPOLIS (Ἑκατόμπολις, i. e., having one hundred cities), appellation of the island Crete, from the one hundred cities it was said to have had in ancient times.]

HECATOMPYLOS (Ἑκατόμυλος, i. e., having one hundred gates). 1. An epithet of Thebes in Egypt. Vid. THEBAE.—2. A city in the middle of Parthia, twelve hundred and sixty stadia or one hundred and thirty-three Roman miles from the Caspian Pylæ; enlarged by Seleucus, and afterward used by the Parthian kings as a royal residence.

Ἡκίτων (Ἡκίτων), a Stoic philosopher, a native of Rhodes, studied under Panætius, and wrote numerous works, all of which are lost.

HECATOMNÆS (Ἑκατόμνηος: now Μακρόνησος), a group of small islands, between Lesbos and the coast of Æolis, on the southern side of the mouth of the Gulf of Adramyttium. The name, one hundred islands, was indefinite; the real number was reckoned by some at twenty, by others at forty. Strabo derives the name, not from ἑκατόν, one hundred, but from Ἑκτερες, a surname of Apollo.

HECTOR (Ἡκτωρ), the chief hero of the Trojans in their war with the Greeks, was the eldest son of Priam and Hecuba, the husband of Andromache, and father of Scamandrius. He fought with the bravest of the Greeks, and at length slew Patroclus, the friend of Achilles. The death of his friend roused Achilles to the fight. The other Trojans fled before him into the city. Hector alone remained without the walls, though his parents implored him to turn; but when he saw Achilles his heart failed and he took to flight. Thrice did he surround the city, pursued by the swift-footed Achilles, and then fell pierced by Achilles's ear. Achilles tied Hector's body to his chariot and thus dragged him into the camp of the Greeks; but later traditions relate that he first dragged the body thrice around the walls of Troy. At the command of Jupiter (Zeus), Hector surrendered the body to the prayers of Priam, who buried it at Troy with great pomp. Hector is one of the noblest conceptions of the Greeks. He is the great bulwark of Troy, and Achilles trembles when he approaches him. He has a presentiment of the fall of his city, but he perseveres in his heroic resistance, preferring death to slavery and disgrace. Besides these virtues of a warrior, he is distinguished also by those of a man: his heart is sensitive to the gentle feelings of a son, a husband, a father.

Ἑκὺβα (Ἑκάβη), daughter of Dymas in Thracia, or of Cisseus, king of Thrace. She was the wife of Priam, king of Troy, to whom she bore Hector, Paris, Deiphobus, Helenus, Cassandra, and many other children. On the fall of Troy, she was carried away as a captive by the Greeks. According to the tragedy of Euripides, which bears her name, she was carried by the Greeks to Chersonesus, and there she saw her daughter Polyxena sacrificed. On the same day the waves of the sea washed up on the coast the body of her last son Polydorus, who had been murdered by Polymestor, king of Thracian Chersonesus, to whose care he had been intrusted by Priam. Hecuba thereupon killed the children of Polymestor, and tore the eyes of their father. Agamemnon pardoned her the crime, and Polymestor prophesied that she should be metamorphosed into a she-wolf and should leap into the sea at a place called Cynossema. It was added that the inhabitants of Chersonesus endeavored to stone her, but that she metamorphosed into a dog, and in this form fled through the country for a long time. According to other accounts she was given as a wife to Ulysses, and in despair leaped into Hellespont; or, being anxious to die, she uttered such invectives against the Greeks, that the warriors put her to death, and called the place where she was buried Cynossema, with reference to her impudent invectives.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), son of Melicertes, was a poet of Samos or of Athens, and an epigrammatic poet. Eleven of his epigrams are in the Greek Anthology. He was a contemporary rival of Callimachus, and lived, therefore, at the middle of the third century B.C.

Ἑβύλιος, a celebrated performer on the flute in the time of Domitian (Juv. vi. 382).

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος). 1. An Athenian orator, sent to protect Mantinea from the threatened attack of Epaminondas, B.C. 362.—2. One of Alexander's officers, who accompanied him into Asia, and perished at the battle of Arbela.—3. Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), of Thasos, a poet of the comedy at Athens, but more celebrated for parodies, of which kind of poetry he was the inventor. He was nicknamed Θαξίς, on account of his fondness for that kind of pulchre. He lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and his parody of the Gigasomachia was the piece to which the Athenians were listening when the news was brought to them in the theatre of the destruction of the expedition to Sicily.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), the leader or ruler; is the name of one of the Athenian Charites or Graces. Hegemone was also a surname of Diana (Artemis) at Sparta and in Aresmia.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), a Spartan naval commander during the Peloponnesian war, defeated the Athenian fleet off Oropus, but did not follow up his victory by attacking Athens.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), an historian of Alexandria, is said to have been the real author of the work called Troica, which went under the name of Cephalaon or Cephalion. He appears to be the same as the Hegesinaon who was sent by Antiochus the Great as one of his envoys to the Romans in B.C. 196 and 193.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος). 1. Of Magnesia, a rhetorician and historian, lived about B.C. 290, and wrote the history of Alexander the Great. He was regarded by some as the founder of that degenerate style of composition which bore the name of the Asiatic. His own style was destitute of all vigor and dignity, and was marked chiefly by childish conceits and minute prettinesses.—2. Of Salamis, supposed by some to have been the author of the Cyprian poem which, on better authority, is ascribed to Stasinus.—3. A Cyrenaic philosopher, who lived at Alexandria in the time of the Ptolemies, perhaps about B.C. 260. He wrote a work containing such gloomy descriptions of human misery that it drove many persons to commit suicide; hence he was surnamed Ποσειδωνεύτης (Ποσειδωνεύτης). He was, in consequence, forbidden to teach by Ptolemy.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), and Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), two Greek statues, whom many scholars identify with one another. They lived at the period immediately preceding that of Phidias. The chief work of Hegesias was the statue of Orestes and Pollux, which are supposed to be the same as those which now stand on the stairs leading to the Capitol.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), of Pergamum, the successor of Evander and the immediate predecessor of Carneades in the chair of the Academy, flourished about B.C. 185.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος). 1. An Athenian orator, and a contemporary of Demosthenes, to whose political party he belonged. The grammarians ascribe to him the oration on Halonnesus, which has come down to us under the name of Demosthenes.—2. A poet of the new comedy, flourished about B.C. 300.—3. A Greek historian of Maceonia, wrote an account of the peninsula of Pallene.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος), daughter of Glauco, king of Thrace, and wife of Miltiades.

Ἑβύλιος (Ἑβύλος). 1. Natural son of Pisistratus, made by his father tyrant of Sigeum.—2. Son of Aristagoras of Samos, came before the battle of Mycale on an embassy to the Spartan king Leotychides from the Samians to treat for the liberation of his countrymen from the Persian yoke.]

Ἑβύλιος. Vid. HEGESIAS.

HĒLĒNA (Ἠλένη), daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Leda, and sister of Castor and Pollux (the Dioscuri). She was of surpassing beauty. In her youth she was carried off by Theseus and Pirithous to Attica. When Theseus was absent in Hades, Castor and Pollux undertook an expedition to Attica, to liberate their sister. Athene was taken, Helen delivered, and Æthra, the mother of Theseus, made prisoner, and carried as a slave of Helen to Sparta. According to some accounts, she bore to Theseus a daughter, Iphigenia. On her return home she was sought in marriage by the noblest chiefs from all parts of Greece. She chose Menelaus for her husband, and became by him the mother of Hermione. She was subsequently seduced and carried off by Paris to Troy. For details, vid. PARIS and MENELAUS. The Greek chiefs who had been her suitors resolved to revenge her abduction, and accordingly sailed against Troy. Hence arose the celebrated Trojan war, which lasted ten years. During the course of the war she is represented as showing great sympathy with the Greeks. After the death of Paris toward the end of the war, she married his brother Deiphobus. On the capture of Troy, which she is said to have favored, she betrayed Deiphobus to the Greeks, and became reconciled to Menelaus, whom she accompanied to Sparta. Here she lived with him for some years in peace and happiness; and here, according to Homer, Telemachus found her solemnizing the marriage of her daughter Hermione with Neoptolemus. The accounts of Helen's death differ. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. Others relate that she and Menelaus were buried at Therapne in Laconia, where their tomb was seen by Pausanias. Others, again, relate, that after the death of Menelaus she was driven out of Peloponnesus by the sons of the latter and fled to Rhodes, where she was tied to a tree and strangled by Polyxus: the Rhodians expiated the crime by dedicating a temple to her under the name of Helena Dendritia. According to another tradition she married Achilles in the island of Leuce, and bore him a son, Euphorion. The Egyptian priests told Herodotus that Helen never went to Troy, but that when Paris reached Egypt with Helen on his way to Troy, she was detained by Proteus, king of Egypt; and that she was restored to Menelaus when he visited Egypt in search of her after the Trojan war, finding that she had never been at Troy.

HĒLĒNA, FLÁVIA JÚLIA. 1. The mother of Constantine the Great. When her husband Constantius was raised to the dignity of Cæsar by Diocletian, A.D. 302, he was compelled to repudiate his wife, to make way for Theodora, the step-child of Maximianus Herulius. Subsequently, when her son succeeded to the purple, Helena was treated with marked distinction, and received the title of Augusta. She died about 328. She was a Christian, and is said to have discovered at Jerusalem the sepulchre of our Lord, together with the wood of the true cross.—2. Daughter of Constantine the Great and Fausta, married her cousin Julian the Apostate 355, and died 360.

HĒLĒNA (Ἠλένη). 1. (Now Makronisi) a small and rocky island between the south of Attica and Ceos, formerly called Cranai.—3. The later name of ILLIBERRIS in Gaul.

HĒLĒNUS (Ἠλένηος). 1. Son of Priam and Hecuba, was celebrated for his prophetic powers, and also fought against the Greeks in the Trojan war. In Homer we have no further particulars about Helenus; but in later traditions he is said to have deserted his countrymen and joined the Greeks. There are likewise various accounts respecting his desertion of the Trojans. According to some, he did it of his own accord; according to others, he was ensnared by Ulysses, who was anxious to obtain his prophecy respecting the fall of Troy. Others, again, relate that, on the death of Paris, Helenus and Deiphobus contended for the possession of Helena, and that Helenus being conquered, fled to Mount Ida, where he was taken prisoner by the Greeks. After the fall of Troy he fell to the share of Pyrrhus. He foretold Pyrrhus the sufferings which awaited the Greeks who returned home by sea, and prevailed upon him to return by land to Epirus. After the death of Pyrrhus he received a portion of the country, and married Andromache, by whom he became the father of Cestrinus. When Æneas, in his wanderings, arrived in Epirus, he was hospitably received by Helenus, who also foretold him the future events of his life.—2. Son of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, by Lanassa, daughter of Agathocles. He accompanied his father to Italy B.C. 280, and was with him when Pyrrhus perished at Argos, 272. He then fell into the hands of Antigonus Gonatas, who, however, sent him back in safety to Epirus.—3. Son of Cæops, a Greek, slain by Hector before Troy.]

HĒLÍADA and HĒLÍADES (Ἠλιάδες; and Ἠλιάδης), the sons and daughters of Helios (the Sun). The name Heliades is given especially to Phæthusa, Lampetia, and Phæbe, the daughters of Helios and the nymph Clymene, and the sisters of Phæthos. They bewailed the death of their brother Phæthos so bitterly on the banks of the Eridanus, that the gods, in compassion, changed them into poplar-trees and their tears into amber. Vis. Eridanus.

[HELICIAON (Ἠλικίων), son of Antenor, and husband of Laodice; he is said to have founded Patavium in Italy.]

HĒLÍOS (Ἠλίος), daughter of Lycæon, was beloved by Jupiter (Zeus), but Juno (Hera), out of jealousy, metamorphosed her into a she-bear, whereupon Jupiter (Zeus) placed her among the stars under the name of the Great Bear.

HĒLÍOS (Ἠλίος; Ἠλικῖος, Ἠλικεύς). 1. The ancient capital of Achaia, said to have been founded by Ion, possessed a celebrated temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which was regarded as the great sanctuary of the Achaean race. Helice was swallowed up by an earthquake together with Bura, B.C. 373. The earth sunk deep into the ground, and the place on which the cities stood was ever afterward covered by the sea.—2. An ancient town in Thessaly, which disappeared in early times.

HELICON (Ἠλικών), son of Aescus, a celebrated artist. Vis. Aescus.

HELICON (Ἠλικών; now Helicon, Pal no-Bowri, Turk. Zagora), a celebrated range of mountains in Boeotia, between the Lake Copais and the Corinthian Gulf, was covered with snow the greater part of the year, and possessed many romantic ravines and lovely valleys. Helicon was sacred to Apollo and the Muses, the latter of whom are hence called Ἑλικωνίασιν παρθέναις and Ἑλικωνιάδαι γυναῖκες by the Greek poets, and Heliconiades and Heliconides by the Roman poets. Here sprang the celebrated fountains of the Muses, AGANIPPUS and HIPPOCRENE. At the fountain of Hippocrene was a grove sacred to the Muses, which was adorned with some of the finest works of art. On the slopes and in the valleys of the mountains grew many medicinal plants, which may have given occasion to the worship of Apollo as the healing god.

Ἡελίοδορος (Ἡελίοδορος). 1. An Athenian surnamed Periegetes (Περιηγητής), probably lived about B.C. 164, and wrote a description of the works of art in the Acropolis at Athens. This work was one of the authorities for Pliny's account of the Greek artists.—2. A rhetorician at Rome in the time of Augustus, whom Horace mentions as the companion of his journey to Brundisium (Sat., i. 5, 2, 8).—3. A Stoic philosopher at Rome, who became a delator in the reign of Nero. (Juv., Sat., i. 38).—4. A rhetorician, and private secretary to the Emperor Hadrian.—5. Of Emesa in Syria, lived about the end of the fourth century of our era, and was bishop of Tricea in Thessaly. Before he was made bishop he wrote a romance in ten books, entitled Æthiopica, because the scene of the beginning and the end of the story is laid in Ethiopia. This work has come down to us, and is far superior to the other Greek romances. It relates the loves of Theagenes and Chariclea. Though deficient in those characteristics of modern fiction which appeal to the universal sympathies of our nature, the romance of Heliodorus is interesting on account of the rapid succession of strange and not altogether improbable adventures, the many and various characters introduced, and the beautiful scenes described. The language is simple and elegant. The best editions are by Mitscherlich, in his Scriptores Græci Erotici, Argentorat., 1798, and by Coraë, Paris, 1804.—6. Of Larissa, the author of a short work on optics, still extant, chiefly taken from Euclid's Optics: edited by Mantzani, Pistor., 1768.

HELIOGABALUS. Vid. ELAGABALUS.

Ἡελίοβλις (Ἡέλιον πόλις or Ἡελίοπολις, i. e. the City of the Sun). 1. (Heb. Babelath; now Baalbek, ruins), a celebrated city of Syria, a chief seat of the worship of Baal, one of whose symbols was the sun, and whom the Greeks identified with Apollo, as well as with Jupiter (Zeus); hence the Greek name of the city. With the worship of Baal, here as elsewhere, was associated that of Astarte, whom the Greeks identified with Venus (Aphrodite). It was situated in the middle of Oule-Syria, at the western foot of Anti-Libanus, on a rising ground at the northeastern extremity of a large plain which reaches almost to the sea, and which is well watered by the River Leontes (now Kahr-ol-Kasimiyeh), near whose sources Heliopolis was built; the amroes of the Orontes also are not far north of the city. The situation of Heliopolis necessarily made it a place of great commercial importance, as it was on the direct road from Egypt and the Red Sea, and also from Tyre to Syria, Asia Minor, and Europe; and hence, probably the wealth of the city, to which its ruins still bear witness. We know, however, very little of its history. It was made a Roman colony by the name of Colonia Julia Augusta Felix Heliopolitana, and colonized by veterans of the fifth and eighth legions, under Augustus. Antoninus Pius built the great temple of Jupiter (i. e., Baal), of which the ruins still exist; and there are medals which show, in addition to other testimony, that it was favored by several of the later emperors. All the existing ruins are of the Roman period, and most of them probably of later date than the great temple just mentioned; but it is impossible to determine their exact times. They consist of a large quadrangular court in front of the great temple, another hexagonal court outside of this, and in front of all, a portico or propylæa, approached by a flight of steps. Attached to one corner of the quadrangular court is a smaller but more perfect temple, and at some distance from all these buildings there is a circular edifice, of a unique and very interesting architectural form. There is also a single Doric column on a rising ground, and traces of the city walls.—2. (In the Old Testament, On, or Bethshemesh; now Metarich, ruins northeast of Cairo), a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Heliopolites, stood on the eastern side of the Pelusiac branch of the Nile, a little below the apex of the Delta, and near the canal of Trajan, and was, in the earliest period of which we have any record, a chief seat of the Egyptian worship of the sun. Here, also, was established the worship of Mnevis, a sacred bull similar to Apis. The priests of Heliopolis were renowned for their learning. It suffered much during the invasion of Cambyses; and by the time of Strabo it was entirely ruined.

Ἡέλιος (Ἡέλιος or Ἡέλιος), called Sol by the Romans, the god of the sun. He was the son of Hyperion and Thea, and a brother of Selene and Eos. From his father he is frequently called HYPERIONIDES or HYPERION, the latter of which is an abridged form of the patronymic HYPERIONION. In the Homeric hymn on Helios he is called a son of Hyperion and Euryphaessa. Homer describes Helios as giving light both to gods and men: he rises in the east from Oceanus, traverses the heaven, and descends in the evening into the darkness of the west and Oceanus. Later poets have marvellously embellished this simple notion. They tell of a most magnificent palace of Helios in the east, containing a throne occupied by the god, and surrounded by personifications of the different divisions of time. They also assign him a second palace in the west, and describe his horses as feeding upon herbs growing in the islands of the Blessed. The manner in which Helios during the night passes from the western into the eastern ocean is not mentioned either by Homer or Hesiod, but later poets make him sail in a golden boat, the work of Hephaestus, round one half of the earth and thus arrive in the east at the point from which he has to rise again. Others represent him as making his nightly voyage while slumbering in a golden bed. The horses and chariot with which Helios traverses the heavens are not mentioned in the Iliad and Odyssey, but first occur in the Homeric hymn on Helios, and both are described minutely by later poets. Helios is described as the god who sees and hears every thing, and was thus able to reveal to Vulcan (Hephaestus) the faithlessness of Venus (Aphrodite), and to Ceres (Demeter) the abduction of her daughter. At a later time Helios became identified with Apollo, though the two gods were originally quite distinct; but the identification was never carried out completely, for no Greek poet ever made Apollo ride in the chariot of Helios through the heavens, and among the Romans we find this idea only after the time of Virgil. The representations of Apollo with rays around his head, to characterize him as identical with the sun, belong to the time of the Roman empire. The island of Thrinacia (Sicily) was sacred to Helios, and there he had flocks of sheep and oxen, which were tended by his daughters Phaethusa and Lampetia. Later traditions ascribe to him flocks also in the island of Erythia; and it may be remarked, in general, that sacred flocks, especially of oxen, occur in most places where the worship of Helios was established. His descendants are very numerous; and the surnames and epithets given him by the poets are mostly descriptive of his character as the sun. Temples of Helios (ἥλιος) existed in Greece at a very early time: and in later times we find his worship established in various places, and especially in the island of Rhodes, where the famous colossus was a representation of the god. The sacrifices offered to him consisted of white rams, boars, bulls, goats, lambs, especially white horses, and honey. Among the animals sacred to him, the cock is especially mentioned. The Roman poets, when speaking of the god of the sun (Sol), usually adopt the notions of the Greeks. The worship of Sol was introduced at Rome, especially after the Romans had become acquainted with the East, though traces of the worship of the sun and moon occur at an early period.

HELISSEION (Ἠλισσίον or Ἠλισσός), a small town in Arcadia, on a river of the same name, which falls into the Alpheus.

HELLANICUS (Ἑλληνικός). 1. Of Mytilene in Lesbos, the most eminent of the Greek logographers or early Greek historians, was in all probability born about B.C. 496, and died 411. We have no particulars of his life, but we may presume that he visited many of the countries, of whose history he gave an account. He wrote a great number of genealogical, chronological, and historical works, which are cited under the titles of Troica, Æolica, Persica, &c. One of his most popular works was entitled Τίσιμα τῆς Ἡρᾶς: it contained a chronological list of the priestesses of Juno (Hera) at Argos, compiled from the records preserved in the temple of the goddess of this place. This work was one of the earliest attempts to regulate chronology, and was made use of by Theophrastus.

Timæus, and others. The fragments of Hellenicus are collected by Sturz, Hellenici Latini Fragmenta, Lips., 1826; and by C. and Th. Müller, Fragm. Histor. Græc., Paris, 1841.—2. A Greek grammarian, a disciple of Agathangelus and apparently a contemporary of Aristarchus wrote on the Homeric poems.

HELLAS, HELLENÆ. Vid. GRÆCIA.

HELLE (Ἑλλή), daughter of Athamas and Nephele, and sister of Phrixus. When Phrixus was to be sacrificed (vid. PHRIXUS), Nephele rescued her two children, who rode away through the air upon the ram with the golden fleece, the gift of Mercury (Hermes); but, between Sigæum and the Chersonesus, Helle fell into the sea, which was thence called the Sea of Helle (Hellepontus). Her tomb was shown near Pæctya, on the Hellespont.

HELLEN (Ἑλλεύς), son of Deucalion and Pyrrha, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Dorippe, husband of Oresia, and father of Æolus, Dorus, and Xuthus. He was king of Phthia in Thessaly, and was succeeded by his son Æolus. He is the mythical ancestor of all the Hellenes; from his two sons Æolus and Dorus were descended the Æolians and Dorians; and from his two grandsons Achæus and Ion, the sons of Xuthus, the Achæans and Ionians.

HELLESPOINTUS (Ἑλλήσποντος; now Straits of the Dardanelles or of Gallipoli, Turk. Stambul Daghisi), the long narrow strait connecting the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara) with the Ægean Sea, and through which the waters of the Black Sea discharge themselves into the Mediterranean in a constant current. The length of the strait is about fifty miles, and the width varies from six miles at the upper end to two at the lower, and in some places it is only one mile wide, or even less. The narrowest part is between the ancient cities of SERRUS and ABYDUS, where Xerxes made his bridge of boats (vid. XERXES), and where the legend related that Leander swam across to visit Hero. Vid. LEANDER. The name of the Hellespont (i. e., the Sea of Helle) was derived from the story of Helle's being drowned in it. Vid. HELLE. The Hellespont was the boundary of Europe and Asia, dividing the Thracian Chersonesus in the former from the Troad, and the territories of Abydus and Lampascus in the latter. The district just mentioned, on the southern side of the Hellespont, was also called Ἑλλήσποντος, its inhabitants Ἑλλήσποντιοί, and the cities on its coast Ἑλλήσποντιαι πόλεις.—2. Under the Roman empire, Hellespontus was the name of a provincial province, composed of the Troad and the northern part of Mysia, and having Oysicus for its capital.

HELLŌPIA. Vid. ELLIPPIA.

HELIDRUS or HELIDRUS (ἡ Ἑλιδρος; Ἑλιδρὸς), a town on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Syracuse, at the mouth of the River Helorus. There was a road from Helorus to Syracuse (ὁδὸς Ἑλιδρίας, Thuc. vi. 70; vii. 80).

HELLOS (τὸ Ἑλός; Ἑλείος, Ἑλεῖρος). 1. A town in Laconia, on the coast, in a marshy situation, whence its name (ἑλός—marsh). The town was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It was commonly said that the Spartan alaxan called Helotes (ἑλωτες), were originally the Achaean inhabitants of this town, who were reduced by the Dorian conquerors to slavery; but this account of the origin of the Helotes seems to have been merely an invention, in consequence of the similarity of their name to that of the town of Helos. Vid. Dict. of Antig. art. Helos.—2. A town or district of Elis, on the Akrota.

HELVECONA, a people in Germany, between the Vistula and the Vistula, south of the Rugii, and north of the Burgundiones, reckoned by Tacitus among the Ligii.

HELVI, a brave and powerful Celtic people, who dwelt between Mount Jurasus (now Jura), the Lacus Lemannus (now Lake of Geneva), the Rhone, and the Rhine as far as the Lacus Brigantinus (now Lake of Constance). They were thus bounded by the Sequani on the west, by the Mantuates and Lepontii in Cisalpine Gaul on the south, by the Ræti on the east, and by the German nations on the north beyond the Rhine. Their country, called Ager Helvetiorum (but never Helvetia), thus corresponded to the western part of Switzerland. Their chief town was AVENTICUM. They were divided into four pagi or cantons, of which the Pagus Tigurinus was the most celebrated. We only know the name of one of the three others, namely, the Fines Verbigenus, or, more correctly, Urbigenus. The Helvetii are first mentioned in the war with the Cimbri. In B.C. 107 the Tigurini defeated and killed the Roman consul L. Cassius Longinus, on the Lake of Geneva, while another division of the Helvetii accompanied the Cimbri and Tentones in their invasion of Gaul. Subsequently the Helvetii invaded Italy along with the Cimbri, and they returned home in safety after the defeat of the Cimbri by Marius and Catulus in 101. About forty years afterward they resolved, upon the advice of Orgetorix, one of their chiefs, to migrate from their country with their wives and children, and seek a new home in the more fertile plains of Gaul. In 58 they endeavored to carry their plan into execution, but they were defeated by Cæsar, and driven back into their own territories. The Romans now planted colonies and built fortresses in their country (Noviodunum, Vindonissa, Aventicum), and the Helvetii gradually adopted the customs and language of their conquerors. They were severely punished by the generals of Vitellius (A.D. 70), whom they refused to recognize as emperor; and after that time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people. The Helvetii were included in Gallia Lugdunensis according to Strabo, but in Gallia Belgica according to Pliny: most modern writers adopt Pliny's statement. When Gaul was subdivided into a great number of provinces under the later emperors, the country of the Helvetii formed, with that of the Sequani and the Rauraci, the province of Maxima Sequanorum.

HEPHAESTION (Ἥφαστιον). 1. Son of Amyntor, a Macedonian of Pella, celebrated as the friend of Alexander the Great, with whom he had been brought up. Alexander called Hephæstion his own private friend, but Craterus the friend of the king. Hephæstion accompanied Alexander to Asia, and was employed by the king in many important commands. He died at Ecbatana, after an illness of only seven days, B.C. 325. Alexander's grief for his loss was passionate and violent. A general mourning was ordered throughout the empire, and a funeral pile and monument erected to him at Babylon, at a cost of ten thousand talents.—2. A Greek grammarian, who instructed the Emperor Verus in Greek, and accordingly lived about A.D. 150. He was perhaps the author of a Manual on Metres (Ἐγχειρίδιον περὶ μέτρων), which has come down to us under the name of Hephæstion. This work is a tolerably complete manual of Greek metres, and forms the basis of all our knowledge on that subject. Edited by Gaisford, Oxon., 1810.

HEPHAESTUS (Ἥφαistos), called VULCANUS by the Romans, the god of fire. He was, according to Homer, the son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Hera (Juno). Later traditions state that he had no father, and that Hera (Juno) gave birth to him independent of Zeus (Jupiter), as she was jealous of Zeus (Jupiter) having given birth to Athena (Minerva) independent of her. He was born lame and weak, and was, in consequence, so much disliked by his mother that she threw him down from Olympus. The marine divinites, Thetis and Eurynome, received him, and he dwelt with them for nine years in a grotto, beneath Oceanus, making for them a variety of ornaments. He afterward returned to Olympus, though we are not told through what means, and he appears in Homer as the great artist of the gods of Olympus. Although he had been cruelly treated by his mother, he always showed her respect and kindness, and on one occasion took her part when she was quarrelling with Zeus (Jupiter), which so much enraged the father of the gods that he seized Hephaestus (Vulcan) by the leg and hurled him down from heaven. Hephaestus (Vulcan) was a whole day falling, but in the evening he alighted in the island of Lemnos, where he was kindly received by the Sintians. Later writers describe his lameness as the consequence of this fall, while Homer makes him lame from his birth. He again returned to Olympus, and subsequently acted the part of mediator between his parents. On that occasion he offered a cup of nectar to his mother and the other gods, who burst out into immoderate laughter on seeing him busily hobbling from one god to another. Hephaestus (Vulcan) appears to have been originally the god of fire simply; but as fire is indispensable in working metals, he was afterward regarded as an artist. His palace in Olympus was imperishable and shining like stars. It contained his workshop, with the anvil and twenty bellows, which worked spontaneously at his bidding. It was there that he made all his beautiful and marvellous works, both for gods and men. The ancient poets abound in descriptions of exquisite workmanship which had been manufactured by the god. All the palaces in Olympus were his workmanship. He made the armor of Achilles; the fatal necklace of Harmonia; the fire-breathing bulls of Æetes, king of Colchis, &c. In later accounts, the Cyclopes are his workmen and servants, and his workshop is no longer in Olympus, but in some volcanic island. In the Iliad the wife of Hephaestus (Vulcan) is Charis; in Hesiod, Aglaia, the youngest of the Charites; but in the Odyssey, as well as in later accounts, Aphrodite (Venus) appears as his wife. Aphrodite (Venus) proved faithless to her husband, and was in love with Ares (Mars); but Helios disclosed their amours to Hephaestus (Vulcan), who caught the guilty pair in an invisible net, and exposed them to the laughter of the assembled gods. The favorite abode of Hephaestus (Vulcan) on earth was the island of Lemnos; but other volcanic islands also, such as Lipara, Hiera, Imbros, and Sicily, are called his abodes or workshops. Hephaestus (Vulcan), like Athena (Minerva), gave skill to mortal artists, and, conjointly with her, he was believed to have taught men the arts which embellish and adorn life. Hence at Athens they had temples and festivals in common. The epithets and surnames by which Hephaestus (Vulcan) is designated by the poets, generally allude to his skill in the plastic arts or to his lameness. The Greeks frequently placed small dwarf-like statues of the god near the hearth. During the best period of Grecian art he was represented as a vigorous man with a beard, and is characterized by his hammer or some other instrument, his oval cap, and the chiton, which leaves the right shoulder and arm uncovered. The Roman Vulcanus was an old Italian divinity. Vid. VULCANUS.

HERA (Hpa or Hpa), called JUNE by the Romans. The Greek Hera, that is, Mistress, was a daughter of Cronos (Saturn) and Rhea, and sister and wife of Zeus (Jupiter). Some call her the eldest daughter of Cronos (Saturn), but others give this title to Hestia. According to Homer she was brought up by Oceanus and Tethys, and afterward became the wife of Zeus (Jupiter) without the knowledge of her parents. This simple account is variously modified in other traditions. Being a daughter of Cronos (Saturn), she, like his other children, was swallowed by her father, but afterward released and, according to an Arcadian tradition, she was brought up by Temenus, the son of Pelagus. The Argives, on the other hand, related that she had been brought up by Euboea, Prosymma, and Acreea, the three daughters of the River Asterion. Several parts of Greece claimed the honor of being her birth-place, and more especially Argos and Samos, which were the principal seats of her worship. Her marriage with Zeus (Jupiter) offered ample scope for poetical invention, and several places in Greece also claimed the honor of having been the scene of the marriage, such as Euboea, Samos, Cosus in Crete, and Mount Thornax in the south of Argolia. Her marriage, called the Sacred Marriage (ἱερὸς γάμος), was represented in many places where she was worshipped. At her nuptials all the gods honored her with presents, and Ge (Terra) presented to her a tree with golden apples, which was watched by the Hesperides, at the foot of the Hyperborean Atlas. In the Iliad Hera (Juno) is treated by the Olympian gods with the same reverence as her husband. Zeus (Jupiter) himself listens to her counsels, and communicates his secrets to her. She is, notwithstanding, far inferior to him in power, and must obey him unconditionally. She is not, like Zeus (Jupiter), the queen of gods and men, but simply the wife of the supreme god. The idea of her being the queen of heaven, with regal wealth and power, is of much later date. Her character, as described by Homer, is not of a very amiable kind; and her jealousy, obstinacy, and quarrelsome disposition sometimes make her husband trouble. Hence arise frequent disputes between Hera (Juno) and Zeus (Jupiter); and on one occasion Hera (Juno), in conjunction with Poseidon (Neptune) and Athena (Minerva), contemplated putting Zeus (Jupiter) into chains. Zeus (Jupiter), in such cases, not only threatens, but beats her. Once he even hung her up in the clouds, with her hands chained, and with two anvils suspended from her feet; and on another occasion, when Hephaestus (Vulcan) attempted to help her, Zeus (Jupiter) hurled him down from Olympus. By Zeus (Jupiter) she was the mother of Ares (Mars), Hebe, and Hephaestus (Vulcan). Hera (Juno) was, properly speaking, the only really married goddess among the Olympians for the marriage of Aphrodite (Venus) with Hephaestus (Vulcan) can scarcely be taken into consideration. Hence she is the goddess of marriage and of the birth of children. Several epithets and surnames, such as Ελευθερα, Γαλαξία, Ζωγία, Τελεία, &c., contain allusions to this character of the goddess, and the Ilithyia is described as her daughter. She is represented in the Iliad riding in a chariot drawn by four horses, in the harnessing and unharnessing of which she is assisted by Hebe and the Hours. Owing to the judgment of Paris (vid. PARIS) she was hostile to the Trojans, and in the Trojan war she accordingly sided with the Greeks. She persecuted all the children of Zeus (Jup)

ter) by mortal mothers, and hence appears as the enemy of Dionysus (Bacchus), Hercules, and others. In the Argonautic expedition she assisted Jason. It is impossible here to enumerate all the events of mythical story in which Hera (Juno) acts a part, and the reader must refer to the particular deities or heroes with whose story she is connected. Hera (Juno) was worshipped in many parts of Greece, but more especially at Argos, in the neighborhood of which she had a splendid temple, on the road to Mycenæ. Her great festival at Argos is described in the Dict. of Ant. art. ΗΡΑΙΑ. She also had a splendid temple in Samos. The ancients gave several interpretations respecting the real significance of Hera (Juno), but we want in all probability regard her as the great goddess of nature, who was worshipped every where from the earliest times. The worship of the Roman Juno is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. JUNO. Hera (Juno) was usually represented as a majestic woman of mature age, with a beautiful forehead, large and widely-opened eyes, and with a grave expression commanding reverence. Her hair was adorned with a crown or a diadem. A veil frequently hangs down the back of her head, to characterize her as the bride of Zeus (Jupiter), and the diadem, veil, sceptre, and peacock are her ordinary attributes.

ΗΡΑΚΛΕΙΑ (Ἡράκλεια: Ἡρακλέως: Heraclæus). 1. In Europe. 1. H., in Lucania, on the River Siris, founded by the Tarentines. During the independence of the Greek states in the south of Italy, congresses were held in this town under the presidency of the Tarentines. It sunk into insignificance under the Romans. — 2. In Acarnania, on the Ambracian Gulf. — 3. In Pisatis Elis, in ruins in the time of Strabo. — 4. The later name of Perinthus in Thrace. Vid. PERINTHUS. — 5. H. CAOCABARIA PORRABIA, in Gallia Narbonensis, on the coast, a sea-port of the Massilians. — 6. H. LYNCESTIS (Λυγκηστis) also called Pelagonia (now Bitolia or Bitolia), in Macedonia, on the Via Egnatia, west of the Egean, the capital of one of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans. — 7. H. MINDA (Μινωία: ruins near Torre di Capo Bianco), on the southern coast of Sicily, at the mouth of the River Halycus, between Agrigentum and Selinus. According to tradition it was founded by Minos, when he pursued Daedalus to Sicily, and it may have been an ancient colony of the Cretans. We know, however, that it was afterward colonized by the inhabitants of Selinus, and that its original name was Minos, which it continued to bear till about B.C. 500, when the town was taken by the Lacædæmonians, under Euryleon, who changed its name into that of Heraclæa; but it continued to bear its ancient appellation as a surname, to distinguish it from other places of the same name. It fell at an early period into the hands of the Carthaginians, and remained in their power till the conquest of Sicily by the Romans, who planted a colony there. — 8. H. SINTICA (Συντική), in Macedonia, a town of the Sintî, on the left bank of the Strymon, founded by Amyntas, brother of Philip. — 9. H. TRACHINIA, in Thebes. Vid. TRACHINIA. — II. In Asia. 1. H. POCIDIA (Ἡ. ἡ Ποικιδία, or Πόιδου, or Πόιδου, or Πόιδου).

now Harakli or Eregli), a city on the southern shore of the Pontus Euxinus, on the coast of Bithynia, in the territory of the Mariandyni, was situated twenty stadia north of the River Lycus, upon a little river called Acheron or Soonautes, and near the base of a peninsula called Acherusia, and had a fine harbor. It was founded about B.C. 550 by colonists from Megara and from Tanagra in Boeotia (not, as Strabo says, from Miletus). After various political struggles, it settled down under a monarchical form of government. It reached the height of its prosperity in the reign of Darius Codomannus, when it had an extensive commerce, and a territory reaching from the Parthenius to the Sangarius. It began to decline in consequence of the rise of the kingdom of Bithynia and the foundation of Nicomedia, and the invasion of Asia Minor by the Gauls; and its ruin was completed in the Mithradatic war, when the city was taken and plundered, and partly destroyed, by the Romans under Cotta. It was the native city of HERACLIDUS PONTICUS, and perhaps of the painter ZEUKIS. — 2. H. AD LATMUM (Ἡ. Ἀδλτμου or ἡ ὑπὸ Ἀδλτμῶ: ruins near the Lake of Baffi), a town of Ionia, southeast of Miletus, at the foot of Mount Latmus, and upon the Sinus Latmicus; formerly called Latmus. Near it was a cave, with the tomb of Endymion. There was another city of the same name in Caria, one in Lydia, two in Syria, one in Media, and one in India, none of which require special notice here.

ΗΡΑΚΛΕΟΠΟΛΙΣ (Ἡρακλεοπολῖς). 1. ΠΑΡΥΑ (ἡ μικρά), also called ΣΙΤΗΘΑ, a city of Lower Egypt, in the Nomos Sethroites, twenty-two Roman miles west of Pelusium. — 2. ΜΑΓΕΤΑ (ἡ μεγάλη, also ἡ ἀνω), the capital of the fertile Nomos Heraclæopolites or Heraclæotes, in the Heptanomis or Middle Egypt: a chief seat of the worship of the ichneumon.

[HERACLEUS (Ἡρακλῆς). Vid. HERCULES.] HERACLÆUM (Ἡρακλεῖον), the name of several promontories and towns, of which none require special notice except, 1. A town in Macedonia, at the mouth of the Apidas, near the frontiers of Thessaly. — 2. The harbor of Cnæus in Crete. — 3. A town on the coast of the Delta of Egypt, a little west of Canopus, from which the Canopic mouth of the Nile was often called also the Heraclæotic mouth. — 4. A place near Gindarus, in the Syrian province of Cyrrhestice, where Ventidius, the legate of M. Antony, gained his great victory over the Parthians under Pacorus in B.C. 53.

HERACLIANUS (Ἡρακλειανός), one of the officers of Honorius, put Stilicho to death (A.D. 408), and received, as the reward of that service, the government of Africa. He rendered good service to Honorius during the invasion of Italy by Alaric, and the usurpation of Attalus. In 413 he revolted against Honorius, and invaded Italy; but his enterprise failed, and on his return to Africa he was put to death at Carthage.

HERACLIDÆ (Ἡρακλειδαί), the descendants of Hercules, who, in conjunction with the Dorians, conquered Peloponnesus. It had been the will of Jupiter (Zeus), so ran the legend, that Hercules should rule over the country of the Perseids, at Mycenæ and Tiryns; but, through Juno's (Hera) cunning, Eurystheus, and hence put into the place of Hercules, who had become the servant of the former. After the death of Hercules, his claims devolved upon his sons and descendants. At the time of his death, Hyllus, the eldest of his four sons by Deianira, was residing with his brothers at the court of Ceyx at Trachis. As Eurystheus demanded their surrender, and Ceyx was unable to protect them, they fled to various parts of Greece, until they were received as suppliants at Athens, at the altar of Eleos (Mercy). According to the Heraclicæ of Euripides, the sons of Hercules were first staying at Argos, thence went to Trachis in Thessaly, and at length came to Athens. Demophon, the son of Theseus, received them, and they settled in the Attic tetrapolis. Eurystheus, to whom the Athenians refused to surrender the fugitives, now marched against the Athenians with a large army, but was defeated by the Athenians under Iolaus, Theseus, and Hyllus, and was slain with his sons. The battle itself was celebrated in Attic story as the battle of the Scironian rock, on the coast of the Saronic Gulf, though Pindar places it in the neighborhood of Thebes. After the battle the Heraclicæ entered the Peloponnesus, and maintained themselves there for one year. This was their first invasion of Peloponnesus. But a plague, which spread over the whole peninsula, compelled them to return to Attica, where, for a time, they again settled in the Attic tetrapolis. From thence they proceeded to Ægimius, king of the Dorians, whom Hercules had assisted in his war against the Lapithæ, and who had promised to preserve a third of his territory for the children of Hercules. Vid. Ægimius. The Heraclicæ were hospitably received by Ægimius, and Hyllus was adopted by the latter. After remaining in Doris three years, Hyllus, with a band of Dorians, undertook an expedition against Atreus, who had married a daughter of Eurystheus, and had become king of Mycenæ and Tiryns. Hyllus marched across the Corinthian isthmus, and first met Echemus of Tegea, who fought for the Pelopidæ, the principal opponents of the Heraclicæ. Hyllus fell in single combat with Echemus, and, according to an agreement which had been made before the battle, the Heraclicæ were not to make any further attempt upon Peloponnesus for the next fifty years. Thus ended their second invasion. They now retired to Tricorythus, where they were allowed by the Athenians to take up their abode. During the period which followed (ten years after the death of Hyllus), the Trojan war took place; and thirty years after the Trojan war Cleodæus, son of Hyllus, again invaded Peloponnesus, which was the third invasion; about twenty years later, Aristomachus, the son of Cleodæus, undertook the fourth expedition; but both heroes fell. Not quite thirty years after Aristomachus (that is, about eighty years after the destruction of Troy), the Heraclicæ prepared for their fifth and final attack. Temenus, Cresphontes, and Aristodemus, the sons of Aristomachus, upon the advice of an oracle, built a fleet on the Corinthian Gulf; but this fleet was destroyed, because Hippotes, one of the Heraclicæ, had killed Carnus, an Acarnanian soothsayer; and Aristodemus was killed by a flash of lightning. An oracle now ordered them: to take a three-eyed man for their commander. He was found in the person of Oxylus, the son of Andromon, an Ætolian, but descended from a family in Elis. The expedition now successfully sailed from Naupactus toward Rhium in Peloponnesus. Oxylus, keeping the invaders away from Elis, led them through Arcadia. The Heraclicæ and Dorians conquered Tisamenus, the son of Orestes, who ruled over Argos, Mycenæ, and Sparta. After this they became masters of the greater part of Peloponnesus, and then distributed by lot the newly acquired possessions. Temenus obtained Argos, Procles and Eurystheus, the twin sons of Aristodemus, Lacedæmon; and Cresphontes, Messenia. Such are the traditions about the Heraclicæ and their conquest of Peloponnesus. They are not purely mythical, but contain a genuine historical substance, notwithstanding the various contradictions in the accounts. They represent the conquest of the Æolian population by Dorian invaders, who henceforward appear as the ruling race in the Peloponnesus. The conquered Æolians became partly the slaves and partly the subjects of the Dorians. Vid. Dict. of Ant. art. ΠΗΛΙΟΙ.

HERACLIDÆS (Ἡρακλείδης). 1. A Syracusan, son of Lydimachus, one of the generals when Syracuse was attacked by the Athenians, B.C. 415.—2. A Syracusan, who held the chief command of the mercenary forces under the younger Dionysius. Being suspected by Dionysius he fled from Syracuse, and afterward took part with Dion in expelling Dionysius from Syracuse. After the expulsion of the tyrant, a powerful party at Syracuse looked up to Heraclicæ as their leader, in consequence of which Dion caused him to be assassinated, 354.—3. Son of Agathocles, accompanied his father to Africa where he was put to death by the soldiers when they were deserted by Agathocles, 301.—4. Of Tarentum, one of the chief counsellors of Philip V., king of Macedonia.—5. Of Byzantium, sent as ambassador by Antiochus the Great to the two Scipios, 190.—6. One of the three ambassadors sent by Antiochus Epiphanes to the Romans, 169. Heraclicæ was banished by Demetrius Soter, the successor of Antiochus (162), and in revenge gave his support to the imposture of Alexander Balas.—7. So named Porricus, because he was born at Heraclea in Pontus. He was a person of considerable wealth, and migrated to Athens, where he became a pupil of Plato. He paid attention also to the Pythagorean system, and afterward attended the instructions of Speusippus, and finally of Aristotle. He wrote a great number of works upon philosophy, mathematics, music, history, politics, grammar, and poetry; but almost all of these works are lost. There comes down to us a small work, under the name of Heraclicæ, entitled περὶ Πολιτείας, of which the best editions are by Köler, Halle, 1804, 1805, in his edition of Ælian, Paris, 1806, [ed. by Schneidewin, 1849]. Another extant work, Ἀλλήγορίαι Ὀμπρικά, which also bears the name of Heraclicæ, was certainly not written by him. Diogenes Laërtius, in his life of Heraclicæ, says that "Heraclicæ made tragedy and put the name of Theopis to them." This sentence has given occasion to a learned question by Bentley (Phalaris, p. 289), to prove that the fragments attributed to Theophrastus are really cited from these counterfeit tragedies of Heracles. Some childish stories are told about Heracles keeping a pet serpent, and ordering one of his friends to conceal his body after his death, and place the serpent on the bed, that it might be supposed that he had been taken to the company of the gods. It is also said that he killed a man who had usurped the tyranny at Heracles, and there are other traditions about him scarcely worth relating.—8. An historian, who lived in the reign of Ptolemy Philopator (222-206), and wrote several works, quoted by the grammarians.—9. A physician of Tarentum, lived in the third or second century B.C., and wrote some works on Materia Medica, and a commentary on all the works in the Hippocratic Collection.—10. A physician of Erythrae in Ionia, was a pupil of Chrysermus, and a contemporary of Strabo in the first century B.C.

HERACLITUS (Ἡράκλειτος). 1. Of Ephesus, a philosopher generally considered as belonging to the Ionian school, though he differed from their principles in many respects. In his youth he travelled extensively, and after his return to Ephesus the chief magistracy was offered him, which, however, he transferred to his brother. He appears afterward to have become a complete recluse, rejecting even the kindnesses offered by Darius, and at last retreating to the mountains, where he lived on pot-herbs; but, after some time, he was compelled by the sickness consequent on such meagre diet to return to Ephesus, where he died. He died at the age of sixty, and flourished about B.C. 513. Heracitus wrote a work On Nature (περὶ φύσεως), which contained his philosophical views. From the obscurity of his style, he gained the title of the Obscure (σκούρος). He considered fire to be the primary form of all matter; but by fire he meant only to describe a clear light fluid, "self-kindled and self-extinguished," and therefore not differing materially from the air of Anaximenes.—2. An Academic philosopher of Tyre, a friend of Antiochus, and a pupil of Clitomachus and Philo.—3. The reputed author of a work, Περὶ Ἀνίστων, published by Westermann in his Mythographi, Brunsvig, 1843.—4. Of Lesbos, author of a history of Macedonia.—5. An elegiac poet of Halicarnassus, a contemporary and friend of Callimachus, who wrote an epigram on him.]

HERACLITUS (Ἡράκλειτος: Ἡράκλειος). 1. The name of several Sicilians mentioned by Cicero, viz.: a. A citizen of Centuripini, who appeared in evidence against Verres; b. A native of Segesta, put to death by Verres, though innocent; c. Son of Hiero, a noble and opulent Syracusan, stripped of nearly all his property by Verres; d. Another Syracusan, priest of Jupiter (Zeus), held a high estimation by his fellow-citizens.—2. A coach and favorite of Valentinian III.; was the instigator of the murder of Aëtius.—3. A governor of the Emperor Leo's in Africa, fought successfully against the Vandals, 466 A.D.]

HERAEA (Ἡραία: Ἡραεῖς: ruins near St. Joseph), a town in Arcadia, on the right bank of the Alphæa, near the borders of Elis. Its territory was called Ἡρακλῆϊς (Ἡρακλῆϊς).

HERMUS MONTES (τὰ Ἡὸα ὁ ὄρος: novy Monti

Sori), a range of mountains in Sicily, running from the centre of the island southeast, and ending in the promontory Pachynum.

HERMIRA (Ἡρμίρα: Ἡρμιράδος, Herbitanus, a town in Sicily, north of Agyrium, in the mountainous, was a powerful place in early times under the tyrant Archonides, but afterward declined in importance.

HERCULANUM, a town in Samnium, conquered by the consul Carvilius, B.C. 293 (Liv., x, 45), must not be confounded with the more celebrated town of this name mentioned below.

HERCULANUM, HERCULANUM, HERCULANUM, HERCULENSE OPIDUM, HERCULÆA URBS (Ἡράκλειον), an ancient city in Campania, near the coast, between Neapolis and Pompeii, was originally founded by the Oscans, was next in the possession of the Tyrrhenians, and subsequently was chiefly inhabited by Greeks, who appear to have settled in the place from other cities of Magna Græcia, and to have given it its name. It was taken by the Romans in the Social war (B.C. 89, 88), and was colonized by them. In A.D. 68 a great part of it was destroyed by an earthquake; and in 79 it was overwhelmed, along with Pompeii and Stabiae, by the great eruption of Mount Vesuvius. It was buried under showers of ashes and streams of lava, from seventy to one hundred feet under the present surface of the ground. On its site stand the modern Portici and part of the village of Resina: the Italian name of Ercolano does not indicate any modern place, but only the part of Herculaneum that has been disinterred. The ancient city was accidentally discovered by the sinking of a well in 1720, since which time the excavations have been carried on at different periods; and many works of art have been discovered, which are deposited in the Royal Museum at Portici. It has been found necessary to fill up again the excavations which were made, in order to render Portici and Resina secure, and therefore very little of the ancient city is to be seen. The buildings that have been discovered are a theatre capable of accommodating about ten thousand spectators, the remains of two temples, a large building, commonly designated as a forum civile, two hundred and twenty-eight feet long and one hundred and thirty-two broad, and some private houses, the walls of which were adorned with paintings, many of which, when discovered, were in a state of admirable preservation. There have been also found at Herculaneum many MSS., written on rolls of papyrus; but the difficulty of unrolling and deciphering them was very great; and the few which have been deciphered are of little value, consisting of a treatise of Philodemus on music, and fragments of unimportant works on philosophy.

HERCULES (Ἡρακλῆς), the most celebrated of all the heroes of antiquity. His exploits were celebrated not only in all the countries round the Mediterranean, but even in the most distant lands of the ancient world. I. GREEK LEGENDS. The Greek traditions about Hercules appear in their national purity down to the time of Herodotus. But the poets of the time of Herodotus and of the subsequent periods, introduced considerable alterations, which were probably derived from the East or Egypt, for every nation possesses some traditions respecting heroes of superhuman strength and power. Now while in the earliest Greek legends Hercules is a purely human hero, a conqueror of men, and cities, he afterward appears as the subduer of monstrous animals, and is connected in a variety of ways with astronomical phenomena. According to Homer, Hercules was the son of Jupiter (Zeus) by Alcmena of Thebes in Boeotia. His stepfather was Amphitryon. Amphitryon was the son of Alcæus, the son of Perseus; and Alcmena was a grand-daughter of Perseus. Hence Hercules belonged to the family of Perseus. Jupiter (Zeus) visited Alcmena in the form of Amphitryon, while the latter was absent warring against the Taphians; and he, pretending to be her husband, became by her the father of Hercules. For details, vid. ALCME-NE, AMPHITRYON. On the day on which Hercules was to be born, Jupiter (Zeus) boasted of his becoming the father of a hero who was to rule over the race of Perseus. Juno (Hera) prevailed upon him to swear that the descendant of Perseus born that day should be the ruler. Thereupon she hastened to Argos, and there caused the wife of Sthenelus to give birth to Eurystheus; whereas, by keeping away the Ilithyia, she delayed the birth of Hercules, and thus robbed him of the empire which Jupiter (Zeus) had destined for him. Jupiter (Zeus) was enraged at the imposition practiced upon him, but could not violate his oath. Alcmena brought into the world two boys, Hercules, the son of Jupiter (Zeus), and Iphicles, the son of Amphitryon. Nearly all the stories about the childhood and youth of Hercules, down to the time when he entered the service of Eurystheus, seem to be inventions of a later age. At least in Homer and Hesiod we are only told that he grew strong in body and mind; that, confiding in his own powers, he defied even the immortal gods, and wounded Juno (Hera) and Mars (Ares), and that under the protection of Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva (Athena) he escaped the dangers which Juno (Hera) prepared for him. To these simple accounts, various particulars are added in later writers. As he lay in his cradle, Juno (Hera) sent two serpents to destroy him, but the infant hero strangled them with his own hands. As he grew up, he was instructed by Amphitryon in driving a chariot, by Autolycus in wrestling, by Eurytus in archery, by Castor in fighting with heavy armor, and by Linus in singing and playing the lyre. Linus was killed by his pupil with the lyre because he had censured him; and Amphitryon, to prevent similar occurrences, sent him to feed his rattle. In this manner he spent his life till his eighteenth year. His first great adventure happened while he was still watching the oxen of his stepfather. A huge lion, which haunted Mount Cithæron, made great havoc among the flocks of Amphitryon and Thestius (or Thestius), king of Thestia. Hercules promised to deliver the country of the monster; and Thestius rewarded Hercules by making him his guest so long as the chase lasted. Hercules slew the lion, and henceforth wore its skin as his ordinary garment, and its mouth and head as his helmet. Others related that the head of Hercules was taken from the Nemean lion. On his return to Thebes, he met the envoys of King Erginus of Orchomenos, who were going to fetch the annual tribute of one hundred oxen, which they had compelled the Thebans to pay. Hercules cut off the noses and ears of the envoys, and thus sent them back to Erginus. The latter thereupon marched against Thebes; but Hercules defeated and killed Erginus, and compelled the Orchomenians to pay double the tribute which they had formerly received from the Thebans. In this battle against Erginus Hercules lost his stepfather Amphitryon, though the tragedians make him survive the campaign. Creon rewarded Hercules with the hand of his daughter Megara, by whom he became the father of several children. The gods, on the other hand, made him presents of arms: Mercury (Hermes) gave him a sword, Apollo a bow and arrows, Vulcan (Hephaestus) a golden coat of mail, and Minerva (Athena) a peplus. He cut for himself a club in the neighborhood of Nemea, while, according to others, the club was of brass, and the gift of Vulcan (Hephaestus). Soon afterward Hercules was driven mad by Juno (Hera), and in this state he killed his own children by Megara and two of Iphicles. In his grief he sentenced himself to exile, and went to Thebes, who purified him. Other traditions place this madness at a later time, and relate the circumstances differently. He then consulted the oracle of Delphi as to where he should settle. The Pythia first called him by the name of Hercules—for hitherto his name had been Alcides or Alceus—and ordered him to live at Tiryns and to serve Eurystheus for the space of twelve years, after which he should become immortal. Hercules accordingly went to Tiryns, and did as he was bid by Eurystheus. The account of the twelve labors which Hercules performed at the bidding of Eurystheus are found only in the later writers. The only one of the twelve labors mentioned by Homer is his descent into the lower world to carry off Cerberus. We also find in Homer the fight of Hercules with a sea monster; his expedition to Troy, to fetch the horses which Laomedon had refused him; and his war against the Pylians, when he destroyed the whole family of their king Neleus, with the exception of Nestor. Hesiod mentions several of the feats of Hercules distinctly, but knows nothing of their number twelve. The selection of these twelve from the great number of feats ascribed to Hercules is probably the work of the Alexandrines. They are usually arranged in the following order. 1. The fight with the Nemean lion. The valley of Nemea, between Cleonæ and Phlius, was inhabited by a monstrous lion, the offspring of Typhon and Echidna. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring him the skin of this monster. After using in vain his club and arrows against the lion, he strangled the animal with his own hands. He returned carrying the dead lion on his shoulder, but Eurystheus was so frightened at the gigantic strength of the hero, that he ordered him to deliver the account of his exploit outside the town.—2. Fight against the Lernean Hydra. This monster, like the lion, was the slaying of Typhon and Echidna, and was brought up by Juno (Hera). It ravaged the country of Lerna near Argos, and dwelt in a swamp near the well of Amymone. It had nine heads, of which the middle one was immortal. Hercules struck off its heads with his club; but in the place of the head he cut off, two new ones grew forth each time. A gigantic crab also came to the assistance of the hydra, and wounded Hercules. However, with the assistance of his faithful servant Iolaus, he burned away the heads of the hydra, and buried the ninth or immortal one under a huge rock. Having thus conquered the monster, he poisoned his arrows with its bile, whence the wounds inflicted by them became incurable. Eurystheus declared the victory unlawful, as Hercules had won it with the aid of Iolaus.—3. Capture of the Arcadian stag. This animal had golden antlers and brazen feet. It had been dedicated to Diana (Artemis) by the nymph Taygete, because the goddess had saved her from the pursuit of Jupiter (Zeus). Hercules was ordered to bring the animal alive to Mycenæ. He pursued it in vain for a whole year: at length he wounded it with an arrow, caught it, and carried it away on his shoulders. While in Arcadia, he was met by Diana (Artemis), who was angry with him for having outraged the animal sacred to her; but he succeeded in soothing her anger, and carried his prey to Mycenæ. According to some statements he killed the stag.—4. Destruction of the Erymanthian boar. This animal, which Hercules was ordered to bring alive to Eurystheus, had descended from Mount Erymanthus into Paophia. Hercules chased him through the deep snow and having thus worn him out, he caught him in a net, and carried him to Mycenæ. Other traditions place the hunt of the Erymanthian boar in Thessaly, and some even in Phrygia. It must be observed that this and the subsequent labors of Hercules are connected with certain subordinate labors, called Parerga (Ἰδεργα). The first of these parerga is the fight of Hercules with the Centaurs. In his pursuit of the boar he came to the centaur Pholus, who had received from Bacchus (Dionysus) a cask of excellent wine. Hercules opened it, contrary to the wish of his host, and the delicious fragrance attracted the other centaurs, who besieged the grotto of Pholus. Hercules drove them away; they fled to the house of Chiron; and Hercules, eager in his pursuit, wounded Chiron, his old friend, with one of his poisoned arrows; in consequence of which, Chiron died. Vid. Chiron. Pholus likewise was wounded by one of the arrows, which by accident fell on his foot and killed him. This fight with the centaurs gave rise to the establishment of mysteries, by which Ceres (Demeter) intended to purify the hero from the blood he had shed against his own will.—5. Cleansing of the stables of Augeas. Eurystheus imposed upon Hercules the task of cleansing in one day the stalls of Augeas, king of Elis. Augeas had a herd of three thousand oxen, whose stalls had not been cleaned for thirty years. Hercules, without mentioning the command of Eurystheus, went to Augeas, and offered to cleanse his stalls in one day, if he would give him the tenth part of his cattle. Augeas agreed to the terms; and Hercules, after taking Phyleus, the son of Augeas, as his witness, led the rivers Alpheus and Peneus through the stalls, which were thus cleaned in a single day. But Augeas, who learned that Hercules had undertaken the work by the command of Eurystheus, refused to give him the reward. His son Phyleus then bore witness against his father, who exiled him from Elis. Eurystheus, however, declared the exploit null and void, because Hercules had stipulated with Augeas for a reward for performing it. At a later time Hercules invaded Elis, and killed Augeas and his sons. After this he is said to have founded the Olympic games.—6. Destruction of the Stymphalian birds. These voracious birds had been brought up by Mars (Ares). They had brazen claws, wings, and beaks, used their feathers as arrows, and ate human flesh. They dwelt on a lake near Stymphalia in Arcadia, from which Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to expel them. When Hercules undertook the task, Minerva (Athena) provided him with a brazen rattle, by the noise of which he startled the birds; and, as they attempted to fly away, he killed them with his arrows. According to some accounts, he only drove the birds away, and they appeared again in the island of Aretias, where they were found by the Argonauts.—7. Capture of the Cretan bull. According to some, this bull was the one which had carried Europa across the sea. According to others, the bull had been sent out of the sea by Neptune (Poseidon), that Minos might offer it in sacrifice. But Minos was so charmed with the beauty of the animal, that he kept it; and sacrificed another in its stead. Neptune (Poseidon) punished Minos by driving the bull mad, and causing it to commit great havoc in the island. Hercules was ordered by Eurystheus to catch the bull, and Minos willingly allowed him to do so. Hercules accomplished the task, and brought the bull home on his shoulders; but he then set the animal free again. The bull now roamed through Greece, and at last came to Marathon, where we meet it again in the stories of Theseus.—8. Capture of the mares of the Thracian Diomedes. This Diomedes, king of the Bistones in Thrace, fed his horses with human flesh. Eurystheus ordered Hercules to bring these animals to Mycenæ. With a few companions, he seized the animals, and conducted them to the sea-coast. But here he was overtaken by the Bistones. During the fight he intrusted the mares to his friend Abderus, who was devoured by them. Hercules defeated the Bistones, killed Diomedes, whose body he threw before the mares, built the tower of Abdera in honor of his unfortunate friend, and then returned to Mycenæ with the mares, which had become tame after eating the flesh of their master. The mares were afterward set free, and destroyed on Mount Olympus by wild beasts.—9. Seizure of the girdle of the queen of the Amazons. Hippolyte, the queen of the Amazons, possessed a girdle, which she had received from Mars (Ares). Admetus, the daughter of Eurystheus, wished to obtain this girdle, and Hercules was therefore sent to fetch it. He was accompanied by a number of volunteers, and after various adventures in Europe and Asia, he at length reached the country of the Amazons.

Hippolyte at first received him kindly, and promised him her girdle; but Juno (Hera) having excited the Amazons against him, a contest ensued, in which Hercules killed their queen. He then took her girdle, and carried it with him. In this expedition Hercules killed the two sons of Boreas, Calais and Zetes; and he also begot three sons by Echidna, in the country of the Hyperboreans. On his way home he landed in Ithaca, where he rescued Hesione from the monster sent against her by Neptune (Poseidon); in return for which service, her father, Laomedon, promised him the horses he had received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Gany-medes; but, as Laomedon did not keep his word, Hercules, on leaving, threatened to make war against Troy. He landed in Thrace, where he slew Sarpedon, and at length returned through Macedonia to Peloponnesus.—10. Capture of the oxen of Geryones in Erythia. Geryones, the monster with three bodies, lived in the fabulous island of Erythia (the reddish), so called because it lay under the rays of the setting sun in the west. This island was originally placed off the coast of Epirus, but was afterward identified either with Gades or the Balearic Islands, and was at all times believed to be in the distant west. The oxen of Geryones were guarded by the giant Eurytion and the two-headed dog Orthrus; and Hercules was commanded by Eurystheus to fetch them. After traversing various countries, he reached at length the frontiers of Libya and Europe, where he erected two pillars (Calpe and Abyla) on the two sides of the Straits of Gibraltar, which were hence called the Pillars of Hercules. Being annoyed by the heat of the sun, Hercules shot at Helios, who so much admired his boldness, that he presented him with a golden cup or boat, in which he sailed to Erythia. He there slew Eurytion and his dog, as well as Geryones, and sailed with his booty to Tartessus, where he returned the golden cup (boat) to Helios. On his way home he passed through Gaul, Italy, Illyricum, and Thrace, and met with numerous adventures, which are variously embellished by the poets. Many attempts were made to deprive him of the oxen, but he at length brought them in safety to Eurystheus, who sacrificed them to Juno (Hera). These ten labors were performed by Hercules in the space of eight years and one month; but as Eurystheus declared two of them to have been performed unlawfully, he commanded him to accomplish two more.—11. Fetching the golden apples of the Hesperides. This was particularly difficult, since Hercules did not know where to find them. They were the apples which Juno (Hera) had received at her wedding from Terra (Ga), and which she had intrusted to the keeping of the Hesperides and the dragon Ladon, on Mount Atlas, in the country of the Hyperboreans. For details, vid. HESPERIDES. After various adventures in Europe, Asia, and Africa, Hercules at length arrived at Mount Atlas. On the advice of Prometheus, he sent Atlas to fetch the apples, and in the mean time bore the weight of heaven for him. Atlas returned with the apples, but refused to take the burden of heaven on his shoulders again. Hercules, however, contrived by a stratagem to get the apples, and hastened away. On his return Eurystheus made him a present of the apples; but Hercules dedicated them to Minerva (Athena), who restored them to their former place. Some traditions add that Hercules killed the dragon Ladon.—12. Bringing Cerberus from the lower world. This was the most difficult of the twelve labors of Hercules. He descended into Hades, near Taenarum in Laconia, accompanied by Mercury (Hermes) and Minerva (Athena). He delivered Theseus and Ascalaphus from their torments. He obtained permission from Pluto to carry Cerberus to the upper world, provided he could accomplish it without force of arms. Hercules succeeded in seizing the monster and carrying it to the upper world; and after he had shown it to Eurystheus, he carried it back again to the lower world. Some traditions connect the descent of Hercules into the lower world with a contest with Hades, as we see even in the Iliad, (v., 397), and more particularly in the Alceas of Euripides (24, 846). Besides these twelve labors, Hercules performed several other feats without being commanded by Eurystheus. These feats were called Parerga by the ancients. Several of them were interwoven with the twelve labors, and have been already described; those which had no connection with the twelve labors are spoken of below. After Hercules had performed the twelve labors, he was released from the servitude of Eurystheus, and returned to Thebes. Here there gave Megara in marriage to Iolaus; and he wished to gain in marriage for himself Iole, the daughter of Eurytus, king of Oechalia. Eurytus promised his daughter to the man who should conquer him and his sons in shooting with the bow. Hercules defeated them; but Eurytus and his sons, with the exception of Iphitus, refused to give Iole to him, because he had murdered his own children. Soon afterward the oxen of Eurytus were carried off, and it was suspected that Hercules was the offender. Iphitus again defended Hercules, and requested his assistance in searching after the oxen. Hercules agreed; but when the two had arrived at Tiryns, Hercules, in a fit of madness, threw his friend down from the wall, and killed him. Deiphobus of Amyclæ purified Hercules from this murder, but he was, nevertheless, attacked by a severe illness. Hercules then repaired to Delphi to obtain a remedy, but the Pythia refused to answer his questions. A struggle ensued between Hercules and Apollo, and the combatants were not separated till Jupiter (Zeus) sent a flash of lightning between them. The oracle now declared that he would be restored to health if he would serve three years for wages, and surrender his earnings to Eurytus, as an atonement for the murder of Iphitus. Therefore he became servant to Omphale, queen of Lydia, and widow of Tmolus. Later writers describe Hercules as living effeminately during his residence with Omphale; he span wool, it is said, and sometimes put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. According to other accounts, he nevertheless performed several great feats during this time. He undertook an expedition to Colchis, which brought him into connection with the Argonauts; he took part in the Calydonian hunt, and met Theseus on his landing from Troezen on the Corinthian Isthmus. An exposition to India, which was mentioned in some traditions, may likewise be inserted in this place. When the time of his servitude had expired, he sailed against Troy, took the city, and killed Laomedon, its king. On his return from Troy, a storm drove him on the island of Oea, where he was attacked by the Mæropes; but he defeated them and killed their king, Eurypylus. It was about this time that the gods sent for him in order to fight against the Giants. Vid. GIGANTES. Soon after his return to Argos he marched against Angus, as has been related above. He then proceeded against Pylus, which he took, and killed the sons of Neleus except Nestor. He next advanced against Lacedæmon, to punish the sons of Hippocoon for having assisted Neleus and slain Omon, the son of Læymnius. He took Lacedæmon, and assigned the government of it to Tyndareus. On his return to Tegea, he became, by Auge, the father of Telephus (vid. AUGES); and he then proceeded to Calydon, where he obtained Deianira, the daughter of Oeneus, for his wife, after fighting with Achelous for her. Vid. DEIANIRA, ACHÉLOUS. After Hercules had been married to Deianira nearly three years, he accidentally killed, at a banquet in the house of Linus, the boy Eunomus. In accordance with the law, Hercules went into exile, taking with him his wife Deianira. On their road they came to the River Eryon, across which the centaur Nessus carried travellers for a small sum of money. Hercules himself forded the river, but gave Deianira to Nessus to carry across. Nessus attempted to outrage her: Hercules heard her screaming, and shot an arrow into the heart of Nessus. The dying centaur called out to Deianira to take his blood with her, as it was a sure means of preserving the love of her husband. He then conquered the Dryopes, and assisted Ægimius, king of the Dorians, against the Lapithæ. Vid. ÆGIMUS. After this he took up his abode at Trachis, whence he marched against Eurytus of Œchaliæ. He took Œchaliæ, killed Eurytus and his sons, and carried off his daughter Iole as a prisoner. On his return home he landed at Cæcum, a promontory of Eubœa, erected an altar to Jupiter (Zeus), and sent his companion Lichas to Trachis, in order to fetch him a white garment, which he intended to use during the sacrifice. Deianira, afraid lest Iole should supplant her in the affections of her husband, steeped the white garment he had demanded in the blood of Nessus. This blood had been poisoned by the arrow with which Hercules had shot Nessus; and, accordingly, as soon as the garment became warm on the body of Hercules, the poison penetrated into all his limbs, and caused him the most excruciating agony. He seized Lichas by his feet, and threw him into the sea. He wrenched off the garment, but it stuck to his flesh, and with it he tore away whole pieces from his body. In this state he was conveyed to Trachis. Deianira, on seeing what she had unwittingly done, hung herself. Hercules commanded Hyllus, his eldest son by Deianira, to marry Iole as soon as he should arrive at the age of manhood. He then ascended Mount Œta, raised a pile of wood, on which he placed himself, and ordered it to be set on fire. No one ventured to obey him, until at length Peas the shepherd, who passed by, was prevailed upon to comply with the desire of the suffering hero. When the pile was burning, a cloud came down from heaven, and, amid peals of thunder, carried him to Olympus, where he was honored with immortality, became reconciled to Juno (Hera), and married her daughter Hebe, by whom he became the father of Alexiares and Anioetus. Immediately after his apotheosis, his friends offered sacrifices to him as a hero; and he was, in course of time, worshipped throughout all Greece as a god and as a hero. His worship, however, prevailed more extensively among the Dorians than among any other of the Greek races. The sacrifices offered to him consisted principally of bulls, boars, rams, and lambs. The works of art in which Hercules was represented were extremely numerous, and of the greatest variety, for he was represented at all the various stages of his life, from the cradle to his death. But whether he appears as a child, a youth, a struggling hero, or as the immortal inhabitant of Olympus, his character is always one of heroic strength and energy. Specimens of every kind are still extant. The finest representation of the hero that has come down to us is the so-called Farnese Hercules, which was executed by Glycon. The hero is resting, leaning on his right arm, and his head reclining on his left hand: the whole figure is a most exquisite combination of peculiar softness with the greatest strength.—II. ROMAN TRADITIONS. The worship of Hercules at Rome and in Italy is connected by Roman writers with the hero's expedition to fetch the oxen of Geryon. They stated that Hercules, on his return, visited Italy, where he abolished human sacrifices among the Sabines, established the worship of fire, and slew Cacus, a robber, who had stolen his oxen. Vid. CACUS. The aborigines, and especially Evander, honored Hercules with divine worship; and Hercules, in return, taught them the way in which he was to be worshipped, and intrusted the care of his worship to two distinguished families, the Potitii and Pinarii. Vid. PINARIA GENS. The Fabii gens traced its origin to Hercules; and Fama and Acca Laurentia are called mistresses of Hercules. In this manner the Romans connected their earliest legends with Hercules. It should be observed that in the Italian traditions the hero bore the name of Recaranus, and this Recaranus was afterward identified with the Greek Hercules. He had two temples at Rome. One was a small round temple of Hercules Victor, or Hercules Triumphalis, between the river and the Circus Maximus, in front of which was the ara maxima, on which, after a triumph, the tenth of the booty was deposited for distribution among the citizens. The second temple stood near the porta trigemina, and contained a bronze statue and the altar on which Hercules himself was believed to have once offered a sacrifice. Here the city praetor offered every year a young cow, which was consumed by the people within the sanctuary. At Rome Hercules was connected with the Muses, whence he is called Musagetes, and was represented with a lyre, of which there is no trace in Greece. III. TRADITIONS OF OTHER NATIONS. The ancients themselves expressly mention several heroes of the name of Hercules, who occur among the principal nations of the ancient world. 1. The Egyptian Hercules, whose Egyptian name was Som, or Dsom, or Ohon, or, according to Pausanias, Maceria, was a son of Amon or Nilus. He was placed by the Egyptians in the second of the series of the evolutions of their gods.—2. The Cretan Hercules, one of the Idman Dactyls, was believed to have founded the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia, but to have come originally from Egypt. He was worshipped with funeral sacrifices, and was regarded as a magician, like other ancient dæmones of Crete.—3. The Indian Hercules, was called by the unintelligible name Dorsanes (Δαρσάνης). The later Greeks believed that he was their own hero, who had visited India; and they related that in India he became the father of many sons and daughters by Pandæa, and the ancestral hero of the Indian kings.—4. The Phœnician Hercules, whom the Egyptians considered to be more ancient than their own, was worshipped in all the Phœnician colonies, such as Carthage and Gades, down to the time of Constantine, and it is said that children were sacrificed to him.—5. The Celtic and Germanic Hercules is said to have founded Alesia and Nemausus, and to have become the father of the Celtic race. We become acquainted with him in the accounts of the expedition of the Greek Hercules against Geryones. We must either suppose that the Greek Hercules was identified with native heroes of those northern countries, or that the notions about Hercules had been introduced there from the East.

ΗΕΡΚΟΥΛΗΣ (Ἡρακλῆς), son of Alexander the Great by Barsine, the widow of the Rhodian Memnon. In B.C. 310 he was brought forward by Polysperchon as a pretender to the Macedonian throne; but he was murdered by Polysperchon himself in the following year, when the latter became reconciled to Cassander.

HERCŪLIS PROMONTORIUM (now Cape Spartivento), the most southerly point of Italy in Brutium.

HERCŪLIS SILVA, a forest in Germany, sacred to Hercules, east of the Visurgis.

HERCOTIA SILVA, HERCOTIUS SALTUS, HERCOTIUM JUGUM, an extensive range of mountains in Germany, covered with forests, is described by Cæsar (B. G., vi., 24) as nine days' journey in breadth, and more than sixty days' journey in length, extending east from the territories of the Helvetii, Nemetes, and Rauraci, parallel to the Danube, to the frontiers of the Dacians. Under this general name Cæsar appears to have included all the mountains and forests in the south and centre of Germany, the Black Forest, Odenwald, Thüringerwald, the Hers, the Erzgebirge, the Riesengebirge, &c. As the Romans became better acquainted with Germany, the name was confined to narrower limits. Pliny and Tacitus use it to indicate the range of mountains between the Thüringerwald and the Carpathian Mountains. The name is still preserved in the modern Hers and Erz.

HERDŌNIA (Herdoniensis: now Ordona), a town in Apulia, was destroyed by Hannibal, who removed its inhabitants to Thurii and Metapontum; it was rebuilt by the Romans but remained a place of no importance.

HERDŌNIUS. 1. TURNUS, of Aricia, in Latium, endeavored to rouse the Latins against Tarquinius Superbus, and was, in consequence, falsely accused by Tarquinius, and put to death.—2. ARRIUS, a Sabine chieftain, who, in B.C. 460, with a band of outlaws and slaves, made himself master of the Capitol. On the fourth day from his entry the Capitol was retaken, and Herdonius and nearly all his followers were slain.

HERENNII GENÆ, originally Samnite, and by the Samnite invasion established in Campania, became at a later period a plebeian house at Rome. The Herennii were a family of rank in Italy, and are frequently mentioned in the time of the Samnite and Punic wars. They were the hereditary patrons of the Marii.

HERILLUS (Ἡράλλος), of Carthage, a Stoic philosopher, was the disciple of Zeno of Citium. He did not, however, confine himself to the opinions of his master, but held some doctrines directly opposed to them. He held that the chief good consisted in knowledge (ἐπιστήμη). This notion is often attacked by Cicero [Hætilus, son of the nymph Feronia, and king of Præneste: his mother had given him three lives, and, accordingly, Evander, who fought with him, had to conquer and despoil him of his armor three times before he fully destroyed him.].

HERMAIUM, or, in Latin, HERMAIUM PROMONTORIUM (Ærmaia insula). 1. (Now Cape Bon, Arab Ras Addor), the headland which forms the eastern extremity of the Sinus Carthaginensis, and the extreme northeastern point of the Carthaginian territory (later the province of Africa) opposite to Lilybæum, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa.—2. (Now Ras el Ashan), a promontory on the coast of the Greater Syrtis, fifty stadia west of Leptis. There were other promontories of the name on the coast of Africa.

HERMAGŌRUS (Ἡρμαγόρας). 1. Of Tennes, a distinguished Greek rhetorician of the time of Cicero. He belonged to the Rhodian school of oratory, but is known chiefly as a teacher of rhetoric. He devoted particular attention to what is called the invention, and made a peculiar division of the parts of an oration, which differed from that adopted by other rhetoricians.—2. Surnamed Carion, a Greek rhetorician, taught rhetoric at Rome in the time of Augustus. He was a disciple of Theodorus of Gadara.

HERMAPHRODITUS (Ἡρμαφρόδιτος), son of Hermes (Mercury) and Aphrodite (Venus), and consequently great-grandson of Atlas, whence he is called Atlantides or Atlantius. (Or. Met., iv., 368.) He had inherited the beauty of both his parents, and was brought up by the nymphs of Mount Ida. In his fifteenth year he to Cerna. In the neighborhood of Halimae he lay down by the fountain of Salamis. The nymph of the fountain fell in love with him, and tried in vain to win his affection. When he was bathing in the fountain she seized him, and prayed to the gods that she might be united with him forever. The gods granted the request, and the bodies of the youth and the nymph became united together, but retained the characteristics of each sex. Hermodotus, on becoming aware of the change, said that, in future, every one who bathed in it might be metamorphosed in the same way.

HERMARCHUS (Ἑρμαρχος), of Mytilene, a rhetorician, became afterward a disciple of Epicurus, who left to him his garden, and appointed him successor in his school, about B.C. 300. He wrote several works, all of which are lost. HERMAS (Ἑρμᾶς), a disciple of the Apostle Paul and one of the apostolic fathers. He is said to be the same person as the Hermes mentioned in St. Paul's epistle to the Romans (xvi, 14). He wrote in Greek a work called The Shepherd of Hermas, of which a translation is still extant. Its object is to exhort persons in the duties of the Christian religion. It is attributed by Cotelier in his Patres Apostolici, 1672.

HERMES (Ἑρμῆς, Ἑρμείας, Dor. Ἑρμᾶς), called also by the Romans. The Greek Hermes is a son of Zeus (Jupiter) and Maia, the daughter of Atlas, and born in a cave of Mount Arcadia, whence he is called Attalus or Oyllenius. A few hours after his birth he fled from his cradle, went to Pieria, and hid himself from the eyes of Apollo. In the Odyssey this tradition is not mentioned, though Hermes (Mercury) is characterized as a cunning thief. That he might not be followed by the traces of his footsteps, he put sandals on the oxen of Apollo, and drove the oxen to Pylos, where he hid himself, and concealed the rest in a cave. Some of the slaughtered animals were put on a rock, and part of their flesh was eaten, and the rest burned. There he returned to Oyllene, where he found a lion at the entrance of his native cave. He took the animal's skin, drew strings across it, and invented the lyre, on which he immediately played. Apollo, by his prophetic power, at once discovered the thief, and went to charge Hermes (Mercury) with the theft before his mother Maia. She showed the god the child in its cradle; but Apollo rebuked the boy before Zeus (Jupiter), and debarred him from his oxen. Zeus (Jupiter) commanded him to comply with the demand of Apollo, but Hermes (Mercury) denied that he had stolen the cattle. As, however, he saw that his assertions were not believed, he went to Apollo at Pylos, and restored to him his sandals. When Apollo heard the sounds of the lyre, he was so charmed that he allowed Hermes (Mercury) to keep the animals. Hermes (Mercury) now invented the syrinx, and by his inventions won the friendship of Apollo, the latter concluded an intimate friendship with him. Apollo presented him his young friend with his own golden shepherd's staff, and taught him the art of prophesying by means of dice. Zeus (Jupiter) made him his own herald, and likewise the herald of the gods of the lower world. The principal feature in the traditions about Hermes (Mercury) consists in his being the herald of the gods, and in this capacity he appears even in the Homeric poems. His original character of an ancient Pelasgian, or Arcadian divinity of nature, gradually disappeared in the legends. As the herald of the gods, he is the god of eloquence, for the heralds are the public speakers in the assemblies and on other occasions. The gods especially employed him as messenger when eloquence was required to attain the desired object. Hence the tongues of sacrificial animals were offered to him. As heralds and messengers are usually men of prudence and circumspection, Hermes (Mercury) was also the god of prudence and skill in all the relations of social intercourse. These qualities were combined with similar ones, such as cunning, both in words and actions, and even fraud, perjury, and the inclination to steal; but acts of this kind were committed by Hermes (Mercury) always with a certain skill, dexterity, and even gracefulness. Being endowed with this shrewdness and sagacity, he was regarded as the author of a variety of inventions, and, besides the lyre and syrinx, he is said to have invented the alphabet, numbers, astronomy, music, the art of fighting, gymnastics, the cultivation of the olive-tree, measures, weights, and many other things. The powers which he possessed himself he conferred upon those mortals and heroes who enjoyed his favor; and all who possessed them were under his especial protection or are called his sons. He was employed by the gods, and more especially by Zeus (Jupiter), on a variety of occasions, which are recorded in ancient story. Thus he led Priam to Achilles to fetch the body of Hector; tied Ixion to the wheel; conducted Hera (Juno), Aphrodite (Venus), and Athena (Minerva) to Paris; fastened Prometheus to Mount Caucasus; rescued Dionysus (Bacchus) after his birth from the flames, or received him from the hands of Zeus (Jupiter) to carry him to Athanas; sold Hercules to Omphale; and was ordered by Zeus (Jupiter) to carry off Io, who was metamorphosed into a cow, and guarded by Argus, whom he slew. Vid. ARGUS. From this murder he is very commonly called Ἀλκίμανης. In the Trojan war Hermes (Mercury) was on the side of the Greeks. His ministry to Zeus (Jupiter) was not confined to the office of herald and messenger, but he was also his charioteer and cup-bearer. As dreams are sent by Zeus (Jupiter), Hermes (Mercury) conducts them to man, and hence he is also described as the god who had it in his power to send refreshing sleep or take it away. Another important function of Hermes (Mercury) was to conduct the shades of the dead from the upper into the lower world, whence he is called ψυχοπομπὴς, νεκροπομπὴς, ψυχάγωγός, &c. The idea of his being the herald and messenger of the gods, of his travelling from place to place and concluding treaties, necessarily implied the notion that he was the promoter of social intercourse and of commerce among men. In this capacity he was regarded as the maintainer of peace, and as the god of roads, who protected travellers, and punished those who refused to assist travellers who had mistaken their way. Hence the Athenian generals, on setting out on an expedition, offered sacrifices to Hermes (Mercury), surnamed Hegemonius or Agoræ; and numerous statues of the god were erected on roads, at doors and gates, from which circumstance he derived a variety of surnames and epithets. As the god of commerce he was called διεμπορος, ἐμπολεως, παιλῆγκάπηλος, κερδέμπορος, δυνατορ, &c. As commerce is the source of wealth, he was also the god of gain and riches, especially of sudden and unexpected riches, such as are acquired by commerce. As the giver of wealth and good luck (πλουτοδότης), he also presided over the game of dice. Hermes (Mercury) was believed to be the inventor of sacrifices. Hence he not only acts the part of a herald at sacrifices, but is also the protector of sacrificial animals, and was believed in particular to increase the fertility of sheep. For this reason he was especially worshipped by shepherds, and is mentioned in connection with Pan and the Nymphs. This feature in the character of Hermes (Mercury) is a remnant of the ancient Arcadian religion, in which he was the fertilizing god of the earth, who conferred his blessing on man. Hermes (Mercury) was likewise the patron of all the gymnastic games of the Greeks. This idea seems to be of late origin, for in Homer no trace of it is found. Athens appears to have been the first place in which he was worshipped in this capacity. At a later time almost all gymnasia were under his protection, and the Greek artists derived their deal of this god from the gymnasium, and represented him as a youth whose limbs were beautifully and harmoniously developed by gymnastic exercises. The most ancient seat of the worship of Hermes (Mercury) is Arcadia, the land of his birth, where Lycæon, the son of Pelægus, is said to have built to him the first temple. From thence his worship was carried to Athens, and ultimately spread through all Greece. The festivals celebrated in his honor were called Hermæa. Vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v. His temples and statues (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v. HERMÆA) were extremely numerous in Greece. Among the things sacred to him were the palm-tree, the tortoise, the number four, and several kinds of fish; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of incense, honey, cakes, pigs, and especially lambs and young goats. The principal attributes of Hermes (Mercury) are, 1. A travelling hat with a broad brim, which in later times was adorned with two small wings. 2. The staff (βάβυλος or σκήπτρον), which he bore as a herald, and had received from Apollo. In late works of art the white ribbons which surrounded the herald's staff were changed into two serpents. 3. The sandals (πέδιλα). They were beautiful and golden, and carried the god across land and sea with the rapidity of wind; at the ankles of the god they were provided with wings, whence he is called πτερυπόδιλος, or alipes. The Roman MERCURIUS is spoken of separately.

HERMES TRISMEGISTUS (Ἑρμῆς Τριμέγιστος), the reputed author of a variety of works, some of which are still extant. The Greek God

Hermes was identified with the Egyptian Thoth or Thout as early as the time of Plato. The New Platonists regarded the Egyptian Hermes as the source of all knowledge and thought, or the λόγος embodied, and hence called him Trismegistus. A vast number of works on philosophy and religion, written by the New Platonists, were ascribed to this Hermes, from whom it was pretended that Pythagoras and Plato had derived all their knowledge. Most of these works were probably written in the fourth century of our era. The most important of them is entitled Parmenides (from παρμηνεύς, a shepherd, pastor), apparently in imitation of the Pastor of Hermias. Vid. HERMAS. This work is in the form of a dialogue. It treats of nature, the creation of the world, the deity, his nature and attributes, the human soul, knowledge, &c.

HERMANTIMACHUS (Ἑρμαντίμαχος), of Colophon, a distinguished elegiac poet, lived in the time of Alexander the Great. His chief work was an elegiac poem, in three books, addressed to his mistress Leontium, whose name formed the title of the poem. His fragments are edited by Rieger and Axt, Colón, 1828, [by Hermann, in a university programme, Lips., 1828, 4to], and by Bailey London, 1889.

HERMIAS or HERMIAS (Ἑρμίας or Ἑρμίας) 1. Tyrant of Atarneus and Assos in Mysia, celebrated as the friend and patron of Aristotle. Aristotle remained with Hermias three years, from B.C. 347 to 344, in the latter of which years Hermias was seized by Mentor, the Greek general of the Persian king, and sent as a captive to the Persian court, where he was put to death. Aristotle married Pythias, the adopted daughter of Hermias, and celebrated the praises of his benefactor in an ode addressed to Virtue, which is still extant.—2. A Christian writer, who lived about A.D. 180, was the author of an extant work, entitled Διασυρμός τῶν ἐξω φιλοσόφων, in which the Greek philosophers are held up to ridicule. Edited with Tatianus by Worth, Oxon. 1700.

HERMINIA GENS, a very ancient patrician house at Rome, which appears in the first Etruscan war with the republic, B.C. 506, and vanishes from history in 448. T. Herminius was one of the three heroes who kept the Sublician bridge along with Horatius Cocles against the whole force of Persena.

HERMINIUS Mons (now Serra de la Estrella), the chief mountain in Lusitania, south of the Durus, from seven thousand to eight thousand feet high, called in the Middle Ages Hermione or Arminia.

HERMIONE (Ἑρμιόνη), the beautiful daughter of Menelaus and Helena. She had been promised in marriage to Orestes before the Trojan war, but Menelaus, after his return home, married her to Neoptolemus (Pyrrhus). Thereupon Orestes claimed Hermione for himself; but Neoptolemus haughtily refused to give her up. Orestes, in revenge, incited the Dorians against him, and Neoptolemus was slain. Hermione afterward married Orestes, whom she had always loved, and bore him a son Thanaos. The history of Hermione is related with various modifications. According to some, Menelaus betrothed her at Troy to Neoptolemus, but in the meantime her grandfather, Tyndarus as promised her to Orestes, and actually gave her in marriage to him. Neoptolemus, on his return, took possession of her by force, but was slain soon after either at Delphi or in his own home at Phthia.

HERMIÓNA ('Ερμιόνα; 'Ερμιονεύς: now Kastri) a town of Argolis, but originally independent of Argos, was situated on a promontory on the eastern coast, and on a bay of the sea, which derived its name from the town (Hermionius Sinus). Its territory was called HERMIÓNIA. It was originally inhabited by the Dryopes; and, in consequence of its isolated position, it became a flourishing city at an early period. It contained several temples, and, among them, a celebrated one of (Ceres) Demeter Obthonia. At a later time it joined the Achaean league.

HERMIÓNEA. Vid. GERMANIA.

HERMIPPUS ('Ερμιππος). 1. An Athenian poet of the old comedy, vehemently attacked Pericles and Aspasia. [The fragments of Hermippus are published collectively by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 188-195, edit. minor.]—2. Of Smyrna, a distinguished philosopher, was a disciple of Callimachus of Alexandria, and flourished about B.C. 200. He wrote a great biographical work (Bioi), which is frequently referred to by later writers.—3. Of Berytus, a grammarian, who flourished under Trajan and Hadrian.

HERMIUM, a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, in the Cimmerian Bosphorus.

HERMOCLITES ('Ερμοκλῆτης), a Syracusan of rank, and an able statesman and orator, was chosen one of the Syracusan generals, B.C. 414, in order to oppose the Athenians. He afterward served under Gylippus, when the latter took the command of the Syracusan forces; and after the destruction of the Athenian armament he attempted to save the lives of Nicias and Demosthenes. He then employed all his influence to induce his countrymen to support with vigor the Lacedæmonians in the war in Greece itself. He was, with two colleagues, appointed to the command of a small fleet, which the Syracusans sent to the assistance of the Lacedæmonians; but, during his absence from home, he was banished by the Syracusans (410). Having obtained support from the Persian satrap Pharnabazus, he returned to Sicily, and endeavored to effect his restoration to his native city by force of arms, but was slain in an attack which he made upon Syracuse in 407.

HERMODORUS ('Ερμόδορος). 1. Of Ephesus, a person of distinction, was expelled by his fellow-citizens, and is said to have gone to Rome, and to have explained to the decemvirs the Greek laws, and thus assisted them in drawing up the laws of the Twelve Tables, B.C. 461.—2. A disciple of Plato, is said to have circulated the works of Plato, and to have sold them in Sicily. He wrote a work on Plato.—3. Of Salamis, the architect of the temple of Mars in the Flaminian Forum.

HERMODORUS ('Ερμόδορος). 1. A son of Hippocritus, and a brother of the wealthy Callias, is introduced by Plato as one of the speakers in his "Cratylus," where he maintains that all the words of a language were formed by an agreement of men among themselves.—2. A celebrated Greek rhetorician, was a native of Tarsus, and lived in the reign of Marcus Aurelius, A.D. 161-180. At the age of fifteen his eloquence excited the admiration of Marcus Aurelius. He was shortly afterward appointed public teacher of rhetoric, and at the age of seventeen he began his career as a writer; but, unfortunately, when he was twenty-five, his mental powers gave way, and he never recovered their full use, although he lived to an advanced age. After his death, his heart is said to have been found covered with hair. His works, five in number, which are still extant, form together a complete system of rhetoric, and were for a long time used in all the rhetorical schools as manuals. They are, 1. Τέχνη ῥητορικὴ κατὰ τὸν ὁρίαν. 2. Περὶ εὐρίσκειος (De Inventionis). 3. Περὶ ἰδεῶν (De Formis Oratoris). 4. Περὶ μεθόδου διειρηνητοῦ (De apto et solerti genere dicendi Methodus). 5. Προγυμνάσματα. An abridgment of the latter work was made by Aphthonius, in consequence of which the original fell into oblivion. The works of Hermogenes are printed in Walz's Rhetor. Græc.—3. An architect of Alabanda, in Caria, who invented what was called the pseudodipterus, that is, a form of a temple, with apparently two rows of columns. His great object as an architect was to increase the taste for the Ionic form of temples, in preference to Doric temples.

HERMODORUS, M. TIGELLINUS, a notorious detractor of Horace, who calls him (Sat., l. 3, 129), however, optimus cantor et modulator. He was opposed to satires altogether, was a man without talent, but yet had a foolish fancy for trying his hand at literature. It is conjectured that, under the fictitious name of Pantolabus (Sat., l. 8, 11; ii., l. 21), Horace alludes to Hermogenes, for the prosody of the two names is the same, so that one may be substituted for the other.

HERMOGENIANUS, the latest Roman jurist from whom there is an extract in the Digest, lived in the time of Constantine the Great. It is probable that he was the compiler of the Codex Hermogenianus, but so many persons of the same name lived nearly at the same time that this cannot be affirmed with certainty.

HERMOLANUS ('Ερμόλαος), a Macedonian youth, and a page of Alexander the Great. During a hunting party in Bactria, B.C. 327, he slew a wild boar without waiting to allow Alexander the first blow, whereupon the king ordered him to be flogged. Incensed at this indignity, Hermolans formed a conspiracy against the king's life; but the plot was discovered, and Hermolans and his accomplices were stoned to death by the Macedonians.

HERMONASSA. 1. A town of the Sind, at the entrance of the Cimmerian Bosphorus, founded by the Mytileneans, called after Hermonassa, the wife of the founder, who died during its foundation, and left to her the sovereignty.—2. A town on the coast of Pontus, near Trapezus.

HERMONTHEIS ('Ερμυνθεις; now Ermont, ruins), the chief city of the Nomos Hermouthites, in Upper Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile, a little above Thebes.

HERMOPOLIS ('Ερμόπολις, 'Ερμων πόλις). 1. PARTHA (ἡ μικρή; now Damanhour), a city of Lower Egypt, the capital of the Nomos of Alexandria, stood upon the canal which connected the Oaurois branch of the Nile with the Lake Maroutis.—2. ΜΑCNA (ἡ μεγάλη; ruins near Ephraïm), the capital of the Nomos Hermopolites, in the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and one of the oldest cities in the land, stood on the west bank of the Nile, a little below the confines of Upper Egypt. At the boundary line itself was a military station, or custom-house, called 'Ερμοπολιτικὴ φυλακή, for collecting a toll on goods entering the Heptanomia. Hermopolis was a chief seat of the worship of Anubis (Cynocephalus), and it was the sacred burial-place of the Ibis.

ΗΕΚΑΜΟΣ (τὸ Ἔρμος; Ἑρμειος), a demus in Attica, belonging to the tribe Acamantis, on the road from Athens to Eleusis.

HERMOTIMUS (Ἑρμότιμος). 1. A mathematician of Colophon, was one of the immediate predecessors of Euclid, and the discoverer of several geometrical propositions.—2. Of Clazomenae, an early Greek philosopher of uncertain date, belonged to the Ionic school. Some traditions represent him as a mysterious person, gifted with supernatural power, by which his soul, apart from the body, wandered from place to place, bringing tidings of distant events in incredibly short spaces of time. At length his enemies burned his body, in the absence of the soul, which put an end to his wanderings.

HERMUNDUR, one of the most powerful nations of Germany, belonged to the Suevic race, dwelt between the Main and the Danube, and were bounded by the Sudeti Mountains in the north, the Agri Decumates of the Romans in the west and south, the Narisci on the east, the Cherusci on the northeast, and the Catti on the northwest. They were for a long time the allies of the Romans; but along with the other German tribes they assisted the Marcomanni in the great war against the Romans in the reign of M. Aurelius. After this time they are rarely mentioned as a separate people, but are included under the general name of Suevi.

HERMUS (Ἑρμος; now Ghieliz-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises in Mount Dindymene (now Morad-Dagh) in Phrygia; flows through Lydia, watering the plain north of Sardis, which was hence called Ἑρμον πεδίον; passes by Magnesia and Temnus, and falls into the Gulf of Smyrna between Smyrna and Phocaea. It formed the boundary between Æolis and Ionia. Its chief tributaries were the Hyllus, Cogamus, Pactolus, and Phrygus.

HERNICI, a people in Latium, belonged to the Sabine race, and are said to have derived their name from the Marsic (Sabine) word Aerna, "rock." According to this etymology, their name would signify "mountaineers." They inhabited the mountains of the Apennines between the Lake Fucinus and the River Teverus, and were bounded on the north by the Marsi and Æqui, and on the south by the Volsci. Their chief town was ANAGNIA. They were a brave and warlike people, and long offered a formidable resistance to the Romans. The Romans formed a league with them on equal terms in the third consulship of Sp. Cassius, B.C. 486. They were finally subdued by the Romans, 306.

HERO Vid. LEXANDER.

HERO (Ἡρώ). 1. THE ELDER, a celebrated mathematician, was a native of Alexandria, and lived in the reigns of the Ptolemies Philadelphus and Evergetes (B.C. 285-222). He is celebrated on account of his mechanical inventions, of which one of the best known is the common pneumatic experiment called Hero's fountain, in which a jet of water is maintained by condensed air. We also find in his works a description of a steam-engine, and of a double forcing pump used for a fire-engine. The following works of Hero are extant, though not in a perfect form: 1. Χειροβάλλιστρας κατασκευὴ καὶ συμμετρία, de Constructione et Mensura Manipulistica. 2. Βελουτοικύ, on the manufacture of darts. 3. Πνευματικά, or Spiritalia, the most celebrated of his works. 4. Περὶ αὐτοματων μηχανῶν, de Automatonum Fabrica Libri duo. All these works are published in the Mathematici Veteres, Paris, 1698.—2. THE YOUNGER, a mathematician, is supposed to have lived under Heraclius (A.D. 610-641). The principal extant works assigned to him are, 1. De Mechanicis bellicis. 2. Geodasia, on practical geometry. 3. De Obsidione repellenda. Published in the Mathematici Veteres.

HERODAS I. (Ἡρώδης), commonly called Herod. 1. Surnamed the Great, king of the Jews, was the second son of Antipater, and consequently of Idumean origin. Vid. ANTIPATER. No. 3. When his father was appointed by Caesar procurator of Judaea, in B.C. 47, Herod, though only twenty-five years of age, obtained the government of Galilee. In 46 he obtained the government of Oule-Syria. After the death of Caesar (44), Herod first supported Cassius, but upon the arrival of Antony in Syria, in 41 he exerted himself to secure his favor, and completely succeeded in his object. In 40 he went to Rome, and obtained from Antony and Octavianus a decree of the senate, constituting him king of Judaea. He supported Antony in the civil war against Octavianus; but after the battle of Actium (31) he was pardoned by Octavianus and confirmed in his kingdom. During the remainder of his reign he cultivated with assiduity the friendship of Augustus and his counsellor Agrippa, and enjoyed the highest favor both of the one and the other. He possessed a jealous temper and ungovernable passions. He put to death his beautiful wife Mariamne whom he suspected, without cause, of adultery, and with whom he was violently in love; and at a later period he also put to death his two sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobolus. His government, though cruel and tyrannical, was vigorous; and he was both feared and respected by his subjects and the surrounding nations. He especially loved to display his power and munificence by costly and splendid public works. He commenced rebuilding the temple of Jerusalem; he rebuilt the city of Samaria and bestowed on it the name of Sebaste; while he converted a small town on the sea-coast into a magnificent city, to which he gave the name of Caesarea. He adorned these new cities with temples, theatres, gymnasia, and other buildings in the Greek style; and he even ventured to erect a theatre at Jerusalem itself, and a amphitheatre without the walls, in which he exhibited combats of wild beasts and gladiators. In the last year of his reign JAMES CHRIST was lost; and it must have been on his death-bed that he ordered that massacre of the children at Bethlehem which is recorded by the evangelist (Matth. ii, 16). He died in the thirty-seventh year of his reign, and the seventieth of his age, B.C. 4.*—2. HERODES ANTIPAS, son of Herod the Great by Malthace, a Samaritan, obtained the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea on his father's death, while the kingdom of Judea devolved on his elder brother Archelaus. He married Herodias, the wife of his half-brother, Herod Philip, also having, in defiance of the Jewish law, divorced her first husband. He had been previously married to a daughter of the Arabian prince Aretas, who quitted him in disgust at this new alliance. Aretas thereupon invaded the dominions of Antipas, and defeated the army which was opposed to him. In A.D. 38, after the death of Tiberius, Antipas went to Rome to solicit from Caligula the title of king, which had just been bestowed upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa; but, through the intrigues of Agrippa, who was high in the favor of the Roman emperor, Antipas was deprived of his dominions, and sent into exile at Lyons (39); he was subsequently removed to Spain, where he died. It was Herod Antipas who imprisoned and put to death John the Baptist, who had reproached him with his unlawful connection with Herodias. It was before him also that Jesus was sent by Pontius Pilate at Jerusalem, as belonging to his jurisdiction, on account of his supposed Galilean origin.—3. HERODES AGRIPPA. Vid. AGRIPPA.—4. Brother of Herod Agrippa I., obtained the kingdom of Chalcis from Claudius at the request of Agrippa, 41. After the death of Agrippa (44), Claudius bestowed upon him the superintendence of the temple of Jerusalem, together with the right of appointing the high priests. He died in 48, when his kingdom was bestowed by Claudius upon his nephew, Herod Agrippa II.—5. HERODES ATTICUS, the rhetorician. Vid. ATTICUS.

HÆRODŌTUS (Ῥοδότος). 1. An historian, who wrote in Greek a history of the Roman empire in eight books, from the death of M. Aurelius to the commencement of the reign of Gordianus III. (A.D. 180-235). He himself informs us that the events of this period had occurred in his own lifetime; but beyond this we know nothing respecting his life. He appears to have had Thucydides before him as a model, both for style and for the general composition of his work, like him, introducing here and there speeches wholly or in part imaginary. In spite of occasional inaccuracies in chronology, his narrative is in the main truthful and impartial. Edited by Irmisch, Lips., 1789-1805, 3 vols., and by Bekker, Berlin, 1826.—2. ÆLIUS HÆRODŌTUS, one of the most celebrated grammarians of antiquity, was the son of Apollonius Dyscolus (vid. APOLLONIUS, No. 4), and was born at Alexandria. From that place he removed to Rome, where he gained the favor of the emperor M. Aurelius, to whom he dedicated his work on prosody. This work seems to have embraced not merely prosody, but most of those subjects now included in the etymological portion of grammar. The estimation in which he was held by subsequent grammarians was very great. Priscian styles him maximus auctor artis grammaticæ. He was a very voluminous writer; but none of his works have come down to us complete, though several extracts from them are preserved by later grammarians.

HÆRODŌTUS (Ῥοδότος). 1. Of Babylon, a grammarian, was one of the immediate successors of Crates of Mallus, and an opponent of the followers of Aristarchus, against whom he wrote an epigram, which is still extant and included in the Greek Anthology.—2. A celebrated physician of Selymbria in Thrace, lived in the fifth century B.C., and was one of the tutors of Hippocrates.

HÆRODŌTUS (Ῥοδότος), of Heraclea, in Pontus, a contemporary of Hecataeus and Pherecydes, about B.C. 510, wrote a work on Heracles and his exploits.

HÆRODŌTUS (Ῥοδότος). 1. A Greek historian, and the father of history, was born at Halicarnassus, a Doric colony in Caria, B.C. 484. He belonged to a noble family at Halicarnassus. He was the son of Lyxes and Dryo; and the epic poet Panyasis was one of his relations. Herodotus left his native city at an early age, in order to escape from the oppressive government of Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, who put to death Panyasis. He probably settled at Samos for some time, and there became acquainted with the Ionic dialect; but he spent many years in his extensive travels in Europe, Asia, and Africa, of which we shall speak presently. At a later time he returned to Halicarnassus, and took a prominent part in expelling Lygdamis from his native city. In the contentions which followed the expulsion of the tyrant, Herodotus was exposed to the hostile attacks of one of the political parties, whereupon he again left Halicarnassus, and settled at Thurii, in Italy, where he died. Whether he accompanied the first colonists to Thurii in 443, or followed them a few years afterward, is a disputed point, and can not be determined with certainty, though it appears probable, from a passage in his work, that he was at Athens at the commencement of the Peloponnesian war (431). It is also disputed where Herodotus wrote his history. Lucian relates that Herodotus read his work to the assembled Greeks at Olympia, which was received with such universal applause that the nine books of the work were in consequence honored with the names of the nine muses. The same writer adds that the young Thucydides was present at this recitation, and was moved to tears. But this celebrated story, which rests upon the authority of Lucian alone, must be rejected for many reasons. Nor is there sufficient evidence in favor of the tradition that Herodotus read his work at the Panathenæa at Athens in 446 or 445, and received from the Athenians a reward of ten talents. It is far more probable that he wrote his work at Thurii, when he was advanced in years; and it appears that he was engaged upon it, at least in the way of revision, when he was seventy-seven years of age, since he mentions the revolt of the Medes against Darius Nothus, and the death of Amyrtæus, events which belong to

* The death of Herod took place in the same year with the actual birth of Christ, as is mentioned above, but it is well known that this is to be placed four years before the fact in general use as the Christian era.

the years 409 and 408. Though the work of Herodotus was probably not written till he was advanced in years, yet he was collecting materials for it during a great part of his life. It was apparently with this view that he undertook his extensive travels through Greece and foreign countries, and his work contains on almost every page the results of his personal observations and inquiries. There was scarcely a town of any importance in Greece Proper and on the coasts of Asia Minor with which he was not perfectly familiar; and at many places in Greece, such as Samos, Athens, Corinth, and Thebes, he seems to have stayed some time. The sites of the great battles between the Greeks and barbarians, as Marathon, Thermopylae, Salamis, and Platea, were well known to him; and on Xerxes's line of march from the Hellespont to Athens, there was probably not a place which he had not seen with his own eyes. He also visited most of the Greek islands, not only in the Ægean, but even in the west of Greece, such as Zacynthus. Further north in Europe he visited Thrace and the Scythian tribes on the Black Sea. In Asia he travelled through Asia Minor and Syria, and visited the cities of Babylon, Ecbatana, and Susa. He spent some time in Egypt, and travelled as far south as Elephantine. He saw with his own eyes all the wonders of Egypt, and the accuracy of his observations and descriptions still excites the astonishment of travellers in that country. From Egypt he appears to have made excursions to the east into Arabia, and to the west into Libya, at least as far as Cyrene, which was well known to him. The object of his work is to give an account of the struggles between the Greeks and Persians. He traces the enmity between Europe and Asia to the mythical times. He passes rapidly over the mythical ages to come to Croesus, king of Lydia, who was known to have committed acts of hostility against the Greeks. This induces him to give a full history of Croesus and of the kingdom of Lydia. The conquest of Lydia by the Persians under Cyrus then leads him to relate the rise of the Persian monarchy, and the subjugation of Asia Minor and Babylon. The nations which are mentioned in the course of this narrative are again discussed more or less minutely. The history of Cambyses and his expedition into Egypt induce him to enter into the details of Egyptian history. The expedition of Darius against the Scythians causes him to speak of Scythia and the north of Europe. In the mean time the revolt of the Ionians breaks out, which eventually brings the contest between Persia and Greece to an end. An account of this insurrection is followed by the history of the invasion of Greece by the Persians; and the history of the Persian war now runs in a regular channel, until the taking of Sestos by the Greeks, B.C. 478, with which event his work concludes. It will be seen from the preceding sketch that the history is full of digressions and episodes; but these do not impair the unity of the work, for the thread, as it were, runs through the whole, and the episodes are only like branches of the same tree. The structure of the work thus bears a strong resemblance to a grand epic poem. The work is pervaded by a deep religious sentiment. Herodotus shows the most profound reverence for every thing which he conceives as divine, and rarely ventures to express an opinion on what he considers a sacred or religious mystery. In order to form a fair judgment of the historical value of the work of Herodotus, we must distinguish between those parts in which he speaks from his own observations and those in which he merely repeats what he was told by priests and others. In the latter case he was undoubtedly often deceived; but whenever he speaks from his own observations, he is a real model of truthfulness and accuracy; and the more the countries which he describes have been explored by modern travellers, the more firmly has his authority been established. Many things which used to be laughed at as impossible or paradoxical are found now to be strictly in accordance with truth. The dialect in which he wrote is the Ionic, intermixed with epic or poetical expressions, and sometimes even with Attic and Doric forms. The excellences of his style consist in its antique and epic coloring, its transparent clearness, and the lively flow of the narrative. But, notwithstanding all the merits of Herodotus, there were certain writers in antiquity who attacked him both in regard to the form and the substance of his work; and there is still extant a work ascribed to Plutarch, entitled "On the Malignity of Herodotus," full of the most futile accusations of every kind. The best editions of Herodotus are by Schweighauser, Argenteor, 1806, often reprinted; by Gaisford, Oxon., 1824; and by Bähr, Lips., 1830.—2. A Greek physician, who practised at Rome with great reputation, about A.D. 100. He wrote some medical works, which are several times quoted by Galen.—3. Also a Greek physician, a native either of Tarsus or Philadelphia, taught Sextus Empiricus.

ΗΕΡΟΠΟΛΙΣ or ΗΕΡΟ (Ἡρώων πόλις; Ἡρώ: is the Old Testament, Rameses or Ramesses: ruins near Abou-Kashid?), the capital of the Nomos Heropolites or Arainoites in Lower Egypt, stood on the border of the Desert east of the Delta, upon the canal connecting the Nile with the western head of the Red Sea, which was called from it Sinus Heropoliticus (κόλπος Ἡρώων, Ἡρωπολίτης or -τικός). The country about it is supposed to be the Goshen of Scripture [Ἡερόδωτος (Ἡρόδωτος), tyrant at Paris in the time of Darius Hystaspis.]

ΗΕΡΟΦΙΛΟΣ (Ἡρόφιλος), one of the most celebrated physicians of antiquity, was born at Chalcedon in Bithynia, was a pupil of Praxagoras and lived at Alexandria under the first Ptolemy, who reigned B.C. 283-285. Here he soon acquired a great reputation, and was one of the founders of the medical school in that city. He seems to have given his chief attention to anatomy and physiology, which he studied not merely from the dissection of animals, but also from that of human bodies. He is even said to have carried his ardor in his anatomical pursuits so far as to have dissected criminals alive. He was the author of several medical and anatomical works, of which nothing but the titles and a few fragments remain. These have been collected and published by Marx, De Herophili Vita, &c., Götting., 1840.

HEROSTRATUS (Ἡρόστρατος), an Ephesian, set fire to the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus on the same night that Alexander the Great was born, B.C. 356. He was put to the torture, and confessed that he had fired the temple to immortalize himself. The Ephesians passed a decree condemning his name to oblivion; but it has been, as might have been expected, handed down by history.

HERA (Ἥρα), daughter of Cecrops and sister of Agraëus, was beloved by Mercury (Hermes), by whom she became the mother of Cephalus. Respecting her story, vid. AGRAULOS. At Athens sacrifices were offered to her, and the maidens who carried the vessels containing the libation (ἑσπῆ) were called ἑσπέρηδες.

HERILIA, the wife of Romulus, was the only married woman carried off by the Romans in the rape of the Sabine maidens. As Romulus after death became Quirinus, so Herilia his wife became a goddess, Hora or Horta. Some writers, however, made Herilia the wife of Rostus, grandfather of Tullius Hostilius.

HERMA (containing probably the same elements as the words earth, erde), the goddess of the earth among the ancient Germans.

HERULI or HERULI, a powerful German race, are said to have come originally from Scandinavia, but they appear on the shores of the Black Sea in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 262), when, in conjunction with the Goths, they invaded the Roman empire. They were conquered by the Ostrogoths, and afterward formed part of the great army of Attila, with which he invaded Gaul and Italy. After the death of Attila (453) a portion of the Heruli united with other German tribes; and under the command of Odoacer, who is said to have been an Herulian, they destroyed the Western Empire, 476. Meantime the remainder of the nation formed a powerful kingdom on the banks of the Theiss and the Danube, which was eventually destroyed by the Langobardi or Lombards. Some of the Heruli were allowed by Anastasius to settle in Pannonia, and they served with great distinction in the armies of Justinian.

HELIODORUS (Ἡλίοδορος) one of the earliest Greek poets, of whose personal history we possess little authentic information. He is frequently mentioned along with Homer; as Homer represents the Ionic school of poetry in Asia Minor, so Hesiod represents the Boeotian school of poetry, which spread over Phocis and Euboea. The only points of resemblance between the two schools consist in their versification and dialect. In other respects they entirely differ. The Homeric school takes for its subjects the restless activity of the heroic age, while the Hesiodic turns its attention to the quiet pursuits of ordinary life, to the origin of the world, the gods and heroes. Hesiod lived about a century later than Homer, and is placed about B.C. 875. We learn from his own poem on Works and Days that he was born in the village of Ascra in Boeotia, whither his father had emigrated from the Æolian Cyme in Asia Minor. After the death of his father he was involved in a dispute with his brother Perseus about his small patrimony, which was decided in favor of his brother. He then emigrated to Orebomena, where he spent the remainder of his life. This is all that can be said with certainty about the life of Hesiod. Many of the stories related about him refer to his school of poetry, and not to the poet personally. In this light we may regard the tradition that Hesiod had a poetical contest with Homer, which is said to have taken place at Chalcis during the funeral solemnities of King Amphidamas, or, according to others, at Anlis or Delos. The story of this contest gave rise to a composition still extant under the title of Ἄλυσσις Ὀμήρου καὶ Ἡσίοδου, the work of a grammarian who lived toward the end of the first century of our era, in which the two poets are represented as engaged in the contest, and answering one another. The following works were attributed to Hesiod in antiquity: 1. Ἔργα or Ἔργα καὶ ἡμέραι, Opera et Dies, Works and Days. It is written in the most homely style, with scarcely any poetical imagery or ornament, and must be looked upon as the most ancient specimen of didactic poetry. It contains ethical, political, and economical precepts, the last of which constitute the greater part of the work, consisting of rules about choosing a wife, the education of children, agriculture, commerce, and navigation. It would further seem that three distinct poems have been inserted in it, viz., 1. The fable of Prometheus and Pandora (47-105); 2. On the ages of the world, which are designated by the names of metals (109-201); and, 3. A description of winter (504-556). 2. Θεογονία, a Theogony, was not considered by Hesiod's countrymen to be a genuine production of the poet. This work gives an account of the origin of the world and the birth of the gods, explaining the whole order of nature in a series of genealogies, for every part of physical as well as moral nature there appears personified in the character of a distinct being. The whole concludes with an account of some of the most illustrious heroes. 3. Ἥοιαι or ἡοίαι μεγάλαι, also called κατάλογος γυναικῶν, Catalogue of Women. This work is lost. It contained accounts of the women who had been beloved by the gods, and had thus become the mothers of the heroes in the various parts of Greece, from whom the ruling families derived their origin. 4. Ἀσπίς Ἡρακλέους, Shield of Hercules, which is extant, probably formed part of the work last mentioned. It contains a description of the shield of Hercules, and is an imitation of the Homeric description of the shield of Achilles. The best edition of Hesiod is by Götting, Götting and Erfurt, 1843, 2d ed.

HELIODORA (Ἡλίοδωρα). 1. Daughter of Laomedon, king of Troy, was chained by her father to a rock, in order to be devoured by a sea-monster, that he might thus appease the anger of Apollo and Neptune (Poseidon). Hercules promised to save her if Laomedon would give him the horses which he had received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Ganymedes. Hercules killed the monster, but Laomedon refused to keep his promise. Thereupon Hercules took Troy, killed Laomedon, and gave Heliode to his friend and companion Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Teucer. Her brother Priam sent Antenor to claim her back, and the refusal on the part of the Greeks is mentioned as one of the causes of the Trojan war.—[2. Daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Prometheus.]

Εσπ. Ηαί. (Ἑσπεία), the Western land (from Ἑσπερος, vesper), the name given by the Greek poets to Italy, because it lay west of Greece. In imitation of them, the Roman poets gave the name of Hesperia to Spain, which they sometimes called ultima Hesperia (Hor., Carm. i, 36, 4), to distinguish it from Italy, which they occasionally called Hesperia Magna (Virg., Æn., 5, 569.)

Ἑσπερίδες (Ἑσπερίδες), the celebrated guardians of the golden apples which Ge (Earth) gave to Juno (Hera) at her marriage with Jupiter (Zeus.) Their parentage is differently related. They are called the daughters either of Night or Erebus, or of Phoreys and Ceto, or of Atlas and Hesperia (whence their names Atlantides or Hesperides), or of Hesperus, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis. Some traditions mentioned three Hesperides, viz., Ægle, Arethusa, and Hesperia; others four, Ægle, Erytheia, Hestia, and Arethusa; and others again seven. The poets describe them as possessing the power of sweet song. In the earliest legends, these nymphs are described as living on the River Oceanus, in the extreme west; but the later attempts to fix the geographical position of their garden led poets and geographers to different parts of Libya, as the neighborhood of Cyrene, Mount Atlas, or the islands on the western coast of Libya, or even to the northern extremity of the earth, beyond the wind Boreas, among the Hyperboreans. They were assisted in watching the golden apples by the dragon Ladon. It was one of the labors of Hercules to obtain possession of these apples. (Vid. p. 358, a.)

Ἑσπερίον (Ἑσπερίον, Ἑσπερίον κέρας: now Cape Verde or Cape Roxo), a headland on the western coast of Africa, was one of the furthest points to which the knowledge of the ancients extended along that coast. Near it was a bay called Sinus Hesperius; and a day's journey from it a group of islands called Ἑσπερίου Ἰνσουλᾶς, wrongly identified by some with the Fortunate Islands; they are either the Cape de Verde islands, or, more properly, the Bissagos, at the mouth of the Rio Grande.

[HESPERIUS SINUS. Vid. HESPERIUM.]

Ἑσπέρης (Ἑσπερος), the evening star, is called by Hesiod a son of Atlas and Aurora (Eos). He was also regarded as the same as the morning star, whence both Homer and Hesiod call him the bringer of light (εὐφρόνης). A later account makes him a son of Atlas, who was fond of astronomy, and who disappeared after ascending Mount Atlas to observe the stars. He was worshipped with divine honors, and was regarded as the fairest star in the heavens. The Romans designated him by the names Lucifer and Hesperus, to characterize him as the morning or evening star.

Ἑστία (Ἑστία, Ion. Ἰοστία), called Vesta by the Romans, the goddess of the hearth, or, rather, of the fire burning on the hearth, was one of the twelve great divinities of the Greeks. She was a daughter of Saturn (Cronus) and Rhea, and, according to common tradition, was the first-born of Rhea, and consequently the first of the children swallowed by Saturn (Cronus). She was a maiden divinity and when Apollo and Neptune (Poseidon) sued for her hand, she swore by the head of Jupiter (Zeus) to remain a virgin forever. As the hearth was looked upon as the centre of domestic life, so Hestia was the goddess of domestic life and the giver of all domestic happiness; as such she was believed to dwell in the inner part of every house, and to have invented the art of building houses. In this respect she often appears together with Mercury (Hermes), who was likewise a domestica. Being the goddess of the sacred fire of the altar, Hestia had a share in the sacrifices offered to all the gods. Hence, when sacrifices were offered, she was invoked first, and the first part of the sacrifice was presented to her. Solemn oaths were sworn by the goddess of the hearth; and the hearth itself was the sacred asylum where suppliants implored the protection of the inhabitants of the house. A town or city is only an extended family, and therefore had likewise its sacred hearth. This public hearth usually existed in the prytaneum of a town, where the goddess had her especial sanctuary (θάλαμος), under the name of Prytaniotis (Πρυτανίτις), with a statue and the sacred hearth. There, as at a private hearth, Hestia protected the suppliants. When a colony was sent out, the emigrants took the fire which was to burn on the hearth of their new home from that of the mother town. If ever the fire of her hearth became extinct, it was not allowed to be lighted again with ordinary fire, but either by fire produced by friction, or by burning glass, drawing fire from the sun. The mystical speculations of later times took their origin from the simple ideas of the ancients, and assumed a sacred hearth not only in the centre of the earth but even in that of the universe, and confused Hestia in various ways with other divinities such as Cybele, Terra (Gæa), Ceres (Demeter), Proserpina (Persephone), and Diana (Artemis). There were but few special temples of Hestia in Greece, since every prytaneum was in reality a sanctuary of the goddess, and since a portion of the sacrifices, to whatever divinity they were offered, belonged to her. The worship of the Roman Vesta is spoken of under VESTA.

HESYCHIUS (Ἡσυχίος). 1. An Alexandrine grammarian, under whose name a large Greek dictionary has come down to us. Respecting his personal history nothing is known, but he probably lived about A.D. 380. The work is based, as the writer himself tells us, upon the lexicon of Diogenianus. Hesychius was probably a pagan: the Christian glosses and the references to Christian writers in the work are interpolations by a later hand. The work is one of great importance, not only on account of its explaining the words of the Greek language, but also from its containing much literary and archaeological information, derived from earlier grammarians and commentators, whose works are lost. The arrangement of the work, how work is very defective. The best edition is by Alberti, completed after Alberti's death by Heinsius. Lugd. Bat., 1746-1766, 2 vols. fol.—2. Of Milesus, surnamed Illustris, from some office which he held, lived about A.D. 540, and wrote, 1. An Onomasticon, or account of illustrious men, published by Orelli, Lips., 1820. 2. A Chronicon, or synoptical view of universal history, in six parts, from the reign of Belus, the reputed founder of the Assyrian empire, to the death of the Byzantine emperor, Anastasius I., A.D. 518. The work itself is lost, but an account of it is preserved by Photius.

HERICULUM, a town of the Brutii.

HEREDIA, also called LEANT, IVERNA or JUVERNI (Ἰέρη, Ἰερνὴ νῆσος, Iouernia), the island of Ireland, appears to have derived its name from the inhabitants of its southern coast, called Juverni (Iouepnoi) by Ptolemy, but its original name was probably Bergion or Vergion. It is mentioned by Caesar, and is frequently spoken of by subsequent writers; but the Romans never made any attempt to conquer the island, though they obtained some knowledge of it from the commercial intercourse which was carried on between it and Britain. We have no account of the island except from Ptolemy, who must have derived his information from the statements of the British merchants, who visited its coast. Ptolemy gives rather a long list of its promontories, rivers, tribes, and towns.

HERICLON (Ἰερκλῶν), son of the Trojan king Laomedon, and brother of Priam.]

HERICLAS (Ἰκέρης or Ἰκέρης). 1. A Syracusan, contemporary with the younger Dionysius and Timoleon. He was at first a friend of Dion, after whose death (B.C. 353) his wife Arete and his sister Aristomache placed themselves under the care of Hierocles; but he was persuaded, notwithstanding, to consent to their destruction. A few years later he became tyrant of Leontini. He carried on war against the younger Dionysius, whom he defeated, and had made himself master of the whole city, except the island citadel, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, 344. Hierocles then opposed Timoleon, and called in the aid of the Carthaginians, but he was defeated and put to death by Timoleon, 339 or 338.—2. Tyrant of Syracuse, during the interval between the reign of Agathocles and that of Pyrrhus. He defeated Phintias, tyrant of Agrigentum, and was himself defeated by the Carthaginians. After a reign of nine years (338-329), he was expelled from Syracuse.—3. Of Syracuse, one of the earlier Pythagoreans.

HERICLUS. 1. Son of Miccipa, king of Numidia, and grandson of Masinissa, was murdered by Jugurtha soon after the death of Miccipa, B.C. 118.—2. King of Numidia, grandson or great-grandson of Masinissa, and father of Juba, appears to have received the sovereignty of part of Numidia after the Jugurthine war. He was expelled from his kingdom by Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, the leader of the Marian party in Africa, but was restored by Pompey in 81. Simplicius wrote some works in the Punic language, which are cited by Sallust (Jug., 17).

HERIA. 1. Vid. ÆOLIS. 2. Vid. ÆOLIS. HERIALEUS (Ἡριαλεὺς). 1. (Now Bambuckalemi), a city of Great Phrygia, near the Maeander, celebrated for its hot springs and its temple of Cybele. Like the neighboring cities of Colossæ and Laodicea, it was an early seat of Christianity, and it is mentioned in St. Paul's Epistle to the Colossians (iv., 13).—2. Formerly Βαμβύκη (Bambuk: now Bambuck or Membij) a city in the northeast of Syria, one of the chief seats of the worship of Ashtar.

Ἡρακλίττα (Ἡρακλίττα, in Dio Cass. Ἡρακλίττα: Iouepnion: now Girapittra), a town on the southern coast of Crete, fabled to have been founded by the Corybantes.]

Ἡερο. Vid. HIERON.

HIEROCLES (Ἡεροκλῆς). 1. A Greek rhetorician of Alabanda in Caria, lived about B.C. 100 and was distinguished, like his brother Menecles, by the Asiatic style of oratory.—2. Governor of Bithynia, and afterward of Alexandria, is said to have been one of the chief instigators of the persecution of the Christians under Diocletian. He wrote a work against the Christians, entitled Λόγοι φιλαλήθεις πρὸς τοὺς Χριστιανούς, of which we may form an idea from the account of Lactantius and the refutation which Eusebius wrote against it. We see from these writers that Hierocles attacked the character of Jesus Christ and his apostles, and put him on an equality with Apollonius of Tyana.—3. A New Platonist, who lived at Alexandria about the middle of the fifth century. He wrote

1. A commentary on the golden verses of Pythagoras, in which he endeavors to give an intelligible account of the philosophy of Pythagoras. Published by Needham, Cambridge, 1706 and by Warren, London, 1742. 2. A work of Providence, Fate, and the reconciliation of man's free will with the divine government of the world, in seven books. The work is lost, but some extracts from it are preserved in Photius. 3. An ethical work on justice, on reverence toward the gods, parents, relations, &c., which bore the title Τὰ φιλοσοφούμενα. This work is also lost, but there are several extracts from it in Stobæus. The extant work, entitled Ἀσσεια, a collection of ludicrous tales, is erroneously ascribed to Hierocles, the New Platonist. The work is of no merit.—4. A Greek grammarian the author of an extant work, entitled Συνέκδημος, that is, The Travelling Companion, intended as a hand-book for travellers through the provinces of the eastern empire. It was perhaps written at the beginning of the sixth century of our era. It contains a list of sixty eparchies or provinces of the Eastern empire, and of nine hundred and thirty-five different towns with brief descriptions. Published by Weesseling, in Vetorum Romanorum Itineraria, Amsterdam, 1785.

HIERON (Ἥρων). 1. Tyrant of Syracuse (B.C. 478-467), was son of Dinomenes and brother of Gelon, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty. In the early part of his reign he became involved in a war with Theron of Agrigentum, who had espoused the cause of his brother Polyzelus, with whom he had quarrelled. But Hieron afterward concluded a peace with Theron, and became reconciled to his brother Polyzelus. After the death of Theron in 472, he carried on war against his son Thrasydæus, whom he defeated in a great battle, and expelled from Agrigentum. But by far the most important event of his reign was the great victory which he obtained over the Etruscan fleet near Cumæ (474), and which appears to have effectually broken the naval power of that nation. Hieron died at Catana in the twelfth year of his reign, 467. His government was much more despotic than that of his brother Gelon. He maintained a large guard of mercenary troops, and employed numerous spies and informers. He was, however, a liberal and enlightened patron of men of letters, and his court became the resort of the most distinguished poets and philosophers of the day. Æschylus, Pindar, and Bacchylides took up their abode with him, and we find him associating in friendly intercourse with Xenophanes, Epicharmus, and Simonides. His intimacy with the latter was particularly celebrated, and has been made the subject by Xenophon of an imaginary dialogue, entitled the Hieron. His love of magnificence was especially displayed in the great contests of the Grecian games, and his victories at Olympia and Delphi have been immortalized by Pindar.—2. King of Syracuse (B.C. 270–216), was the son of Hierocles, a noble Syracusan, descended from the great Gelon, but his mother was a female servant. When Pyrrhus left Sicily (276), Hieron, who had distinguished himself in the wars of that monarch, was declared general by the Syracusan army. He strengthened his power by marrying the daughter of Leptines, at that time the most influential citizen at Syracuse; and after his defeat of the Mamertines, he was saluted by his fellow-citizens with the title of king, 270. It was the great object of Hieron to expel the Mamertines from Sicily; and accordingly, when the Romans, in 264, interposed in favor of that people, Hieron concluded an alliance with the Carthaginians, and, in conjunction with them, carried on war against the Romans. But having been defeated by the Romans, he concluded a peace with them in the following year (263), in virtue of which he retained possession of the whole southeast of Sicily, and the eastern side of the island as far as Tauromenium. From this time till his death, a period of little less than half a century, Hieron continued the steadfast friend and ally of the Romans, a policy of which his subjects as well as himself reaped the benefits, in the enjoyment of a state of uninterrupted tranquillity and prosperity. Even the heavy losses which the Romans sustained in the first three years of the second Punic war did not shake his fidelity; and after their great defeats, he sent them large supplies of corn and auxiliary troops. He died in 216 at the age of ninety-two. His government was mild and equitable: though he did not refuse the title of king, he avoided all external display of the insignia of royalty, and appeared in public in the garb of a private citizen. The care he bestowed upon the financial department of his administration is attested by the laws regulating the tithes of corn and other agricultural produce, which, under the name of Leges Hieronicae, were retained by the Romans when they reduced Sicily to a province. He adorned the city of Syracuse with many public works. His power and magnificence were celebrated by Theocritus in his sixteenth Idyl. Hieron had only one son, Gelon, who died shortly before his father. He was succeeded by his grandson, Hieronymus.

ΗΙΕΡΟΝΥΜΟΣ (Ἱερώνυμος). 1. Of Cardia probably accompanied Alexander the Great to Asia, and after the death of that monarch (B.C. 323) served under his countryman Eumenes. In the last battle between Eumenes and Antigonus (316), Hieronymus fell into the hands of Antigonus, who treated him with kindness, and whose service he henceforth attached himself to. After the death of Antigonus (301), Hieronymus continued to follow the fortunes of his son Demetrius, and was appointed by the latter governor of Bœotia, after his first conquest of Thebes, 292. He continued unshaken in his attachment to Demetrius and to his son, Antigonus Gonatas, after him. It appears that he survived Pyrrhus, and died at the advanced age of 104. Hieronymus wrote a history of the events from the death of Alexander to that of Pyrrhus, if not later. This work has not come down to us, but it is frequently cited by later writers as one of the chief authorities for the history of Alexander's successors. We are told that Hieronymus displayed partiality to Antigonus and Demetrius, and, in consequence, treated Pyrrhus and Lysimachus with great injustice.

—2. King of Syracuse, succeeded his grandfather Hieron II., B.C. 216, at fifteen years of age. He was persuaded by the Carthaginian party to renounce the alliance with the Romans, which his grandfather had maintained for many years. He was assassinated after a short reign of only thirteen months.—3. Of Rhodes commonly called a peripatetic, though Cicero questions his right to the title, was a disciple of Aristotle, and appears to have lived down to the time of Ptolemy Philadelphus. He held the highest good to consist in freedom from pain and trouble, and denied that pleasure was to be sought for its own sake.—4. Commonly known as SAINT JEROME, one of the most celebrated of the Christian fathers, was born at Stridon, a town upon the confines of Dalmatia and Pannonia, about A.D. 340. His father sent him to Rome for the prosecution of his studies, where he devoted himself with great ardor and success to the Greek and Latin languages, to rhetoric, and to the different branches of philosophy, enjoying the instructions of the most distinguished preceptors of that era, among whom was Aelius Donatus. Vid DONATUS. After completing his studies he went to Gaul, where he remained some time, and subsequently travelled through various countries in the East. At Antioch he was attacked by a dangerous melody, and on his recovery he resolved to withdraw from the world. In 374 he retired to the desert of Chalcis, lying between Antioch and the Euphrates, where he passed four years, adhering strictly to the most rigid observances of monkish asceticism, but at the same time pursuing the study of Hebrew. In 379 he was ordained a presbyter at Antioch by Paulinus. Soon after he went to Constantinople, where he lived for three years, enjoying the instructions and friendship of Gregory of Nazianzus. In 382 he accompanied Paulinus to Rome, where he formed a close friendship with the Pope Damasus. He remained at Rome three years, and there labored in proclaiming the glory and merit of a new templative life and monastic discipline. He had many enthusiastic disciples among the Roman ladies, but the influence which he exercised over them excited the hatred of their relations, and exposed him to attacks against his character. Accordingly, he left Rome in 385, having lost his patron Damasus in the preceding year, and accompanied by the rich widow Paula, her daughter Eustochium, and a number of devout maidens, he made a tour of the Holy Land, and finally settled at Bethlehem, where Paula erected four monasteries, three for nuns and one for monks. Here he passed the remainder of his life. He died A.D. 420. Jerome wrote a great number of works, most of which have come down to us. Of these the most celebrated are his Commentaries on the various books of the Scriptures. He also translated into Latin the Old and New Testaments: his translation is in substance the Latin version of the Scriptures, known by the name of the Vulgate. The translation of the Old Testament was made by Jerome directly from the Hebrew; but the translation of the New Testament was formed by him out of the old translations, carefully corrected from the original Greek. Jerome likewise translated from the Greek the Chronicle of Eusebius, which he enlarged, chiefly in the department of Roman history, and brought down to A.D. 378. Jerome was the most learned of the Latin fathers. His profound knowledge of the Latin, Greek, and Hebrew languages, his familiarity with ancient history and philosophy, and his personal acquaintance with the manners and scenery of the East, enabled him to throw much light upon the Scriptures. In his controversial works he is vehement and dogmatical. His language is exceedingly pure, bearing ample testimony to the diligence with which he must have studied the choicest models. The best editions of the works of Jerome are the Benedictine, Paris, 5 vols. fol., 1693-1706, and that by Vallart, Veron, 11 vols. fol., 1734-1742; reprinted Venet., 11 vols. 4to, 1766.

HIKIOGOLYMA. Vid JERUSALEM.

HILARIUS. 1. A Christian writer, was born of pagan parents at Poitiers. He afterward became a Christian, and was elected bishop of his native place, A.D. 350. From this time he devoted all his energies to check the progress of Arianism, which was making rapid strides in Gaul. He became so troublesome to the Arians, that they induced the Emperor Constantius to send to banish him to Phrygia. He was allowed to return to Gaul about 361, and died in his diocese in 368. Several of his works have come down to us. They consist chiefly of polemical treatises against the Arians and addresses to the Emperor Constantius. The best edition of his works is by Constant, Paris, 1693, forming one of the Benedictine series, and reprinted by Scipio Maffei, Veron. 1730.—2. Bishop of Arles, succeeded his master Honoratus in that diocese, A.D. 429, and died in 449. He wrote the life of Honoratus and a few other works.

HILLENBERG. Vid GERMANIA, p. 327, a.

HIMERA (Ἱμέρα). 1. (Now Fiume Salvo.) one of the principal rivers in the south of Sicily, at one time the boundary between the territories of the Carthaginians and Syracusans, receives near Enna the water of a salt spring, and hence has salt water as far as its mouth.—2. A smaller river in the north of Sicily, flows into the sea between the towns of Himera and Thermae.—3. (Ἱμερα), a celebrated Greek city on the northern coast of Sicily, west of the mouth of the River Himera (No. 2), was founded by the Chalcidians of Zanele, B.C. 648, and afterward received Dorian settlers, so that the inhabitants spoke a mixed dialect, partly Ionic (Chalcidian) and partly Doric. About 560, Himera, being threatened by its powerful neighbors, placed itself under the protection of Phalaris, tyrant of Agrigentum, in whose power it appears to have remained till his death. At a later time (500) we find Himera governed by a tyrant Terillus, who was expelled by Theron of Agrigentum. Terillus thereupon applied for assistance to the Carthaginians, who, anxious to extend their influence in Sicily, sent a powerful army into Sicily under the command of Hamilcar. The Carthaginians were defeated with great slaughter at Himera by the united forces of Theron and Gelon of Syracuse on the same day that the battle of Salamis was fought (480). Himera was now governed by Thrasydæus, the son of Theron, in the name of his father; but the inhabitants having attempted to revolt, Theron put to death or drove into exile a considerable part of the population, and repopulated the city with settlers from all quarters, but especially of Dorian origin. After the death of Theron (478), Himera recovered its independence, and for the next sixty years was one of the most flourishing cities in Sicily. It assisted Syracuse against the Athenians in 415. In 409 it was taken by Hannibal, the son of Gisco, who, to revenge the great defeat which the Carthaginians had suffered before this town, levelled it to the ground and destroyed almost all the inhabitants. Himera was never rebuilt; but on the opposite bank of the River Himera, the Carthaginians founded a new town, which, from a warm medicinal spring in its neighborhood, was called Thermae (Θέρμαι: Θερμαῖς, Thermitanus: now Thermi). Here the remains of the unfortunate inhabitants of Himera were allowed to settle. The Romans, who highly prized the warm springs of Thermae, permitted the town to retain its own constitution; and Augustus made it a colony. The poet Stesichorus was born at the ancient Himera, and the tyrant Agathocles at Thermae.

HIMERIUS (Ἱμερίος), a celebrated Greek sophist, was born at Prusa in Bithynia, and studied at Athens. He was subsequently appointed professor of rhetoric at Athens, where he gave instruction to Julian, afterward emperor, and the celebrated Christian writers, Basil and Gregory Nazianzen. In 362 the Emperor Julian invited him to his court at Antioch, and made him his secretary. He returned to Athens in 368, and there passed the remainder of his life. Himerius was a pagan; but he does not manifest in his writings any animosity against the Christians. There were extant in the time of Photius seventy-one orations by Himerius; but of these only twenty-four have come down to us complete. Edited by Wernsdorf, Gottingen, 1790.

HIMILCO (Ἱμῖλκων). 1. A Carthaginian, who conducted a voyage of discovery from India toward the north, along the western shores of Europe, at the same time that Hanno undertook his voyage to the south along the coast of Africa. Vid. HANNO, No. 10. Himilco represented that his further progress was prevented by the stagnant nature of the sea, loaded with seaweed, and by the absence of wind. His voyage is said to have lasted four months, but it is impossible to judge how far it was extended. Perhaps it was intentionally wrapped in obscurity by the commercial jealousy of the Carthaginians.—2. Son of Hanno, commanded, together with Hannibal, son of Gisco (vid. HANNIBAL, No. 1), a Carthaginian army in Sicily, and laid siege to Agrigentum, B.C. 406. Hannibal died before Agrigentum of a pestilence, which broke out in the camp; and Himilco, now left sole general, succeeded in taking the place, after a siege of nearly eight months. At a later period he carried on war against Dionysius of Syracuse. In 395 he defeated Dionysius, and laid siege to Syracuse; but while pressing the siege of the city, a pestilence carried off a great number of his men. In this weakened condition, Himilco was attacked and defeated by Dionysius, and was obliged to purchase his safety by an ignominious capitulation. Such was his grief and disappointment at this termination of the campaign, that, on his return to Carthage, he put an end to his life by voluntary abstinence.—3. The Carthaginian commander at Lilybæum, which he defended with skill and bravery when it was attacked by the Romans, 260.—4. Commander of the Carthaginian forces in Sicily during a part of the second Punic war, 214–212.—5. Surnamed PHAMÆAS, commander of the Carthaginian cavalry in the third Punic war. He deserted to the Romans, by whom he was liberally rewarded.

HIPPARCHIA (ἵππαρχία), wife of Crates the Cynic (For details, vid. CRATES, No. 3.)

HIPPARCHUS (ἵππαρχος). 1. Son of Pisistratus. Vid. PISISTRATIDÆ.—2. A celebrated Greek astronomer, was a native of Nicæa in Bithynia, and flourished B.C. 160–146. He resided both at Rhodes and Alexandria. He was the true father of astronomy, which he raised to that rank among the applications of arithmetic and geometry which it has always since preserved. He was the first who gave and demonstrated the means of solving all triangles, rectilinear and spherical. He constructed a table of chords, of which he made the same sort of use as we make of our sines. He made more observations than his predecessors, and understood them better. He invented the planisphere, or the mode of representing the starry heavens upon a plane, and of producing the solutions of problems of spherical astronomy. He is also the father of true geography, by his happy idea of marking the position of spots on the earth, as was done with the stars, by circles drawn from the pole perpendicularly to the equator; that is, by latitudes and longitudes. His method of eclipses was the only one by which differences of meridians could be determined. The catalogue which Hipparchus constructed of the stars is preserved in the Almagest of Ptolemy. Hipparchus wrote numerous works, which are

HIPPARCHUS (ἵππαρχος). 1. A Syracusan father of Dion and Aristomachus, supported the elder Dionysius, who married his daughter Aristomacha.—2. Son of Dion, and grandson of the preceding, threw himself from the roof of a house, and was killed on the spot, when his father attempted, by restraint, to cure him of the dissolute habits which he had acquired while under the power of Dionysius.—3. Son of the elder Dionysius by Aristomacha, daughter of No. 1, succeeded Callippus in the tyranny of Syracuse, B.C. 352. He was assassinated after reigning only two years.

HIPPARIUS (ἵππαρις; now Camarina), a river in the south of Sicily, which flows into the sea near Camarina.

HIPPASUS (ἵππασος), of Metapontum or Croton, in Italy, one of the elder Pythagoreans, held the element of fire to be the cause of all things. In consequence of his making known the sphere, consisting of twelve pentagons, which was regarded by the Pythagoreans as a secret, he is said to have perished in the sea as an impious man.

HIPPUS and HIPPIUS (ἵππια and ἵππιος, or ἵππειος), in Latin Equus and Equestris, are names of several divinities, as of Juno (Hera), and Minerva (Athena), of Neptune (Poseidon) and of Mars (Ares); and at Rome also of Fortuna and Venus.

HIPPUS (ἵππιος). 1. Son of Pisistratus. Vid. PISISTRATIDÆ.—2. The Sophist, was a native of Elis, and the contemporary of Socrates. His fellow-citizens availed themselves of his abilities in political matters, and sent him on a diplomatic mission to Sparta. But he was in every respect like the other sophists of the time. He travelled through Greece for the purpose of acquiring wealth and celebrity by teaching and public speaking. His character as a sophist, his vanity, and his boastful arrogance, are well described in the two dialogues of Plato, Hippias major and Hippias minor. Though his knowledge was superficial, yet it appears that he had paid attention not only to rhetorical, philosophical, and political studies, but also to poetry, music, mathematics, painting, and sculpture, and he must even have acquired some practical skill in the mechanical arts, as he used to boast of wearing on his body nothing that he had not made with his own hands, such as his seal-ring, his cloak, and shoes. He possessed great facility in extempore speaking; and once his vanity led him to declare that he would travel to Olympia, and there deliver before the assembled Greeks an oration on any subject that might be proposed to him.

HIPPO (ἵππων), in Africa. 1. H. Basilus (ἵπποβασιλικός; ruins near Bonah), a city on the coast of Numidia, west of the mouth of the Rabrictus; once a royal residence, and afterward celebrated as the birthplace of St. Augustine.—2. H. DIAPHANTUS or ZARITUS (ἵπποδαφάντης; now Di Zerta), a city on the northern coast of the Carthaginian territory (Zengitana), west of Utica, at the mouth of the Sinus Hippocentauricus.—3. A town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, south of Toletum.

HIPPOCENTAURI. Vid. CENTAURI.

ΗΙΠΠΟΚΟΩΝ (Ἰπποκῶν). 1. Son of Cebalus and Bates. After his father's death he expelled his brother Tyndareus, in order to secure the kingdom to himself; but Hercules led Tyndareus back, and slew Hippocoon and his sons. Ovid (Met. viii, 314) mentions the sons of Hippocoon among the Calydonian hunters.—[2. A Thracian, follower of Rhesus in the Trojan war.—3. Son of Hyrtacus, a companion of Æneas, distinguished himself in the funeral games celebrated in honor of Anchises.]

ΗΙΠΠΟΚΡΑΤΗΣ (Ἰπποκράτης). 1. Father of Pistratus, the tyrant of Athens.—2. An Athenian, son of Megacles, was brother of Clisthenes, the legislator, and grandfather, through his daughter Agariste, of the illustrious Pericles.—3. An Athenian, son of Xanthippus and brother of Pericles. He had three sons, who, as well as their father, are alluded to by Aristophanes as men of a mean capacity, and devoid of education.—4. An Athenian, son of Ariphron, commanded the Athenians, B.C. 424, when he was defeated and slain by the Boeotians at the battle of Delium.—5. A Laedæmonian, served under Mindarus on the Asiatic coast in 410, and, after the defeat of Mindarus at Cyzicus, became commander of the fleet.—6. A Sicilian, succeeded his brother Cleander as tyrant of Gela, 498. His reign was prosperous; and he extended his power over several other cities of Sicily. He died in 491, while besieging Hybla.—7. A Sicilian, brother of Epicydes.—8. The most celebrated physician of antiquity. He was born in the island of Cos about B.C. 460. He belonged to the family of the Asclepiads, and was the son of Heraclides, who was also a physician. His mother's name was Phænarete, who was said to be descended from Hercules. He was instructed in medical science by his father and by Herodotus, and he is said to have been also a pupil of Gorgias of Leontini. He wrote, taught, and practiced his profession at home; travelled in different parts of the continent of Greece; and died at Larissa in Thessaly, about 357, at the age of 104. He had two sons, Theasalus and Dracon, and a son-in-law, Polybus, all of whom followed the same profession, and who are supposed to have been the authors of some of the works in the Hippocratic collection. These are the only certain facts which we know respecting the life of Hippocrates; but to these later writers have added a large collection of stories, many of which are clearly fabulous. Thus he is said to have stopped the plague at Athens by burning fires throughout the city, by suspending chaplets of flowers, and by the use of an antidote. It is also related that Artaxerxes Longimanus, king of Persia, invited Hippocrates to come to his assistance during a time of pestilence, but that Hippocrates refused his request on the ground of his being the enemy of his country. The writings which have come down to us under the name of Hippocrates were composed by several different persons, and are of very different merit. They are more than sixty in number, but of these only a few are certainly genuine. They are: 1. Προγνωστικόν, Pronosticon or Prognosticon. 2. Ἀφορισμοί, Aphorismi. 3. Ἐπιδημιῶν Βιβλία, De Morbis Populæ (or Epidemiorum). 4. Περὶ Διαιτήσεως, De Ratione Victus in Morbis Acutis, or De Dieta

Acutorum. 5. Περὶ Ἀέρος, Υδατος, Ἰσχυος, De Aëre, Aquâ, et Locis. 6. Περὶ τῶν ἐν Κεφαλῇ Τραυμάτων, De Capitis Vulneribus. Some of the other works were perhaps written by Hippocrates; but the great majority of them were composed by his disciples and followers, many of whom bore the name of Hippocrates. The ancient physicians wrote numerous commentaries on the works in the Hippocratic collection. Of these the most valuable are the commentaries of Galen. Hippocrates divided the causes of disease into two principal classes; the one comprehending the influence of seasons, climates, water, situation, &c., and the other the influence of food, exercise, &c. He considered that while heat and cold, moisture and dryness, succeeded one another throughout the year, the human body underwent certain analogous changes, which influenced the diseases of the period. He supposed that the four fluids or humors of the body (blood, phlegm, yellow bile, and black bile) were the primary seat of disease; that health was the result of the due combination (or crasis) of these, and that, when this crasis was disturbed, disease was the consequence; that, in the course of a disorder that was proceeding favorably, these humors underwent a certain change in quality (or coction), which was the sign of returning health, as preparing the way for the expulsion of the morbid matter, or crisis; and that these crises had a tendency to occur at certain stated periods which were hence called "critical days." Hippocrates was evidently a person who not only had had great experience, but who also knew how to turn it to the best account; and the number of moral reflections and apophthegms that we meet with in his writings, some of which (as, for example, "Life is short, and Art is long") have acquired a sort of proverbial notoriety, show him to have been a profound thinker. His works are written in the Ionic dialect, and the style is so concise as to be sometimes extremely obscure. The best edition of his works is by Littré, Paris, 1839, seq., with a French translation.

ΗΙΠΠΟΚΡΗΝΗ (Ἰπποκρήνη), the "Fountain of the Horse," called by Pausanias Fons Caballinus, was a fountain in Mount Helicon in Boeotia, sacred to the Muses, said to have been produced by the horse Pegasus striking the ground with his feet.

ΗΙΠΠΟΔΑΜΑΣ (Ἰπποδάμας), son of Priam, slain by Achilles.]

ΗΙΠΠΟΔΑΜΙΑ (Ἰπποδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Ctenomachus, king of Pisa in Elis. For details, vid. CENOMACHUS and PELOPS.—2. Wife of Pirithous, at whose nuptials took place the celebrated battle between the Centaurs and Lapithæ. For details, vid. PIRITHOUS.—3. Vid. BAISAKIA.—[4. Wife of Amyntor, and mother of Phoenix.—5. Daughter of Anchises, and wife of Alcaïchous.—6. One of the female attendants of Penelope.]

ΗΙΠΠΟΔΑΜΟΣ (Ἰπποδάμος). [1. A Trojan hero, slain by Ulysses.]—2. A distinguished Greek architect, a native of Miletus, and the son of Euryphon or Eurycoön. His fame rests on his construction, not of single buildings, but of whole cities. His first great work was the town of Piræus, which he built under the auspices of Pericles. When the Athenians founded their emony of Thuri (B.C. 443), Hippodamus went out with the colonists, and was the architect of the new city. Hence he is often called a Thurian. He afterwards built Rhodes (408-407).

HIPPOLŌCHUS (Ἱππόλοχος). 1. Son of Bellerophon and Philonoe or Anticlea, and father of Glaucus, the Lycian prince.—[2. A Trojan, son of Antimachus, slain by Agamemnon.—8. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens.]

HIPPOLYTE (Ἱππολύτη). 1. Daughter of Mars (Ares) and Otrera, was queen of the Amazons, and sister of Antiope and Melanippe. She wore a girdle given to her by her father; and when Hercules came to fetch this girdle, she was slain by Hercules. Vid. p. 357, b. According to another tradition, Hippolyte, with an army of Amazons, marched into Attica, to take vengeance on Theseus for having carried off Antiope; but, being conquered by Theseus, she fled to Megara, where she died of grief, and was buried. In some accounts, Hippolyte, and not Antiope, is said to have been married to Theseus.—2. Or ASTYDAMIA, wife of Acastus, fell in love with Peleus. Vid. ACASTUS.

HIPPOLYTUS (Ἱππόλυτος). 1. Son of Theseus by Hippolyte, queen of the Amazons, or her sister Antiope. Theseus afterwards married Phædra, who fell in love with Hippolytus; but, as her offers were rejected by her step-son, she accused him to his father of having attempted her dishonor. Theseus thereupon cursed his son, and requested his father, Ægeus or Neptune (Poseidon), to destroy him. Accordingly, as Hippolytus was riding in his chariot along the sea-coast, Neptune (Poseidon) sent forth a bull from the water. The horses were frightened, upset the chariot, and dragged Hippolytus along the ground till he was dead. Theseus afterward learned the innocence of his son, and Phædra, in despair, made away with herself. Diana (Artemia) induced Æsculapius to restore Hippolytus to life again; and, according to Italian traditions, she placed him, under the name of Virbius, under the protection of the nymph Egeria, in the grove of Aricia, in Latium, where he was honored with divine worship. Horace, following the more ancient tradition, says that Diana could not restore Hippolytus to life (Carm. iv., 7, 25).—2. An early ecclesiastical writer of considerable eminence, but whose real history is very uncertain. He appears to have lived early in the third century, and is said to have suffered martyrdom under Alexander Severus, being drowned in a ditch or pit full of water. Others suppose that he perished in the Decian persecution. He is said to have been a disciple of Irenæus and a teacher of Origen. His works, which are written in Greek, are edited by Fabricius, Hamb., 1716-718, 2 vols. fol.

HIPPOMACHUS (Ἱππόμαχος). 1. A Trojan warrior, son of Antimachus, slain by Leonteus.—2. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens, fell in battle against the patriots under Thrasybulus.

HIPPOMEDON (Ἱππομόδων), son of Aristomachus, or, according to Sophocles, of Talaua, was one of the Seven against Thebes, where he was slain during the siege by Hyperbius or Lamachus.

HIPPOMENES (Ἱππομένης). 1. Son of Megareus, and great-grandson of Neptune (Poseidon), conquered Atalanta in the foot-race. For details, vid. ATALANTA, No. 2.—2. A descendant of Codrus, the fourth and last of the decennial archons. Incensed at the barbarous punishment which he inflicted on his daughter, the Attic nobles deposed him.

HIPPON (Ἱππών), of Rhegium, a philosopher of uncertain date, belonging to the Ionian school. He was accused of atheism, and so got the surname of the Melian, as agreeing in sentiment with Diagoras. He held water and fire to be the principles of all things, the latter springing from the former, and developing itself by generating the universe.

HIPPONAX (Ἱππώναξ), of Ephesus, son of Pytheus and Protia, was, after Archilochus and Simonides, the third of the Iambic poets of Greece. He flourished B.C. 546-520. He was distinguished for his love of liberty, and having been expelled from his native city by the tyrants, he took up his abode at Clazomenæ, for which reason he is sometimes called a Clazomenian. In person, Hipponax was little, thin, and ugly, but very strong. The two brothers Bupalus and Athenia, who were sculptors of Chios, made statues of Hipponax, in which they caricatured his natural ugliness, and he, in return, directed all the power of his satirical poetry against them, and especially against Bupalus. (Hor. Epod. vi., 14.) Later writers add that the sculptors hanged themselves in despair. Hipponax was celebrated in antiquity for the severity of his satire. He severely chastised the effeminate luxury of his Ionian brethren; he did not spare his own parents; and he ventured even to ridicule the gods. In his satire he introduced a spondee or a trochee in the last foot instead of an iambus. This change made the verse irregular in its rhythm, and gave it a sort of halting movement, whence it was called the Choliambus (χολιαμβός i. e. lame iambic), or Iambus Scæzon (σκάζων, limping). He also wrote a parody on the Iliad. He may be said to occupy a middle place between Archilochus and Aristophanes. He is as bitter, but not so earnest, as the former, while in lightness and jocoseness he more resembles the latter. The fragments of Hipponax are edited by Welcker, Götting, 1817, 8vo, and by Bergk in the Poeta Lyrici Græci.

HIPPOTADES (Ἱπποτάδης) i. e. son of Hippotes, that is, Æolus. Vid. ÆOLUS, No. 2. Hence the Æolian Islands are called Hippotades regnum. (Ov. Met. xiv., 86.)

HIPPOTES (Ἱππότης). 1. Father of Æolus. Vid. ÆOLUS, No. 2.—2. Son of Phylas by daughter of Iolaus, great-grandson of Hercules and father of Aletes. When the Heraclids invaded Peloponnesus, Hippotes killed the son Carnus. The army, in consequence, began to suffer very severely, and Hippotes, by the command of an oracle, was banished for ten years.

HIPPOTHŌON (Ἱπποθόων), an Attic hero, son of Neptune (Poseidon) and ALOPE, the daughter of Cereyon. He had a heron at Athens; and one of the Attic phylæ, or tribes, was called after him Hippothoonia.

HIPPOTHŌUS (Ἱπποθόος). 1. Son of Cereyon and father of Æpytus, succeeded Agapenor at Hippotion in Arcadia.—2. Son of Lethus, grandson of Teutamus, and brother of Pylæus, led a band of Pelasgians from Larissa to the assistance of the Trojans. He was slain by the Telamonian Ajax.

Hirronion (Ἰρρωνίον), a Phrygian, slain by Mariones in the Trojan war.]

Hirsi, a Samnite people, whose name is said to come from the Sabine word hirpus, "a wolf," dwelt in the south of Samnium, between Apulia, Lucania, and Campania. Their chief town was Æoulanum.

Hirtius, A., belonged to a plebeian family, which came probably from Ferentinum in the territory of the Hernici. He was the personal and political friend of Cæsar the dictator. In B.C. 48 he was Cæsar's legatus in Gaul, and during the civil war his name constantly appears in Cicero's correspondence. He was one of the ten prætors nominated by Cæsar for 46, and during Cæsar's absence in Africa he lived principally at his Tusculan estate, which was contiguous to Cicero's villa. Though politically opposed, they were on friendly terms, and Cæsar gave Hirtius lessons in oratory. In 44 Hirtius received Belgic Gaul for his province, but he governed it by deputy, and attended Cæsar at Rome, who nominated him and Vibius Pansa consuls for 43. After Cæsar's assassination (44) Hirtius first joined Antony, but, being disgusted by the despotic arrogance of the latter, he retired to Puteoli, where he renewed his intercourse with Cicero. Later in the year he resided at his Tusculan villa, where he was attacked by a dangerous illness, from which he never perfectly recovered. On the first of January, 43, Hirtius and Pansa entered on their consularship, according to Cæsar's arrangement. The two consuls were sent along with Octavianus against Antony, who was besieging Dec. Brutus at Mutina. Pansa was defeated by Antony, and died of a wound which he had received in the battle. Hirtius retrieved this disaster by defeating Antony, but he also fell on the 27th of April, in leading an assault on the besieger's camp. Octavianus sent the bodies of the slain consuls to Rome, where they were received with extraordinary honors, and publicly buried in the Field of Mars. To Octavianus their removal from the scene was so timely, that he was accused by many of murdering them. Hirtius divides with Oppius the claim to the authorship of the eighth book of the Gallic war, as well as that of the Alexandrian, African, and Spanish. It is not impossible that he wrote the first three, but he certainly did not write the Spanish war.

Hirulanus, a distinguished general of Sertorius in Spain. In B.C. 78 he was routed and slain near Italica, in Bætica, by Metellus.

Hispalum, more rarely Hispal (now Seville), a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, founded by the Phœnicians, was situated on the left bank of the Bætis, and was in reality a seaport, for, although five hundred stadia from the sea, the river is navigable for the largest vessels up to the town. Under the Romans Hispania was the third town in the province, Corduba and Gades being the two first. It was patronized by Cæsar, because Corduba had espoused the side of Pompey. He made it a Roman colony, under the name of Julia Romula or Romulensis, and a conventus juridicus or town of assize. Under the Goths and Vandals Hispalis was the chief town in the south of Spain, and under the Arabs was the capital of a separate kingdom.

Hispānia or Iberia (Ἰσπανία, Ἰβηρία: Hispānia, Iberus: now Spain and Portugal), a peninsular in the southwest of Europe, is connected with the land only on the northeast, where the Pyrenees form its boundary, and is surrounded on all other sides by the sea, on the east and south by the Mediterranean, on the west by the Atlantic, and on the north by the Cantabrian Sea. The Greeks and Romans had no accurate knowledge of the country till the time of the Roman invasion in the second Punic war. It was first mentioned by Hecateus (about B.C. 500) under the name of Iberia; but this name originally indicated only the eastern coast: the western coast beyond the Pillars of Hercules was called Tartessus (Ταρτησσός); and the interior of the country Celtica (ἡ Κελτική). At a later time the Greeks applied the name of Iberia, which is usually derived from the River Iberus, to the whole country. The name Hispānia, by which the Romans call the country, first occurs at the time of the Roman invasion. It is usually derived from the Punic word Span, "a rabbit," on account of the great number of rabbits which the Carthaginians found in the peninsula; but others suppose the name to be of native origin, and to be the same as the Basque España, an edge or border. The poets also called it Hesperia, or, to distinguish it from Italy, Hesperia Ultima. Spain is a very mountainous country. The principal mountains are, in the northeast, the Pyrenees (vid. PRÆNEUS Mons), and in the centre of the country the Ibuxeda, which runs parallel with the Pyrenees from the land of the Cantabri to the Mediterranean, and the Oroseda or Orosceda, which begins in the centre of the Ibuxeda, runs south west throughout Spain, and terminates at Calpe. The rivers of Spain are numerous. The six most important are the Ilerus (now Ebro), Bætis (now Guadalquivir), and Anas (now Guadiana), in the east and south; and the Tætus, Durus (now Douro), and Minus (now Minho), in the west. Spain was considered by the ancients very fertile, but more especially the southern part of the country, Bætica and Lusitania, which were also praised for their splendid climate. The central and northern parts of the country were less productive, and the climate in these districts was very cold in winter. In the south there were numerous flocks of excellent sheep, the wool of which was very celebrated in foreign countries. The Spanish horses and asses were also much valued in antiquity; and on the coast there was abundance of fish. The country produced a great quantity of corn, oil, wine, flax, figs, and other fruits. But the principal riches of the country consisted in its mineral productions, of which the greatest quantity was found in Turdetania. Gold was found in abundance in various parts of the country; and there were many silver mines, of which the most celebrated were near Carthago Nova, Ilipa, Sisapon, and Castulo. The precious stones, copper, lead, tin, and other metals, were also found in more or less abundance. The most ancient inhabitants of Spain were the Iberi, who, as a separate people, must be distinguished from the Iberi, a collective name of all the inhabitants of Spain. The Iberi dwelt on both sides of the Pyrenees, and were found in the south of Gaul as far as the Rhone. Celts afterward crossed the Pyrenees, and became mingled with the Iberi, whence arose the mixed race of the Celtiberi, who dwelt chiefly in the high table-land in the centre of the country. Vid. CELTIBERI. But besides this mixed race of the Celtiberi, there were also several tribes, both of Iberians and Celts, who were never united with one another. The unmixed Iberians, from whom the modern Basques are descended, dwelt chiefly in the Pyrenees and on the coasts, and their most distinguished tribes were the ASTURES, CANTABRI, VACCAI, &c. The unmixed Celts dwelt chiefly on the River Anas, and in the northwest corner of the country or Gallæcia. Besides these inhabitants, there were Phœnician and Carthaginian settlements on the coasts, of which the most important were GADES and CARTHAGO NOVA; there were likewise Greek colonies, such as EMPORIA and SAGUNTUM; and, lastly, the conquest of the country by the Romans introduced many Romans among the inhabitants, whose customs, civilization, and language gradually spread over the whole peninsula, and effaced the national characteristics of the ancient population. The spread of the Latin language in Spain seems to have been facilitated by the schools, established by Sertorius, in which both the language and literature of Greece and Rome were taught. Under the empire some of the most distinguished Latin writers were natives of Spain, such as the two Senecas, Lucan, Martial, Quintilian, Silius Italicus, Pomponius Mela, Prudentius, and others. The ancient inhabitants of Spain were a proud, brave, and warlike race; easily excited and ready to take offence; inveterate robbers; moderate in the use of food and wine; fond of song and of the dance; lovers of their liberty, and ready at all times to sacrifice their lives rather than submit to a foreign master. The Cantabri and the inhabitants of the mountains in the north were the fiercest and most uncivilized of all the tribes; the Vaccaei and the Turdetani were the most civilized; and the latter people were not only acquainted with the alphabet, but possessed a literature which contained records of their history, poems, and collections of laws composed in verse. The history of Spain begins with the invasion of the country by the Carthaginians, B.C. 228; for up to that time hardly any thing was known of Spain except the existence of two powerful commercial states in the west, TARRACONENSIS and GADES. After the first Punic war, Hamilcar, the son of Hannibal, formed the plan of conquering Spain, in order to obtain for the Carthaginians possessions which might indemnify them for the loss of Sicily and Sardinia. Under his command (228-229), and that of his son-in-law and successor, Hasdrubal (228-221), the Carthaginians conquered the greater part of the southeast of the peninsula as far as the Iberus; and Hasdrubal founded the important city of Carthago Nova. These successes of the Carthaginians excited the jealousy of the Romans, and a treaty was made between the two nations about 228, by which the Carthaginians bound themselves not to cross the Iberus. The town of Saguntum, although on the west side of the river, was under the protection of the Romans; and the capture of this town by Hannibal in 211 was the immediate cause of the second Punic war. In the course of this war the Romans drove the Carthaginians out of the peninsula, and became masters of their possessions in the south of the country. But many tribes in the centre of the country, which had been only nominally subject to Carthage, still retained their virtual independence; and the tribes in the north and northwest of the country had been hitherto quite unknown both to the Carthaginians and Romans. There now arose a long and bloody struggle between the Romans and the various tribes in Spain, and it was nearly two centuries before the Romans succeeded in subduing entirely the whole of the peninsula. The Celtiberians were conquered by the elder Cato (195), and Tib. Gracchus, the father of the two tribunes (179). The Lusitanians, who long resisted the Romans under their brave leader Viriathus, were obliged to submit, about the year 137, to D. Brutus, who penetrated as far as Gallæcia; but it was not till Numantia was taken by Scipio Africanus the younger, in 133, that the Romans obtained the undisputed sovereignty over the various tribes in the centre of the country, and of the Lusitanians to the south of the Tagus. Julius Cæsar after his prætorship, subdued the Lusitanians north of the Tagus (60). The Cantabri, Astures, and other tribes in the mountains of the north, were finally subjugated by Augustus and his generals. The whole peninsula was now subject to the Romans; and Augustus founded in it several colonies, and caused excellent roads to be made throughout the country. The Romans had, as early as the end of the second Punic war, divided Spain into two provinces, separated from one another by the Iberus, and called Hispania Citerior and Hispania Ulterior, the former being to the east, and the latter to the west of the river. In consequence of there being two provinces, we frequently find the country called Hispania. The provinces were governed by two præconsuls or two prætors, the latter of whom also frequently bore the title of præconsuls. Augustus made a new division of the country, and formed three provinces Tarraconensis, Bætica, and Lusitania. The province Tarraconensis, which derived its name from Tarraco, the capital of the province, was by far the largest of the three, and comprehended the whole of the north, east, and centre of the peninsula. The province Bætica, which derived its name from the River Bætis, was separated from Lusitania on the north and west by the River Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the east by a line drawn from the River Anas to the promontory Charidæum in the Mediterranean. The province Lusitania, which corresponded very nearly in extent to the modern Portugal, was separated from Tarraconensis on the north by the River Durum, from Bætica on the east by the Anas, and from Tarraconensis on the east by a line drawn from ius to the Anas, between the territories of the Attones and Carpetani. Augustus made it a senatorial province, but reserved the east of the two others for the Caesar; the former was governed by a praetor appointed by the senate, and the latter by legati. In Bætica, Corduba or Hispalis seat of government; in Tarraconensis, and in Lusitania, Augusta Emerita. The organization of the empire by Constantine, together with Gaul and Britain, was a general administration of the Prætorio Gallia, one of whose three viths: government of Spain, and usually Hispalia. At the same time, the country was divided into seven provinces: Bætica, Gallacia, Tarraconensis, Carthaginiensis, and Mauritania Tingitana in which was then reckoned part of Spain). Six of these seven provinces were re-Hispalis, Augusta Emerita, Bracara, Lusitania, Carthago Nova, Palma, and Tinissenda. In 409 the Vandals and Suevi, together with other barbarians, invaded Spain, and in possession of the greater part of it. In 414 the Visigoths, as allies of the empire, attacked the Vandals, and in 418 years (414-418) compelled a part of the peninsula to submit again to them. In 429 the Vandals left Spain, and moved over into Africa under their king after which time the Suevi established a kingdom in the south of the peninsula. Afterward the Visigoths again invaded, and after many years' struggle, in conquering the whole peninsula, kept for themselves, and continued to rule the country for two centuries, until in their turn conquered by the Moors in 712.

Hispellæ, Atis: Hispellensis: a town in Umbria, and a Roman name for the name of Colonia Julia Hispellensium.

VID. HISTIAEUS.

(Histiæus), tyrant of Miletus, was one of the Ionians to guard the bridge over the Danube when Darius invaded Persia (C. 513). He opposed the proposal of the Athenians to destroy the bridge, and the Persians to their fate, and was, in consequence, rewarded by Darius with the title of king, and with a district in Thrace, which he called Myrcinus, appearing a view of establishing an independent kingdom. This excited the suspicions of Darius, who invited Histæus to Susa, where he was kindly, but prohibited him from revealing of the restraint in which he was induced his kinsman Aristagoras the Ionians to revolt, hoping that a revolt in Ionia might lead to his release. He succeeded. Darius allowed Histæus (496) on his engaging to reduce the revolt, however, was nearly put to death. Histæus reached the coast. Here he threw off the mask, and, after raising a revolt, carried on war against the Persians for years, and obtained possession of the country. In 494 he made a descent upon the coast, but was defeated and taken prisoner by Harpagus. Artaphernes, the eunuch of Ionia, caused him to be put to death by impalement, and sent his head to the king.

Histonium (Histonienis: now Vasto d'Assione), a town of the Freuntani on the coast, and subsequently a Roman colony.

Homaziræ (Ouppirai), a people of Arabia Felix, who migrated from the interior to the southern part of the western coast, and established themselves in the territory of the Sabæi (in El Yemen), where they founded a kingdom, which lasted more than five centuries.

Hómērus (Ὅμηρος), 1. The great epic poet of Greece. His poems formed the basis of Greek literature. Every Greek who had received a liberal education was perfectly well acquainted with them from his childhood, and had learned them by heart at school; but nobody could state any thing certain about their author. His date and birth-place were equally matters of dispute. Seven cities claimed Homer as their countryman (Smyrna, Rhodus, Corophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athens); but the claims of Smyrna and Chios are the most plausible, and between these two we have to decide. It is supposed by the best modern writers that Homer was an Ionian, who settled at Smyrna at the time when the Achæans and Æolians formed the chief part of the population. We can thus explain how Homer became so well acquainted with the traditions of the Trojan war, which had been waged by Achæans and Æolians, but in which the Ionians had not taken part. We know that the Ionians were subsequently driven out of Smyrna; and it is further supposed either that Homer himself fled to Chios, or his descendants or disciples settled there, and formed the famous family of Homerids. According to this account, the time of Homer would be a few generations after the Ionian migration; but, with the exception of the simple fact of his being an Asiatic Greek, all other particulars respecting his life are purely fabulous. The common tradition related that he was the son of Mæon (hence called Mæonides), and that in his old age he was blind and poor. Homer was universally regarded by the ancients as the author of the two great poems of the Iliad and the Odyssey. Other poems were also attributed to Homer, the genuineness of which was disputed by some; but the Iliad and Odyssey were ascribed to him by the concurrent voice of antiquity. Such continued to be the prevalent belief in modern times, till 1795, when F. A. Wolf wrote his famous Prolegomena, in which he endeavored to show that the Iliad and Odyssey were not two complete poems, but small, separate, independent epic songs, celebrating single exploits of the heroes, and that these lays were for the first time written down and united, as the Iliad and Odyssey, by Pisistratus, the tyrant of Athens. This opinion gave rise to a long and animated controversy respecting the origin of the Homeric poems, which is not yet settled, and which probably never will be. The following, however, may be regarded as the most probable conclusion. An abundance of heroic lays preserved the tales of the Trojan war. Europe must necessarily have been the country where these songs originated, both because the victorious heroes dwell in Europe.

and received from his father in the 15th year, while his elder brother obtained the kingdom of the East. During the minority of Honorius, the government was entirely in the hands of the able and energetic Stilicho, and his daughter Maria, the young emperor's sister, defended Italy against the ravages of other barbarians under Alaric (402), and took and plundered Rome; but after Honorius had put to death on a charge of treason (408), Alaric again invaded Italy, and took and plundered Rome. Honorius meantime lived an inglorious life in Ravenna, where he continued to reside till in 423.

(Ἥραι) originally the goddesses of the nature and of the seasons, but in later times goddesses of order in general and of law. In Homer, who neither mentions their names nor their number, they are the Olympian goddesses of the weather and the ministers of Zeus. In this capacity they guard the Olympus, and promote the fertility of the earth by the various kinds of weather which they send to mortals. As the weather, generating, is regulated according to the seasons, they are further described as the goddesses of the seasons. The course of the seasons is frequently described as the dance of the Muses. At Athens, two Horæ, Thallo (the Hora of Spring) and Carpō (the Hora of autumn), were worshipped from very early times. The Horæ accompanied Proserpina (Persephone) on her ascent from the lower world; an expression of "The chamber of the Muses" is equivalent to "The spring of the Muses." The attributes of spring—flowers, and graceful freshness—are ascribed to the Horæ. Thus they adorn Aphrodite as she rose from the sea, and bear a resemblance to and are met with the Charites, and both are founded or identified. As they were to promote the prosperity of every growth, they appear also as the protectors of youth and newly-born gods. Even the ethical notions were attached to them, and the influence which these god-nymphs exercised on nature was sub-transferred to human life in particular. Ovid describes them as giving to a state justice, and peace; he calls them daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and names the significant names of Eunoia and Irene. The number of the Horæ is three in the different writers, though the number seems to have been two, as but afterward their common number like that of the Moræ and Charites. Part of the Horæ were represented as sisters, carrying the different products of the seasons.

(Ἡρακλῆς), the name prefixed to the work on hieroglyphics, which purports to be a Greek translation, made by one of the priests of the Egyptian temple at Hermopolis, and probably lived about the middle of the fifth century. The best edition is by J. J. G. Leclercq, Amsterdam, 1835.

arches at Rome. Three brothers of this race fled with the Curiatii, three brothers from Alba, to determine whether Rome or Alba was to exercise the supremacy. The battle was long undecided. Two of the Horatii fell, but the three Curiatii, though alive, were severely wounded. Seeing this, the surviving Horatius, who was still unbent, pretended to fly, and vanquished his wounded opponents by encountering them severally. He returned in triumph, bearing his threefold spoils. As he approached the Capene gate, his sister Horatia met him, and recognized on his shoulders the mantle of one of the Curiatii, her betrothed lover. Her importunate grief drew on her the wrath of Horatius, who stabbed her, exclaiming, "So perish every Roman woman who bewails a foe." For this murder he was adjudged by the duumviri to be scourged with covered head, and hanged on the accursed tree. Horatius appealed to his peers, the burghers or populus; and his father pronounced him guiltless, or he would have punished him by the paternal power. The populus acquitted Horatius, but prescribed a form of punishment. With veiled head, led by his father, Horatius passed under a yoke or gibbet—signum sororis, "sister's gibbet."

HORATIUS COCLES. Vid. COCLES.

HORATIUS FLACVUS, Q., the poet, was born December 8th, B.C. 65, at Venusia in Apulia. His father was a libertinus or freedman. He had received his manumission before the birth of the poet, who was of ingenuous birth, but who did not altogether escape the taunt, which adhered to persons even of remote servile origin. His father's occupation was that of collector (coactor), either of the indirect taxes farmed by the publicans, or at sales by auction. With the profits of his office he had purchased a small farm in the neighborhood of Venusia, where the poet was born. The father, either in his parental fondness for his only son, or discerning some hopeful promise in the boy, determined to devote his whole time and fortune to the education of the future poet. Though by no means rich, he declined to send the young Horace to the common school, kept in Venusia by one Flavius, to which the children of the rural aristocracy resorted. Probably about his twelfth year, his father carried him to Rome, to receive the usual education of a knight's or senator's son. He frequented the best schools in the capital. One of these was kept by Orbilius, a retired military man, whose flogging propensities have been immortalized by his pupil (Epist., ii., 1, 71). The names of his other teachers are not recorded by the poet. He was instructed in the Greek and Latin languages: the poets were the usual school books, Homer in the Greek, and the old tragic writer, Livius Andronicus, in the Latin. In his eighteenth year Horace proceeded to Athens, in order to continue his studies at that seat of learning. He seems chiefly to have attached himself to the opinions which he heard in the Academy, though later in life he inclined to those of Epicurus. When Brutus came to Athens after the death of Cæsar, Horace joined his army, and received at once the rank of a military tribune and the command of a legion. He was present at the battle of Philippi, and shared in the flight.

of the republican army. In one of his poems he playfully alludes to his flight, and throwing away his shield. (Carm., ii, 7, 9.) He now resolved to devote himself to more peaceful pursuits, and, having obtained his pardon, he ventured at once to return to Rome. He had lost all his hopes in life; his paternal estate had been swept away in the general forfeiture; but he was enabled, however, to obtain sufficient money to purchase a clerkship in the quaestor's office; and on the profits of that place he managed to live with the utmost frugality. Meantime some of his poems attracted the notice of Varius and Virgil, who introduced him to Mæcenas (B.C. 89). Horace soon became the friend of Mæcenas, and his friendship quickly ripened into intimacy. In a year or two after the commencement of their friendship (87), Horace accompanied his patron on that journey to Brundisium, so agreeably described in the fifth satire of the first book. About the year 84 Mæcenas bestowed upon the poet a Sabine farm, sufficient to maintain him in ease, comfort, and even in content (satis beatus unicus Sabina), during the rest of his life. The situation of this Sabine farm was in the valley of Ustica, within view of the mountain Lucretilla, and near the Digentia, about fifteen miles from Tibur (now Tivoli). A site exactly answering to the villa of Horace, and on which were found ruins of buildings, has been discovered in modern times. Besides this estate, his admiration of the beautiful scenery in the neighborhood of Tibur inclined him either to hire or to purchase a small cottage in that romantic town; and all the later years of his life were passed between these two country residences and Rome. He continued to live on the most intimate terms with Mæcenas, and this intimate friendship naturally introduced Horace to the notice of the other great men of his period, and at length to Augustus himself, who bestowed upon the poet substantial marks of his favor. Horace died on November 17th, B.C. 8, aged nearly fifty-seven. His death was so sudden that he had not time to make his will, but he left the administration of his affairs to Augustus, whom he instituted as his heir. He was buried on the slope of the Esquiline Hill, close to his friend and patron Mæcenas, who had died before him in the same year. Horace has described his own person. He was of short stature, with dark eyes and dark hair, but early tinged with gray. In his youth he was tolerably robust, but suffered from a complaint in his eyes. In more advanced life he grew fat, and Augustus jests about his protuberant belly. His health was not always good, and he seems to have inclined to be a valetudinarian. When young he was irascible in temper, but easily placable. In dress he was rather careless. His habits, even after he became richer, were generally frugal and abstemious; though on occasions, both in youth and maturer age, he seems to have indulged in conviviality. He liked choice wine, and in the society of friends scrupled not to enjoy the luxuries of his time. He was never married. The philosophy of Horace was that of a man of the world. He playfully alludes to his Epicureanism, but it was practical rather than speculative Epicureanism. His mind, indeed, was not in the least speculative. Common-life wisdom was his study, and to this he brought a quickness of observation and a sterling common sense, which have made his works the delight of practical men. The Odes of Horace want the higher inspirations of lyric verse. His amatory verses are exquisitely graceful, but they have no strong ardor, no deep tenderness, nor even much of light and joyous gaiety. But as works of refined art, of the most skillful felicities of language and of measure, of translucent expression, and of agreeable images, embodied in words which imprint themselves indelibly on the memory, they are unrivalled. According to Quintilian, Horace was almost the only Roman lyric poet worth reading. In the Satires of Horace there is one of the lofty moral indignation, the fierce vehemence of invective which characterized the later satirists. It is the folly rather than the wickedness of vice which he touches with such playful skill. Nothing can surpass the keenness of his observation, or his ease of expression; it is the finest comedy of manners, in a descriptive instead of a dramatic form. In the Epodes there is bitterness provoked, it should seem, by some personal hatred or sense of injury, and the ambition of imitating Archilochus; but in these he seems to have exhausted all the malignity and violence of his temper. But the Epistles are the most perfect of the Horatian poetry, the poetry of manners and society, the beauty of which consists in a kind of ideality of common sense and practical wisdom. The Epistles of Horace are, with the Poem of Lucretius, the Georgics of Virgil, and perhaps the Satires of Juvenal, the most perfect and most original form of Roman verse. The title of the Art of Poetry for the Epistle to the Pisos is as old as Quintilian, but it is now agreed that it was not intended for a complete theory of the poetic art. It is conjectured with great probability that it was intended to dissuade one of the younger Pisos from devoting himself to poetry, for which he had little genius, or at least to suggest the difficulties of attaining to perfection. The chronology of the Horatian poems is of great importance, as illustrating the life, the times, and the writings of the poet. There has been great dispute upon the subject, but the following view appears the most probable: The first book of Satires, which was the first publication, appeared about B.C. 85, in the thirty-fifth year of Horace. The second book of Satires was published about 83, in the thirty-second year of Horace. The Epodes appeared about 81, in the thirty-fourth year of Horace. The first three books of the Odes were published about 84 or 83, in the forty-first or forty-second year of Horace. The first book of the Epistles was published about 80 or 79, in the forty-fifth or forty-sixth year of Horace. The Carmen Seculare appeared in 17, in the forty-eighth year of Horace. The fourth book of the Odes was published in 14 or 13, in his fifty-first or fifty-second year. The dates of the second book of Epistles, and of the Ars Poetica, are admitted to be uncertain, though both appeared before the poet's death, B.C. 8. One of the best editions of Horace is by Orelli, Turin, 1848.

UCLA. 1. Sister of the celebrated orator, married to M. Valerius Messala, daughter of the orator Hortensius. She of her father's eloquence, and spoke as a triumvir on behalf of the wealthy when these were threatened with a tax to defray the expenses of the war with Cassina.]

UCLA. 1. Q., the orator, was born in eight years before Cicero. At the age of nineteen he spoke with great aptitude in the forum, and at once rose to eminence as an advocate. He served two campaigns in the civil war (90, 89). In the civil wars Sulla, and was afterward a constant ally of the aristocratical party. His chief labors were in defending men of high rank when accused of mal-administration in their provinces, or of bribery in canvassing for public honors. He was rival in the forum till he encountered Cicero, who long exercised an undisputed mastery in the courts of justice. In 81 he was consul; in 79, prætor; and in 69, Q. Cæcilius Metellus. It was in the consulship that the prosecution commenced. Hortensius was the adversary, and attempted to put off the case till the next year, when he would be able to all the consular authority in favor of his client. But Cicero, who accused Verres, the schemes of Hortensius; and the contest was to dethrone Hortensius from his seat which had been already tottering to establish his rival, the despised Arpinian, as the first orator and the Roman forum. After his consulship took a leading part in supplanting against the rising power of Cicero.

He opposed the Gabinian law, which gave Pompey with absolute power in the East, in order to put down the pirates (67); and the Manilian, by which the conduct of the war against Mithridates was transferred from Lucullus to Pompey. In his consulship (68) deserted the party, with whom he had hitherto been one of the supporters of the party. Thus Hortensius no longer appears.

We first find them pleading together for L. Mummius, and for the coalition of Pompey with Crassus in 60, Hortensius drew back, and confined himself to his advocacy. He died in 60. The eloquence of his was of the florid or (as it was called) stylis, fitter for hearing than for reading.

His voice was soft and musical, so ready and retentive that he has been able to come out of a sale at the auction-list backward. His style elaborate, so that sneers call it stylis—the name of a well-known day; and the pains he bestowed on the folds of his toga have been recorded by ancient writers. But in all this there must have been a real grace and dignity, for we read that Æsopus and Roscius, the tragedians, used to follow him into the forum to take a lesson in their own art. He possessed immense wealth, and was keenly alive to all the enjoyments which wealth can give. He had several villas, the most splendid of which was the one near Laurentum. Here he laid up such a stock of wine, that he left ten thousand casks of Chian to his heir. Here he had a park full of all sorts of animals; and it was customary, during his sumptuous dinners, for a slave, dressed like Orpheus, to issue from the woods with these creatures following the sound of his cithara. At his villa at Bauli he had immense fish-ponds, into which the sea came: the fish were so tame that they would feed from his hand; and he was so fond of them that he is said to have wept for the death of a favorite muræna. He was also very curious in trees: he is said to have fed them with wine, and we read that he once begged Cicero to change places in speaking, that he might perform this office for a favorite plane-tree at the proper time. It is a characteristic trait, that he came forward from his retirement (55) to oppose the sumptuary law of Pompey and Crassus, and spoke so eloquently and witily as to procure its rejection. He was the first person at Rome who brought peacocks to table.—2. Q., surnamed HORTALUS, son of the preceding, by Lutatia, the daughter of Catulus. In youth he lived a low and profligate life, and appears to have been at last cast off by his father. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Cæsar, and fought on his side in Italy and Greece. In 44 he held the province of Macedonia, and Brutus was to succeed him. After Cæsar's assassination, M. Antony gave the province to his brother Caius. Brutus, however, had already taken possession, with the assistance of Hortensius. When the proscription took place, Hortensius was in the list; and, in revenge, he ordered C. Antonius, who had been taken prisoner, to be put to death. After the battle of Philippi, he was executed on the grave of his victim.

HORTUS ('Ἄρτος), the Egyptian god of the sun, whose worship was also established in Greece, and afterward at Rome. He was compared with the Greek Apollo, and identified with Harpocrates, the last-born and weakly son of Osiris. Both were represented as youths, and with the same attributes and symbols. He was believed to have been born with his finger on his mouth, as indicative of secrecy and mystery. In the earlier period of his worship at Rome he seems to have been particularly regarded as the god of quiet life and silence.

HOSTIA, the author of a poem on the Istrian war (B.C. 178), which is quoted by the grammarians. He was probably a contemporary of Julius Cæsar.

HUNNERIC, king of the Vandals in Africa, A.D. 477-484, was the son of Genseric, whom he succeeded. His reign was chiefly marked by his savage persecution of the Catholics.

HUNNI (Οὐννοι), an Asiatic race, who dwelt for some centuries in the plains of Tartary, and were formidable to the Chinese empire long before they were known to the Romans. It was to repel the inroads of the Huns that the Chinese built their celebrated wall, one thousand five hundred miles in length. A portion of the nation afterward migrated west, conquered the Alani, a warlike race between the Volga and the Tanais, and then crossed into Europe about A.D. 375. The appearance of these new barbarians excited the greatest terror both among the Romans and Germans. They are described by the Greek and Roman historians as hideous and repulsive beings, resembling apes, with broad shoulders, flat noses, and small black eyes deeply buried in their head, while their manners and habits were savage to the last degree. They destroyed the powerful monarchy of the Ostrogoths, who were obliged to retire before them, and were allowed by Valens to settle in Thrace, A.D. 376. The Huns now frequently ravaged the Roman dominions. They were joined by many other barbarian nations, and under their king Attila (A.D. 434-453) they devastated the fairest portions of the empire, both in the east and the west. Vid. ATTILA. On the death of Attila, the various nations which composed his army dispersed, and his sons were unable to resist the arms of the Ostrogoths. In a few years after the death of Attila, the empire of the Huns was completely destroyed. The remains of the nation became incorporated with other barbarians, and never appear again as a separate people.

HYACINTHUS (Ύακινθος). 1. Son of the Spartan king Amyclas and Diomedes, or of Pierus and Clio, or of Ebalus or Eurotas. He was a youth of extraordinary beauty, and was beloved by Apollo and Zephyrus. He returned the love of Apollo; and as he was once playing at quoit with the god, Zephyrus, out of jealousy, drove the quoit of Apollo with such violence against the head of the youth that he fell down dead. From the blood of Hyacinthus there sprang the flower of the same name (hyacinth), on the leaves of which appeared the exclamation of woe AI, AI, or the letter T, being the initial of Ύακινθος. According to other traditions, the hyacinth sprang from the blood of Ajax. Hyacinthus was worshipped at Amyclas as a hero, and a great festival, Hyacinthia, was celebrated in his honor. Vid. Dict. of Antiq., v.—3. A Lacedæmonian, who is said to have gone to Athens, and to have sacrificed his daughters for the purpose of delivering the city from a famine and plague, under which it was suffering during the war with Minos. His daughters were known in the Attic legends by the name of the Hyacinthides, which they derived from their father. Some traditions make them the daughters of Erechtheus, and relate that they received their name from the village of Hyacinthus, where they were sacrificed at the time when Athens was attacked by the Eleusinians and Thracians, or Thebans.

HYADES (Ύάδες), that is, the Rainy, the name of nymphs, whose parentage, number, and names are described in various ways by the ancients.

Their parents were Atlas and Æthra, or Atis and Pleione, or Hyas and Bœotia: others as their father Oceanus, Melisseus, Cadmæus, or Erechtheus. Their number differs in various legends; but their most common number is seven, as they appear in the constellation which bears their name, viz. Ambrosia, Rudra, Pole, Coronis, Polyza, Phyto, and Thyena or Dia. They were entrusted by Jupiter (Zeus) with the care of his infant son Bacchus (Dionysus), and were afterward placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars. The story which made them the daughters of Atlas relates that their number was twelve or fifteen, and that at first five of them were placed among the stars as Hyades and the seven (or ten) others afterward with the name of Pleiades, to reward them for the sisterly love they had evinced after the death of their brother Hyas, who had been killed by a wild beast. Their name, Hyades, derived by the ancients from their father, Hyas or from Hyes, a myotic surname of Bacchus (Dionysus); or, according to others, from the position in the heavens, where they formed a figure resembling the Greek letter T. The Hyades, who derived it from tyr, a pig, translated the name by Sucula. The most natural derivation is from teiv, to rain, as the constellation of the Hyades, when rising simultaneously with the sun, announced rainy weather. Hence Bacchus speaks of the tristes Hyades (Carm., i. 2, 1).

HYAMPOLIS (Ύαμπολις: Ύαμπολίτης), a town in Phocis, east of the Cephissus, near Cleus was founded by the Hyantes when they were driven out of Bœotia by the Cadmeans; it was destroyed by Xerxes; afterward rebuilt; and again destroyed by Philip and the Amphictyons. Cleonus, from its vicinity to Hyampolis, is called by Xenophon (Hell., vi. 4, § 2) Ύαμπολις τὸ κρείσσειον. Strabo speaks of two towns the name of Hyampolis in Phocis, but is doubtful whether his statement is correct.

HYANTES (Ύαντες), the ancient inhabitants of Bœotia, from which country they were expelled by the Cadmeans. Part of the Hyantes migrated to Phocis (vid. HYAMPOLIS), and part to Ætolia. The poets use the adjective Hyantes as equivalent to Bœotian.

HYAS (Ύας), the name of the father and brother of the Hyades. The father was married to Bœotia, and was looked upon as the ancestor of the ancient Hyantes. His son, the brother of the Hyades, was killed in Libya by a serpent, or a lion.

HYBLA (Ύβλα: Ύβλαιος, Hyblensis), the towns in Sicily. 1. Megara (ἡ μέγιστη or μέγιστη) on the southern slope of Mount Ætna and the River Symæthus, was originally a town of the Siculi.—2. Minora (ἡ μικρά), afterward called Megara. Vid. MEGARA.—3. Hybla, in south of the island, on the road from Syracuse to Agrigentum. It is doubtful from which of these three places the Hyblæan honey came frequently mentioned by the poets.

sacred orator, contemporary with the triumvir Antonius.

[HYRIAS (Ἰρίας), an ancient lyric poet of Crete, author of a celebrated eclogon, which has been preserved in Athenæus: edited by Graefschek, Mulhouse, 1884.]

HYROLIA (ἡ Ὑκρά: Ὑκακτός: now Muro di Carini), a town of the Sicani on the northern coast of Sicily, west of Panormus, said to have derived its name from the sea-fish ὕκκα. It was taken by the Athenians, and plundered, and its inhabitants sold as slaves, B.C. 415. Among the captives was the beautiful Timandra, the mistress of Alcibiades and the mother of Lais.

HYDARNES (Ὑδάρνης). 1. One of the seven Persians who conspired against the Magi in B.C. 521.—2. Son of the foregoing, leader of the select body in the army of Xerxes called the Immortals.

HYDASPES (Ὑδάσις: now Jelum), the northernmost of the five great tributaries of the Indus, which, with the Indus itself, water the great plain of Northern India, which is bounded on the north by the Himalaya range, and which is now called the Punjab, i. e., five rivers. The Hydaspes falls into the Acesines (now Chenab), which also receives, from the south, first the Hydraotes (now Ravee), and then the Hyphasis (now Beas, and lower down, Gharra), which has previously received, on the southern side, the Hindius or Zaradrus (now Sutlej or Hemud); and the Acesines itself falls into the Indus. These five rivers all rise on the southwestern side of the Emodi Mountains (now Himalays), except the Sutlej, which, like the Indus, rises on the northeastern side of the range. They became known to the Greeks by Alexander's campaign in India: his great victory over Porus (B.C. 327) was gained on the left side of the Hydaspes, near, or perhaps upon, the scene of the recent battle of Chillianwallah; and the Hyphasis formed the limit of his progress. The epithet "fabulous," which Horace applies to the Hydaspes (Carm., i. 22, 7), refers to the marvellous stories current among the Romans, who knew next to nothing about India; and the "Medus Hydaspes" of Virgil (Georg., ii. 21) is merely an example of the vagueness with which the Roman writers, especially the poets, refer to the countries beyond the eastern limit of the empire.

HYRASIOTES (Ὑρασίωνες, Strab. Ὑάσις: now Ravee), a river of India, falling into the Acesines. Vid. HYDASPES.

HYREA (Ὑρέα: Ὑδραῖος: now Hydra), a small island in the gulf of Hermione off Argolis, of no importance in antiquity, but the inhabitants of which in modern times played a distinguished part in the war of Greek independence, and are some of the best sailors in Greece.

HYRUNTUM or HYRANTS (Ὑδρόν: Hydruntini: now Otranto), one of the most ancient towns of Calabria, situated on the southeastern coast, with a good harbor, and near a mountain Hydra, was in later times a municipium. Persons frequently crossed over to Epirus from this port.

HYTTUS (Ὑττός: Ὑττιος), a small town in Boeotia, on the Lake Copais, and near the frontiers of Locria.

HYGEIA (Ὑγίεια), also called HYGEA or HYGIA, the goddess of health, and a daughter of Æsculapius, though some traditions make her the wife of the latter. She was usually worshipped in the temples of Æsculapius, as at Argos, where the two divinities had a celebrated sanctuary, at Athens, at Corinth, &c. At Rome there was a statue of her in the temple of Cordia. In works of art she is represented as a virgin dressed in a long robe, and feeding a serpent from a cup. Although she was originally the goddess of physical health, she is sometimes conceived as the giver or protectress of mental health; that is, she appears as ὑγίεια φρονέων (Æschyl., Eum., 522), and was thus identified with Minerva (Athena), surnamed Hygiea.

HYGIUS. 1. C. JULIUS, a Roman grammarian, was a native of Spain, and lived at Rome in the time of Augustus, whose freedman he was. He wrote several works, all of which have perished.—2. HYGIUS GRAMMATICUS, so called from gramma, an instrument used by the Agrimensores. He lived in the time of Trajan, and wrote works on land surveying and cartography, of which considerable fragments are extant.—3. HYGIUS, the author of two extant works: 1. Fabularum Liber, a series of short mythological legends, with an introductory genealogy of divinities. Although the larger portion of these narratives has been copied from obvious sources, they occasionally present the tales under new forms or with new circumstances. 2. Poeticon Astronomicum Libri IV. We know nothing of the author of these two works. He is sometimes identified with C. JULIUS HYGINUS, the freedman of Augustus, but he must have lived at a much later period. Both works are included in the Mythographi Latini of Muncker, Amst. 1681, and of Van Staveren, Lugd. Bat. 1742.

HYLEA (Ὕλαια, Herod.), a district in Scythia, covered with wood, in the peninsula adjacent to Taurica on the northwest, between the rivers Borysthenes and Hypæcyrus.

HYLEUS (Ὕλαιος), that is, the Woodman, the name of an Arcadian centaur, who was slain by Atalanta when he pursued her. According to some legends, Hylæus fell in the battle against the Lapithæ, and others, again, said that he was one of the centaurs slain by Heracles.

HYLAS (Ὕλας), son of Theodamas, king of the Dryopes, by the nymph Menodice; or, according to others, son of Hercules, Euphemus, or Ceyx. He was beloved by Heracles, whom he accompanied in the expedition of the Argonautæ. On the coast of Mysia, Hylas went on shore to draw water from a fountain; but his beauty excited the love of the Naiads, who drew him down into the water, and he was never seen again. Heracles endeavored in vain to find him; and when he shouted out to the youth, the voice of Hylas was heard from the bottom of the well only like a faint echo, whence some say that he was actually metamorphosed into an echo. While Heracles was engaged in seeking his favorite, the Argonautæ sailed away leaving him and his companion, Polyphemus, behind.—[2. A famous automime at Rome, in the time of Augustus, pupil of Pylades, acquired great reputation as well as wealth.]

HYLE (Ἦλη, also Ἦλαι), a small town in Boeotia, situated on the HYLION, which was called after this town, and into which the River Ismaeus flows.

[HYLEUS (Ἦλεύς), a Greek hero engaged in the hunt of the Calydonian boar, by which he was killed.]

HYLIAS, a river in Brutium, separating the territories of Sybaris and Croton.

HYLICE (ἡ Ἰλυκή λίμνη: now Lake of Livadhi or Sensina), a lake in Boeotia, south of the Lake Copais. Vid. HYLE.

HYLICUS (Ἰλικός, Ἰλλικός), a small river in Argolis, near Trœzen.

HYLLON (Ἰλλός), son of Hercules by Deianira. For details, vid. HEACLIDÆ.

HYLLUS (Ἰλλός: now Demirji), a river of Lydia, falling into the Hermus on its northern side.

HYMEN or HYMENÆUS (Ἥμην or Ἥμεναίος), the god of marriage, was conceived as a handsome youth, and invoked in the hymeneal or bridal song. The names originally designated the bridal song itself, which was subsequently personified. He is described as the son of Apollo and a Muse, either Calliope, Urania, or Terpsichore. Others describe him only as the favorite of Apollo or Thamyris, and call him a son of Magnes and Calliope, or of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Venus (Aphrodite). The ancient traditions, instead of regarding the god as a personification of the hymeneal song, speak of him as originally a mortal, respecting whom various legends were related. The Attic legends described him as a youth of such delicate beauty that he might be taken for a girl. He fell in love with a maiden, who refused to listen to him; but, in the disguise of a girl, he followed her to Eleusis to the festival of Ceres (Demeter). The maidens, together with Hymenæus, were carried off by robbers into a distant and desolate country. On their landing, the robbers laid down to sleep, and were killed by Hymenæus, who now returned to Athens, requesting the citizens to give him his beloved in marriage if he restored to them the maidens who had been carried off by the robbers. His request was granted, and his marriage was extremely happy. For this reason he was invoked in the hymeneal songs. According to others, he was a youth who was killed by the fall of his house on his wedding-day, whence he was afterward invoked in bridal songs, in order to be propitiated. Some related that at the wedding of Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ariadne he sang the bridal hymn, but lost his voice. He is represented in works of art as a youth, but taller and with a more serious expression than Eros, and carrying in his hand a bridal torch.

HYMETTUS (Ἥμηττός), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble (Hymettia trabes, Hor., Carm., ii., 18, 8), and more especially for its honey. It is about three miles south of Athens, and forms the commencement of the range of mountains which runs south through Attica. It is now called Talovuni, and by the Franks Monte Mallo: the part of the mountain near the promontory Zoster, which was called in ancient times ANHYDRUS (ὁ Ἀνδρός, sc. Ἰμνός), or the Dry Hymettus, is now called Μανωσσί.

HYPAOSIA, HYPAOSIUS, or PACIUS (now Αιπασία), a river in European Sarmatia, which flows through the country of the nomad Scythians, and falls into the Sinus Carcinias in the Euxine Sea.

HYPÆA. Vid. STOICHRADÆ.

HYPÆA (Ἰππαια: now Tarapa), a city of Lydia, on the south slope of Mount Tmolus near the north bank of the Cayster.

HYPÆA (Ἰππῶνα. ἡ Ἰππῶνα: Ἰππῶνα), a town in Triphylian Elis, belonging to the Pætopolis.

HYPÆNUS (now Bog), a river in European Sarmatia, rises, according to Herodotus, in a lake flows parallel to the Borysthenes, has at first sweet, then bitter water, and falls into the Euxine Sea west of the Borysthenes.

HYPÆTA (ἡ Ἰππῶνα, ἡ Ἰππῶνα: Ἰππῶνα, Ἰππῶνα: now Neopatra, Turk. Batçelik), a town of the Ænians in Thessaly, south of the Spercheus, belonged in later times to the Æolian league. The inhabitants of this town were notorious for witchcraft.

HYPERIA (Ἰππῶνα), daughter of Theon, by whom she was instructed in philosophy and mathematica. She soon made such immense progress in these branches of knowledge, that she is said to have presided over the Neoplatonic school of Plotinus at Alexandria, where she expounded the principles of his system to a numerous auditory. She appears to have been most graceful, modest, and beautiful, but nevertheless to have been a victim to sloth and falsehood. She was accused of too much familiarity with Orestes, prefect of Alexandria, and the charge spread among the clergy, who took up the notion that she interrupted the friendship of Orestes with their archbishop, Cyril. In consequence of this, a number of them seized her in the street, and dragged her into one of the churches, where they tore her to pieces, A.D. 415.

HYPERBOLUS (Ἰπέρβολος), an Athenian demagogue in the Peloponnesian war, was of servile origin, and was frequently satirized by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. In order to get rid either of Nicias or Alcibiades, Hyperbolus called for the exercise of the ostracism. But the parties endangered combined to defeat him, and the vote of exile fell on Hyperbolus himself: an application of that dignified punishment by which it was thought to have been so debased that the use of it was never resorted to. Some years afterward he was murdered by the oligarchs at Samos, B.C. 411.

HYPERBŌTES or Ἰπ (Ἰπέρβοται, Ἰπέρβοται), a fabulous people, the earliest mention of whom seems to have been in the sacred legends connected with the worship of Apollo, both at Ithaca and at Delphi. In the earliest Greek conception of the Hyperboreans, as embodied by the poets, they were a blessed people, living beyond the north wind (Ἰπέρβοται, fr. ὑπὲρ and βορρῆ), and therefore not exposed to its cold blasts, in a land of perpetual sunshine, which produced abundant fruits, on which the people lived, abstaining from animal food. In innocence and peace, free from disease, and toil, and care, ignorant of violence and war, they spent a long and happy life in the due and cheerful observance of the worship of Apollo, who visited their country soon after his birth, and spent a whole year among them, dancing and singing, before he returned to Delphi. The poets related further how the sun only rose once a year and set once a year upon the Hyperboreans, whose year was thus divided, at the equinoxes, into a six months' day and a six months' night, and they were therefore said to sow in the morning, to reap at noon, to gather their fruits in the evening, and to store them up at night. Now, too, their natural life lasted one thousand years, but if any of them was satiated with its unbroken enjoyment, he threw himself, crowned and mounted from a sacred rock into the sea. The Delian legends told of offerings sent to Apollo by the Hyperboreans, first by the hands of virgins named Arge and Opis (or Hecastge), and then by Laodice and Hyperochia, escorted by five men called Perpherees; and, lastly, as their messengers did not return, they sent the offerings packed in wheat-straw, and the sacred package was forwarded from people to people till it reached Delos. If these legends are based on any geographical relations at all, the most probable explanation is that which regards them as pointing to regions north of Greece (the north part of Thessaly especially) as the original seat of the worship of Apollo. Naturally enough, as the geographical knowledge of the Greeks extended, they moved back the Hyperboreans further and further into the unknown parts of the earth; and of those who sought to fix their precise locality, some placed them in the extreme west of Europe, near the Pyrenean Mountains and the supposed sources of the Ister; and thus they came to be identified with the Celts; while others placed them in the extreme north of Europe, on the shores of the Hyperborean Oceanus, beyond the fabulous Grypes and Arimæpi, who themselves lived beyond the Scythians. The latter opinion at length prevailed; and then, the religious aspect of the fable being gradually lost sight of, the term Hyperborean came to mean only most northerly, as when Virgil and Horace speak of the "Hyperborean or" and "Hyperborei campi." The fable of the Hyperboreans may probably be regarded as one of the forms in which the tradition of an original period of innocence, happiness, and immortality existed among the nations of the ancient world.

HYPERBOREI MONTES was originally the mythical name of an imaginary range of mountains in the north of the earth (vid. HYPERBOREI), and was afterward applied by the geographers to various chains, as, for example, the Caucasus, the Khipsi Montes, and others.

HYPEREIA (ὑπέρεια). 1. A name of several towns mentioned in Homer, in Thessaly; one near the ancient Hellas, another in the city Phœnæ.—2. The earlier place of residence of the Phœnians, whence they removed to Scharia.]

HYPERIDES (ὑπερίδης; or ὑπερίδης), one of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Glaukippos, and belonged to the Attic demus of Collytus, was a pupil of Plato in philosophy, and of Demosthenes in oratory. He was a friend of Demosthenes, and with him and Lycurgus was at the head of the anti-Macedonian party. He is first mentioned about B.C. 358, when he and his sons equipped two triremes at their own expense in order to serve against Eubœa, and from this time to his death he continued a steadfast friend to the patriotic cause. After the death of Alexander (323), Hyperides took an active part in organizing that confederacy of the Greeks against Antipater which produced the Lamian war. Upon the defeat of the confederates at the battle of Crannon in the following year (322), Hyperides fled to Ægina, where he was slain by the emissaries of Antipater. The number of orations attributed to Hyperides was seventy-seven, but none of them have come down to us. His oratory was graceful and powerful, holding a middle place between that of Lysias and Demosthenes.

HYPERION (ὑπερίων), a Titan, son of Coelus (Uranus) and Terra (Ga), and married to his sister Thia or Euryphassa, by whom he became the father of Helios (Sol), Selene (Luna), and Eos (Aurora). Homer uses the name as a patronymic of Helios, so that it is equivalent to Hyperionion or Hyperionides, and Homer's example is imitated also by other poets. Vid. HELIOS.

HYPERIMACHIA (ὑπεριμάχη). 1. Daughter of Thestius and Eurythemis, wife of Oicles, and mother of Amphiaræus.—2. One of the daughters of Danaus, and wife of Lynceus. Vid. DANAUS, LYNCEUS.

HYPERIDONUS (ὑπερίδωνος, Ep. ὑπερίδωνος). 1. A Trojan warrior slain by Ulysses.—2. Of Oenone, author of a work entitled Κυπριακά.

HYPERIUM, or HYPERIA, or HYPERIUS (ὑπερίον, ὑπερίον, ὑπερίον; now Beas and Gharra), a river of India. Vid. HYDRARES.

HYRUS (ὑρύς), a river and mountain in Bithynia.

HYRUS (ὑρύς), two rivers on the southern coast of Sicily, one between Selinus and Thermae Selinuntium (now Betici), and the other near Agrigentum (now Fiume drago).

HYRATROUS (ὑράτρου). 1. A Trojan warrior son of Dolopion.—2. Son of Hippasus, a Greek, companion of Antilochus, slain by Deiphobus.]

HYRUS (ὑρύς), son of Penelus and Creusa, was king of the Lapiths, and father of Ocyroe.

HYRUS (ὑρύς), of Alexandria, a Greek mathematician, who is usually said to have lived about A.D. 160, but who ought not to be placed earlier than A.D. 580. The only work of his extant is entitled Περὶ τῆς τῶν ζωδίων ἀναφορᾶς published with the Optics of Heliodorus at Paris 1567. He is supposed, however, to have added the fourteenth and fifteenth books to the Elements of Euclid.

HYRUS (ὑρύς), daughter of Thoon, king of Lemnos. When the Lemnian women killed all the men in the island because they had taken some female Thracian slaves to their beds, Hypsipyle saved her father. Vid. THOAS. She then became queen of Lemnos; and when the Argonauts landed there shortly afterward she bore twin sons to Jason, Euneus and Nebrophonus, also called Deiphilus or Thosa. The Lemnian women subsequently discovered that Thosa was alive, whereupon they compelled Hypsipyle to quit the island. On her flight she was taken prisoner by pirates and sold to the Nemean king Lyncus, who intrusted to her care his son Archemorus or Opheltea. Vid. ARCHEMORUS.

HYPSŪS (Ἱψὺς-ὄντας), a town in Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name.

HYRCANIA (Ἱρκανία: Ἱρκάνιος, Hyrcanus: now Mazandaran), a province of the ancient Persian empire, on the southern and southeastern shores of the Caspian or Hyrcanian Sea, and separated by mountains on the west, south, and east from Media, Parthia, and Margiana. Its valleys were very fertile; and it flourished most under the Parthians, whose kings often resided in it during the summer.

HYRCANUM or -IUM MARE. Vid. CASPIUM MARE.

HYRCANUS (Ἱρκανός). 1. JOANNES, prince and high-priest of the Jews, was the son and successor of Simon Maccoabæus, the restorer of the independence of Judæa. He succeeded to his father's power B.C. 135. He was at first engaged in war with Antiochus VII. Sidetes, who invaded Judæa, and laid siege to Jerusalem. In 133 he concluded a peace with Antiochus on the condition of paying an annual tribute. Owing to the civil wars in Syria between the several claimants to the throne, the power of Hyrcanus steadily increased; and at length he took Samaria, and razed it to the ground (109), notwithstanding the army which Antiochus IX. Cyzicenus had sent to the assistance of the city. Hyrcanus died in 106. Although he did not assume the title of king, he may be regarded as the founder of the monarchy of Judæa, which continued in his family till the accession of Herod.—2. High-priest and king of the Jews, was the eldest son of Alexander Jannæus and his wife Alexandra. On the death of Alexander (78) the royal authority devolved upon Alexandra, who appointed Hyrcanus to the high-priesthood. Alexandra reigned nine years; and, upon her death in 69, Hyrcanus succeeded to the sovereignty, but was quickly attacked by his younger brother Aristobulus, who possessed more energy and ambition than Hyrcanus. In the following year (68) Hyrcanus was driven from the throne, and took refuge with Aretas, king of Arabia Petraea. That monarch assembled an army, with which he invaded Judæa in order to restore Hyrcanus. He defeated Aristobulus, and blockaded him in the temple of Jerusalem. Aristobulus, however, gained over by bribes and promises Pompey's lieutenant, M. Scaurus, who had arrived at Damascus, and who now ordered Aretas and Hyrcanus to withdraw from Judæa (64). The next year Pompey himself arrived in Syria: he reversed the decision of Scaurus, carried away Aristobulus as a prisoner to Rome, and reinstated Hyrcanus in the high-priesthood, with the authority, though not the name of royalty. Hyrcanus, however, did not long enjoy his newly-recovered sovereignty in quiet. Alexander, the son of Aristobulus, and subsequently Aristobulus himself, escaped from Rome, and excited dangerous revolts, which were only quelled by the assistance of the Romans. The real government was now in the able hands of Antipater, the father of Herod, who rendered such important services to Cæsar during the Alexandrian war (47) that Cæsar made him procurator of Judæa, leaving to Hyrcanus the title of high-priest. Although Antipater was poisoned by the contrivance of Hyrcanus (43), the latter was a man of such feeble character that he allowed Herod to take vengeance on the murderer of his father, and to succeed to his father's power and influence. The Parthians on their invasion of Syria, carried away Hyrcanus as prisoner (40). He was treated with much liberality by the Parthian king, and allowed to live in perfect freedom at Babylon. Here he remained for some years; but having at length received an invitation from Herod, who had meanwhile established himself on the throne of Judæa, he returned to Jerusalem with the consent of the Parthian king. He was treated with respect by Herod till the battle of Actium, when Herod, fearing lest Augustus might place Hyrcanus on the throne, accused him of a treasonable correspondence with the king of Arabia, and on this pretext put him to death (30).

[HYRCUS (Ἱρϋς: now Donetz), a tributary of the Tanais in Asia.]

HYRIA (Ἱρία: Ἱπύρις, Ἱπύραρι). 1. A town in Boeotia, near Tanagra, was in the earliest times a place of importance, but afterward sunk into insignificance.—2. A town in Apulia. Vid. URLA.

HYRIUS (Ἱπύρις), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Aloyone, king of Hyria in Boeotia, husband of Olonia, and father of Nycteus, Lycus, and Orion. Respecting his treasures, vid. ANACREON.

HYRMINA (Ἱρμίνη), a town in Elis, mentioned by Homer, but of which all trace had disappeared in the time of Strabo. Near it was the promontory Hymnina or Hormina (now Sape Chiarenza).

HYRMINE (Ἱρμίνη), daughter of Neleus or Nycteus, wife of Phorbas, and mother of Actor.

HYRTIUS (Ἱρτανός), a Trojan, to whom Priam gave his first wife Ariaba, when he married Hecuba. Homer makes him the father of Asius, hence called Hyrtacides. In Virgil, Nisus and Hippocoon are also represented as sons of Hyrtæus.

[HYRTIUS (Ἱρτιος), a leader of the Mysians slain in the Trojan war by Ajax, son of Telamon.]

HYRIA (Ἱρία). 1. (Ἱδύρις), a town in Argolis, south of Argos, destroyed by the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war.—2. (Ἱρύρις), a town in Boeotia, east of Platæa, called by Herodotus (v. 74) a demus of Attica, but probably belonging to Platæa.

HYSTASPES (Ἰστιάσης; in Persian, Goshasp, Gustasp, Histaap, or Wistaap). 1. Son of Artabanus, and father of Darius I., was a member of the Persian royal house of the Achemenides. He was probably satrap of Persis under Cambyses, and probably under Cyrus also.—2. Son of Darius I. and Atossa, commanded the Bactrians and Sogdians in the army of his brother Xerxes.

IAOCHUS ('Ιαχος'), the solemn name of Bacchus & the Eleusinian mysteries, whose name was derived from the boisterous song called iacchos. In these mysteries Iacchus was regarded as: the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Ceres (Demeter), and was distinguished from the Theban Bacchus (Dionysus), the son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Semele. In some traditions Iacchus is even called a son of Bacchus, but in others the two are identified. On the sixth day of the Eleusinian festival (the twentieth of Boëdromion), the statue of Iacchus was carried from the temple of Ceres (Demeter) across the Thracian plain to Eleusina, accompanied by a numerous and riotous procession of the initiated, who sang the Iacchos, carried mystic baskets, and danced to the sound of cymbals and trumpets.

IADERA OF IADER ('Iadertinus': now Old Zara), a town on the coast of Illyricum, with a good harbor, and a Roman colony under the name of Colonia Claudia Augusta Felix.

[IADRA ('Ιάδρα). 1. A daughter of Nereus and Doria.—2. A wood nymph, who reared the sons of Alceon, Pandarus and Bitias.]

IADREUS ('Ιάδρευς'), a similar personification to that of Ianus, and hence called a son of Apollo and Calliope, and the inventor of the song Iadreaus, which was a kind of dirge, and is only mentioned as sung on most melancholy occasions.

IADREUS ('Ιάδρευς'), son of Mars (Ares) and Asyoche, and brother of Ascalaphus, was a native of the Boeotian Orchomenos. He was one of the Argonauts and a suitor of Helena. After the destruction of Troy, he wandered about with the Orchomenians, and founded colonies in Colchia.

IALYSUS ('Ιάλυσος': now Ialyso), one of the three very ancient Dorian cities in the island of Rhodes, and one of the six original members of the Dorian Hexapolis (vid. Doris), stood on the northwestern coast of the island, about sixty stadia southwest of Rhodes. It is said to have derived its name from the mythical Ialysus, son of Cerephus, and grandson of Helios.

IAMBÉ ('Ιάμβη'), a Thracian woman, daughter of Pan and Echo, and a slave of Metanira. When Ceres (Demeter), in search of her daughter, arrived in Attica, and visited the house of Metanira, Iambe cheered the mournful goddess by her jokes.

IAMBICUS ('Ιάμβλικος). 1. A Syrian, who lived in the time of the Emperor Trajan, wrote a romance in the Greek language entitled Babylonia. The work itself is lost, but an epitome of it is preserved by Photius.—2. A celebrated Neo-Platonic philosopher, was born at Chalcis in Cele-Syria. He resided in Syria during the greater part of his life, and died in the reign of Constantine the Great, probably before A.D. 337. He was inferior in judgment, and learning to the earlier Neo-Platonists, Plotinus and Porphyry; and he introduced into his system many of the superstitions and mysteries of the East, by means of which he endeavored to check the progress of Christianity. The extant works of Iamblichus are, 1. Ἡεὶ Πυθαγόρου αἰδέσεως, on the philosophy of Pythagoras. It was intended as a preparation for the study of Plato and consisted originally of ten books, of which five only are extant. 2. The first book contains an account of the life of Pythagoras, and though compiled without care, it is yet of value, as the other works, from which it is taken, are lost. Edited by Kuster, Amsterd., 1707; and by Kieseling, Lips., 1816. 3. Περὶ περπετικῶν λόγων εἰς φιλοσοφίαν, forms a sort of introduction to the study of Plato. Edited by Kieseling, Lips., 1818, 8vo. 4. Περὶ κοινῆς μαθηματικῆς ἐπιστήμης, contains many fragments of the works of early Pythagoreans. Edited by Fries, Copenhagen, 1790. 5. Περὶ τῆς Νικομάχου ἀριθμητικῆς εἰσαγωγῆς. Edited by Tennulius, Deventer and Arnheim, 1668. 6. Τὰ θεολογούμενα τῆς ἀριθμητικῆς. Edited by Ast, Lips., 1817.—II. Περὶ ἰωστηρίων, written to prove the divine origin of the Egyptian and Chaldean theology. Edited by Gale, Oxon., 1678. Iamblichus wrote other works which are lost.—3. A later Neo-Platonic philosopher of Apamea, a contemporary of the Emperor Julian and of Libanius.

IAMIDA. Vid. IAMUS.

IAMNIA ('Ιάμνεια': Iamnia: 'Ιάμνη': in Old Testament, Jabneel, Jabneh: now Imneh or Gabneh), a considerable city of Palestine, between Diospolis and Azotus, near the coast, with a good harbor, was taken by King Uzziab from the Philistines. Pompey united it to the province of Syria. After the destruction of Jerusalem it became the seat of the Sanhedrim, and of a celebrated school of Jewish learning.

[IAMPHORINA, a strong place in the territory of the Mædi in Macedonia.]

IAMUS ('Ιάμος'), son of Apollo and Evadne, received the art of prophecy from his father, and was regarded as the ancestor of the famous family of seers, the Iamidæ at Olympia.

IANTHE ('Ιάνθη). 1. Daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and one of the playmates of Proserpina (Persephone).—2. Daughter of Telestes of Crete, beloved by Iphis.

IAPETUS ('Ιαπετός'), one of the Titans, son of Oœlus (Uranus) and Terra (Ge), married Asia or Clymene, the daughter of his brother Oceanus, and became by her the father of Atlas, Prometheus, Epimetheus, and Menœtus. He was imprisoned with Saturn (Cronus) in Tartarus. Being the father of Prometheus, he was regarded by the Greeks as the ancestor of the human race. His descendants, Prometheus, Atlas, and others, are often designated by the patronymics Iapetides (es), Iapetionides (es), and the feminine Iapetionia.

[IAPIS, son of Iasus, beloved by Apollo, and received from him the knowledge of medicine and the prophetic art: he cured Æneas of the wound received by him in the war against Laïnia.]

IAPYDES (Ἰάπυδες or Ἰάπυδες), a warlike and barbarous people in the north of Illyricum, between the Rivers Arsia and Tedanum, were a mixed race, partly Illyrian and partly Celtic, who tattooed their bodies. They were subdued by Augustus. Their country was called IAPYDIA.

IAPYDIA (Ἰάπυγία: Ἰάπυγες), the name given by the Greeks to the south of Apulia, from Tarantum and Brundisium to the PROMONTORIUM IAPYGIUM (now Cape Leuca), though it is sometimes applied to the whole of Apulia. Vid. ARULIA. The name is derived from the mythical Iapyx.

IAPYX (Ἰάπυξ). 1. Son of Lycæon and brother of Daunus and Peucetius, who went as leaders of a colony to Italy. According to others, he was a Cretan, and a brother of Icadius, or a son of Dædalus and a Cretan woman, from whom the Cretans who migrated to Italy derived the name of Iapygia.—2. The west-northwestern wind, blowing off the coast of Iapygia (Apulia), in the south of Italy, and consequently, favorable to persons crossing over to Greece. It was the same as the ἀπύρριος of the Greeks.

IARBA or HIARBA, king of the Gætulians, and son of Jupiter Ammon by a Libyan nymph, sued in vain for the hand of Dido in marriage. For details, vid. DIDO.

IARDANES (Ἰαρδάνης), a king of Lydia, and father of Omphale, who is hence called Jardania.

IARDANUS or IARDANUS (Ἰαρδάνης, Ἰάρδανες). 1. (Now Jordan), a river in Elia.—2. A river in the north of Crete, which flowed near the town Cydonia.

IARION or IARION (Ἰαρίων, Ἰάριος), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Electra, the daughter of Atlas, or son of Corythus and Electra. At the wedding of his sister Harmonia, Ceres (Demeter) fell in love with him, and in a thrice-ploughed field (τρίπλοος) she became by him the mother of Pluton or Plutus in Crete; Jupiter (Zeus), in consequence, killed Iasion with a flash of lightning. Others represent him as living to an advanced age as the husband of Ceres (Demeter). In some traditions Iasion and his brother Dardanus are said to have carried the palladium to Samothrace, and there to have been instructed in the mysteries of Ceres (Demeter) by Jupiter (Zeus). Others relate that Iasion, being inspired by Ceres (Demeter) and Cora (Proserpina), travelled about in Sicily and many other countries, and every where taught the people the mysteries of Ceres (Demeter).

IASIS, f. e., Atalanta, the daughter of Iasion.

IASION (Ἰάσιος). 1. King of Orchomenos, father of Amphion.—2. Vid. IASION.

IASO (Ἰάσω), f. e., Recovery, a daughter of Æsculapius or Amphiaræus, and sister of Hygiea, was worshipped as the goddess of recovery.

IASIUS or IASIUS SINUS (Ἰασικός κόλπος: now Gulf of Mandaliyeh), a large gulf on the western coast of Caria, between the peninsulas of Miletus and Myndus, named after the city of Iasus, and called also Bargyleticus Sinus (Βαργυλιτικὸς κόλπος) from another city which stood upon it, namely, Bargylia.

IASSUS (1. IASSUS (Ἰάσος; Ἰάσος: Ἰάσος: ruin at Asyn-Kaleasi), a city of Caria, on the Iasus Sinus, founded by Argives and further colonized by Milesians.

IASSUS (Ἰάσος). 1. An Arcadian, son of Lycurgus and Cleophile or Buryrnora, brother of Anceus, husband of Clymene, the daughter of Minyas, and father of Atalanta. He is likewise called Iasius and Iasion.—2. Father of Amphion, and king of the Minyas.—[3. Son of Triopa, grandson of Phorbas, brother of Agæor, and father of Io, according to one account, was king of Argos.—4. Son of Sphelus, a leader of the Athenians before Troy, slain by Æneas.]

IASYGES (Ἰάσγες), a powerful Sarmatian people, who originally dwell on the coast of the Pontus Euxinus and the Palus Mæotis, but in the reign of Claudius settled near the Quadi in Dacia, in the country bounded by the Danube, the Theiss, and the Sarmatian Mountains. They are generally called Sarmata Iazyges or simply Sarmata, but Ptolemy gives them the name of Iazyges Metanasta, on account of their migration. The Iazyges were in close alliance with the Quadi, along with whom they frequently attacked the Roman dominions, especially Moesia and Pannonia. In the fifth century they were conquered by the Goths.

ISARIA (Ἰσάρια: southern part of Georgia), a country of Asia, in the centre of the isthmus between the Black and Caspian Seas, was bounded on the north by the Caucasus, on the west by Colchis, on the east by Albania, and on the south by Armenia. It was surrounded on every side by mountains, through which there were only four passes. Sheltered by these mountains and watered by the Cyrus (now Kour) and its upper tributaries, it was famed for a fertility of which its modern name (from Γεωργός) remains a witness. Its inhabitants, ISARANS (Ἰσάρης) or ISARAI, were, and are still, among the most perfect specimens of the Caucasian race. The ancients believed them to be of the same family as the Assyrians and Medes, whom they were thought to resemble in their customs. They were more civilized than their neighbors in Colchis and Albania, and were divided into four castes: 1. The nobles, from whom two kings were chosen; 2. The priests, who were also the magistrates; 3. The soldiers and husbandmen; 4. The slaves, who performed all public and mechanical work. The chief employment of the Iberians was agriculture. The Romans first became acquainted with the country through the expedition of Pompey in B.C. 66; and under Trajan it was subjected to Rome. In the fifth century it was conquered by the Persian king Sapor. No connection can be traced between the Iberians of Asia and those of Spain.

ISERUS (Ἰσῆρος or Ἰσῆρ: now Ebro), the principal river in the northeast of Spain, rises among the mountains of the Cantabri, near Julobriga, flows southeast through a great plain between the Pyrenees and the Mons Idueda, and falls into the Mediterranean near Dertosa, after forming a Delta.

ISYCUS (Ἰσῦκος), a Greek lyric poet, was a native of Rhegium, and spent the best part of his life, at Samos, at the court of Polycrates about B.C. 540. It is related that, travelling through a desert place near Corinth, he was murdered by robbers, but before he died he called upon a flock of cranes that happened to fly over him to avenge his death. Soon afterward, when the people of Corinth were assembled in the theatre, the cranes appeared; and one of the murderers, who happened to be present, cried out involuntarily, "Behold the avengers of Ibycus!" and thus were the authors of the crime detected. The phrase ai Ibykon yipavoi passed into a proverb. The poetry of Ibycus was chiefly erotic, and partook largely of the impetuosity of his character. In his dialect there was a mixture of the Doric and Æolia. In antiquity there were seven books of his lyric poems, of which only a few fragments now remain. [These fragments are collected in Schneidewin's Ibyci Carminum Reliquia, Göttingen, 1833.]

ICĀLIA or ICĀLIUS ('Ikapia, 'Ikapios: 'Ikapieus), a nymph and a demon in Attica, belonging to the tribe Ægeia, where Bacchus (Dionysus) is said to have taught Icarus the cultivation of the vine.

ICĀLIUS ('Ikapios), also called ICĀLUS or ICĀLIUS. 1. An Athenian, who lived in the reign of Pandion, and hospitably received Bacchus (Dionysus) on his arrival in Attica. The god, in return, taught him the cultivation of the vine. Icarus made a present of some wine to peasants, who became intoxicated by it, and thinking that they were poisoned by Icarus, slew him, and threw his body into a well, or buried it under a tree. His daughter Erigone, after a long search, found his grave, to which she was attracted by his faithful dog Mæra. From grief she hung herself on the tree under which he was buried. Jupiter (Zeus) or Bacchus (Dionysus) placed her and Icarus among the stars, making Erigone the Virgin, Icarus Bootes or Arcturus, and Mæra Procyon or the little dog. Hence the latter is called Icarus canis. The god then punished the ungrateful Athenians with madness, in which condition the Athenian maidens hung themselves as Erigone had done. The Athenians propitiated Icarus and Erigone by the institution of the festival of the Æora. Vid. Dict. of Ant., v.—2. A Lacedæmonian, son of Perieres and Gorgophōne, and brother of Tyndareus. Others called him grandson of Perieres, and son of Œbalus. When Icarus and Tyndareus were expelled from Lacedæmon by their half-brother Hippocoön, Icarus went to Acarnania, and there became the father of Penelope, and of several other children. He afterward returned to Lacedæmon. Since there were many suitors for the hand of Penelope, he promised to give her to the hero who should conquer in a foot race. Ulysses won the prize, and was betrothed to Penelope. Icarus tried to persuade his daughter to remain with him, and not accompany Ulysses to Ithaca. Ulysses allowed her to do as she pleased, whereupon she covered her face with her veil to hide her blushes, and thus intimated that she would follow her husband. Icarus then desisted from further entreaties, and erected a statue of Modesty on the spot.

ICĀLUS ('Ikapos), son of Dædalus. Vid. Dædalus.

ICĀLUS or ICĀLIA ('Ikapos, 'Ikapla: now Ni-caria, an island of the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades, west of Samos, called also Dobuhe (δολύχη, i. e. long island). Its common name, and that of the surrounding sea, ICARIUM MARE, were derived from the myth of ICARUS. It was first colonized by the Milesians, but afterward belonged to the Samians, who fed their herds on its rich pastures.

ICICIUS. [1. A noble of Rheims (i. e. allia Belgica), who headed a deputation of his townsmen to Cæsar in B.C. 57, placing their state at Cæsar's disposal, and praying his aid against the other Belgic communities.]—2. A friend of Horace, who addressed him an ode (Carm., i, 29) and an epistle (Ep., i, 12). The ode was written in B.C. 25, when Icius was preparing to join Ælius Gallus in his expedition to Arabia. The epistle was composed about ten years afterward, when Icius had become Vipercianus Agrippa's steward in Sicily. In both poems Horace reprehends pointedly, but delicately, in Icius an inordinate desire for wealth.

ICĒNI, called ΣΙΝΕΝΙ (Sinenoi) by Ptolemy, a numerous and powerful people in Britain, who dwelt north of the Trinobantes, in the modern counties of Suffolk and Norfolk. Their revolt from the Romans, under their heroic queen Boadicea, is celebrated in history. Vid. BOADICEA. Their chief town was VENTA ISENORUM (now Caister) about three miles from Norwich.

ICHNÆ ('Iχνα: 'Iχναος). 1. A town in Bithynia in Macedonia, near the mouth of the Axios.—2. A town in Phthiotis in Thessaly, celebrated for its worship of Themis, who was hence surnamed Ichnæa.

ICHNÆ or ICHNÆ ('Iχνα, 'Iχναος), a Greek city in the north of Mesopotamia, founded by the Macedonians, was the scene of the first battle between Crassus and the Parthians, in which the former gained the victory. According to Appian, the Parthians soon after defeated the Romans near the same spot.

ICHTNÆA ('Iχνοα), the ancient name of Sardinia. Vid. SARDINIA.

ICHTHYOPHAGI ('Iχθυόφαγοι, i. e., Fish-eaters), was a vague descriptive name given by the ancients to various tribes on the coasts of Asia and Africa, of whom they knew but little. Thus we find Ichthyophagi: 1. In the extreme south-east of Asia, in the country of the Sina. 2. On the coast of Gedrosia. 3. On the northeastern coast of Arabia Felix. 4. In Africa, on the coast of the Red Sea, above Egypt. 5. On the western coast of Africa.

ICILIUS. 1. Sp., was one of the three envoys sent by the plebeians, after their succession to the Sacred Mount, to treat with the senate, B.C. 494. He was thrice elected tribune of the plebs, namely, in 493, 481, and 471.—2. L., a man of great energy and eloquence, was tribune of the plebs 456, when he claimed for the tribunes the right of convoking the senate, and also carried the important law for the assignment of the Aventine (de Aventino publicando) to the plebs. In the following year (455) he was again elected tribune. He was one of the chief leaders in the outbreak against the decemvirs, 449. Virginia had been betrothed to him, and he boldly defended her cause before Appius Claudius, and when at length she fell by her father's hand, Icilius hurried to the army which was carrying in war against the Sabines, and prevailed upon them to desert the government.

ICÓNIVM ('Ικόνιον; 'Ικονίτις; now Koniyeh), the capital of Lycaonia, in Asia Minor, was, when visited by St. Paul, a flourishing city, with a mixed population of Jews and Greeks; under the later emperors, a colony; and in the Middle Ages, one of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, and important in the history of the crusades.

ICTINUS ('Ικτινός), a contemporary of Pericles, was the architect of two of the most celebrated of the Greek temples, namely, the great temple of Minerva (Athena) in the acropolis of Athens, called the Parthenon, and the temple of Apollo Epicurius, near Phigalia in Arcadia. Calliocrates was associated with Ictinus in building the Parthenon.

IDA ('Ιδα, Dor. 'Ιδα). 1. (Now Ida or Kas-Dagh), a mountain range of Mysia, in Asia Minor, which formed the southern boundary of the Troad; extending from Lectum Promontorium in the southwest corner of the Troad, eastward along the northern side of the Gulf of Adramyttium, and further east into the centre of Mysia. Its highest summits were Cocythus on the north and Gargara on the south; the latter is about five thousand feet high, and is often capped with snow. Lower down, the slopes of the mountain are well-wooded; and lower still, they form fertile fields and valleys. The sources of the Scamander and the Ææpua, besides other rivers and numerous brooks, are on Ida. The mountain is celebrated in mythology as the scene of the rape of Ganymede, whom Ovid (Fast., ii, 145) calls Idæus puer, and of the judgment of Paris, who is called Idæus Iudex by Ovid (Fast., vi, 44), and Idæus pastor by Cicero (ad Att., ii, 18). In Homer, too, its summit is the place from which the gods watch the battles in the plain of Troy. Ida was also an ancient seat of the worship of Cybele, who obtained from it the name of Idæa Mater.—2. (Now Pailorati), a mountain in the centre of Crete, belonging to the mountain range which runs through the whole length of the island. Mount Ida is said to be seven thousand six hundred and seventy-four feet above the level of the sea. It was closely connected with the worship of Jupiter (Zeus), who is said to have been brought up in a cave in this mountain.

IDÆA MATER. Vid. IDA.

IDÆI DACTYLII. Vid. DACTYLII.

[IDÆUS ('Ιδαίος). 1. A herald of the Trojans.—2. Son of Dares, the priest of Vulcan (Hephaestus), slain by Diomedes.]

IDŌLIVM ('Ιδάλιον), a town in Cyprus, sacred to Venus (Aphrodite), who hence bore the surname Idalia.

IDANTHYRUS ('Ιδανθύρος), a king of the Scythians, under whom they overran Asia, and advanced as far as Egypt.

IDAS ('Ιδας). 1. Son of Aphareus and Arene, the daughter of Cebalus, brother of Lynceus, husband of Marpessa, and father of Cleopatra or Aleyone. From the name of their father, Idas and Lynceus are called Apharetidae or Apharidae. Apollo was in love with Marpessa, the daughter of Evmenus, but Idas carried her off in a winged chariot which Neptune (Poseidon) had given him. Evmenus could not overtake Idas, but Apollo found him in Messene and took the maiden from him. The lovers fought for her possession, but Jupiter (Zeus) separated them and left the decision with Marpessa, who chose Idas, from fear lest Apollo should desert her if she grew old. The Apharetidae also took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. But the most celebrated part of their story is their battle with the Dioscuri, Castor and Pollux, which is related elsewhere (p. 266, b).—[2. One of the guests at the marriage of Perseus, slain by Phineus.—3. One of the companions of Diomedes, changed by Venus (Aphrodite) into a bird.—4. A Trojan warrior, mentioned by Virgil, slain by Turnus in Italy.—5. Two heroes in the Theban war, the one from Onchestus, the other from Tanarus.]

IDISTAVIVS CAMPUS, a plain in Germany near the Weser, probably in the neighborhood of the Porta Westphalia, between Rinteln and Hausberge, memorable for the victory of Germanicus over the Cherusci, A. D. 16.

IDMON ('Ιδμων). 1. Son of Apollo and Asteria, or Cyrene, was a soothsayer, and accompanied the Argonauts, although he knew beforehand that death awaited him. He was killed in the country of the Mariandynians by a boar or a serpent; or, according to others, he died there of a disease.—[2. A Rutulian, sent by Turnus to Æneas to propose to settle the dispute for the hand of Lavinia by single combat between the heroes.]

IDOMENEUS ('Ιδομενεύς). 1. Son of the Cretan Deucalion, and grandson of Minos and Pasiphaë, was king of Crete. He is sometimes called Lycius or Onosius, from the Cretan towns of Lycus and Onosus. He was one of the suitors of Helen; and, in conjunction with Meriones, the son of his half-brother Molus, he led the Cretans in eighty ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and distinguished himself especially in the battle near the ships. According to Homer, Idomeneus returned home in safety after the fall of Troy. Later traditions relate that once in a storm he vowed to sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon) whatever he should first meet on his landing, if the god would grant him a safe return. This was his own son, whom he accordingly sacrificed. As Crete was thereupon visited by a plague, the Cretans expelled Idomeneus. He went to Italy, where he settled in Calabria, and built a temple to Minerva (Athena). From thence he is said to have migrated again to Colophon, on the coast of Asia. His tomb, however, was shown at Cosus, where he and Meriones were worshipped as heroes.—2. Of Lampascus, a friend and disciple of Epicurus, flourished about B.C. 310–270. He wrote several philosophical and historical works, all of which are lost. The latter were chiefly devoted to an account of the private life of the distinguished men of Greece.

IDOMŒA (Ειδомѐα), daughter of Proteus, taught Menelaus how he might secure her father, and compel him to declare in what manner he might reach home in safety.

IDRIEUS or HIRIÆUS ('Ιδριεύς, 'Ιδριεύς) king of Caria, second son of Hecatomnus, succeeded to the throne on the death of Artemius, the widow of his brother Mausolus, in B.C. 351. He died in 344, leaving the kingdom to his sister Ada, whom he had married.

IDUBEDA (now Sierra de Oca and Lorenzo), a range of mountains in Spain, begins among the Cantabri, forms the southern boundary of the plain of the Ebro, and runs southeast to the Mediterranean.

IDUMÆA (Ἰδουμαία), is the Greek form of the scriptural name Edom, but the terms are not precisely equivalent. In the Old Testament, and in the time before the Babylonish captivity of the Jews, Edom is the district of Mount Seir, that is, the mountainous region extending north and south from the Dead Sea to the eastern head of the Red Sea, peopled by the descendants of Esau, and added by David to the Israelitish monarchy. The decline of the kingdom of Judaea, and at last its extinction by Nebuchadnezzar, enabled the Edomites to extend their power to the northwest over the southern part of Judaea as far as Hebron, while their original territory was taken possession of by the Nabathæan Arabs. Thus the Idumæa of the later Jewish and of the Roman history is the southern part of Judaea and a small portion of the north of Arabia Petraea, extending northwest and southeast from the Mediterranean to the western side of Mount Seir. Under the Maccabees, the Idumæans were again subjected to Judaea (B.C. 129), and governed, under them, by prefects (σπαρταγοί), who were very probably descended from the old princes of Edom; but the internal dissensions in the Asmonean family led at last to the establishment of an Idumæan dynasty on the Jewish throne. Vid. Αἰτιολογία, Nos. 3, 4, Ἰδουμαία. The Roman writers of the Augustan age and later use Idumæa and Judaea as equivalent terms. Soon after the destruction of Jerusalem the name of Idumæa disappears from history, and is merged in that of Arabia. Both the old Edomites and the later Idumæans were a commercial people, and carried on a great part of the traffic between the East and the shores of the Mediterranean.

IDIA (Ἰδία), daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and wife of the Colchian king Æetes.

IDRE. Vid. Ἰδρυμνία.

IDRE (Ἰδρεῖς: now Jato), a town in the interior of Sicily, on a mountain of the same name, southwest of Macella.

ἸΔΥΛΛΙ (Ἰδυλλίς: now Jigelli or Jigel), a city of Mauretania Cæsariensis, west of the River Ampsaga, between the rivers Audus and Guba.

IDULIUM (now Giglio), a small island off the Etruscan coast, opposite Cosa.

IGNATIUS (Ἰγνῆτιος), one of the apostolical fathers, was a hearer of the Apostle John, and succeeded Evodius as bishop of Antioch in A.D. 68. He was condemned to death by Trajan at Antioch, and was taken to Rome, where he was thrown to the wild beasts in the amphitheatre. The date of his martyrdom is uncertain. Some place it in 107, but others as late as 116. On his way from Antioch to Rome, Ignatius wrote several epistles in Greek to various churches. There are extant at present fifteen epistles ascribed to Ignatius, but of these only seven are considered to be genuine; and even these seven are much interpolated. The ancient Syriac version of some of these epistles, which has been recently discovered, is free from many of the interpolations found in the present Greek text and was evidently executed when the Greek text was in a state of greater purity than it is at present. The Greek text has been published in the Patres Apostolici by Cotelierus, Amsterdam, 1724, and by Jacobson, Oxon., 1838; and the Syriac version, accompanied with the Greek text, by Cureton, Lond., 1849.

IGUVIUM (Iguvium, Iguvina, ātis: now Gubbio or Eugubio), an important town in Umbria, on the southern slope of the Apennines. On a mountain in the neighborhood of this town was a celebrated temple of Jupiter (Zeus), in the ruins of which were discovered, four centuries ago, seven brazen tables, covered with Umbrian inscriptions, and which are still preserved at Gubbio. These tables, frequently called the Eugubian Tables, contain more than one thousand Umbrian words, and are of great importance for a knowledge of the ancient languages of Italy. They are explained by Grotefend, Rudimenta Linguae Umbriae, &c., Hannov., 1836, seq., and by Lepsius, Inscriptiones, Umbriae et Osci, Lips., 1841.

ILAIAS (Ἰλαίᾱ), daughter of Leucippus and Philodice, and sister of Phoebe. The two sisters are frequently mentioned by the poets under the name of Leucippides. Both were carried off by the Dioscuri, and Ilaira became the wife of Castor.

ILERACONES, ILERACONENSES, or ILLURGAVONENSES, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the western coast, between the Ibærus and Mons Idubeda. Their chief town was DEBORA.

ILERDA (now Lerida), a town of the Illegitæ in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a height above the River Sicoris (now Segre), which was here crossed by a stone bridge. It was afterward a Roman colony, but in the time of Ausonius had ceased to be a place of importance. It was here that Africanus and Petreius, the legates of Pompey, were defeated by Cæsar (B.C. 49).

ILERGETES, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Iberus and the Pyreneæ.

ILIA or RHEA SILVIA. Vid. ROMULUS.

ILICI or ILLICI (now Elche), a town of the Contestanti, on the eastern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Carthago Nova to Valentia, was a colonia immunita. The modern Elche lies at a greater distance from the coast than the ancient town.

ILIENSES, an ancient people in SABDINIA.

ILIONA (Ἰλιόνα), daughter of Priam and Hebe, wife of Polymnestor or Polymestor, king of the Thracian Chersonesus, to whom she bore a son Deipylus. At the beginning of the Trojan war her brother Polydorus was intrusted to her care, and she brought him up as her own son. For details, vid. POLYDORUS. Iliona was the name of one of the tragedies of Pacuvius (Hor., Sat., ii, 3, 61.)

ILIONÆUS (Ἰλιονεύς). 1. A son of Niobe, whom Apollo would have liked to save, because he was praying; but the arrow was no longer under the control of the god. Vid. NIOSÆ.—2. A Trojan son of Phobas, slain in battle by Peneleus.

2. One of the companions of Æneas.—4. A Trojan warrior, slain by Diomedes.]

ILIPA (now Pennafort), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the right bank of the Bætis, which was navigable to this place with small vessels.

[ILIPULA (Ἰλιπούλα). 1. Called MAGNA, a city of Hispania Bætica, between the rivers Anas and Bætis.—2. I. MINOR (now Lepe de Ronda), also in Hispania Bætica, belonging to the district of Astigi.]

ILIUSUS (Ἰλιούσος, more rarely Εἰλιούσος), a small river in Attica, rises on the northern slope of Mount Hymettus, receives the brook Eridanus near the Lyceum, outside the walls of Athens, then flows through the eastern side of Athens, and loses itself in the marshes in the Atheion plain. The Ilissus is now usually dry, as its waters are drawn off to supply the city.

ILITHYIA (Ἰλίδιθια), also called Elithyia, Ilthyia, or Eleutho, the goddess of birth, who came to the assistance of women in labor. When she was kindly disposed, she furthered the birth; but when she was angry, she protracted the labor. In the Iliad the Ilithyia (in the plural) are called the daughters of Hera (Juno). But in the Odyssey and Hesiod, and in the later poets in general, there is only one goddess of this name. Ilithyia was the servant of Hera (Juno), and was employed by the latter to retard the birth of Hercules. Vid. Hæcoulæa. The worship of Ilithyia appears to have been first established among the Dorians in Crete, where she was believed to have been born in a cave in the territory of Cnosus. From thence her worship spread over Delos and Attica. According to a Delian tradition, Ilithyia was not born in Crete, but had come to Delos from the Hyperboreans, for the purpose of assisting Leto (Latona). In an ancient hymn attributed to Olen, which was sung in Delos, Ilithyia was called the mother of Eros (Love). It is probable that Ilithyia was originally a goddess of the moon, and hence became identified with Artemis or Diana. The moon was supposed to exercise great influence over growth in general, and consequently over that of children.

ILIVM. Vid. Troas.

ILISTRIS (Ἰλλίστρις). 1. (Now Tsch), called TICHIS or TETRUM by the Romans, a river in Gallia Narbonensis, in the territory of the Sardones, rises in the Pyrenees, and falls, after a short course, into the Mare Gallicum.—2. (Now Eine), a town of the Santones, on the above-mentioned river, at the foot of the Pyrenees, was originally a place of importance, but afterward sunk into insignificance. It was restored by Constantine, who changed its name into HELÈNE, after that of his mother, whence the modern Eine.

ILITURGIS or ILLITURGI (now Andajar), an important town of the Turduli in Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a steep rock near the Bætis, and on the road from Cordoba to Ossonoba: it was destroyed by Scipio B.C. 210, but was rebuilt, and received the name of Forum Julium.

ILLYRICUM or ILLYRIA, more rarely ILLYRIA (ἢ Ἰλλυρικόν Ἰλλυρίς, Ἰλλυρία), included, in its widest signification, all the land west of Macedonia and east of Italy and Rætia, extending south as far as Epirus, and north as far as the valleys of the Savus and Dravus, and the junction of these rivers with the Danube. The wide extent of country was inhabited by numerous Illyrian tribes, all of whom were more or less barbarous. They were probably of the same origin as the Thracians, but some Cæls were mingled with them. The country was divided into two parts: 1. ILLYRIA BARBARA or ROMANA, the Roman province of ILLYRICUM, extended along the Adriatic Sea from Italy (Istria) from which it was separated by the Arsia, is the River Drilo, and was bounded on the east by Macedonia and Moesia Superior, from which it was separated by the Drinus, and on the north by Pannonia, from which it was separated by the Dravus. It thus comprehended a part of the modern Croatia, the whole of Dalmatia, almost the whole of Bosnia, and a part of Albania. It was divided in ancient times into three districts, according to the tribes by which it was inhabited: Iapydia, the interior of the country on the north, from the Arsia to the Tedanum (vid. Lapydia); Liburnia, along the coast from the Arsia to the Titius (vid. Liburni); and Dalmatia, south of Liburnia, along the coast from the Titius to the Drilo. Vid. DALMATIA. The Liburnians submitted at an early time to the Romans; but it was not till after the conquest of the Dalmatians, in the reign of Augustus, that the entire country was organized as a Roman province. From this time the Illyrians, and especially the Dalmatians, formed an important part of the Roman legions.—2. ILLYRIA GRÆCA, or ILLYRIA proper, also called EPIROS NOVA, extended from the Drilo, along the Adriatic, to the Ceraunian Mountains, which separated it from Epirus proper: it was bounded on the east by Macedonia. It thus embraced the greater part of the modern Albania. It was a mountainous country, but possessed some fertile land on the coast. Its principal rivers were the AOCIA, ARSUS, GENIUS, and PANTASUS. In the interior was an important lake, the LYCHNIA. On the coast there were the Greek colonies of Epidaurum, afterward DYRACHUM, and APOLLONIA. It was at these places that the celebrated Vit Egnatia commenced, which ran through Macedonia to Byzantium. The country was inhabited by various tribes, ATTINATES, TAURANTII, PARTHI, DABARÆ, &c. In early times they were troublesome and dangerous neighbors to the Macedonian kings. They were subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who defeated and slew in battle their king Bardylis, B.C. 359. After the death of Alexander the Great, most of the Illyrian tribes recovered their independence. At a later time, the injury which the Roman trade suffered from their piracies brought against them the arms of the republic. The forces of their queen Teuta were easily defeated by the Romans; and she was obliged to purchase peace by the surrender of a part of her dominions and the payment of an annual tribute, 200. The second Illyrian war was finished by the Romans with the same ease. It was commenced by Demetrius of Pharos, who was guardian of Ptolema, the son of Agrippa, but he was conquered by the consul Antistius Pallus, 319. Ptolema was succeeded by Pleuratus, who cultivated friendly relations with the Romans. His son Gentius formed an alliance with Perseus, king of Macedonia, against Rome; but he was conquered by the prætor L. Anicius, in the same year as Perseus, 168; whereupon Illyria, as well as Macedonia, became subject to Rome. In the new division of the empire under Constantine, Illyricum formed one of the great provinces of the empire. It was divided into ILLYRIUM OCCIDENTALE, which included Illyricum proper, Pannonia, and Noricum, and ILLYRIUM ORIENTALE, which comprehended Dacia, Moesia, Macedonia, and Thrace.

ILUS (Ἴλος). 1. Son of Dardanus by Bates, the daughter of Teucer. Ilus died without issue, and left his kingdom to his brother, Erichonius.—2. Son of Troas and Callirrhoe, grandson of Erichonius, and great-grandson of Dardanus; whence he is called Dardanides. He was the father of Laomedon and the grandfather of Priam. He was believed to be the founder of Ilium, which was also called Troy, after his father. Jupiter (Zeus) gave him the palladium, a statue of three cubits high, with its feet close together, holding a spear in its right hand, and a shield in its left, and promised that as long as it remained in Troy, the city should be safe. The tomb of Ilus was shown in the neighborhood of Troy.—3. Son of Mermernus, and grandson of Jason and Medea. He lived at Ephyra, between Elis and Olympia; and when Ulysses came to him to fetch the poison for his arrows, Ilus refused it, from fear of the vengeance of the gods.—[4. A Latin warrior, slain by Pallas, son of Evander.]

ILVA. Vid. ÆTHALIA.

ILYRIÆ, a people in Liguria, south of the Po, the modern Montferrat.

IMACHÆA (Imacharensis: now Mascara), a town in Sicily, in the Herman Mountains.

IMANUTERIDA, king of the Trinobantes, slain by Cammelanica.]

IMAOX, a Latin warrior, whom Hæleus protected when attacked by Pallas, son of Evander.]

IMAIOS (τὸ Ἰμαῖον ὄρος), the name of a great mountain range of Asia, is one of those terms which the ancient geographers appear to have used indefinitely, for want of exact knowledge. In its most definite application, it appears to mean the western part of the Himalaya, between the Paropamisus and the Emodi Montes; but when it is applied to some great chain, extending much further to the north, and dividing Scythia into two parts, Scythia intra Imaum and Scythia extra Imaum, it must either be understood to mean the modern Moussour or Altai Mountains, or else some imaginary range, which cannot be identified with any actually existing mountains.

IMBRIUM (Ἰμβριον), a river in the island of Samos, formerly called Parthenius, flowing into the sea not far from the city of Samos. The celebrated temple of Juno (Hera) (Ἥραιον) stood near it, and it gave the epithet of Imbriæa both to Juno (Hera) and to Diana (Artemis).

IMMORUS (Ἰμμορος), son of Mentor of Pedasus in Caria, married an illegitimate daughter of Priam (named Modemiscate), and aided Priam against the Greeks: he was slain by Teucer.]

IMBROS (Ἰμβρος: now Imbro or Imbros), an island in the north of the Ægean Sea, near the Thracian Chersonesus, about eighteen miles southeast of Samothrace, and about twenty-two northeast of Lemnos. It is about twenty-five miles in circumference, and is hilly, but contains many fertile valleys. Imbros, like the neighboring island of Samothrace, was in ancient times one of the chief seats of the worship of the Cabiri and Mercury (Hermes). There was a town of the same name on the east of the island, of which there are still some ruins.

INACHIS (Ἰναχίς), a surname of Io, the daughter of Inachus. The goddess Isis is also called Inachis, because she was identified with Io; and sometimes Inachis is used as synonymous with an Argive or Greek woman. Inachides in the same way was used as a name of Epaphus, a grandson of Inachus, and also of Perseus, because he was born at Argos, the city of Inachus.

INACHUS (Ἰναχος), son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Phorcus and Ægialeus, to whom others add Io, Argus Pasoptes, and Phægon or Pegæus. He was the first king and the most ancient hero of Argos, whence the country is frequently called the land of Inachus; and he is said to have given his name to the River Inachus. The ancients made several attempts to explain the stories about Inachus: sometimes they looked upon him as a native of Argos, who, after the flood of Deucalion, led the Argives from the mountains into the plains; and sometimes they regarded him as the leader of an Egyptian or Libyan colony, which settled on the banks of the Inachus.

INACHUS (Ἰναχος). 1. (Now Planitza or Zerfa), the chief river in Argolis, rises in the mountain Lyreus, on the borders of Arcadia, flows in a southeasterly direction, receives near Argos the Obaradrus, and falls into the Sinus Argolicus south of Argos.—2. (Now Krikeli, or, according to Leake, Ariadhis), a river in Acarnania, which rises in Mount Læmon, in the range of Pindus, and falls into the Achælus.

INACHUS. Vid. ÆTHALIA.

INAROS (Ἰναρος, occasionally Ἰναρος), son of Psammitichus, a chief of some Libyan tribes to the west of Egypt, commenced hostilities against the Persians, which ended in a revolt of the whole of Egypt, B.C. 461. In 460 Inaros called in the Athenians, who with a fleet of two hundred galleys, were then off Cyprus: the ships sailed up to Memphis, and, occupying two parts of the town, besieged the third. In the same year Inaros defeated the Persians in a great battle, in which Achæmenes, the brother of the king Artaxerxes, was slain. But a new army, under a new commander, Megabysus, was more successful. The Egyptians and their allies were defeated; and Inaros was taken by treachery and crucified, 455.

INDIA (ἡ Ἰνδία: Ἰνδός, Indus) was a name used by the Greeks and Romans, much as the modern term East Indies, to describe the whole of the southeast part of Asia, to the east, south, and southeast of the great ranges of mountains now called the Soliman and Himalaya Mountains, including the two peninsulas of Hindustan, and of Burma, Cochin-China, Siam, and Malacca, and also the islands of the Indian Archipelago. There is ample evidence that commercial intercourse was carried on, from a very early time, between the western coast of Hindustan and the western parts of Asia, by the way of the Persian Gulf, the Euphrates, and across the Syrian Desert to Phœnicia, and also by way of the Red Sea and Iudæa, both to Egypt and to Phœnicia; and so on from Phœnicia to Asia Minor and Europe. The direct acquaintances of the western nations with India dates from the reign of Darius, the son of Hystaspes, who added to the Persian empire a part of its north-west regions, perhaps only as far as the Indus, certainly not beyond the limits of the Punjab; and the slight knowledge of the country thus obtained by the Persians was conveyed to the Greeks through the inquiries of travellers, especially Herodotus, and afterward by those Greeks who resided for some time in the Persian empire, such as CYRUS, who wrote a special work on India (Indica). The expedition of ALEXANDER into India first brought the Greeks into actual contact with the country; but the conquests of Alexander only extended within Scinde and the Punjab, as far as the River HYPHASIS, down which he sailed into the Indus, and down the Indus to the sea. The Greek king of Syria, Seleucus Nicator, crossed the Hyphasis, and made war with the Prasii, a people dwelling on the banks of the upper Ganges, to whom he afterward sent ambassadors, named Megasthenes and Daimachus, who lived for several years at Palibothra, the capital of the Prasii, and had thus the opportunity of obtaining much information respecting the parts of India about the Ganges. Megasthenes composed a work on India, which appears to have been the chief source of all the accurate information contained in the works of later writers. After the death of Seleucus Nicator, B.C. 281, the direct intercourse of the Western nations with India, except in the way of commerce, ceased almost entirely; and whatever new information the later writers obtained was often very erroneous. Meanwhile, the foundation of Alexandria had created an extensive commerce between India and the West, by way of the Indian Ocean, the Red Sea, and Egypt, which made the Greeks better acquainted with the western coast of the peninsula, and extended their knowledge further into the Eastern seas; but the information they thus obtained of the countries beyond Cape Comorin was extremely vague and scanty. Another channel of information, however, was opened, during this period, by the establishment of the Greek kingdom of Bactria, to which a considerable part of Northern India appears to have been subject. The later geographers made two great divisions of India, which are separated by the Ganges, and are called India intra Gangem and India extra Gangem, the former including the peninsula of Hindustan, the latter the Burmese peninsula. They were acquainted with the division of the people of Hindustan into castes, of which they enumerate seven. It is not necessary, for our object, to mention the other particulars which they relate concerning India and its people.

INDIBILIS and MANDONUS, two brothers, and chiefs of the Spanish tribe of the Illegetes, who played an important part in the war between the Romans and Carthaginians in Spain during the second Punic war. For some years they were faithful allies of the Carthaginians; but in consequence of the generous treatment which the wife of Mandonus and the daughters of Indibilis received from P. Scipio when they fell into his hands, the two brothers deserted the Carthaginian cause, and joined Scipio in 208 with all the forces of their nation. But in 206, the illness and reported death of Scipio gave them hopes of shaking off the yoke of Rome, and they excited a general revolt not only among their own subjects, but the neighboring Celtiberian tribes also. They were defeated by Scipio, and upon suing for forgiveness were pardoned. But when Scipio left Spain in the next year (205), they again revolted. The Roman generals whom Scipio had left in Spain forthwith marched against them; Indibilis was slain in battle, and Mandonus was taken soon afterward and put to death.

INDIGETES or INDIGETIA, a people in the north-east corner of Hispania Tarraconensis, close upon the Pyrenees. Their chief town was Eboracum.

INDICUM OCEANUS. Vid. EASTERN MARE.

INDIGETES, the name of three indigenous gods and heroes at Rome, who once lived on earth as mortals, and were worshipped after their death as gods, such as Janus, Feus, Faunus, Æneas, Evander, Hercules, Latona, Romulus, and others. Thus Æneas, after his disappearance on the banks of the Numicius, became a deus Indiges, pater Indiges, or Jupiter Indiges; and in like manner, Romulus became Quirinus, and Latinus Jupiter Latiaris. The Indigetes are frequently mentioned together with the Lares and Penates; and many writers connect the Indigetes with those divinities to whom a share in the foundation of the Latin and Roman state is ascribed, such as Mars, Venus, Vesta, &c.

INDUS or SINDUS (Ἰνδός: now Indus, Sind), a great river of India, rises in the table-land of Thibet, north of the Himalaya Mountains, flows nearly parallel to the great bend of that chain on its northern side, till it breaks through the chain a little east of Attock, in the northwest corner of the Punjab, and then flows southwest through the great plain of the Punjab into the Erythræum Mare (now Indian Ocean), which it enters by several mouths, two according to the earlier Greek writers, six according to the later. Its chief tributaries are the Cophen (now Cabul), which enters it from the northwest at Attock, and the Acœsines on the east side. Vid. HYPHASIS. Like the Nile, the Indus overflows its banks, but with a much less fertilizing result, as the country about its lower course is for the most part a sandy desert, and the deposit it brings down is much less rich than that of the Nile. The erroneous notions of the early Greeks respecting the connection between the southeastern parts of the continents of Africa and Asia, led to a confusion between the Indus and the Nile; but this and other mistakes were corrected by the voyage of Alexander's fleet down the Hyphasis and the Indus. The ancient name of India was derived from the native name of the Indus (now Sind).

INDUS (Ἰνδός: now Dollomen-Chai), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rising in the southwest of Phrygia, and flowing through the district of Cibyrratis and the southeastern corner of Caria into the Mediterranean, opposite to Rhodes.

INDUTIOMARUS or INDUCIONEURUS, one of the leading chiefs of the Treviri in Gaul. As he was opposed to the Romans, Ossa induced the leading men of the nation to side with Cingetorix, the son-in-law but rival of Indutiomarus, B.C. 54. Indutiomarus, in consequence, took up arms against the Romans, but was defeated and slain by Labienus.

INERA. Vid. ÆTNA, No. 2.

INFERI, the gods of the Nether World, in contradistinction from the Superi, or the gods of heaven. In Greek the Inferi are called οἱ αἰνῆ, οἱ χθονιοί, οἱ ἐνὶ γαίᾳ, οἱ ἐσπέρη, οἱ αἰετῖμοι θεοί; and the Superi, οἱ ἀνω, θεοὶ αἰετῖμοι. But the word Inferi is also frequently used to designate the dead, in contradistinction from those living upon the earth; so that opod inferos is equivalent to "in Hades," or "in the lower world." The Inferi therefore comprise all the inhabitants of the lower world, the gods, viz., Hades or Pluto, his wife Persephone (Proserpina), the Erinyes or Furies, and others, as well as the souls of departed men. The gods of the lower world are treated of in separate articles.

IOBURES, a Gallic people, who crossed the Alps, and settled in Gallia Transpadana, in the north of Italy. Their chief town was MEDIO-LAURUM. Next to the Boii, they were the most powerful and warlike of the Gallic tribes in Cisalpine Gaul. They were conquered by the Romans shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war.

IOBAPHENES (Ἰοβάφνης), one of the seven conspirators against the two Magi in Persia, B.C. 523. He was afterward put to death by Darius.

INTERAMNA (Interamnæ), the name of several towns in Italy, so called from their lying between two streams. 1. (Now Tivoli), an ancient municipium in Umbria, situated on the Tiber, and surrounded by a canal flowing into this river, whence its inhabitants were called Interamnates Narces. It was the birth-place of the historian Tacitus, as well as of the emperor of the same name.—2. A town in Latium, on the Via Latina, and at the junction of the Cassinus with the Liris, whence its inhabitants are called Interamnates Lirinales. It was made a Roman colony B.C. 312, but subsequently sunk into insignificance.

INTERCATIA, an important town of the Væcosi in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Asturica to Caesar Augusta.

INTERCISA or PETRA PENTURA, a town in Umbria, so called because a road was here cut through the rocks by order of Vespasian. An ancient inscription on the spot still commemorates this work.

INTERIVM MARE, the Mediterranean Sea, extended on the west from the Straits of Hercules, which separated it from the Atlantic, to the coasts of Syria and Asia Minor on the east. In the northeast it was usually supposed to terminate at the Hellespont. From the Straits of Hercules to the furthest shores of Syria it is two thousand miles in length; and, including the islands, it occupies an area of seven hundred and thirty-four thousand square miles. It was called by the Romans Mare Internum or Intestinum; by the Greeks, ἡ ἐσω θάλαττα or ἡ ἐντὸς θάλαττα, or more fully, ἡ ἐντὸς Ἡρακλείων θάλαττα, and by Herodotus ἡδε ἡ θάλαττα; and from its washing the coasts both of Greece and Italy, it was also called both by Greeks and Romans Our Sea (ἡ ἡμετέρα θάλαττα, ἡ καθ' ἡμῶς θάλαττα, Mare Nostrum). The term Mare Mediterraneum is not used by the best classical writers, and occurs first in Solinus. Most of the ancients believed that the Mediterranean received its waters from the Atlantic, and poured them through the Hellespont and the Propontis into the Euxine; but others, on the contrary, maintained that the waters came from the Euxine into the Mediterranean. The ebb and flow of the tide are perceptible in only a few parts of the Mediterranean, such as in the Syrtis on the coast of Africa, in the Adriatic, &c. The different parts of the Mediterranean are called by different names, which are spoken of in separate articles. Vid. MARE TYRÆNIVM or INFERIVM, ADRIA or M. ADRIATICVM or M. IO (Ἰώ), daughter of Inachus, the first king of Argos, or, according to others, of Iasus or Piren. Jupiter (Zeus) loved Io, but, on account of Juno's (Hera) jealousy, he metamorphosed her into a white heifer. The goddess, who was aware of the change, obtained the heifer from Jupiter (Zeus), and placed her under the care of Argus Panoptes; but Jupiter (Zeus) sent Mercury (Hermes) to slay Argus and deliver Io. Vid. ARGVS. JUNO (Hera) then tormented Io with a gad-fly, and drove her in a state of phrensy from land to land over the whole earth, until at length she found rest on the banks of the Nile. Here she recovered her original form, and bore a son to Jupiter (Zeus) called Epaphus. Vid. EPAPHUS. This is the common story, which appears to be very ancient, since Homer constantly gives the epithet of Argiphontes (the slayer of Argus) to Mercury (Hermes). The wanderings of Io were very celebrated in antiquity, and were extended and embellished with the increase of geographical knowledge. Of these there is a full account in the Prometheus of Æschylus. The Bosphorus is said to have derived its name from her swimming across it. According to some traditions Io married Telegonus, king of Egypt, and was afterward identified with Isis. The legend of Io is difficult to explain. It appears that Io was identical with the moon, which is probably signified by her being represented as a woman, with the horns of a heifer. Her connection with Egypt seems to be an invention of later times, and was probably suggested by the resemblance which was found to exist between the Argive Io and the Egyptian Isis.

IOLEUS (Ἰόλεος) son of Iphicles and Autome-dusa. Iphicles was the half-brother of Hercules, and Ioleus was the faithful companion and charioteer of the hero. Vid. HERCULES. He assisted Hercules in slaying the Lernaean Hydra. After Hercules had instituted the Olympic games, Ioleus won the victory with the horses of his master. Hercules sent him to Sardinia at the head of his sons whom he had by the daughters of Thestius. He introduced civilization among the inhabitants of that island, and was worshipped by them. From Sardinia he went to Sicily, and then returned to Hercules shortly before the death of the latter. After the death of the hero, Ioleus was the first who offered sacrifices to him as a demigod. According to Pausanias, Ioleus died in Sardinia, whereas, according to others, he was buried in the tomb of his grandfather, Amphitryon. His descendants in Sardinia were called Ἰολαῖοι and Ἰολαῖται. Vid. SARDINIA. Ioleus, after his death, obtained permission from the gods of the nether world to come to the assistance of the children of Hercules. He slew Eurytheus, and then returned to the shades.

IOLCOS (Ἰωλκός, Ep. Ἰωλκός, Dor. Ἰαλός; Ἰόλκιος), an ancient town in Magnesia in Thessaly, at the top of the Pegasus Gulf, seven stadia from the sea. It is said to have been founded by the mythical Cretheus, and to have been colonized by Minyans from Orchomenus. It was celebrated in mythology as the residence of Pelias and Jason, and as the place from which the Argonauts sailed in quest of the golden fleece. At a later time it fell into decay, and its inhabitants were removed to the neighboring town of Demetrias, which was founded by Demetrius Poliorcetes.

IOLE (Ἰόλη), daughter of Eurytus of Clethia, was beloved by Hercules. For details, vid. p. 359, a. After the death of Hercules, she married his son Hylias.

IOLEAS or IOLEUS (Ἰόλλας or Ἰόλεος). 1. Son of Antipater, and brother of Cassander, king of Macedonia. He was cup-bearer to Alexander at the period of his last illness. These writers who adopt the idea of the king having been poisoned, represent Iolias as the person who actually administered the fatal draught.—2. Of Boethia, a writer on materia medica, flourished in the third century B.C.

ION (Ἴων). 1. The fabulous ancestor of the Ionians, is described as the son of Apollo and Creusa, the daughter of Erechtheus and wife of Xuthus. The most celebrated story about Ion is the one which forms the subject of the Ion of Euripides. Apollo had visited Creusa in a cave below the Propylæe, at Athens; and when she gave birth to a son, she exposed him in the same cave. The god, however, had the child conveyed to Delphi, where he was educated by a priestess. Some time afterward Xuthus and Creusa came to consult the oracle about the means of obtaining an heir. The received for answer that the first human being which Xuthus met on leaving the temple should be his son. Xuthus met Ion, and acknowledged him as his son; but Creusa, imagining him to be a son of her husband by a former mistress, caused a cup to be presented to the yolk which was filled with the poisonous blood of a dragon. However, her object was discovered, for as Ion, before drinking, poured out a libation to the gods, a pigeon which drank of it died on the spot. Creusa thereupon fled to the altar of the god. Ion dragged her away, as was on the point of killing her, when a priestess interfered, explained the mystery, and showed that Ion was the son of Creusa. Mother and son thus became reconciled, but Xuthus would not let into the secret. Among the inhabitants of the Ægialia, i. e., the northern coast of Peloponnesus, who were Ionians, there was another tradition current. Xuthus, when expelled from Thessaly, came to the Ægialia. At his death Ion was on the point of naming against the Ægialeans, when their king Selinus gave him his daughter Helice in marriage. On the death of Selinus, Ion succeeded to the throne, and thus the Ægialeans received the name of Ionians, and the town of Helice was built in honor of Ion's wife. Other traditions represent Ion as king of Athens between the reigns of Erechtheus and Cecrops; for it is said that his assistance was called in by the Athenians in their war with the Eleusinians that he conquered Eumolpus, and then became king of Athens. He there became the father of four sons, Geleon, Ægeocores, Argonoe, a Hoplite, whose names were given to the four Athenian classes. After his death he was buried at Potamus.—2. Of Chios, son of Orthocorus was a celebrated tragic poet. He went to Athens when young, and there enjoyed the society of Æschylus and Cimon. The number of his tragedies is variously stated at twelve, thirty, and forty. We have the titles and a few fragments of eleven. Ion also wrote other kinds of poetry, and prose works both in history and philosophy. [The fragments of his tragedies are contained in Wagner's Fragm. Trag. Græc., p. 36.]—3. Of Ephesus, a rhapsodist in the time of Socrates, from whom one of Plato's dialogues is named.

called from the Ionian Greeks who colonized it at a time earlier than any distinct historical records. The mythical account of "the great Ionic migration" relates that in consequence of the disputes between the sons of Codrus, king of Athens, about the succession to his government, his younger sons, Neleus and Androcles, resolved to seek a new home beyond the Aegean Sea. Attica was at the time overpopulated by numerous exiles, whom the great revolution, known as "the return of the Heraclidae," had driven out of their own states, the chief of whom were the Ionians who had been expelled from Peloponnesus by the Dorian invaders. A large portion of this superfluous population went forth as Athenian colonists, under the leadership of Androcles and Neleus, and of other chieftains of other races, and settled on that part of the western shores of Asia Minor, which formed the coast of Lydia and part of Caria, and also in the adjacent islands of Chios and Samos, and in the Cyclades. The mythical chronology places this great movement one hundred and forty years after the Trojan war, or sixty years after the return of the Heraclidae, that is, in B.C. 1060, or 1044, according to the two chief dates imagined for the Trojan war. Passing from mythology to history, the earliest authentic records show us the existence of twelve great cities on the above-named coast, claiming to be (though some of them only partially) of Ionic origin, and all united into one confederacy, similar to that of the twelve ancient Ionian cities on the northern coast of the Peloponnesus. The district they covered formed a narrow strip of coast, extending between, and somewhat beyond, the mouth of the rivers Maeander on the south, and Hermus on the north. The names of the twelve cities going from south to north, were Miletus, Myos, Priene, Samos (city and island), Ephesus, Colophon, Lebedus, Teos, Erythraea, Cnidos (city and island), Olasomena, and Proconnesus; the first three on the coast of Caria, the rest on that of Lydia: the city of Smyrna, which lay within this district, but was of Aeolic origin, was afterward (about B.C. 700) added to the Ionian confederacy. The common sanctuary of the league was the Panionium (πανιώνιον), a sanctuary of Neptune (Poseidon) Heliconium, on the northern side of the promontory of Mycale, opposite to Samos; and here was held the great national assembly (κατήγορος) of the confederacy, called Panionia (πανιώνια: vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.). It is very important to observe that the inhabitants of these cities were very far from being exclusively and purely of Ionian descent. The traditions of the original colonization and the accounts of the historians agree in representing them as peopled by a great mixture, not only of Hellenic races, but also of these with the earlier inhabitants, such as Carians, Leleges, Lydians, Cretans, and Pelasgians; their dialects, Herodotus expressly tells us, were very different, and nearly all of them were founded on the sites of pre-existing native settlements. The religious rites, also, which the Greeks of Ionia observed, in addition to their national worship of Neptune (Poseidon), were borrowed in part from the native communities; such were the worship of Apollo Didymaeus at Branchidae near Miletus, of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, and of Apollo Clarius at Colophon. All these facts point to the conclusion that the Greek colonization of this coast was effected, not by one, but by successive emigrations from different states, but chiefly of the Ionic race. The central position of this district, its excellent harbors, and the fertility of its plains, watered by the Maeander, the Cayster, and the Hermus, combined with the energetic character of the Ionian race to confer a high degree of prosperity upon these cities; and it was not long before they began to send forth colonies to many places on the shores of the Mediterranean and the Euxine, and even to Greece itself. During the rise of the Lydian empire, the cities of Ionia preserved their independence until the reign of Croesus, who subdued those on the main land, but relinquished his design of attacking the islands. When Cyrus had overthrown Croesus, he sent his general Harpagus to complete the conquest of the Ionic Greeks, B.C. 557. Under the Persian rule they retained their political organization, subject to the government of the Persian satraps, and of tyrants who were set up in single cities, but they were required to render tribute and military service to the king. In B.C. 500 they revolted from Darius Hystaspis, under the leadership of Histiaeus, the former tyrant of Miletus, and his brother-in-law Anaxarchus, and supported by aid from the Athenians. The Ionian army advanced as far as Sardis, which they took and burned, but they were driven back to the coast, and defeated near Ephesus, B.C. 499. The re-conquest of Ionia by the Persians was completed by the taking of Miletus in 496, and the Ionians were compelled to furnish ships, and to serve as soldiers in the two expeditions against Greece. After the defeat of Xerxes, the Greeks carried the war to the coasts of Asia, and effected the liberation of Ionia by the victories of Mycale (479) and of the Eurymedon (469). In 387 the peace of Antalcidas restored Ionia to Persia; and after the Macedonian conquest, it formed part, successively, of the kingdom of Pergamus, and of the Roman province of Asia. For the history of the several cities, see the respective articles. In no country inhabited by the Hellenic race, except at Athens, were the refinements of civilization, the arts, and literature, more highly cultivated than in Ionia. The restless energy and free spirit of the Ionic race, the riches gained by commerce, and the neighborhood of the great seats of Asiatic civilization, combined to advance with rapidity the intellectual progress and the social development of its people; but these same influences, unchecked by the rigid discipline of the Doric race, or the simple earnestness of the Aeolic, imbued their social life with luxury and licence, and invested their works of genius with the hues of enchanting beauty at the expense of severe good taste and earnest purpose. Out of the long list of the authors and artists of Ionia, we may mention Minnermus of Colophon, the first poet of the amatory elegy; Anacreon of Teos, who sang of love and wine to the music of the lyre; Thales of Miletus, Anaxagoras of Olasomena, and several other early philosophers; the early mansueti, Cadmus, Dionysius, and Hecateus, all of Miletus; and, in the fine arts, besides being the home of that exquisitely beautiful order of architecture, the Ionic, and possessing many of the most magnificent temples in the world, Ionia was the native country of that refined school of painting, which boasted the names of Zeuxis, Apelles, and Parrhasius. The most flourishing period in the history of Ionia is that during which it was subject to Persia; but its prosperity lasted till the decline of the Roman empire, under which its cities were among the chief resorts of the celebrated teachers of rhetoric and philosophy. The important place which some of the chief cities of Ionia occupy in the early history of Christianity is attested by the Acts of the Apostles, and the Epistles of St. Paul to the Ephesians, and of St. John to the seven churches of Asia.

IONIUM MARE (Ἰόνιος πόντος, Ἰόνιον πέλαγος, Ἰονίη θάλαττα, Ἰόνιος πόντος), a part of the Mediterranean Sea between Italy and Greece, was south of the Adriatic, and began on the west at Hydruntum in Calabria, and on the east at Oricus in Epirus, or at the Ceraunian Mountains. In more ancient times the Adriatic was called Ἰόνιος μυχός or Ἰόνιος κόλπος; while at a later time the Ionium Mare itself was included in the Adriatic. In its widest signification, the Ionium Mare included the Mare Siculum, Oreticum, and Icarium. Its name was usually derived by the ancients from the wanderings of Io, but it was more probably so called from the Ionian colonies, which settled in Cephallenia and the other islands off the western coasts of Greece.

ΙΩΡΗΣ (Ἰωρῆς), son of Sophocles by Nicostate, was a distinguished tragic poet. He brought out tragedies during the life of his father, and was still flourishing B.C. 405, the year in which Aristophanes brought out the Frogs. For the celebrated story of his unprofitable charge against his father, vid. SOPHOCLES.

ΙΡΙΑΣ (Ἰριάς), i. e., Evadne, a daughter of Iphis, and wife of Capaneus.

ΙΡΙΚΛΕΙΑ, or ΙΡΙΚΛΙΔΗΣ (Ἰρικλῆς, Ἰρικλος, or Ἰρικλέης). 1. Son of Amphitryon and Alcmene of Thebes, was one night younger than his half-brother Hercules. He was first married to Automedusa, the daughter of Alcathous, by whom he became the father of Iolaus, and afterward to the youngest daughter of Creon. He accompanied Hercules on several of his expeditions, and also took part in the Calydonian hunt. He fell in battle against the sons of Hippocoon, or, according to another account, was wounded in the battle against the Molionides, and was carried to Phœbea, where he died.—2. Son of Teutius by Laophonte, or Deidamia, or Eurythoea, or Leucippe. He took part in the Calydonian hunt and the expedition of the Argonauts.—3. Son of Phylacus, and grandson of Deion, and Clymene, or son of Cephalus and Clymene, the daughter of Minyas. He was married to Hermodia or Astyoche, and was the father of Heracles and Proteasius. He was also one of the Argonauts; and he possessed large herds of oxen, which he gave to the seer Melampus. He was also celebrated for his swiftness in running.

ΙΡΙΚΑΛΤΗΣ (Ἰρικράτης), the famous Athenian general, was the son of a shoemaker. He distinguished himself at an early age by his gallantry in battle; and in B.C. 394, when he was only twenty-five years of age, he was appointed by the Athenians to the command of the force which they sent to the aid of the Persians after the battle of Coronea. In 393 he commanded the Athenian forces at Corinth, and at the same time introduced an important improvement in military tactics, the formation of a body of targeteers (πελτασταί), possessing, to a certain extent, the advantages of heavy and light-armed forces. This he effected by substituting a small target for the heavy shield, adopting a longer sword and spear, and replacing the old coat of mail by a linen corslet. At the head of his targeteers he defeated and nearly destroyed a Spartan Mora in the following year (392), an exploit which became very celebrated throughout Greece. In the same year he was succeeded in the command of Corinth by Chabrias. In 389 he was sent to the Hellespont to oppose Anaxibius, who was defeated by him and slain in the following year. On the peace of Antalcidas in 387, Iphicrates went to Thrace to assist Seuthes, king of the Odrysæ, but he soon afterwards formed an alliance with Cotys, who gave him his daughter in marriage. In 377 Iphicrates was sent by the Athenians, with the command of a mercenary force, to assist Pharnabazus in reducing Egypt to subjection; but the expedition failed through a misunderstanding between Iphicrates and Pharnabazus. In 375 Iphicrates was sent to Coreyra, in conjunction with Callistratus and Chabrias, in the command of an Athenian force, and he remained in the Ionian Sea till the peace of 371 put an end to hostilities. About 367 he was sent against Amphipolis, and after carrying on the war against this place for three years, was superseded by Timotheus. Shortly afterwards he assisted his father-in-law Cotys in his war against Athens for the possession of the Thracian Chersonesus. But his conduct in this matter was passed over by the Athenians. After the death of Chabrias (375), Iphicrates, Timotheus, and Menætheus were joined with Chares as commanders in the Social war, and were prosecuted by their unscrupulous colleague, because they had refused to risk an engagement in a storm. Iphicrates was acquitted. From the period of his trial he seems to have lived quietly at Athens. He died before 348. Iphicrates has been commended for his combined prudence and energy as a general. The worst words, he said, that a commander sals utter were, "I should not have expected." His services were highly valued by the Athenians, and were rewarded by them with most unprecedented honors.

IPHIGENIA (Ἰφίγεια), according to the most common tradition, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, but according to others, a daughter of Theseus and Helena, and brought up by Clytemnestra as a foster-child. Agamemnon had once killed a stag in the grove of Diana (Artemis); or he had boasted that the goddess herself could not hit better; or he had owed in the year in which Iphigenia was born to sacrifice the most beautiful production of that year, but had afterward neglected to fulfill his vow. One of these circumstances is said to have been the cause of the calm which staid the Greek fleet in Anlis when the Trojans wanted to sail against Troy. The seer Iphiclus declared that the sacrifice of Iphigenia was the only means of propitiating Diana (Artemis). Agamemnon was obliged to yield, and Iphigenia was brought to Chalcis under the pretext of being married to Achilles. When Iphigenia was on the point of being sacrificed, Diana (Artemis) carried her in a cloud to Tauris, where she became the priestess of the goddess, and a stag was substituted for her by Diana (Artemis). While Iphigenia was serving Diana (Artemis) as priestess in Tauris, her mother Orestes and his friend Pylades came to Tauris to carry off the image of the goddess at this place, which was believed to have fallen from heaven. As strangers, they were to be sacrificed in the temple of Diana (Artemis); but Iphigenia recognized her brother, and fled with him and the statue of the goddess. In the mean time, Electra, another sister of Orestes, had heard that he had been sacrificed in Tauris by the priestess of Diana (Artemis). At Delphi she met Iphigenia, who, she supposed, had murdered Orestes. She therefore resolved to deprive Iphigenia of her sight, but was prevented by the interference of Orestes; and a scene of recognition took place. All now returned to Mycenæ; but Iphigenia carried the statue of Diana (Artemis) to the Attic town of Brauron, near Marathon. She there died as priestess of the goddess. As a daughter of Theseus, Iphigenia was connected with the heroic families of Attica, and after her death the veils and most costly garments which had been worn by women who had died in childbirth were dedicated to her. According to some traditions, Iphigenia never died, but was changed by Diana (Artemis) into Heate, or was endowed by the goddess with immortality and eternal youth, and under the name of Oracchia became the wife of Achilles in the island of Leuce. The Lacedæmonians maintained that the image of Diana (Artemis), which Iphigenia and Orestes had carried away from Tauris, was preserved in Sparta and not in Attica, and was worshipped in the former place under the name of Diana (Artemis) Orthia. Both in Attica and in Sparta human sacrifices were offered to Iphigenia in early times. In place of these human sacrifices the Spartan youths were afterward scourged at the festival of Diana (Artemis) Orthia. It appears probable that Iphigenia was originally the same as Diana (Artemis) herself.

IPHIMEDIA or IPHIMEDON (Ἰφίμεδία, Ἰφίμεδών), daughter of Triops, and wife of Aloeus. Being in love with Neptune (Poseidon), she often walked on the sea-shore, and collected its waters in her lap, whence she became, by Neptune (Poseidon), the mother of the Alkides, Otus and Ephialtes. While Iphimedia and her daughter Paneratis were celebrating the orgies of Bacchus (Dionysus) on Mount Drusus, they were carried off by Thracian Pirates to Naxos or Strongyle; but they were delivered by the Alkides.

IPHIXOUS (Ἰφίνοος), son of Dexius, a Greek slain by the Lycian Glaucus before Troy.]

IPHIS (Ἰφίς). 1. Son of Alektor, and father of Eteoclus and Evadne, the wife of Capaneus was king of Argus. He advised Polynices to give the celebrated necklace of Harmonia to Eriphyle, that she might persuade her husband Amphiarus to take part in the expedition against Thebes. He lost his two children, and therefore left his kingdom to Stenelus, son of Capaneus. —2. Son of Stenelus, and brother of Eurystheus, was one of the Argonauts who fell in the battle with Æetes. —3. A youth in love with Anaxarete. Vid. ANAXARETE. —4. Daughter of Ligdus and Telethusa, of Phæstus in Crete. She was brought up as a boy, on the advice of Isis, because her father, previous to her birth, had ordered the child to be killed if it should be a girl. When Iphis had grown up, and was to be betrothed to Iauthe, she was metamorphosed by Isis into a youth. —5. Daughter of Enyæus of Scyru, celebrated for her beauty, presented by Achilles to Patroclus.]

IPHITON (Ἰφίτιον), son of Otrynteus and a Naiad, came from Hyde, at the foot of Tmolus in Lydia, to the Trojan war; slain by Achilles.]

IPHITUS (Ἰφίτος). 1. Son of Eurytus of Orchania, one of the Argonauts, was afterward killed by Hercules. (For details, vid. p. 358, b, 359, a.) —2. Son of Naubolus, and father of Schedius, Epistrophus, and Eurynome, in Phocis, likewise one of the Argonauts. —3. Son of Hæmon, or Praxionides, or Iphitus, king of Elis, restored the Olympic games, and instituted the cessation of all war during their celebration, B.C. 884.

IPHITIME (Ἰφίτιμη), daughter of Icarus, sister of Penelope; under her form Minerva appeared to Penelope to console her when disquieted at the departure of Telemachus from Ithaca.]

IPRUS (Ἰπρός), a small town in Great Phrygia, celebrated in history as the scene of the decisive battle which closed the great contest between the generals of Alexander for the succession to his empire, and in which Antigonus was defeated and slain, B.C. 301. Vid. ANTIGONUS. The site is unknown, but it appears to have been about the centre of Phrygia, not far from SYNADA.

IPA (Ἰπα, Ἰπά), a mountain fortress in Messenia, memorable as the place where Aristomachus was defended himself for seven years against the Spartans. Its capture by the Spartans in B.C. 668 put an end to the second Messenian war. It is doubtful whether it is the same as Ira (Ἰρα, ix., 150), one of the seven cities which Agamemnon promised to Achilles.

IRENÆUS (Ἰρηναιός), one of the early Christian fathers, was probably born at Smyrna between A.D. 120 and 140. In his early youth he heard Polycarp. He afterward went to Gaul, and in 177 succeeded Pothinus as bishop of Lyon. He made many converts from heathenism, and was most active in opposing the Gnostics, especially the Valentinians. He seems to have lived till about the end of the second century. The only work of Irenæus now extant, Adversus Hæreses, is intended to refute the Gnostics. The original Greek is lost, with the exception of a few fragments, but the work exists in a barbarous but ancient Latin version. Edited by Grabe, Oxon., 1702; [and by Stieren, Leipzig, 1848, seqq., 2 vols. 8vo.]

IRENE (Ἰρηνή), called PAX by the Romans, the goddess of peace, was, according to Hesiod, a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and one of the Horæ. Vid. Horæ. After the victory of Timotheus over the Lacedæmonians, altars were erected to her at Athens at the public expense. Her statue at Athens stood by the side of that of Amphiaræus, carrying in its arms Plutus, the god of wealth, and another stood near that of Hestia in the Prytaneum. At Rome, where peace was also worshipped as a goddess, she had a magnificent temple, which was built by the Emperor Vespasian. Pax is represented on coins as a youthful female, holding in her left arm a cornucopia, and in her right hand an olive-branch or the staff of Mercury. Sometimes she appears in the act of burning a pile of arms, or carrying corn-ears in her hand or upon her head.

IRIS (Ἴρις), daughter of Thaumás (whence she is called Thaumantias) and of Electra, and sister of the Harpies. In the Iliad she appears as the messenger of the gods, especially of Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera). In the Odyssey, Mercury (Hermes) is the messenger of the gods, and Iris is never mentioned. Iris appears to have been originally the personification of the rainbow, for this brilliant phenomenon in the skies, which vanishes as quickly as it appears, was regarded as the swift messenger of the gods. Some poets describe Iris as the rainbow itself, but other writers represent the rainbow as only the road on which Iris travels, and which therefore appears whenever the goddess wants it, and vanishes when it is no longer needed. In the earlier poets Iris appears as a virgin goddess, but in the later she is the wife of Zephyrus and the mother of Eros. Iris is represented in works of art dressed in a long and wide tunic, over which hangs a light upper garment, with wings attached to her shoulders, carrying the nerald's staff in her left hand, and sometimes also holding a pitcher.

IRIS (Ἰρίς: now Yeshil-Irmak), a considerable river of Asia Minor, rises on the northern side of the northernmost range of the Anti-Taurus, in the south of Pontus, and flows first west past Comana Pontica, then north to Amasia, where it turns to the east of Eupatoria (Megalopolis), where it receives the Lyros and then flows north through the territory of Themiscyra into the Sinus Amisenus. Xenophon states its breadth at three plethra (three hundred feet).

IRUS (Ἴρος). 1. Son of Actor, and father of Eurydamas and Eurytion. He purified Peleus, when the latter had murdered his brother; but, during the chase of the Calydonian boar, Peleus unintentionally killed Eurytion, the son of Irus. Peleus endeavored to soothe him by offering him his flocks; but Irus would not accept them, and at the command of an oracle Peleus allowed them to run wherever they pleased. A wolf devoured the sheep, but was thereupon changed into a stone, which was shown, in later times, on the frontier between Locris and Phocia.—2. The well-known beggar of Ithaca. His real name was Arneus, but he was called Irus because he was the messenger of the suitors of Penelope. He was slain by Ulysses.

IS (Ἰς: now Hiz), a city on the south of Mesopotamia, eight days' journey from Babylon, on the western bank of the Euphrates, and upon a little river of the same name. In its neighborhood were the springs of asphaltus, from which was obtained the bitumen that was used, instead of mortar, in the walls of Babylon.

ISSUS (Ἰσσιός). 1. One of the ten Attic orators, was born at Oalceia, and came to Athens at an early age. He was instructed in oratory by Lyaias and Isocrates. He was afterward engaged in writing judicial orations for others, and established a rhetorical school at Athens, in which Demosthenes is said to have been his pupil. It is further said that Issus composed for Demosthenes the speeches against his guardians, or at least assisted him in the composition. We have no particulars of his life. He lived between B.C. 420 and 348. Issus is said to have written sixty-four orations, but of these only eleven are extant. They all relate to questions of inheritance, and afford considerable information respecting this branch of the Attic law. The style of Issus is clear and concise, and, at the same time, vigorous and powerful. His orations are contained in the collections of the Greek orators. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. There is a good separate edition by Schömann, Greifswald, 1831.—2. A sophist and rhetorician, a native of Assyria, taught at Rome in the time of the younger Pliny.

ISAGORAS (Ἰσαγόρας), the leader of the oligarchical party at Athens, in opposition to Cleisthenes, B.C. 510. He was expelled from Athens by the popular party, although supported by Cleomenes and the Spartans.

ISANDER (Ἰσάνδρος), son of Bellerophon, killed by Mars (Ares) in the fight with the Solymi.

ISARA (now Izere), a river in Gallia Narbonensis, descends from the Graian Alps, flows west with a rapid stream, and flows into the Rhone north of Valentia. At its junction with the Rhone, Fabius Amilianus defeated the Allobroges and Arverni, B.C. 191.

ISAURIA (ἡ Ἰσαυρία, ἢ Ἰσαυρίς), a district of Asia Minor, on the northern side of the Taurus, between Pisidia and Cilicia, of which the ancients knew little beyond the troublesome fact that its inhabitants, the Isauri (Ἰσαυροί), were daring robbers, whose incursions into the surrounding districts received only a temporary

As Osiris, the god of the Nile, taught he use of the plough, so Isis inventation of wheat and barley, which about in the processions at her fes-was the goddess of the earth, which as called their mother: whence she were the only divinities that were by all the Egyptians. This simple e notion of the Egyptians was modified period through the influence of the East, with which Egypt came into contact, and at a later time through the influence of the Greeks. Thus Osiris and Isis came gradually to be considered as divinities of the sun and the moon. The Egyptian priests represented that the principal religious institutions of Greece came from Egypt; and, after the time of He- rodotus, this belief became established among the learned men in Greece. Hence Isis was identified with Ceres (Demeter), and Osiris with Bacchus (Dionysus), and the sufferings of Isis were accordingly modified to harmonize with the myths of the unfortunate Ceres (Demeter).

As Isis was the goddess of the moon, she was also identified with Io. Vid. Io. The worship of Isis prevailed extensively in Greece. It was introduced into Rome in the time of Sulla; and though the senate made many attempts to suppress her worship, and ordered her temples to be destroyed, yet the new religious rites took deep root at Rome, and became very popular.
In B.C. 43 the triumvirs courted the popular favor by building a new temple of Isis and Se- rapis. Augustus forbade any temples to be erected to Isis in the city; but this command was afterward disregarded; and under the early Roman emperors the worship of Isis and Se- rapis became firmly established. The most important temples of Isis at Rome stood in the Campus Martius, whence she was called Isis Campensis. The priests and servants of the goddess wore linen garments, whence she herself is called linigera. Those initiated in her mysteries wore in the public processions masks representing the heads of dogs. In works of art Isis appears in figure and countenance like Juno (Hera): she wears a long tunic, and her upper garment is fastened on her breast by a knot: her head is crowned with a lotus flower, and her right hand holds the sistrum. Her son Horus is often represented with her as a file-naked boy, holding the fore-finger on the mouth, with a lotus flower on his head, and a cornu-
mentioned by Tacitus is probably the same as Hertha.

[ISMARUS. Vid. ISMARUS.]

ISMARUS (Ισμαρος: Ισμαρίος), a town in Thracæ near Maronea, situated on a mountain of the same name, which produced excellent wine. It is mentioned in the Odyssey as a town of the Ci- cones. Near it was the Lake ISMARUS (Ισμαρίς).
The poets frequently use the adjective Isimarius as equivalent to Thracian. Thus Ovid calls Te- reus, king of Thracæ, Isimarius tyrannus (Am. ii, 6, 7), and Polymnestor, king of Thracæ, Isimarius rex (Met. xiii., 580).

ISMARUS (Ισμαρίς). 1. Daughter of Asopos, wife of Argus, and mother of Isasus and Io.—2.
Daughter of Œdipus and Jocasta, and sister of Antigona.

ISMARUS (Ισμαρός), a small river in Boeotia which rises in Mount Cithæron, flows through Thebes, and falls into the Lake Hylia. The brook Dirce, so celebrated in Theban story, flowed into the Ismenus. From this river Apollo was called Ismenius. His temple, the Ismenium, at which the festival of the Daphnephoria was celebrated, was situated outside the city. The river is said to have been originally called La- don, and to have derived its subsequent name from Ismenus, a son of Asopus and Metope. According to other traditions, Ismenus was a son of Amphion and Niobe, who, when struck by the arrow of Apollo, leaped into a river near Thebes, which was hence called Ismenus.

Ισοκράτης (Isokrátes). 1. One of the ten Attic orators, was the son of Theodorus, and was born at Athis B.C. 436. Theodorus was a man of wealth, and educated his son with the greatest care. Among his teachers were Thiasa, Gorgias, Prodicus, and also Socrates. Since Isocrates was naturally timid, and of a weakly constitution, he did not come forward as a public speaker himself, but devoted himself to giving instruction in oratory, and writing orations for others. He first taught rhetoric in Chios, and afterward at Athens. At the latter place he met with great success, and gradually acquired a large fortune by his profession. He had one hundred pupils, every one of whom paid him one thousand drachmas. He also derived a large income from the orations which he wrote for others; thus he received twenty talents for the speech which he composed for Nicocles, king of Cyprus. Although Isocrates took no part in public affairs, he was an ardent lover of his country; and, accordingly, when the battle of Chaeronea had destroyed the last hopes of freedom, he put an end to his life, B.C. 338, at the age of ninety-eight. The school of Isocrates exercised the greatest influence upon the development of public oratory at Athens. No other rhetorician had so many disciples of celebrity. The language of Isocrates forms a great contrast with the natural simplicity of Lysias, as well as with the sublime power of Demosthenes. His style is artificial. The carefully-rounded periods, and the frequent application of figurative expressions, are features which remind us of the sophists. The immense care he bestowed upon the composition of his orations may be inferred from the statement that he was engaged for ten, or, according to others, fifteen years, upon his Panegyric oration alone. There were in antiquity sixty orations which went under the name of Isocrates, but they were not all recognized as genuine. Only twenty-one have come down to us. Of these, eight were written for the courts; all the others are political discourses, intended to be read by a large public. The most celebrated is his Panegyric oration, in which he shows what services Athens had rendered to Greece in every period of her history, and contends that she, and not Sparta, deserves the supremacy in Greece. The orations are printed in the collections of the Greek orators. The best separate edition is by Baiter and Sauppe, Turici, 1839.—[2. Of Apollonia, a disciple of the foregoing, enjoyed considerable reputation as an orator; the titles of five of his orations are mentioned, but none have come down to us. Some critics have ascribed to him the ῥήγην ἡθροπυῖ, which was included among the works of Isocrates of Athens.]

ΙΣΣΑ (Issa), daughter of Macareus of Lesbos, and beloved by Apollo, from whom the Lesbian town of Issa is said to have received its name.

ΙΣΣΑ (Issus; now Lissa), a small island in the Adriatic Sea, with a town of the same name off the coast of Dalmatia, was colonized at an early period by Greeks. It was inhabited by a hardy race of sailors, whose barks (Issai; Issai) were much prized. The Issai placed themselves under the protection of the Romans when they were attacked by the Illyrian queen Teuta, B.C. 229 and their town is spoken of as a place of importance in Caesar's time.

Ισσηδώνες (Issēdōnes), a Scythian tribe, is Scythia extra Imaum, the easternmost people with whom the Greeks of the time of Herodotus had any intercourse. Their country was in Great Tartary, near the Massagetae, whom they resembled in their manners. They are represented as extending as far as the borders of Serica.

Issicus Sinus (ὁ Ἰσσηϊκὸς κόλπος; now Gulf of Iskenderoon), the deep gulf at the northeast corner of the Mediterranean, between Cilicia and Syria, named after the town of Issa. The width is about eight miles. The coast is much altered since ancient times.

Ισσηία (Issēia), a surname of Diana (Artemis), derived from Mount Issorion, in Laconia, on which she had a sanctuary.

Issus (Ἰσός, also Ἰσσοί, Xen.: Issos), a city in the southeastern extremity of Cilicia, near the head of the Issicus Sinus, and at the northern front of the pass of Mons Amanus called the Syrian Gates; memorable for the great battle in which Alexander defeated Darius Codomannus (B.C. 333), which was fought in a narrow valley near the town. It was at the time large and flourishing, but its importance was much diminished by the foundation of Alexandria in its neighborhood. Its exact site is doubtful.

ISTEA, a Greek historian, was at first a slave of Callimachus, and afterward his friend, and accordingly lived in the reign of Ptolemy Evergetes (B.C. 247-222). He wrote a large number of works, the most important of which was an Atthis, or history of Attica. His fragments are published by C. and Th. Müller, Fragmenta Histor. Græc., vol. i, p. 418-427.

ISTRA or ISTRIA, a peninsula at the northern extremity of the Adriatic, between the Sinus Tergestinus on the west and the Sinus Flanionis on the east. It was separated from Venetia on the northwest by the River Timavus, and from Illyricum on the east by the River Aris. Its inhabitants, the Istrai or Istrii, were a warlike Illyrian race, who carried on several wars with the Romans, till their final subjugation by the consul C. Claudius Pulcher, B.C. 177. Their chief towns were Tergeste and Pola. Istris was originally reckoned part of Illyricum, but from the time of Augustus it formed one of the divisions of Upper Italy. In consequence of its name, it was believed at one time that a branch of the River Ister (Danube) flowed into the Adriatic.

ΙΣΤΡΩΠΟΛΙΣ, ISTRAE or ISTRIA (Ἰστροπέωλις, Ἰστρος, Ἰστρος, Herod. ii, 33: now Istria), a town in Lower Macedonia, not far from the mouth of the Danube, and at a little distance from the coast, was a colony from Miletus.

Italia (Iraklia), signified, from the time of Augustus, the country which we call Italy. It was bounded on the west by the Mare Iugustum and Tyrrhenum, Tuscanum or Inferum; on the south by the Mare Siculum or Ansonium; on the east by the Mare Adriaticum or Superum; and on the north by the Alps, which sweep round it in a semicircle, the River Varus (now Fav. Fere) separating it on the northwest from Transalpine Gaul, and the River Arvis (now Arno) on the northeast from Illyricum. The name Italia, however, was originally used to indicate a much more limited extent of country. Most of the ancients, according to their usual custom, derived the name from an ancient king Iulus; but others, still more absurdly, connected it with the old Italian word Italus (in Oscan, aila or viala), an ox, because the country was rich in oxen! But there can be no doubt that Italia, or Vitalia, as it was also called, was the land of the Itali, Vitali, Vitali, or Vitali, an ancient race, who are better known under the name of Siculi. This race was widely spread over the southern half of the peninsula, and may be said to have been bounded on the north by a line drawn from Mount Garganus on the east to Taracina on the west. The Greeks were ignorant of this wide extent of the name. According to them, Italia was originally only the southernmost part of what was afterward called Scythium, and was bounded on the north by a line drawn from the Lametic to the Seylletic Gulf. They afterward extended the name to signify the whole country south of Poidea on the west and Tarentum on the east. After the Romans had conquered Tarentum and the southern part of the peninsula, about B.C. 272, the name Italia had a still further extension given to it. It then signified the whole country subject to the Romans, from the Sicilian Straits as far north as the Arno and the Rubico. The country north of these rivers continued to be called Gallia Cisalpina and Liguria down to the end of the republic. Augustus was the first who extended the name of Italia, so as to comprehend the whole of the basin of the Po and the southern part of the Alps, from the Maritime Alps to Pola in Istria, both inclusive. In the later times of the empire, when Maximian had transferred the imperial residence to Milan, the name Italia was again used in a narrower compass. As it had originally signified only the south of the country, so now it was restricted to the north, comprising the five provinces of Emilia, Liguria, Flaminia, Venetia, and Istria. Besides Italia, the country was called by various other names, especially by the poets. These were Hesperia, a name which the Greeks gave to it because it lay to the west of Greece, or Hesperia Magna, to distinguish it from Spain (and Hesperia), and Saturia, because Saturnus was said to have once reigned in Latium. The names of separate parts of Italy were also applied by the poets to the whole country. Thus it was called Ænotria, originally the land of the Ænotri, in the country afterward called Bruttium and Lucania; Ausonia, or Opica, or Ovicia, originally the land of the Ausones or Ausani, Opici or Osci, on the western coast, in the country afterward called Campania, Trasenna, properly the land of the Tyrrhens also on the western coast, north of Ansonia or Opica, and more especially in the country afterward called Æturia: Iapygia, properly the land of the Iapyges, on the eastern coast, in the country afterward called Calabria: and Owenica, the land of the Umbri, on the eastern coast, alongside of Æturia. Italy was never inhabited by one single race. It contained a great number of different races, who had migrated into the country at a very early period. The most ancient inhabitants were Pelaegians or Ænotrians, a branch of the same great race who originally inhabited Greece and the coasts of Asia Minor. They were also called Aborigines and Siculi, who, as we have already seen, were the same as the Vitali or Ituli. At the time when Roman history begins, Italy was inhabited by the following races. From the mouth of the Tiber, between its right bank and the sea, dwelt the Etruscans, who extended as far north as the Alps. Alongside of these, between the left bank of the Tiber and the Adriatic, dwelt the Umbrians. To the south of the Etruscans were the Sacriani, Casii, or Prisci, Oscan tribes, who had been driven out of the mountains by the Sabines, had overcome the Pelaegian tribes of the Siculi, Aborigines, or Latins, and, uniting with these conquered people, had formed the people called Prisci Latini, subsequently simply Latini. South of these again, as far as the River Lana, were the Opici, who were also called Ausones or Aurunci, and to whom the Volsi, Sidicini, Saticuli, and Æqui also belonged. The south of the peninsula was inhabited by the Ænotrians, who were subsequently driven into the interior by the numerous Greek colonies founded along the coast. South of the Umbrians, extending as far as Mount Garganus, dwelt the various Sabellian or Sabine tribes, the Sabines proper, the Peligni, Marsi, Marrucini, Vestini, and Hernici, from which tribes the warlike race of the Samnites subsequently sprung. From Mount Garganus to the southeastern extremity of the peninsula, the country was inhabited by the Daunians or Apulians, Peucetii, Messapii, and Salentini. An account of these people is given in separate articles. They were all eventually subdued by the Romans, who became the masters of the whole of the peninsula. At the time of Augustus the following were the chief divisions of Italy, an account of which is also given in separate articles: 1. UPPER ITALY, which extended from the Alps to the River Macra on the west and Rubico on the east. It comprehended, 1. Liguria. 2. GALLIA CISALPINA. 3. VENETIA, including Carnia. 4. ISTRIA.—II. CENTRAL ITALY, sometimes called ITALIA PROPRIA (a term not used by the ancients), to distinguish it from Gallia Cisalpina or Upper Italy, and Magna Græcia or Lower Italy, extended from the River Macra on the west and Rubico on the east, to the River Silarus on the west and Frento on the east. It comprehended, 1. Æturia. 2. UMBRIA. 3. PUGNUM. 4. SAMNIUM, including the country of the Sabini, Vestini, Marrucini, Marsi, Peligni &c. 5. LATUM. 6. CAMPANIA.—III. LOWER ITALY, or MAGNA GRÆCIA, included the remaining part of the peninsula, south of the River

Sicilia and Frento. It comprehended, 1. APULIA, including Calabria. 2. LUCANIA. 3. BRUTTIUM. Augustus divided Italy into the following eleven Regiones. 1. Latiun and Campania. 2. The land of the Hirpini, Apulia and Calabria. 3. Lucania and Bruttium. 4. The land of the Frentani, Marrucini, Peigni, Marsi, Vestini, and Sabini, together with Samnum. 5. Piceum. 6. Umbria and the district of Ariminum, in what was formerly called Gallia Cisalpina. 7. Etruria. 8. Gallia Cispadana. 9. Liguria. 10. The eastern part of Gallia Transpadana, Venetia, Carnia, and Istria. 11. The western part of Gallia Transpadana. The leading features of the physical geography of Italy are so well described by a modern writer, that we can not do better than quote his words. "The mere plan-geography of Italy gives us its shape and the position of its towns; to so it may add a semi-circle of mountains round the northern boundary, to represent the Alps; and another long line stretching down the middle of the country, to represent the Apennines. But let us carry this on a little further, and give life and harmony to what is at present at once lifeless and confused. Observe, in the first place, how the Apennine line, beginning from the southern extremity of the Alps, runs across Italy to the very edge of the Adriatic, and thus separates naturally the Italy proper of the Romans from Cisalpine Gaul. Observe, again, how the Alps, after running north and south where they divide Italy from France, turn then away to the eastward, running parallel to the Apennines, till they too touch the head of the Adriatic, on the confines of Istria. Thus between these two lines of mountains there is inclosed one great basin or plain; inclosed on three sides by mountains, open only on the east to the sea. Observe how widely it spreads itself out, and then see how well it is watered. One great river (the Po) flows through it in its whole extent; and this is fed by streams almost unnumbered, descending toward it on either side, from the Alps on one side, and from the Apennines on the other. Then, descending into Italy proper, we find the complexity of its geography quite in accordance with its manifold political divisions. It is not one simple central ridge of mountains, having a broad belt of level country on either side between it and the sea, nor yet is it a chain rising immediately from the sea on one side, like the Andes in South America, and leaving room therefore on the other side for wide plains of table-land, and for rivers with a sufficient length of course to become at last great and navigable. It is a back-bone, thickly set with spines of unequal length, some of them running out at regular distances parallel to each other, but others twisted so strangely that they often run for a long way parallel to the back-bone, or main ridge, and interlace with one another in a maze almost inextricable. And, as if to complete the disorder, in those spots where the spines of the Apennines, being twisted round, run parallel to the sea and to their own central chain, and thus leave an interval of plain between their bases and the Mediterranean, volcanic agency has broken up the space thus left with other and distinct groups of hills of its own creation, as in the case of Vesuvius and of the Alban hills near Rome. Speaking generally, Italy is made up of an infinite multitude of valleys pass in between high and steep hills, each forming a country to itself, and cut off by natural barriers from the others. Its several parts are isolated by nature, and no art of man can thoroughly unite them. Hence arises the romantic character of Italian scenery: the constant combination of a mountain outline, and all the wild features of a mountain country, with the wild vegetation of a southern climate in the valleys. More minute details respecting the physical features of the different parts of Italy are given in the articles on the separate provinces into which it is divided.

It was the birth-place of the emperors Trajan and Hadrian.—2. The name given to Corfinium by the Italian Socii during their war with Rome. Vid. CORFINIUM.

ITALICUS, SILIUS. Vid. SILIUS.

ITĀLOS (Ἰταλός), an ancient king of the Pelasgians, Sioulians, or Egeotians, from whom Italy was believed to have derived its name. Some call him a son of Telegonus by Penelope.

ITĀNUS (Ἰτάνος), a town on the eastern coast of Crete, near a promontory of the same name, founded by the Phœnicians.

ITHACA (Ἰθάκη: Ἰθάκη: now Thiaki), a small island in the Ionian Sea, celebrated as the birth-place of Ulysses, lies off the coast of Epirus, and is separated from Cephalonia by a channel about three or four miles wide. The island is about twelve miles long, and four in its greatest breadth. It is divided into two parts, which are connected by a narrow isthmus, not more than half a mile across. In each of these parts there is a mountain ridge of considerable height: the one in the north called Neritium (Νηρίτιον, now Anoi), and the one in the south Neium (Νήϊον, now Stefano). The city of Ithaca, the residence of Ulysses, was situated on a precipitous conical hill, now called Ato, or "eagle's cliff," occupying the whole breadth of the isthmus mentioned above. The acropolis, or castle of Ulysses, crowned the extreme summit of the mountain, and is described by a modern traveller as "about as bleak and dreary a spot as can well be imagined for a princely residence." Hence Cicero (De Orat., i, 44) describes it, in asperissimis caeculis tanquam nidulus affixa. It is at the foot of Mount Neium, and is hence described by Telemachus as "Under-Neium" (Ἰθάκῃς Τροφίου, Hom. Od., iii, 81). The walls of the ancient city are in many places well preserved. Ithaca is one of the seven Ionian islands under the protection of Great Britain. [ITĀLOUS (Ἰταλός), son of Pterelcus, a hero, from whom Ithaca was said to have derived its name.]

[ITĀKĒNĒS (Ἰθακῆνης), a Trojan or Lycaean warrior in the Iliad, father of Sthenelus.]

ITHOMĒ (Ἰθώμη: Ἰθωμήνη, Ἰθωμάς). 1. A strong fortress in Meessenia, situated on a mountain of the same name, which afterward formed the citadel of the town of Meessenia. On the summit of the mountain stood the ancient temof Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence surnamed Ithastias (Ἰθαστήας, Dor. Ἰθαμίας). Ithome was taken by the Spartans B. C. 723, at the end of the first Messenian war, after a heroic defence by Aristodemus, and again in 455, at the end of the third Messenian war.—2. A mountain fortress in Pelasgiotis, in Thessaly, near Metropolis, also called Thome.

Itius Portus, a harbor of the Morini, on the north-west coast of Gaul, from which Caesar set sail for Britain. The position of this harbor is much disputed. It used to be identified with Gesoriacum or Boulogne, but it is now usually supposed to be some harbor near Calais, probably Passeus or Wissant.

Iton. Vid. ITONIA.

ITONIA, ITONIAS, or ITONIS (Ἰτωνία, Ἰτωνίς, or Ἰτωνίς), a surname of Minerva (Athena), derived from the town of Iton, in the south of Phthiotis in Thessaly. The goddess there had a celebrated sanctuary and festivals, and hence is called Iacolia Itoni. From Iton her worship spread into Boeotia and the country about Lake Copais, where the Pambœotia was celebrated, in the neighborhood of a temple and grove of Minerva (Athena). According to another tradition, Minerva (Athena) received the surname of Itonia from Itonus, a king or priest.

ITURCI (Ἰτῦρκε, App.) a town in Hispania Bætica, in the district of Hispalis, and a Roman colony, under the name of Virtus Julia.

ITUNA (now Solway Firth), an estuary on the western coast of Britain, between England and Scotland.

ITURÆA, ITURÆA (Ἰτουραία: Ἰτουραῖοι, Ituræi, Ituræi: now El-Jezir), a district on the north-eastern borders of Palestine, bounded on the north by the plain of Damascus, on the west by the mountain-chain (now Jebel-Heish) which forms the eastern margin of the valley of the Jordan, on the southwest and south by Gaulanitis, and on the east by Auranitis and Trachonitis. It occupied a part of the elevated plain into which Mount Hermon sinks down on the southeast, and was inhabited by an Arabian people, of warlike and predatory habits, which they exercised upon the caravans from Arabia to Damascus, whose great road lay through their country. In the wars between the Syrians and the Israelites, they are found acting as allies of the kings of Damascus. They are scarcely heard of again till B.C. 105, when they were conquered by the Asmonean king of Judah, Aristobulus, who compelled them to profess Judaism. Restored to independence by the decline of the Asmonean house, they seized the opportunity offered on the other side, by the weakness of the kings of Syria, to press their predatory incursions into Coele-Syria, and even beyond Lebanon, to Byblos, Botrys, and other cities on the coast of Phœnicia. Pompey reduced them again to order, and many of their warriors entered the Roman army, in which they became celebrated for their skill in horsemanship and archery. They were not, however, reduced to complete subjection to Rome until after the civil wars Augustus gave Ituræa, which had been hitherto ruled by its native princes, to the family of Herod. During the ministry of our Saviour, it was governed by Philip, the brother of Herod Antipas, as tetrarch. Upon Philip's death in A.D. 37, it was united to the Roman province of Syria, from which it was presently again separated, and assigned partly to Herod Agrippa I., and partly to Sossanus, the prince of Emesa. In A.D. 60 it was finally reunited by Claudius to the Roman province of Syria, and there are inscriptions which prove that the Ituræans continued to serve with distinction in the Roman armies. There were no cities or large towns in the country, a fact easily explained by the unsettled character of the people, who lived in the Arab fashion, in unwall'd villager and tents, and even, according to some statements, in the natural caves with which the country abounds.

[ITYMONÆUS (Ἰτυμονεύς), son of Hyperochus of Elis, slain by Nestor.]

ITVA. 1. Vid. ITRANA.—[2. A Trojan hero, accompanied Æneas to Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

ITOLIS (Ἰουλίς: Ἰουλιεύς, Itulieus), the chief town in Cœcis; the birth-place of Simonides. Vid. CECIS.

ITOLUS. 1. Son of Æneas, usually called Ascanius. Vid. ASCANIUS.—2. Eldest son of Ascanius, who claimed the government of Latium, but was obliged to give it up to his brother Silvius.

IXION (Ἰξίων), son of Phlegyas, or of Antion and Perimela, or of Pasion, or of Mars (Ares). According to the common tradition, his mother was Dia, a daughter of Deioneus. He was king of the Lapithæ or Phlegyæ, and the father of Pirithous. When Deioneus demanded of Ixion the bridal gifts he had promised, Ixion treacherously invited him to a banquet, and then contrived to make him fall into a pit filled with fire. As no one purified Ixion of this treacherous murder, Jupiter (Zeus) took pity upon him, purified him, carried him to heaven, and caused him to sit down at his table. But Ixion was ungrateful to the father of the gods, and attempted to win the love of Juno (Hera). Jupiter (Zeus) thereupon created a phantom resembling Juno (Hera), and by it Ixion became the father of a Centaur. Vid. CENTAURI. Ixion was fearfully punished for his impious ingratitude. His hands and feet were chained by Mercury (Hermes) to a wheel, which is said to have rolled perpetually in the air or in the lower world. He is further said to have been scourged, and compelled to exclaim, "Benefactors should be honored."

IXIONIDES, i. e., Pirithous, the son of Ixion. The Centaurs are also called Ixonides.

IXIUS (Ἰξίος), a surname of Apollo, derived from a district of the island of Rhodes which was called Ixiæ or Ixia.

LYNX (Ἰνυξ), daughter of Peitho and Pan, or of Echo. She endeavored to charm Jupiter (Zeus), or make him fall in love with Io; but she was metamorphosed by Juno (Hera) into the bird called lynx.

J.

JACONTANI, a people in Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Pyrenees and the Iberia.

JANA. Vid. JANUS.

JANICULUM. Vid. ROMA.

JANUS and JANA, a pair of ancient Latin divinities, who were worshipped as the sun and moon. The names Janus and Jana are only other forms of Dianus and Diana, which words contain the same root as die, day. Janus was worshipped both by the Etruscans and Romans, and occupied an important place in the Roman religion. He presided over the beginning of every thing, and was therefore always invoked first in every undertaking, even before Jupiter. He opened the year and the seasons, and hence the first month of the year was called after him. He was the porter of heaven, and therefore bore the surnames Patulcus or Patulcius, the " opener," and Clusius or Clusivius, the " shutter." In this capacity he is represented with a key in his left hand, and a staff or sceptre in his right. On earth also he was the guardian deity of gates, and hence is commonly represented with two heads, because every door looks two ways (Janus bifrons). He is sometimes represented with four heads (Janus quadrifrons), because he presided over the four seasons. Most of the attributes of this god, which are very numerous, are connected with his being the god who opens and shuts; and this latter idea probably has reference to his original character as the god of the sun, in connection with the alternations of day and night. At Rome, Numa is said to have dedicated to Janus the covered passage bearing his name, which was opened in times of war, and closed in times of peace. This passage is commonly, but erroneously, called a temple. It stood close by the forum. It appears to have been left open in war to indicate symbolically that the god had gone out to assist the Roman warriors, and to have been shut in times of peace, that the god, the safeguard of the city, was not escape. A temple of Janus was built by C. Duilius in the time of the first Punic war; it was restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. On new year's day, which was the principal festival of the god, people gave presents to one another, consisting of sweetmeats and copper coins, showing on one side the double head of Janus, and on the other a ship. The general name for these presents was strenæ. The sacrifices offered to Janus consisted of cakes (called janual), barley, incense, and wine.

JASON (Ἰάσον). 1. The celebrated leader of the Argonauts, was a son of Æson and Poly-mede or Alcimede, and belonged to the family of the Æolids, at Iolcus in Thessaly. Cre-theus, who had founded Iolcus, was succeeded by his son Æson; but the latter was deprived of the kingdom by his half brother Pelias, who attempted to take the life of the infant Jason. He was saved by his friends, who pretended that he was dead, and intrusted him to the care of the centaur Chiron. Pelias was now warned by an oracle to be on his guard against the one sandaled man. When Jason had grown up, he came to claim the throne. As he entered the market-place, Pelias, perceiving he had only one sandal, asked him who he was; whereupon Jason declared his name, and demanded the kingdom. Pelias consented to surrender it to him, but persuaded him to remove the curse which rested on the family of the Æolids by fetching the golden fleece and slaying the spirit of Phrixus. Another tradition related that Pelias, once upon a time, invited all his subjects to a sacrifice, which he intended to offer to Neptune (Poseidon). Jason came with the rest, but on his journey to Iolcus he lost one of his sandals in crossing the River Anae-ros. Pelias, remembering the oracle about the one-sandaled man, asked Jason what he would do if he were told by an oracle that he should be killed by one of his subjects? Jason, on the suggestion of Juno (Hera), who hated Pelias, answered, that he would send him to fetch the golden fleece. Pelias accordingly ordered Jason to fetch the golden fleece, which was in the possession of King Æetes, in Colchis, and was guarded by an over-watchful dragon. Jason willingly undertook the enterprise, and set sail in the ship Argo, accompanied by the chief heroes of Greece. He obtained the fleece with the assistance of Medea, whom he made his wife, and along with whom he returned to Iolcus. The history of his exploits on this memorable enterprise, and his adventures on his return home, are related elsewhere. Vid. ARGONAUTÆ. On his arrival at Iolcus, Jason, according to one account, found his aged father Æson still alive, and Medea made him young again; but, according to the more common tradition, Æson had been slain by Pelias during the absence of Jason, who accordingly called upon Medea to take vengeance on Pelias. Medea thereupon persuaded the daughters of Pelias to cut their father to pieces and boil him, in order to restore him to youth and vigor, as she had before changed a ram into a lamb by boiling the body in a cauldron. But Pelias was never restored to life, and his son Acastus expelled Jason and Medea from Iolcus. They then went to Corinth, where they lived happily for several years, until Jason deserted Medea, in order to marry Glauce or Creusa, daughter of Creon, the king of the country. Medea fearfully revenged this insult. She sent Glauce a poisoned garment, which burned her to death when she put it on. Creon likewise perished in the flames. Medea also killed her children by Jason, viz. Mermers and Phereas, and then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. Later writers represent Jason as becoming in the end reconciled to Medea, returning with her to Colchis, and there restoring Æetes to his kingdom, of which he had been deprived. The death of Jason is related differently. According to some, he made away with himself from grief; according to others, he was crushed by the poop of the ship Argo, which fell upon him as he was lying under it.—2. Tyrant of Phæris and Tagus of Thessaly (vid. Dict. of Antiq., art. TAGUS), was probably the son of Lycophron, who established a tyranny on the ruins of aristocracy at Phæris. He succeeded his father as tyrant of Phæris soon after B.C. 395, and in a few years extended his power over almost the whole of Thessaly. Phæris was the only city in Thessaly which maintained its independence under the government of Polydamus; but even this place submitted to him in 375. In the following year (374) he was elected Tagus or generalissimo of Thessaly. His power was strengthened by the weakness of the other Greek states, and by the exhausting contest in which Thebes and Sparta were engaged. He was now in a position which held out to him every prospect of becoming master of Greece; but when at the height of his power, he was assassinated at a public audience, 870. Jason had an insatiable appetite for power, which he sought to gratify by any and every means. With the chief men in the several states of Greece, as, e. g., with Timotheus and Pelopidas, he cultivated friendly relations. He is represented as having all the qualifications of a great general and diplomatist—as active, temperate, prudent, capable of enduring much fatigue, and skillful in concealing his own designs and penetrating those of his enemies. He was an admirer of the rhetoric of Gorgias; and Isocrates was one of his friends.—3. Of Argos, an historian, lived under Hadrian, and wrote a work on Greece in four books.

JAVOLENUS PRISCUS, an eminent Roman jurist, was born about the commencement of the reign of Vespasian (A.D. 79), and was one of the council of Antoninus Pius. He was a pupil of Celsus Sabinus, and a leader of the Sabinian or Cassian school. Vid. p. 170, b. There are two hundred and six extracts from Javolenus in the Digest.

JAXARTES (Ἰαξάρτης: now Syr, Sydera, or Sydom), a great river of Central Asia, about which the ancient accounts are very different and confused. It rises in the Comedi Montes (now Moumow), and flows northwest into the Sea of Aral: the ancients supposed it to fall into the northern side of the Caspian, not distinguishing between the two seas. It divided Sogdiana from Scythia. On its banks dwelt a Scythian tribe called Jaxartes.

JERICO or HIRKANUS (Ἰεριχά, Ἰεριχός: now Er-Riha? ruins), a city of the Canaanites, in a plain on the western side of the Jordan, near its mouth, was destroyed by Joshua, rebuilt in the time of the Judges, and formed an important frontier fortress of Judah. It was again destroyed by Vespasian, rebuilt under Hadrian, and finally destroyed during the crusades.

JEROM. Vid. HIERONYMUS.

JERUSALEM or HIEROSOLYMA (Ἱερουσόλημ, Ἱεροσόλυμα: Ἱεροσολυμίτης: now Jerusalem, Arab. El Kuds, i. e., the Holy City), the capital of Palestine in Asia. At the time of the Israelitish conquest of Canaan, under Joshua, Jerusalem, then called Jebus, was the chief city of the Jebusites, a Canaanitish tribe, who were not entirely driven out from it till B.C. 1050, when David took the city, and made it the capital of the kingdom of Israel. It was also established as the permanent centre of the Jewish religion, by the erection of the temple of Solomon. After the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam, it remained the capital of the kingdom of Judah until it was entirely destroyed, and its inhabitants were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, B.C. 588. In B.C. 536, the Jewish exiles, having been permitted by Cyrus to return, began to rebuild the city and temple; and the work was completed in about twenty-four years. In B.C. 332 Jerusalem quickly submitted to Alexander. During the wars which followed his death, the city was taken by Ptolemy, the son of Lagus (B.C. 320), and remained subject to the Greek kings of Egypt till the conquest of Palestine by Antiochus III the Great, king of Syria, B.C. 198. Up to this time the Jews had been allowed the free enjoyment of their religion and their own internal government, and Antiochus confirmed them in these privileges; but the altered government of his son, Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, provoked a rebellion, which was at first put down when Antiochus took Jerusalem and polluted the temple (B.C. 170); but the religious persecution which ensued drove the people to despair, and led to a new revolt under the Maccabees, by whom Jerusalem was retaken, and the temple purified in B.C. 163. Vid. MACCABEÆ. In B.C. 138 Jerusalem was retaken by Antiochus VII. Sidetes, and its fortifications dismantled, but its government was left in the hands of the Maccabees, John Hyrcanus, who took advantage of the death of Antiochus in Parthia (B.C. 128) to recover his full power. His son Aristobulus assumed the title of king of Judah, and Jerusalem continued to be the capital of the kingdom till B.C. 63, when it was taken by Pompey, and the temple was again profaned. For the events which followed, vid. HYRCANUS, HIRKANUS, and PALESTINA. In A.D. 70, the rebellion of the Jews against the Romans was put down, and Jerusalem was taken by Titus, after a siege of several months, during which the inhabitants endured the utmost horrors; the survivors were all put to the sword or sold as slaves, and the city and temple were utterly razed to the ground. In consequence of a new revolt of the Jews, the Emperor Hadrian resolved to destroy all vestiges of their national and religious peculiarities; and, as one means to this end, he established a new Roman colony, on the ground where Jerusalem had stood, by the name of ÆLIA CAPITOLINA, and built a temple of Jupiter Capitolinus on the site of the temple of Jehovah. A.D. 136. The establishment of Christianity as the religion of the Roman empire restored to Jerusalem its sacred character, and led to the erection of several churches; but the various changes which have taken place in it since its conquest by the Arabs under Omar in A.D. 638, have left very few vestiges even of the Roman city. Jerusalem stands due west of the head of the Dead Sea, at the distance of about twenty miles (in a straight line), and about thirty-five miles from the Mediterranean, on an elevated platform, divided, by a series of valleys, from hills which surround it on every side. This platform has a general slope from west to east, its highest point being the summit of Mount Zion, in the southwestern corner of the city, on which stood the original "City of David." The southeastern part of the platform is occupied by the hill called Moriah, on which the temple stood, and the eastern part by the hill called Acra; but these two summits are now hardly distinguishable from the general surface of the platform, probably on account of the gradual filling up of the valleys between. The height of Mount Zion is two thousand five hundred and thirty-five feet above the level of the Mediterranean, and about three hundred feet above the valley below. The extent of the platform is five thousand four hundred feet from north to south, and one thousand one hundred feet from east to west.

JOCASTE (Ἰοκάστη), called EPICASTE in Homer, daughter of Menoeceus, and wife of the Theban king Laius, by whom she became the mother of Œdipus. She afterward married Œdipus, not knowing that he was her son; and when she discovered the crime she had unwittingly committed, she put an end to her life. For details, vid. ŒDIPUS.

JOPPE, JOPPA (Ἰόππη: in the Old Testament, Japho: now Jaffa), a very ancient maritime city of Palestine, and, before the building of Cæsarea, the only sea-port of the whole country, and therefore called by Strabo the port of Jerusalem, lay just south of the boundary between Judæa and Samaria, southwest of Antipatris, and northwest of Jerusalem.

JORDANES (Ἰορδάνης, Ἰόρδανος: now Jordan, Arab. Esh-Sheriah el-Kebir, or el-Urdun), has its source at the southern foot of Mons Hermon (the southernmost part of Anti-Libanus), [about twenty miles above] Paneas (afterward Cæsarea Philippi), whence it flows south into the little lake Semechonitis (now Bahr el-Huleh), and thence [after a course of twelve miles] into the Sea of Galilee (Lake of Tiberias), and thence through a narrow plain, depressed below the level of the surrounding country, into the Lake Asphaltites (now Dead Sea), where it is finally lost. Vid. PALESTINA. Its course, from the Lake of Tiberias to the Dead Sea, [in a distance of sixty miles, is, according to Lieutenant Lynch, about two hundred miles, and within that distance there are no less than twenty-seven considerable rapids, with many others of less descent; thus giving an average of five feet descent to the mile in its whole extent]; the depression through which it runs consists, first, of a sandy valley, from five to ten miles broad, within which is a lower valley, in width about half a mile, and, for the most part, beautifully clothed with grass and trees; and, in some places, there is still a lower valley within this. The average width of the river itself is calculated at thirty yards, and its average depth at nine feet. It is fordable in many places in summer, but in spring it becomes much deeper, and often overflows its banks. Its bed is considerably below the level of the Mediterranean.

JORNANDES or JORDANES, an historian, lived in the times of Justinian, or in the sixth century of our era. He was a Goth by birth; was secretary to the King of the Alani, adopted the Christian religion, took orders, and was made a bishop in Italy. There is not sufficient evidence for the common statement that he was bishop of Ravenna. He wrote two historical works in the Latin language: 1. De Getarum (Gothorum) Origine et Rebus Gestis, containing the history of the Goths from the earliest times down to their subjugation by Belisarius in 541. The work is abridged from the lost history of the Goths by Cassiodorus, to which Jornandes added various particulars; but it is compiled without judgment, and is characterized by partiality to the Goths. 2. De Regnorum ac Temporum Successione, a short compendium of history from the creation down to the victory obtained by Narses in 552 over King Theodatus. It is only valuable for some accounts of the barbarous nations of the North, and the countries which they inhabited. Edited by Lindenbrog, Hamburg, 1611.

JOSEPHUS, FLAVIUS, the Jewish historian, was born at Jerusalem A.D. 37. On his mother's side he was descended from the Asmonean princes, while from his father, Matthias, he inherited the priestly office. He enjoyed an excellent education; and at the age of twenty-six he went to Rome to plead the cause of some Jewish priests whom Felix, the procurator of Judæa, had sent thither as prisoners. After a narrow escape from death by shipwreck, he safely landed at Puteoli; and being introduced to Poppæa, he not only effected the release of his friends, but received great presents from the empress. On his return to Jerusalem he found his countrymen eagerly bent on a revolt from Rome, from which he used his best endeavors to dissuade them; but failing in this, he professed to enter into the popular designs. He was chosen one of the generals of the Jews, and was sent to manage affairs in Galilee. When Vespasian and his army entered Galilee, Josephus threw himself into Iotapata, which he defended for forty-seven days. When the place was taken, the life of Josephus was spared by Vespasian through the intercession of Titus. Josephus thereupon assumed the character of a prophet, and predicted to Vespasian that the empire should one day be his and his son's. Vespasian treated him with respect, but did not release him from captivity till he was proclaimed emperor nearly three years afterward (A.D. 70). Josephus was present with Titus at the siege of Jerusalem, and afterward accompanied him to Rome. He received the freedom of the city from Vespasian, who assigned him, as a residence, a house formerly occupied by himself, and treated him honorably to the end of his reign. The same favor was extended to him by Titus and Domitian as well. He assumed the name of Flavius, as a dependent of the Flavian family. His time at Rome appears to have been employed mainly in the composition of his works. He died about 106. The works of Josephus are written in Greek. They are, 1. The History of the Jewish War (Ἡστορία τοῦ Ἰουδαϊκοῦ πολέμου ἢ Ἰουδαϊκῆς ἱστορίας περὶ ὁλώσεως), in seven books, published about A.D. 75. Josephus first wrote it in Hebrew, and then translated it into Greek. It commences with the capture of Jerusalem by Antiochus Epiphanes in B.C. 170, runs rapidly over the events before Josephus's own time, and gives a detailed account of the fatal war with Rome. 2. The Jewish Antiquities (Ἰουδαϊκῆς ἀρχαῖολογίας) in twenty books, completed about A.D. 93, and addressed to Epaphroditus. The title as well as the number of books may have been suggested by the Ῥωμαϊκῆς ἀρχαῖολογίας of Dionysius of Halicarnassus. It gives an account of Jewish history from the creation of the world to A.D. 66, the twelfth year of Nero, in which the Jews were goaded to rebellion by Gessius Florus. In this work Josephus seeks to accommodate the Jewish religion to heathen taste and prejudices. Thus he speaks of Moses and his law in a tone which might be adopted by any disbeliever in his divine legation. He says that Abraham went into Egypt (Gen. xii.), intending to adopt the Egyptian views of religion to find them better than his own. He doubtfully of the preservation of Jonah's whale. He intimates a doubt of there being any miracle in the passage of the ark, and compares it with the passage of the Great galley above of the sea of Tyberias. He interprets Exod. xxii, 28, obeyed a command to respect the idols of the heathen. Many similar instances might be found from his work. 8. His own Life, in which is an appendage to the Archæology addressed to the same Epaphroditus; was not written earlier than A.D. 97, as Juba II. is mentioned in it as no longer alive. A treatise on the Antiquity of the Jews, as Apion, in two books, also addressed to Epaphroditus. It is in answer to such as denied the antiquity of the Jewish nation on the ground of the silence of Greek writers relative to Arion. The treatise exhibits acquaintance with Greek literature and history. 5. Εἰς Μακκαβαίων ἑκ περ ἀποκριτικῶν, in one book. Its genuineness is not doubted. It is a declamatory account of the life of Eleazar (an aged priest), and of his death and their mother, in the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes. The best edition is by Hudson, Oxon., 1720; in camp. Amst., 1726; [and by W. Dindorf's Bibliotheca Græca; the best edition of the Jewish War, separately, is by Cardus, 1837, 2 vols.]

6. FLAVIUS CLAUDIUS, was elected emperor in June, A.D. 268, after the death of Julian (vid. JULIANUS), whom he had defeated in his campaign against the Persians beyond the Tigris, and several times in Mesopotamia. He died suddenly at Armin on the frontiers of Bithynia and Phrygia, January 17, 364, after a reign of little more than seven months. Jovian was a Christian; he protected the heathens.

7. JUBA. 1. King of Numidia, was son of Juba I., who was re-established on the throne of Numidia by Pompey. On the breaking out of the war between Caesar and Pompey, he sided with the cause of the latter; and, when Caesar sent Curio into Africa, he supported the Pompeian general with a large body of troops. Curio was defeated by their united forces, and fell in battle.

2. In 46 Juba fought along with Scipio against himself, and was present at the battle of Thapsus. After this defeat he fled about for some time, and then put an end to his own life.—3. King of Mauretania, preceding, was a mere child at his death (46), was carried a prisoner to Caesar, and compelled to grace the triumph. He was brought up in Rome, where he received an excellent education, and applied himself with such diligence to study, that he ranked one of the most learned men of the age.

4. After the death of Antony (30), he was conferred upon Juba his paternal kingdom of Numidia, and, at the same time, a marriage Cleopatra, otherwise called the daughter of Antony and Cleopatra. In the subsequent period (45) Augustus gave him

Mauretania in exchange for Numidia, which was reduced to a Roman province. He continued to reign in Mauretania till his death, which happened about A.D. 19. He was beloved by his subjects, among whom he endeavored to introduce the elements of Greek and Roman civilization; and, after his death, they even paid him divine honors. Juba wrote a great number of works in almost every branch of literature. They are all lost, with the exception of a few fragments. They appear to have been all written in Greek. The most important of them were, 1. A History of Africa (Ἀἰθιοπία), in which he made use of Punic authorities. 2. On the Assyrians. 3. A History of Armenia. 4. A Roman History (Ῥωμαϊκὴ ἱστορία). 5. Geographical Topography, a general treatise on all matters connected with the stage. 6. Περὶ γαλακτικῆς, or περὶ γαλακτικῶν, seems to have been a general history of painting. He also wrote some treatises on botany and on grammatical subjects. [The few fragments of Juba's historical works still extant are collected in Müller's Fragn. Hist. Græc., vol. iii., p. 445-484.]

JUDÆA, JUDEA. Vid. PALESTINA.

JUGURTHA, a German people, sometimes described as a Gothic, and sometimes as an Alemannic tribe.

JUGURTHA (Ἰουγούρθας Ἰουγούρθας), king of Numidia, was an illegitimate son of Mastanabal, and a grandson of Masinissa. He lost his father at an early age, but was adopted by his uncle Micipsa, who brought him up with his own sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal. Jugurtha quickly distinguished himself both by his abilities and his skill in all bodily exercises, and rose to so much favor and popularity with the Numidians, that he began to excite the jealousy of Micipsa. In order to remove him to a distance, Micipsa sent him, in B.C. 134, with an auxiliary force, to assist Scipio against Numantia. Here his zeal, courage, and ability gained for him the favor and commendation of Scipio, and of all the leading nobles in the Roman camp. On his return to Numidia he was received with honor by Micipsa, who was obliged to dissemble the fears which he entertained of his ambitious nephew. Micipsa died in 118, leaving the kingdom to Jugurtha and his two sons, Hiempsal and Adherbal, in common. Jugurtha soon showed that he aspired to the sole sovereignty of the country. In the course of the same year he found an opportunity to assassinate Hiempsal at Thimida, and afterward defeated Adherbal in battle. Adherbal fled to Rome to invoke the assistance of the senate; but Jugurtha, by a lavish distribution of bribes, counteracted the just complaints of his enemy. The senate decreed that the kingdom of Numidia should be equally divided between the two competitors; but the senators intrusted with the execution of this decree were also bribed by Jugurtha, who thus succeeded in obtaining the western division of the kingdom, adjacent to Mauretania, by far the larger and richer portion of the two (117). But this advantage was far from contenting him. Shortly afterward he invaded the territories of Adherbal with a large army, and defeated him. Adherbal made his escape to the strong fortress of Cirta, where he was closely blockaded by Jugurtha. The Romans commanded Jugurtha to abstain from further hostilities, but he paid no attention to their commands, and at length gained possession of Cirta, and put Adherbal to death, 111. War was now declared against Jugurtha at Rome, and the consul, L. Calpurnius Bestia, was sent into Africa, 111. Jugurtha had recourse to his customary arts; and, by means of large sums of money given to Bestia and M. Scaturus, his principal lieutenant, he purchased from them a favorable peace. The conduct of Bestia invited the greatest indignation at Rome, and Jugurtha was summoned to the city under a safe conduct, the popular party hoping to be able to convict the nobility by means of his evidence. The scheme, however, failed; since one of the tribunes, who had been gained over by the friends of Bestia and Scaturus, forbade the king to give evidence. Soon afterward Jugurtha was compelled to leave Italy, in consequence of his having ventured on the assassination of Massiva, whose counter-influence he regarded with apprehension. Vid. MASSIVA. The war was now renewed; but the consul, Sp. Postumius Albinus, who arrived to conduct it (110), was able to effect nothing against Jugurtha. When the consul went to Rome to hold the comitia, he left his brother Aulus in command of the army. Aulus was defeated by Jugurtha; great part of his army was cut to pieces, and the rest only escaped a similar fate by the ignominy of passing under the yoke. But this disgrace at once roused all the spirit of the Roman people: the treaty concluded by Aulus was instantly annulled; and the consul Q. Cassilius Metellus was sent into Africa at the head of a new army (109). Metellus was an able general and an upright man, whom Jugurtha was unable to cope with in the field, or to seduce by bribes. In the course of two years Metellus frequently defeated Jugurtha, and at length drove him to take refuge among the Gætulians. In 107 Metellus was succeeded in the command by Marius; but the cause of Jugurtha had meantime been espoused by his father-in-law Bocchus, king of Mauretania, who had advanced to his support with a large army. The united forces of Jugurtha and Bocchus were defeated in a decisive battle by Marius; and Bocchus purchased the forgiveness of the Romans by surrendering his son-in-law to Sulla, the quaestor of Marius (106). Jugurtha remained in captivity till the return of Marius to Rome, when, after adorning the triumph of his conqueror (Jan. 1, 104), he was thrown into a dungeon, and there starved to death.

JULIA. 1. Aunt of Cæsar the dictator, and wife of C. Marius the elder. She died B.C. 68, and her nephew pronounced her funeral oration. —2. Mother of M. Antonius the triumvir. In the proscription of the triumvirate (43) she saved the life of her brother, L. Cæsar. Vid. CÆSAR, No. 5. —3. Sister of Cæsar the dictator, and wife of M. Atius Balbus, by whom she had Atia, the mother of Augustus. Vid. ATIA. —4. Daughter of Cæsar the dictator, by Cornelia, and his only child in marriage, was married to Qn. Pompey in 59. She was a woman of beauty and virtue, and was tenderly attached to her husband, although twenty-three years older than herself. She died in childbirth in 54. —5. Daughter of Augustus by Scribonia, and his only child was born in 39. She was educated with great strictness, but grew up one of the most prodigious women of her age. She was thrice married: first, to M. Marcellus, her first cousin, in 26; secondly, after his death (23) without issue, to M. Agrippa, by whom she had three sons, Q. and L. Cæsar, and Agrippa Postumus, and two daughters, Julia and Agrippina; and thirdly, after Agrippa's death in 12, to Tiberius Nero, the future emperor. In B.C. 2 Augustus at length became acquainted with the misconduct of his daughter, whose notorious adulteries had been one reason why her husband Tiberius had quitted Italy four years before. Augustus was incensed beyond measure, and banished her to Pandataria, an island off the coast of Campania. At the end of five years she was removed to Rhegium, but she was never suffered to quit the bounds of the city. Even the testament of Augustus showed the inflexibility of his anger. He bequeathed her no legacy, and forbade her ashes to repose in his mausoleum. Tiberius, on his accession (A.D. 14), deprived her of almost all the necessaries of life, and she died in the course of the same year. —6. Daughter of the preceding, and wife of L. Æmilius Paulus. She inherited her mother's licentiousness, and was, in consequence, banished by her grandfather Augustus to the little island Tremernia, on the coast of Apulia, A.D. 9, where she lived nearly twenty years. She died in 28. It was probably this Julia whom Ovid celebrated as Corinna in his elegies and other erotic poems; and his intrigues with her appear to have been the cause of the poet's banishment in A.D. 9. —7. Youngest child of Germanicus and Agrippina, was born A.D. 18; was married to M. Vipsianus in 38; and was banished in 37 by her brother Caligula, who was believed to have had an incestuous intercourse with her. She was recalled by Claudius, but was afterward put to death by this emperor at Messalina's instigation. The charge brought against her was adultery, and Seneca, the philosopher, was banished to Corsica as the partaker of her guilt. —8. Daughter of Drusus and Livia, the sister of Germanicus. She was married, A.D. 20, to her first cousin, Nero, son of Germanicus and Agrippina, and, after Nero's death, to Rubellius Plautus, by whom she had a son, Rubellius Plautus. She, too, was put to death by Claudius, at the instigation of Messalina, 59. —9. Daughter of Titus, the son of Vespasian, married Flavius Sabina, a nephew of the Emperor Vespasian. Julia died of abortion, caused by her uncle Domitian, with whom she lived in criminal intercourse. —10. DOMINA. Vid. DOMINA. —11. DOMELLA. Vid. DOMELLA. —12. MAMA. Vid. MAMA.

JULIA GENA, one of the most ancient patrician houses at Rome, was of Alban origin, and was removed to Rome by Tullus Hostilius upon the destruction of Alba Longa. It claimed descent from the mythical Iulus, the son of Venus and Anchises. The most distinguished family in the gens is that of CÆSAR. Under the empire we find an immense number of persons of the name of Julius, the most important of whom are spoken of under their surnames.

His army suffered much from the heat, want of water, and provisions, and he was at length compelled to retreat. The Persians now appeared and fearfully harassed his rear. Still the Romans remained victorious in many a bloody engagement; but in the last battle fought on the 26th of June, Julian was mortally wounded by an arrow, and died in the course of the day. Jovian was chosen emperor in his stead, on the field of battle. VID. JOVIANUS. Julian was an extraordinary character. As a monarch, he was indefatigable in his attention to business, upright in his administration, and comprehensive in his views; as a man, he was virtuous in the midst of a profligate age, and did not yield to the luxurious temptations to which he was exposed. In consequence of his apostasy he has been calumniated by Christian writers; but, for the same reason, he has been unduly extolled by heathen authors. He wrote a large number of works, many of which are extant. He was a man of reflection and thought, but possessed no creative genius. He did not, however, write merely for the sake of writing, like so many of his contemporaries; his works show that he had his subjects really at heart, and that in literature as well as in business his extraordinary activity arose from the wants of a powerful mind, which desired to improve itself and the world. The style of Julian is remarkably pure, and is a close imitation of the style of the classical Greek writers. The following are his most important works: 1. Letters, most of which were intended for public circulation, and are of great importance for the history of the time. Edited by Heyler, Mainz, 1828.—2. Orations, on various subjects, as, for instance, On the Emperor Constantius, On the worship of the sun, On the mother of the gods (Cybele), On true and false Cynicism, &c.—3. The Caesar, or the Banquet (Kaisarēs ē Symposion), a satirical composition, which is one of the most agreeable and instructive productions of ancient wit. Julian describes the Roman emperors approaching one after the other to take their seat round a table in the heavens; and as they come up, their faults, vices, and crimes are censured with a sort of bitter mirth by old Silenus, whereupon each Caesar defends himself as well as he can. Edited by Heusinger, Gotha, 1786, and by Harless, Erlangen, 1788.—4. Misopogon, or the Enemy of the Beard (Kat' Epithymon), a severe satire on the licentious and effeminate manners of the inhabitants of Antioch, who had ridiculed Julian, when he resided in the city, on account of his austere virtues, and had laughed at his allowing his beard to grow in the ancient fashion.—5. Against the Christians (Kat' Χριστιανῶν). This work is lost, but some extracts from it are given in Oyrill's reply to it, which is still extant. The best edition of the collected works of Julian is by Spanheim, Lips. 1696.

JULIANUS, SALVICUS, an eminent Roman jurist, who flourished under Hadrian and the Antonines. He was præfectus urbi, and twice consul, but his name does not appear in the Fasti. By the order of Hadrian, he drew up the edictum perpetuum, which forms an epoch in the history of Roman jurisprudence. His work appears to have consisted in collecting and arranging the clauses which the pretors were accustomed to insert in their annual edict, in condensing the materials, and in omitting antiquated provisions. He was a voluminous legal writer, and his works are cited in the Digest.

JUNIA. 1. Half-sister of M. Brutus, the murderer of Cæsar, and wife of M. Lepidus, the triumvir.—2. TERtia or TRATULLA, own sister of the preceding, was the wife of C. Cassius, one of Cæsar's murderers. She survived her husband a long while, and did not die till A.D. 22.

JUNIA GENA, an ancient patrician house at Rome, to which belonged the celebrated M. Junius Brutus, who took such an active part in expelling the Tarquins. But afterward the gens appears as only a plebeian one. Under the republic the chief families were those of BRUTUS, BUBICULUS, GRAECIANUS, NORBANUS, PULLUS, SILANUS. The Junii who lived under the empire are likewise spoken of under their various surnames.

JUNO, called HERA by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. HERA. The word Ju-no contains the same root as Jupiter. As Jupiter is the king of heaven and of the gods, so Juno is the queen of heaven, or the female Jupiter. She was worshipped at home as the queen of heaven, from early times, with the surname of Regina. At a later period her worship was solemnly transferred from Veii to Rome, where a sanctuary was dedicated to her on the Aventine. As Jupiter was the protector of the male sex, so Juno watched over the female sex. She was supposed to accompany every woman through life, from the moment of her birth to her death. Hence she bore the special surnames of Virginialis and Matrona, as well as the general ones of Opigena and Sospita, and under the last-mentioned name she was worshipped at Lanuvium. On their birth-day women offered sacrifices to Juno surnamed Natalis, just as men sacrificed to their genius natalis. The great festival, celebrated by all the women, in honor of Juno, was called Matronalia (vid. Dict. of Antiq., a. v.), and took place on the 1st of March. Her protection of women, and especially her power of making them fruitful, is further alluded to in the festival Populifugi: (Dict. of Antiq., a. v.), as well as in the surname of Febralis, Febrata, Februta, or Februalis. Juno was further, like Saturn, the guardian of the finances, and under the name of Moneta she had a temple on the Capitoline Hill, which contained the mint. The most important period in a woman's life is that of her marriage, and she was therefore believed especially to preside over marriage. Hence she was called Juga or Jugalis, and had a variety of other names, such as Pronuba, Ovinia, Lacina, &c. The month of June, which is said to have been originally called Junonia, was considered to be the most favorable period for marrying. Women in childbirth invoked Juno Lacina to help them, and newly-born children were likewise under her protection; hence she was sometimes confounded with the Greek Artemis or Ilithyia. In Etruria she was worshipped under the name of Opura. She was also worshipped at Falerii, Lanuvium, Aricia, Tibur, Praeneste, and other places. In the representations of the Roman Juno that have come down to us, the type of the Greek Hera is commonly adopted.

JUPITER, called Zeus by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. Vid. ZEUS. Jupiter was originally an elemental divinity, and his name signifies the father or lord of heaven, being a contraction of Diem pater or Dispiter. Being the lord of heaven, he was worshipped as the god of rain, storms, thunder, and lightning, whence he had the epithets of Pluvius, Fulgurator, Tonitrualis, Imans, and Fulminator. As the pebble or flint stone was regarded as the symbol of lightning, Jupiter was frequently represented with such a stone in his hand instead of a thunderbolt. In concluding a treaty, the Romans took the sacred symbols of Jupiter, viz. the sceptre and flint stone, together with some grass from his temple, and the oath taken on such an occasion was expressed by per Jovem Lapidem jurat. In consequence of his possessing such power over the elements, and especially of his always having the thunderbolt at his command, he was regarded as the highest and most powerful among the gods. Hence he is called the Best and Most High (Optimus Maximus). His temple at Rome stood on the lofty hill of the Capitol, whence he derived the surnames of Capitolinus and Tarpeius. He was regarded as the special protector of Rome. As such he was worshipped by the consuls on entering upon their office; and the triumph of a victorious general was a solemn procession to his temple. He therefore bore the surnames of Imperator, Victor, Inviclus, Stator, Opitulus, Feretrius, Predator, Triumphator, and the like. Under all these surnames he had temples or statues at Rome; and two temples, viz. those of Jupiter Stator and of Jupiter Feretrius, were believed to have been built in the time of Romulus. Under the name of Jupiter Capitolinus, he presided over the great Roman games; and under the name of Jupiter Latiaris or Latiaris, over the Feræ Latine. Jupiter, according to the belief of the Romans, determined the course of all human affairs. He foresaw the future, and the events happening in it were the results of his will. He revealed the future to man through signs in the heavens and the flight of birds, which are hence called the messengers of Jupiter, while the god himself is designated as Prodigiarius, that is, the sender of prodigies.

one reason the god was invoked at the beginning of every undertaking, whether profane, together with Janus, who began himself. Jupiter was furnished as the guardian of law, and as lord of justice and virtue. He maintained an oath, and presided over oaths which were based upon faithfulness. Hence Fides was his companion in the Capitol, along with Victoria; and aid to his country, and persons injured, were thrown down from the sky. As Jupiter was the lord of light, consequently the prince of light, color was sacred to him, white sacrificed to him, his chariot was borne drawn by four white horses, his white caps, and the consuls wore white when they offered sacrifices in the day they entered on their office. of Jupiter at Rome was under the of the Flamen Dialis, who was the rank of all the flamines. Vid. Dict. t. FLAMEN. The Romans, in their awe of the god, adopted the type of him.

J. 3. JUSTINUS, surnamed the GREAT, emperor of the East, A.D. 527–565. He was born in Illyria, A.D. 483; was adopted by the Emperor Justinus, in 520; became emperor in 527; married the beautiful actress, Theodora, who exercised influence over him; and died in the crown to his nephew, Justin II. During the greater part of his reign, a man of orthodoxy, and thus he received ecclesiastical writers the title of orthodoxus. Toward the end of his life he became a devotee of the adherents of Nestorius. His foreign wars were glorious, but his domestic were won by his generals. The Vandals in Africa were overthrown, and their king Gelimer led to Constantinople; and the kingdom of the Goths in Italy was likewise destroyed by the successive victories of Belisarius and Narses. J. 4. BELISARIUS, NARSIS. Justinian's general, with many public building-magnificences; but the cost of their wars, and the expenses of his foreign wars, led him to impose many new taxes, constantly increased by the natural rapacity of the emperor. Justinian's work of Justinian in his legislation, to establish a perfect system of law for all his dominions; and, to make two great collections, one of imperial constitutions, the other of the works of jurists. His first work was the collection of the imperial constitutions. This he commenced in 528, in the second year of his reign. The task was intrusted to a commission of ten, who completed their labors in the following year (529); and their collection was declared to be law under the title of Justinianus Codex. In 530, Tribonian, who had been one of the commission of ten employed in drawing up the Code, was authorized by the emperor to select fellow-laborers to assist him in the other division of the undertaking. Tribonian selected sixteen coadjutors, and this commission proceeded at once to lay under contribution the works of those jurists who had received from former emperors "auctoritatem conscribendarum interpretandique legum." They were ordered to divide their materials into fifty books, and to subdivide each book into Titles (Tituli). Nothing that was valuable was to be excluded, nothing that was obsolete was to be admitted, and neither repetition nor inconsistency was to be allowed. This work was to bear the name Digesta or Pandectæ. The work was completed, in accordance with the instructions that had been given, in the short space of three years; and on the 30th of December, 529, it received from the imperial sanction the authority of law. It comprehends upward of nine thousand extracts, in the selection of which the compilers made use of nearly two thousand different books, containing more than three million lines. The Code and the Digest contained a complete body of law; but as they were not adapted to elementary instruction, a commission was appointed, consisting of Tribonian, Theophilus, and Dorotheus, to compose an institutional work, which should contain the elements of the law (legum institutio), and should not be encumbered with useless matter. Accordingly, they produced a treatise under the title of Institutiones, which was based on elementary works of a similar character, but chiefly on the Institutiones of Gaius. Vid. GAIUS. The Institutiones consisted of four books, and were published with the imperial sanction at the same time as the Digest. After the publication of the Digest and the Institutiones, fifty decisions and some new constitutions also were promulgated by the emperor. This rendered a revision of the Code necessary; and, accordingly, a new Code was promulgated at Constantinople on the 16th of November, 529, and the use of the decisions, of the new constitutions, and of the first edition of the Code was forbidden. The second edition (Code Repetitio Prælectionis) is the code that we now possess, in twelve books, each of which is divided into titles. Justinian subsequently published various new constitutions, to which he gave the name of Novellæ Constitutiones. These Constitutions form a kind of supplement to the Code, and were published at various times from 535 to 565, but most of them appeared between 535 and 539. It does not seem, however, that any official compilation of these Novellæ appeared in the lifetime of Justinian. The four legislative works of Justinian, the Institutiones, Digesta or Pandectæ, Code, and Novellæ, are included under the general name of Corpus Juris Civilis, and form the Roman law, as received in Europe. The best editions of the Corpus for general use are by Gothofredus and Van Leeuwen, Amst., 1663, 2 vols. fol.; by Geubauer and Spangenberg, Götting, 1776-1797, 2 vols. 4to; and by Beck, Lips., 1838, 2 vols. 4to.

JUSTINA. 1. The historian, of uncertain date, but who did not live later than the fourth or fifth century of our era, is the author of an extant work entitled Historiarum Philippicarum Libri XLIV. This work is taken from the Historia Philippica of Trogius Pompeius, who lived at the time of Augustus. The title Philippica was given to it, because its main object was to give the history of the Macedonian monarchy, with all its branches; but in the execution of this design, Trogius permitted himself to indulge in so many excursions, that the work formed a kind of universal history from the rise of the Assyrian monarchy to the conquest of the East by Rome. The original work of Trogius, which was one of great value, is lost. The work of Justin is not so much an abridgment of that of Trogius, as a selection of such parts as seemed to him most worthy of being generally known. Edited by Grævius, Lugd. Bat., 1683; by Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1719 and 1760; and by Frotscher, Lips., 1827, 3 vols. — 2. Surnamed the MARTYR, one of the earliest of the Christian writers, was born about A.D. 103, at Flavia Neapolis, the Shechem of the Old Testament, a city in Samaria. He was brought up as a heathen, and in his youth studied the Greek philosophy with zeal and ardor. He was afterward converted to Christianity. He retained as a Christian the garb of a philosopher, but devoted himself to the propagation, by writing and otherwise, of the faith which he had embraced. He was put to death at Rome in the persecution under Marcus Antoninus, about 165. Justin wrote a large number of works in Greek, several of which have come down to us. Of these the most important are, 1. An Apology for the Christians, addressed to Antoninus Pius, about 139; 2. A Second Apology for the Christians, addressed to the emperors M. Aurelius and L. Verus; 3. A Dialogue with Trypho the Jew, in which Justin defends Christianity against the objections of Trypho. The best edition of the collected works of Justin is by Otto, Jena, 1842-1844, 2 vols. 8vo; [second edition, Jena, 1848-50, 3 vols. 8vo.]

JUSTUS, a Jewish historian of Tiberias in Galilee, was a contemporary of the historian Josephus, who was very hostile to him.

JUTURNA, the nymph of a fountain in Latium, famous for its healing qualities. Its water was used in nearly all sacrifices; a chapel was dedicated to its nymph at Rome in the Campus Martius by Lutatius Catulus; and sacrifices were offered to her on the 11th of January. A pond in the forum, between the temples of Castor and Vesta, was called Lacus Juturnæ, whence we must infer that the name of the nymph Juturna is not connected with juria, but probably with jutare. She is said to have been beloved by Jupiter, who rewarded her with immortality and the rule over the waters. Some writers call her the wife of Janus and mother of Fontus, but in the Æneid she appears as the affectionate sister of Turnus.

JUVAVIM or JUVAVIA (now Salsburg), a town in Noricum, on the River Jovavus or Isonta

(now Salsa), was a Roman colony founded by Hadrian, and the residence of the Roman governor of the province. It was destroyed by the Heruli in the fifth century, but was afterward rebuilt.

JUVENALIS, DÉCIMUS JUVENIS, the Great Roman satirist, but of whose life we have few authentic particulars. His ancient biographers relate that he was either the son or the "alumnus" of a rich freedman; that he occupied himself, until he had nearly reached the term of middle life in declaiming; that, having subsequently composed some clever lines upon Paris the pantomime, he was induced to cultivate assiduously satirical composition; and that, in consequence of his attacks upon Paris becoming known to the court, the poet, although now an old man of eighty, was appointed to the command of a body of troops, in a remote district of Egypt, where he died shortly afterward. It is supposed by some that the Paris who was attacked by Juvenal was the contemporary of Domitian, and that the poet was accordingly banished by this emperor. But this opinion is clearly untenable. 1. We know that Paris was killed in A.D. 83, upon suspicion of an intrigue with the Empress Domitia. 2. The fourth satire, as appears from the concluding lines, was written after the death of Domitian, that is, not earlier than 96. 3. The first satire, as we learn from the forty-ninth line, was written after the condemnation of Marius Priscus, that is, not earlier than 109. These positions admit of no doubt; and hence it is established that Juvenal was alive at least seventeen years after the death of Paris, and that some of his satires were composed after the death of Domitian. The only facts with regard to Juvenal upon which we can implicitly rely are, that he flourished toward the close of the first century; that Aquinum, if not the place of his nativity, was at least his chosen residence (Sat. iii, 319); and that he is, in all probability, the friend whom Martial addresses in three epigrams. There is, perhaps, another circumstance which we may admit. We are told that he declaimed for many years of his life; and every page in his writings bears evidence to the accuracy of this assertion. Each piece is a finished rhetorical essay, energetic, glowing and sonorous. He denounces vice in the most indignant terms; but the obvious tone of exaggeration which pervades all his invective leaves us in doubt how far this sustained passion is real, and how far assumed for show. The extant works of Juvenal consist of sixteen satires, the last being a fragment of very doubtful authenticity, all composed in heroic hexameters. Edited by Ruperti, Lips., 1819; and by Heinrich, Bonn, 1839.

LABIÆNUS. 1. T., tribune of the plebs B.C. 68, the year of Cæsar's consulship. Under pretence of avenging his uncle's death, who had joined Saturninus (100), and had perished along with the other conspirators, he accused Rabirius of perduellio or high treason. Rabirius was defended by Cæsar. Vid. RAMAUS. In his tribuneship Labienus was entirely devoted to Cæsar's interests. Accordingly, when Cæsar went into Transalpine Gaul in 58, he took Labienus with him as his legatus. Labienus continued with Cæsar during the greater part of his campaigns in Gaul, and was the ablest officer he had. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he deserted Cæsar and joined Pompey. His defection caused the greatest joy among the Pompeian party; but he disappointed the expectations of his new friends, and never performed any thing of importance. He fought against his old commander at the battle of Pharsalia in Greece, 48, at the battle of Thapsus in Africa, 46, and at the battle of Munda in Spain, 45. He was slain in the last of these battles.—2. Q., son of the preceding, joined the party of Brutus and Cassius after the murder of Cæsar, and was sent by them into Parthia to seek aid from Orodes, the Parthian king. Before he could obtain any definite answer from Orodes, the news came of the battle of Philippi, 42. Two years afterward he persuaded Orodes to intrust him with the command of a Parthian army; and Pacorus, the son of Orodes, was associated with him in the command. In 40 they crossed the Euphrates and met with great success. They defeated Decidius Saxa, the lieutenant of Antony, obtained possession of the two great towns of Antioch and Apamea, and penetrated into Asia Minor. But in the following year, 39, P. Ventidius, the most able of Antony's legates, defeated the Parthians. Labienus fled in disguise into Cilicia, where he was apprehended and put to death.—3. T., a celebrated orator and historian in the reign of Augustus, either son or grandson of No. 1. He retained all the republican feelings of his family, and never became reconciled to the imperial government, but took every opportunity to attack Augustus and his friends. His enemies obtained a decree of the senate that all his writings should be burned; whereupon he shut himself up in the tomb of his ancestors, and thus perished, about A.D. 12.

The Labynetius who is mentioned by Herodotus (I, 77) as a contemporary of Cyrus and Croesus is the same with the Belshazzar of the prophet Daniel. LACHES (Λάχης), an Athenian commander in the Peloponnesian war, is first mentioned in B.C. 427. He fell at the battle of Mantinea, 418. In the dialogue of Plato which bears his name, he is represented as not over-acute in argument, and with temper on a par with his stoutness.

It possessed a celebrated temple of Juno, who was worshipped here under the surname of Lacinia. The remains of this temple are still extant, and have given the modern name to the promontory, Capo delle Colonne or Capo di Nao (ναός). Hieronymus dedicated in this temple a bilingual inscription (in Punic and Greek), which recorded the history of his campaigns, and of which Polybius made use in writing his history.

LACONICA (Λακωνία), sometimes called Laconia by the Romans, a country of Peloponnesus was bounded on the north by Argolis and Arcadia, on the west by Messenia, and on the east and south by the sea. Laconica was a long valley, running southward to the sea, and was inclosed on three sides by mountains. On the north it was separated by Mount Paron from Argolis, and by Mount Sciritis from Arcadia. It was bounded by Mount Taygetus on the west and by Mount Paron on the east, which are two masses of mountains extending from Arcadia to the southern extremities of the Peloponnesus, Mount Taygetus terminating at the Promontorium Tænarum, and Mount Paron continued under the names of Thornax and Zarex, terminating at the Promontorium Malea. The River Eurotas flows through the valley lying between these mountain masses, and falls into the Laconian Gulf. In the upper part of its course the valley is narrow, and near Sparta the mountains approach so close to each other as to leave little more than room for the channel of the river. It is for this reason that we find the vale of Sparta called the hollow Lacedæmon. Below Sparta the mountains recede, and the valley opens out into a plain of considerable extent. The soil of this plain is poor, but on the slopes of the mountains there is land of considerable fertility. There were valuable marble quarries near Tænarus. Off the coast shell-fish were caught, which produced a purple dye inferior only to the Tyrian. Laconica is well described by Euripides as difficult of access to an enemy. On the north the country could only be invaded by the valleys of the Eurotas and the Cénus; the range of Taygetus formed an almost insuperable barrier on the west; and the want of good harbors on the eastern coast protected it from invasion by sea on that side. Sparta was the only town of importance in the country. Vid SPARTA. The most ancient inhabitants of the country are said to have been Olynurians and Leleges. They were expelled or conquered by the Achæans, who were the inhabitants of the country in the heroic age. The Dorians afterward invaded Peloponnesus and became the ruling race in Laconica. Some of the old Achæan inhabitants were reduced to slavery; but a great number of them became subjects of the Dorians under the name of Periæci (Περιῆκται). The general name for the inhabitants is LACONES (Λάκωνες) or LACEDÆMONIUS (Λακεδαίμωνιος); but the Periæci are frequently called Lacedæmonii, to distinguish them from the Spartans.

LACTANTIUS, a celebrated Christian father but his exact name, the place of his activity

date of his birth, are uncertain. In works we find him denominated Lactius Imerius Lactantius; but the two formations, in the second of which Cavil- is substituted for Cælius, are omitted MSS., while the two latter are frequent in an inverted order. Since then of as far advanced in life about he must have been born not later than the end of the third century, probably in Abul at Firmum, on the Adriatic, and studied in Africa, where he became of Amobius, who taught rhetoric at his fame became so widely extended, 301 he was invited by Diocletian to Nicomedia, and there to practice his art. In this period he appears to have become famous. He was summoned to Gaul about the year 305, when now an old man, to superintend the education of Crispus, son of Constantine, who probably died at Treves some ten or twelve years afterward (325-330). The extant works of Lactantius are, 1. Divinarum Institutionum VII., a sort of introduction to the Christian religion, intended to supersede the less perfect works of Minucius Felix, Tertullian, and others. Each of the seven books bears a separate title: (1.) De Falsa Religione. (2.) De Erroribus. (3.) De Falsa Sapientia. (4.) De Falsa Philosophia. (5.) De Falsa Religione. (6.) De Falsa Philosophia. (7.) De Vita Beata.—II. An the Institutions.—III. De Ira Dei.—IV. De Formations Homini- bus Persecutorum.—V. Various Poems which were probably not written by him.

The style of Lactantius, formed by the style of the great orator of Rome, has him the appellation of the Christian Cicero not undeservedly. The best edition is by Le Brun and Lenglet du Ruis, 1743.

placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars.—[2. An Arcadian, companion and friend of Arcas, slain by Halesus.]

Ladon (Λαδων). 1. A river in Arcadia, which rose near Clitor, and fell into the Alpheus between Hierax and Phrixus. In mythology Ladon is the husband of Stymphalia, and the father of Daphne and Metope.—2. A small river in Elis, which rose on the frontiers of Achaia and fell into the Peneus.

Lactantia, a people on the eastern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the mouth of the River Rubicon (now Lobregat), probably the same as the Lactantia, whose country, Lactantia, produced good wine, and whose chief town was Barcino.

Lelaps (Λαλλας), i. e., the storm wind, personified in the legend of the dog of Procris which bore this name. Procris had received this swift animal from Diana (Artemis), and gave it to her husband Cephalus. When the Teumessian fox was sent to punish the Thebans, Cephalus sent the dog Lelaps against the fox. The dog overtook the fox, but Jupiter (Zeus) changed both animals into a stone, which was shown in the neighborhood of Thebes.

Lælius, one of the thirty tyrants, emperor in Gaul after the death of Postumus, A.D. 267, was slain, after a few months, by his own soldiers, who proclaimed Victorinus in his stead.

Lælius. 1. C., was from early manhood the friend and companion of Scipio Africanus the elder, and fought under him in almost all his campaigns. He was consul B.C. 190, and obtained the province of Cisalpine Gaul.—2. C., surnamed Sarum, son of the preceding. His intimacy with Scipio Africanus the younger was as remarkable as his father's friendship with the elder, and it obtained an imperishable monument in Cicero's treatise Lælius sive de Amicitia. He was born about 186, was tribune of the plebs 151, prætor 145, and consul 140. Though not devoid of military talents, as his campaign against the Lusitanian Viriathus proved, he was more of a statesman than a soldier, and more of a philosopher than a statesman. From Diogenes of Babylon, and afterward from Panætius, he imbibed the doctrines of the Stoic school; his father's friend Polybius was his friend also; the wit and idiom of Terence were pointed and polished by his and Scipio's conversation; and the satirist Lucilius was his familiar companion. The political opinions of Lælius were different at different periods of his life. He endeavored, probably during his tribunate, to procure a redivision of the public land, but he desisted from the attempt, and for his forbearance received the appellation of the Wise or the Prudent. He afterward became a strenuous supporter of the aristocratical party. Several of his orations were extant in the time of Cicero, but were characterized more by smoothness (lenitas) than by power. Lælius is the principal interlocutor in Cicero's dialogue De Amicitia, and is one of the speakers in the De Senectute and in the De Republica. 2. His two daughters were married, the one to Q. Mucius Scaevola, the other to C. Fannius Strabo. The opinion of his worth seems to have been universal, and it is one of Seneca's agitations to his friend Lucilius "to live like Lælius."

LÆNAS, POPILIUS, plebeians. The family was unfavorably distinguished, even among the Romans, for their sternness, cruelty, and haughtiness of character. 1. M., four times consul, B. C. 359, 356, 350, 348. In his third consulship (350) he won a hard-fought battle against the Gauls, for which he celebrated a triumph—the first ever obtained by a plebeian.—2. M., prætor 176, consul 172, and censor 159. In his consulship he defeated the Ligurian mountaineers; and when the remainder of the tribe surrendered to him, he sold them all as slaves.—3. C., brother of No. 2, was consul 172. He was afterward sent as ambassador to Antiochus, king of Syria, whom the senate wished to abstain from hostilities against Egypt. Antiochus was just marching upon Alexandria when Popilius gave him the letter of the senate, which the king read, and proposed to take into consideration with his friends. Popilius straightway described with his case a circle in the sand round the king, and ordered him not to stir out of it before he had given a decisive answer. This boldness so frightened Antiochus, that he at once yielded to the demand of Rome.—4. P., consul 132, the year after the murder of Tib. Gracchus. He was charged by the victorious aristocratical party with the prosecution of the accomplices of Gracchus; and in this odious task he showed all the hard-heartedness of his family. He subsequently withdrew himself, by voluntary exile, from the vengeance of C. Gracchus, and did not return to Rome till after his death.

LAËRTEES (Λαέρτης), king of Ithaca, was son of Aëolus and Chalcomedusa, and husband of Aëria, by whom he became the father of Ulysses and Ctimene. Some writers call Ulysses the son of Siaphus. Vid. ANTICLEA. Laertes took part in the Calydonian hunt, and in the expedition of the Argonauts. He was still alive when Ulysses returned to Ithaca after the fall of Troy.

LAËRTIUS, DIOGÈNES. Vid. DIOGÈNES.

LAËSTRYGONES (Λαοστρυγόνες), a savage race of cannibals, whom Ulysses encountered in his wanderings. They were governed by ANTIPHATES and LAMUS. They belong, however, to mythology rather than to history. The modern interpreters of Homer place them on the north-western coast of Sicily. The Greeks themselves placed them on the eastern coast of the island, in the plains of Leontini, which are therefore called Laistrygonii Campi. The Romans, however, and more especially the Roman poets, who regarded the Promontorium Circeium as the Homeric island of Circe, transplanted the Laëstrygones to the southern coast of Latium, in the neighborhood of Formis, which they supposed to have been built by Larnus, the king of this people. Hence Horace (Carm., iii, 16, 34) speaks of Laistrygonia Bacchus in amphora, that is, Formian wine; and Ovid (Mét., xiv, 233) calls Formis Laistrygonia Lami Urbs.

LAËVI or LÆVI, a Ligurian people in Gallia

LÆVINUS, VALENTIS. 1. P., consul B.C. 200, had the conduct of the war against Pyrrhus. The king wrote to Lævinus, offering to arbitrate between Rome and Tarentum; but Lævinus bluntly bade him mind his own business, and begone to Epirus. An Epirot spy having been taken in the Roman lines, Lævinus showed him the legions under arms, and bade him tell his master, if he was curious about the Roman arms and tactics, to come and see them himself. In the battle which followed, Lævinus was defeated by Pyrrhus on the banks of the Siris.—2. M., prætor 215, crossed over to Greece and carried on war against Philip. He continued in the command in Greece till 211, when he was elected consul in his absence. In his consulship (210) he carried on the war in Sicily, and took Agrigentum. He continued as præconsul in Sicily for several years, and in 208 made a descent upon the coast of Africa. He died 200, and his sons Publius and Marcus honored his memory with funeral games and gladiatorial combats, exhibited during four successive days in the forum.—3. C., son of No. 2, was by the mother's side brother of M. Fulvius Nobilior, consul 189. Lævinus was himself consul in 175, and carried on war against the Ligurians.

LACOS, a city in great Phrygia.

LACUS (Λαῦκος), a Macedonian of obscure birth, was the father, or reputed father, of Ptolemy, the founder of the Egyptian monarchy. He married Arsinoë, a concubine of Philip of Macedon, who was said to have been pregnant at the time of their marriage, on which account the Macedonians generally looked upon Ptolemy as the son of Philip.

LAIIS (Λαίς), the name of two celebrated Grecian Hetærae or courtezans. 1. The elder, a native probably of Corinth, lived in the time of the Peloponnesian war, and was celebrated as the most beautiful woman of her age. She was notorious also for her avarice and caprice.—2. The younger, was the daughter of Timandra, and was probably born at Hyccara in Sicily. According to some accounts she was brought to Corinth when seven years old, having been taken prisoner in the Athenian expedition to Sicily, and bought by a Corinthian. This story, however, involves numerous difficulties, and seems to have arisen from a confusion between this Laïs and the elder one of the same name. She was a contemporary and rival of Phryne. She became enamored of a Thessalian named Hippolochus or Hippostratus, and accompanied him to Thessaly. Here, it is said, some Thessalian women, jealous of her beauty, enticed her into a temple of Venus (Aphrodite), and there stoned her to death.

LAMPONIA or -IUM (Λαμπώνεια, -ώνιον), an important city of Mysia, in the interior of the Troad, near the borders of Æolia.

[LAMPONIUS M., a Lucanian, one of the principal captains of the Italians in the war of the allies with Rome, B.C. 90-88.]

LAMPRA, LAMPRAE, or LAMPTRAE (Λαμπρά, Λαμπραι, Λαμπτραί: Λαμπρίς; now Lamoria), a demus on the western coast of Attica, near the promontory Aestypalaea, belonging to the tribe Erechtheis. It was divided into an upper and a lower city.

LAMPRIIDIUS, ÆLIUS, one of the Scriptores Historie Auguste, lived in the reigns of Diocletian and Constantine, and wrote the lives of the emperors: 1. Commodus; 2. Antoninus Didymenus; 3. Elagabalus; and, 4. Alexander Severus. It is not improbable that Lampridius is the same as Spartianus, and that the name of the author in full was Ælius Lampridius Spartianus. For the editions of Lampridius vid CAPITOLINUS.

[LAMPROLES (Λαμπροκλής). 1. The eldest son of Socrates.—2. An Athenian dithyrambic poet and musician, who probably flourished at the end of the sixth or beginning of the fifth century B.C.]

LAMPRAECUS (Λάμπρακος: Λαμπρακνός; ruins at Lapeaki) an important city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, on the coast of the Hellespont, possessed a good harbor. It was celebrated for its wine; and hence it was one of the cities assigned by Xerxes to Themistocles for his main tenance. It was the chief seat of the worship of Priapus, and the birth-place of the historian Charon, the philosophers Adimantus and Metrodorus, and the rhetorician Anaximenes. Lampeacus was a colony of the Phocæans: the name of the surrounding district, Bebrycia connects its old inhabitants with the Thracian BEBRYCES.

[LAMPUS (Λάμπος). 1. A son of Laomedon and father of Dolon, was one of the Trojans aiders.—2. The name of two houses one belonging to Aurora (Eos), the other to Hector.]

LAMUS (Λάμυς). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon), and king of the Læstrygones, was said to have founded Formiae in Italy. Vid. FORMIÆ.—[2. A Rutulian leader, slain by Nisus.]

LAMUS (Λάμυς; now Lamas), a river of Cilicia, the boundary between Cilicia Aspera and Cilicia Campestris; with a town of the same name.

ΛΑΜΑΞΑ (Λάμαξα). 1. Grand-daughter of Hercules, carried away from the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Dodona by Pyrrhus, son of Achilles, bore him eight children.—2. Daughter of Agathocles, wife of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus; left him to marry Demetrius Poliorcetes.]

LANCIA (Lancienses). 1. (Now Sollanoo or Sollancia, near Leon), a town of the Astures in Hispania Tarraconensis, nine miles east of Legio, was destroyed by the Romans.—2. Sur-named OFFIDANA, a town of the Vettones in Lusitania, not far from the sources of the River Munda.—[3. L. TRANSCUDANA (now Ciudad Rodrigo), a town of Hispania, east of No. 2, so called from lying on the other side of the river Ouda (now Coa).]

LANGOBARDI or LONGOBARDI, corrupted into LOMBARDS, a German tribe of the Suevic race. They dwelt originally on the left bank of the Elbe, near the River Saale; but they afterward crossed the Elbe, and dwelt on the eastern bank of the river, where they were for a time subject to Maroboduus in the reign of Tiberius. After this they disappear from history for four centuries. Like most of the other German tribes, they migrated southward; and in the second half of the fifth century we find them again on the northern bank of the Danube, in Upper Hungary. Here they defeated and almost annihilated the Heruli. In the middle of the sixth century they crossed the Danube, at the invitation of Justinian, and settled in Pannonia. Here they were engaged for thirty years in a desperate conflict with the Gepids, which only ended with the extermination of the latter people. In A.D. 568, Alboin, the king of the Lombards, under whose command they had defeated the Gepids, led his nation across the Julian Alps, and conquered the plains of Northern Italy, which received and have ever since retained the name of Lombardy. Here he founded the celebrated kingdom of the Lombards, which existed for upward of two centuries, till its overthrow by Charlemagne. Paulus Diaconus, who was a Lombard by birth, derives their name of Langobardi from their long beards; but modern critics reject this etymology, and suppose the name to have reference to their dwelling on the banks of the Elbe, inasmuch as Börde signifies in low German a fertile plain on the bank of a river, and there is still a district in Magdeburg called the lange Börde. Paulus Diaconus also states that the Lombards came originally from Scandinavia, where they were called Veniti, and that they did not receive the name of Langobardi or Long-Beards till they settled in Germany; but this statement ought probably to be rejected.

LANTIS (Λαντίη), nurse of Alexander the Great, and sister of Clitus.

ΛΑΝΟΥΡΙΟΝ (Lanuvium; now Lanagna), an ancient city in Latium, situated on a hill of the Alban Mount, not far from the Appia Via, and subsequently a Roman municipium. It possessed an ancient and celebrated temple of Juno Sospita. Under the empire it obtained some importance as the birth-place of Arminius Pius. Part of the walls of Lanuvium and the substructions of the temple of Juno are still remaining.

ΛΑΟΚΩΟΝ (Λαοκῶν), a Trojan, who plays a prominent part in the post-Iliadic legends, was a son of Antenor or Acetes, and a priest of the Thymbraean Apollo. He tried to dissuade his countrymen from drawing into the city the wooden horse, which the Greeks had left behind them when they pretended to sail away from Troy; and, to show the danger from the horse, he hurled a spear into its side. The Trojans, however, would not listen to his advice; and as he was preparing to sacrifice a bull to Neptune (Poseidon), suddenly two fearful serpents were seen swimming toward the Trojan coast from Tenedos. They rushed toward Laocoon, who, while all the people took to flight, remained with his two sons standing by the altar of the god. The serpents first coiled around the two boys, and then around the father, and thus all three perished. The serpents then hastened to the acropolis of Troy, and disappeared behind the shield of Tritonia. The reason why Laocoon suffered this fearful death is differently stated. According to some, it was because he had run his lance into the side of the horse; according to others, because, contrary to the will of Apollo, he had married and begotten children; or, according to others again, because Neptune (Poseidon), being hostile to the Trojans, wanted to show to the Trojans in the person of Laocoon what fate all of them deserved. The story of Laocoon's death was a fine subject for epic and lyric as well as tragic poetry, and was therefore frequently related by ancient poets such as by Bacchylides, Sophocles, Euripides, Virgil, and others. His death also formed the subject of many ancient works of art; and a magnificent group, representing the father and his two sons entwined by the two serpents, is still extant, and preserved in the Vatican. Vid. AGESENDER.

ΛΑΟΚΟΟΒΑ (Λαοκόωβα), wife of Aphareus, and mother of Idas and Lynceus in Theocritus.]

ΛΑΟΔΑΜΑΣ (Λαοδάμας). 1. Son of Alcione, king of the Phæacians, and Arete.—2. Son of Eteocles, and king of Thebes, in whose reign the Epigoni marched against Thebes. In the battle against the Epigoni, he slew their leader Ægialeus, but was himself slain by Alcmaeon. Others related, that after the battle was lost, Laodamas fled to the Eucheleans in Illyria.—[3. A son of Antenor, slain before Troy by Ajax, son of Telamon.]

LAODAMIA (Λαοδάμεια). 1. Daughter of Æolus, and wife of Proteusilaus. When her husband was slain before Troy, she begged the gods to be allowed to converse with him for only three hours. The request was granted. Mercury (Hermes) led Proteusilaus back to the upper world, and when Proteusilaus died a second time, Laodamia died with him. A later anation states that, after the second death of Proteus, Laodamia made an image of her husband, to which she paid divine honors; but as her father Acamas interfered, and commanded her to burn the image, she herself leaped into the fire.—2. Daughter of Bellerophon, became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of Sarpedon, and was killed by Diana (Artemis) while she was engaged in weaving.—3. Nurse of Orestes, usually called Λαοδίκη.

Λαοδίκη (Λαοδίκη). 1. Daughter of Priam and Hecuba, and wife of Heliclon. Some relate that she fell in love with Acamas, the son of Theseus, when he came with Diomedes as ambassador to Troy, and that she became by Acamas the mother of Munius. On the death of this son she leaped down a precipice, or was swallowed up by the earth.—2. Daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra (Hom., Il., ix., 146), called Electra by the tragic poets. Vid. ELECTRA.—3. Mother of Seleucus Nicator, the founder of the Syrian monarchy.—4. Wife of Antiochus II. Theos, king of Syria, and mother of Seleucus Callinicus. For details, vid. p. 66. b.—5. Wife of Seleucus Callinicus, and mother of Seleucus Ceraunus and Antiochus the Great.—6. Wife of Antiochus the Great, was a daughter of Mithradates IV., king of Pontus, and grand-daughter of No. 4.—7. Wife of Archæus, the cousin and adversary of Antiochus the Great, was a sister of No. 6.—8. Daughter of Antiochus the Great by his wife Laodice (No. 6). She was married to her eldest brother Antiochus, who died in his father's lifetime, 195.—9. Daughter of Seleucus IV., Philopator, was married to Perseus, king of Macedonia.—10. Daughter of Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, was married to the impostor Alexander Balas.—11. Wife and also sister of Mithradates Eupator (commonly called the Great), king of Pontus. During the absence of her husband, and deceived by a report of his death, she gave free scope to her amours; and, alarmed for the consequences, on his return attempted his life by poison. Her designs were, however, betrayed to Mithradates, who immediately put her to death.—12. Another sister of Mithradates Eupator, married Ariarathes VI., king of Cappadocia. After the death of her husband she married Nicomedes, king of Bithynia.

Λαοδικαία (Λαοδικαία; Λαοδικαίς, Laodiceensis, Laodicea), the name of six Greek cities in Asia, four of which (besides another now unknown) were founded by Seleucus I. Nicator, and named in honor of his mother Laodice, the other two by Antiochus II. and Antiochus I. or III. Vid. Nos. 1. and 5. 1. Λ. ΑΝ. ΛΥ. ΚΟΝ (Λ. ἀπὸ τῆς Λύκας; ruins at Baki-Hissar), a city of Asia Minor, stood on a ridge of hills near the southern bank of the River Lycus (now Choruk-Su), a tributary of the Mæander, a little to the west of Colossæ and to the south of Hierapolis, on the borders of Lydia, Caria, and Phrygia, to each of which it is assigned by different writers; but, after the definitive division of the provinces, it is reckoned as belonging to Great Phrygia, and under the later Roman emperors it was the capital of Phrygia Pacatiana. It was founded by Antiochus II. Theos, on the site of a previously existing town, and named in honor of his wife Laodice. It passed from the kings of Syria to those of Pergamum, and from them to the Romans, to whom Attalus III. bequeathed his kingdom. Under the Romans it belonged to the province of Asia. At first it was comparatively an insignificant place, and it suffered much from the frequent earthquakes to which its site seems to be more exposed than that of any other city of Asia Minor, and also from the Mithradatic War. Under the later Roman republic and the early emperors, it rose to importance; and, though more than once almost destroyed by earthquakes, it was restored by the aid of the emperors and the munificence of its own citizens, and became, next to Apamea, the greatest city in Phrygia, and one of the most flourishing in Asia Minor. In an inscription it is called "the most splendid city of Asia," a statement confirmed by the magnificent ruins of the city, which comprise an aqueduct, a gymnasium, several theatres, a stadium almost perfect, besides remains of roads, porticoes, pillars, gates, foundations of houses, and sarcophagi. This great prosperity was owing partly to its situation, on the high road for the traffic between the east and west of Asia, and partly to the fertility and beauty of the country round it. Already in the apostolic age it was the seat of a flourishing Christian Church, which, however, became very soon infected with the pride and luxury produced by the prosperity of the city, as we learn from St. John's severe Epistle to it (Revel., iii., 14-22). St. Paul also addresses it in common with the neighboring church of Colossæ (Coloss., ii., 1; iv., 13, 16).—2. Λ. ΚΟΜΠΟΤΑ (Α. ἡ κατακαυμένη or κακαμένη, i. e., the burned); the reason of the epithet is doubtful: ruins at Ladik, a city of Lycæonia, north of Icomia, on the high road from the western coast of Asia Minor to the Euphrates.—3. Λ. ΑΝ. ΜΑΛΛ (Α. ἐπὶ τῇ θαλάττῃ; now Ladikiyek), a city on the coast of Syria, about fifty miles south of Antioch, was built by Seleucus I. on the site of an earlier city, called Ramitha, or Ἀρμὴ 'Ακρό'. It had the best harbor in Syria, and the surrounding country was celebrated for its wine and fruits, which formed a large part of the traffic of the city. In the civil contests during the later period of the Syrian kingdom, Laodicea obtained virtual independence, in which it was confirmed probably by Pompey, and certainly by Julius Cæsar, who greatly favored the city. In the civil wars, after Cæsar's death, the Laodiceans were severely punished by Cassius for their adherence to Dolabella, and the city again suffered in the Parthian invasion of Syria, but was recompensed by Antony with exemption from taxation. Herod the Great built the Laodiceans an aqueduct, the ruins of which still exist. It is mentioned occasionally as an important city under the later Roman empire, and, after the conquest of Syria by the Arabs, it was one of those places on the coast which still remained in the hands of the Greek emperors, and with a Christian population. It was taken and destroyed by the Arabs in 1188. It is now a poor Turkish village, with very considerable ruins of the ancient city, the chief of which are a triumphal arch, the remains of the mole of the harbor, of a portico near it, of catacombs on the sea-coast, of the aqueducts and cisterns, and of pillars where the Neapolis is supposed to have stood.—L. AD LIBANUM (A. Λιβανύ, πρὸς Λιβανύ), a city of Coele-Syria, at the northern entrance to the narrow valley (αβύσσος), between Libanus and Antilibanus, appears to have been, through its favorable situation, a place of commercial importance. During the possession of Coele-Syria by the Greek kings of Egypt, it was the southwestern border fortress of Syria. It was the chief city of a district called Laodiceene.—5. A city in the southeast of Media, near the boundary of Persia, founded either by Antiochus I. Soter, or Antiochus II. the Great: site unknown.—6. In Mesopotamia: site unknown.

LAÏDOCUS (Λαΐδοκος). 1. Son of Bias and Pero, and brother of Talaua, took part in the expeditions of the Argonauts, and of the Seven against Thebes.—2. Son of Autenor.—[3. A Grecian, companion and charioteer of Antilochus in the Trojan war.]

LAÏMEDON (Λαομεδών). 1. King of Troy, son of Ilus and Eurydice, and father of Priam, Hecione, and other children. His wife is called Strymo, Rhoeo, Placia, Thoosa, Zeuxippe, or Leucippe. Neptune (Poseidon) and Apollo, who had displeased Jupiter (Zeus), were doomed to serve Laomedon for wages. Accordingly, Neptune (Poseidon) built the walls of Troy, while Apollo tended the king's flocks on Mount Ida. When the two gods had done their work, Laomedon refused them the reward he had promised them, and expelled them from his dominions. Thereupon Neptune (Poseidon) in wrath let loose the sea over the lands, and also sent a marine monster to ravage the country. By the command of an oracle, the Trojans were obliged, from time to time, to sacrifice a maiden to the monster; and on one occasion it was decided by lot that Hecione, the daughter of Laomedon himself, should be the victim. But it happened that Hercules was just returning from his expedition against the Amazons, and he promised to save the maiden if Laomedon would give him the horses which Trojans had once received from Jupiter (Zeus) as a compensation for Ganymedes. Laomedon promised them to Hercules, but again broke his word, when Hercules had killed the monster and saved Hecione. Thereupon Hercules sailed with a squadron of six ships against Troy, killed Laomedon, with all his sons, except Podarces (Priam), and gave Hecione to Telamon. Hecione ransomed her brother Priam with her veil. Priam, as the son of Laomedon, is called LAÏMEDONTIDÆ; and the Trojans, as the subjects of Laomedon, are called LAÏMEDONTIDÆ.—2. Of Mytilene, was one of Alexander's generals, and after the king's death (B.C. 323) obtained the government of Syria. He was afterward defeated by Nicanor, the general of Ptolemy, and deprived of Syria.

[LAPES. Vid. LAP.]

LAPETHUS or LAPATHUS (Λάπεθος Λαπάθος; now Lapitho or Lapto), an important town on the northern coast of Cyprus on a river of the same name, east of the Promontorium Crommyon.

LAPHRIA (Λαφρία), a surname of Diana (Artemis) among the Calydonians, from whom the worship of the goddess was introduced into Naupactus and Patrae, in Achaia. The name was traced back to a hero, Laphrius, son of Castalius, who was said to have instituted her worship at Calydon.

LAPHYSTIUS (Λαφύστιος), a mountain in Boetia, between Coronea, Lebadea, and Orchomenus, on which was a temple of Jupiter (Zeus), who hence bore the surname Laphystius.

LAPIDÆI CAMPI. Vid. CAMPI LAPIDÆI.

LAPITHES (Λαπίθης), son of Apollo and Stilbe, brother of Centaurus, and husband of Orione, the daughter of Eurynomus, by whom he became the father of Phorbas, Triopas, and Periphas. He was regarded as the ancestor of the LAPITHÆ in the mountains of Thessaly. The Lapithæ were governed by Pirithous, who, being a son of Ixion, was a half-brother of the Centaurs. The latter, therefore, demanded their share in their father's kingdom, and, as their claims were not satisfied, a war arose between the Lapithæ and Centaurs, which, however, was terminated by a peace. But when Pirithous married Hippodamia, and invited the Centaurs to the marriage feast, the latter, fired by wine, and urged on by Mars (Ares), attempted to carry off the bride and the other women. Thereupon a bloody conflict ensued, in which the Centaurs were defeated by the Lapithæ. The Lapithæ are said to have been the inventors of bits and bridles for horses. It is probable that they were a Pelagian people, who defeated the less civilized Centaurs, and compelled them to abandon Mount Pelion.

LAR or LARS, was an Etruscan predomestic borne, for instance, by Porseus and Tolumnus. From the Etruscans it passed over to the Romans, whence we read of Lar Herminius, who was consul B.C. 448. This word signified lord king, or hero in the Etruscan.

LARA. Vid. LARUNDA.

LARANDA (τὸ Λαράνδα; now Lavenda or Cara man), a considerable town in the south of Lycania, at the northern foot of Mount Taurus in a fertile district: taken by storm by Perdiccas, but afterward restored. It was used by the Isaurian robbers as one of their strongholds.

LARENTIA. Vid. ACCA LARENTIA.

LARES, inferior gods at Rome. Their worship was closely connected with that of the Manes, and was analogous to the hero worship of the Greeks. The Lares may be divided into two classes, the Lares domestici and Lares publici. The former were the Manes of a house raised to the dignity of heroes. The Manes were more closely connected with the place of burial, while the Lares were more particularly the divinities presiding over the hearth and the whole house. It was only the spirits of good men that were honored as Lares. All the domestic Lares were headed by the Lar familiaris.

ana, who was regarded as the founder of the family. He was inseparable from the family; and when the latter changed their abode, he went with them. Among the Lares publici we have mention made of Lares praestites and Lares compitales, who are in reality the same, and differ only in regard to the place or occasion of their worship. Servius Tullius is said to have instituted their worship; and when Augustus improved the regulations of the city, he also renewed the worship of the public Lares. Their name, Lares praestites, characterizes them as the protecting spirits of the city, in which they had a temple in the uppermost part of the Via Sacra, that is, near a compitum, whence they might be called Compitales. This temple (Sacellum Larum or ades Larum) contained two images, which were probably those of Romulus and Remus. Now, while these Lares were the general protectors of the whole city, the Lares compitales must be regarded as those who presided over the several divisions of the city, which were marked by the compita or the points where two or more streets crossed each other, and where small chapels (adricula) were erected to them. In addition to the Lares praestites and compitales, there are other Lares which must be reckoned among the public ones, viz., the Lares rurales, who were worshipped in the country; the Lares vias, who were worshipped on the high roads by travellers; and the Lares marini or permarini, to whom P. Scmilus dedicated a sanctuary in remembrance of his naval victory over Antiochus. The worship of the domestic Lares, together with that of the Penates and Manes, constituted what are called the causa privata. The images of the Lares, in great houses, were usually in a separate compartment, called adricula or lararia. They were generally represented in the cinetis Gabinus. Their worship was very simple, especially in early times and in the country. The offerings were set before them in patellas, whence they themselves were called patellarii. Pious people made offerings to them every day; but they were more especially worshipped on the calends, nones, and ides of every month. When the inhabitants of the house took their meals, some portion was offered to the Lares, and on joyful family occasions they were adorned with wreaths, and the lararia were thrown open. When the young bride entered the house of her husband, her first duty was to offer a sacrifice to the Lares. Respecting the public worship of the Lares, and the festival of the Larentalia, vid. Dict. of Art. art. LARENTALIA, COMPITALIA.

LARIS (Λάρις; now Alarbow), a city of Northern Africa, in the Carthaginian territory (Byzance), southwest of Zama; a place of some importance at the time of the war with Jugurtha.

LARIS, SCRIBONTIUS. Vid. SCRIBONTIUS.

LARIUM (Larissa, lit.: now Larino), a town of the Frentani (whence the inhabitants are sometimes called Frentani Larinates), on the River Tifernus, and near the borders of Apulia, subsequently a Roman municipium, possessed a considerable territory extending down to the Adriatic Sea. The town of Olitoria, on the coast, was subject to Larium.

LARISSA (Λάρισα), the name of several Pelasgic places, whence Larissa is called in mythology the daughter of Pelasgus. 1. In Thrace 1. (Now Larissa or Larsa), an important town of Thessaly, in Pelasgia, situated on the Peneus, in an extensive plain. It was once the capital of the Pelasgi, and had a democratical constitution, but subsequently became subject to the Macedonians. It retained its importance under the Romans, and after the time of Constantine the Great became the capital of the province of Thessaly.—2. Surnamed CREMASTIS (ἡ Κρεμαστis), another important town of Thessaly, in Phthiotia, situated on a height, whence probably its name, and distant twenty stadia from the Malian Gulf.—II. In Asia. 1. An ancient city on the coast of the Troad, near Hamaxitus; ruined at the time of the Persian war.—2. L. PHRACONIS (Λ. ἡ Φρακωνis, also αἱ Ληφρακων), a city on the coast of Mysia, near Cyrene (hence called ἡ περὶ τῆν Κυρην), of Pelasgian origin, but colonized by the Aeolians, and made a member of the Aeolic confederacy. It was also called the Egyptian Larissa (ἡ Αἰγυπτια), because Cyrus the Great settled in it a body of his Egyptian mercenary soldiers.—3. L. ERASMIA (Λ. ἡ Ἐρεια), a city of Lydia, in the plain of the Cayster, on the northern side of Mount Messogis, northeast of Ephesus; with a temple of Apollo Larissenus.—4. In Aesyrria, an ancient city on the eastern bank of the Tigris, some distance north of the mouth of the River Zabatas or Lycus, described by Xenophon (Anab. iii. 4). It was deserted when Xenophon saw it; but its brick walls still stood, twenty-five feet thick, one hundred feet high, and two parasangs (—sixty stadia—six geographical miles) in circuit, and there was a stone pyramid near it. Xenophon relates the tradition that, when the empire passed from the Medes to the Persians, the city resisted all the efforts of the Persian king (i. e., Cyrus) to take it, until the inhabitants, terrified at an obscuration of the sun, deserted the city. Mr. Layard identifies the site of Larissa with that of the ruins near Nimroud, the very same site as that of Nineveh. The name Larissa is no doubt a corruption of some Aesyrrian name (perhaps Al-Assur), which Xenophon naturally fell into through his familiarity with the word as the name of cities in Greece.—5. In Syria, called by the Syrians Sizzara (Σίζαρα; now Kulat Sejar), a city in the district of Apamene, on the western bank of the Orontes, about half way between Apamea and Epiphania.

LARISSUS or LARISSUS (Λάρισσος. Λάριος; now Risso), a small river forming the boundary between Achaia and Elis, rises in Mount Scollia, and flows into the Ionian Sea.

LARIUS LACUS (now Lake of Como), a beautiful lake in Gallia Transpadana, running from north to south, through which the River Adda flows. After extending about fifteen miles, it is divided into two branches, or which the one to the southwest is about eighteen miles in length, and the one to the southeast about twelve miles. At the extremity of the southwestern branch is the town of Comum; and at the extremity of the southeastern branch the River Adda issues out of the lake. The beauty of the scenery of this lake is praised by Pliny. He had several villas on the banks of the lake, of which he mentions two particularly; one called Comædia, and the other Tragœdia. (Plin., Ep., ix, 7). Some believe Comædia to have been situated at the modern Bellagio, on the promontory which divides the two branches of the lake; and Tragœdia at Lavio, on the western bank, where the scenery is more wild. The intermittent fountain, of which Pliny gives an account in another letter (Ep., iv, 30), is still called Pliniana.

LARS TOLUMNIUS. Vid. TOLUMNIUS.

LARTIA GESA, patrician, distinguished at the beginning of the republic through two of its members, T. Lartius, the first dictator, and Sp. Lartius, the companion of Horatius on the wooden bridge. The name soon after disappears entirely from the annals. The Lartii were of Etruscan origin, as is clearly shown by their name, which comes from the Etruscan word Lar or Lara. Vid. LAR.

[LARTOLÆTÆ (Λαρτολαῖται), a people in the northeast of Hispania Tarraconensis.]

LARUNDA or LARA, daughter of Almon, was a nymph who informed Juno of the connection between Jupiter and Juturna; hence her name is connected with λαλεῖν. Jupiter deprived her of her tongue, and ordered Mercury to conduct her into the lower world. On the way thither, Mercury fell in love with her, and she afterward gave birth to two Lares.

LARVÆ. Vid. LEMURÆ.

LARYMNA (Λάρυμνα), the name of two towns on the River Cephissus, on the borders of Bœotia and Lœria, and distinguished as Upper and Lower Larymna. The latter was at the mouth of the river, and the former a little way inland.

[LARTIUS Mons (Λαρτίων όρος, τό), a mountain of Laconia sacred to Bacchus (Dionysus).]

LAS (Λᾶς: Ep. Λᾶς; now Passava), an ancient town of Laconia, on the eastern side of the Laconian Gulf, ten stadia from the sea, and south of Gytheum. It is said to have been once destroyed by the Dioscuri, who hence received the surname of Lapœræ, or the Destroyers of Las. In the time of the Romans it had ceased to be a place of importance.

LARBA (Λαρβα), a town in the east of Crete, not far from the Promontorium Samonium, mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles (xxvii, 8).

LASION (Λάσιον: Λασιώνιος; now Lala), a fortified town in Elis, on the frontiers of Arcadia, and not far from the confluence of the Erymanthus and the Alpheus. The possession of this town was a constant source of dispute between the Eleans and Arcadians.

LASTHÉNÈS (Λασθένης). 1. An Olynthian, who, together with Euthyratea, betrayed his country to Philip of Macedon, by whom he had been bribed, B.C. 347.—2. A Cretan, one of the principal leaders of his countrymen in their war with the Romans. He was defeated and taken prisoner by Q. Metellus, 67.

LAEUS (Λᾶος), one of the principal Greek lyric poets, was a native of Hermione in Argolia. He is celebrated as the founder of the Athenian school of dithyrambic poetry, and as the teacher of Pindar. He was contemporary with Simonidea, like whom he lived at Athens, under the patronage of Hipparchus. It would appear that Laeus introduced a greater freedom, both of rhythm and of music, into the dithyrambic Ode; that he gave it a more artificial and more mimetic character; and that the objects of his poetry embraced a far wider range than had been customary.

[LATAGUS, a Trojan warrior, slain by Menæstius in the wars of Æneas in Italy.]

LATÈRA STAGNUM (now Etang de Mesumet et de Perole), a lake in the territory of Neapoliensis in Gallia Narbonensis, connected with the sea by a canal. On this lake was a fortress of the same name (Chateau de la Latte).

[LATERANUS, L. SEPTIMIUS. 1. The friend and supporter of C. Licinius Stolo in his attempt to throw open the consulship to the plebeians: he was tribune of the plebs with Licinius B.C. 376 to 367, and was elected consul B.C. 366, being the first plebeian who had obtained that dignity.

—2. PLAUTIUS, one of the lovers of Messalina, wife of the Emperor Claudius, and was, in consequence, condemned to death by the emperor A.D. 48, but afterward pardoned; he subsequently took part in the conspiracy of Piso against Nero, but was seized and put to death.]

LATERENSIS, JUVENTIUS, was one of the accusers of Plancius, whom Cicero defended, B.C. 54. Vid. PLANCIUS. He was prætor in 51. He served as legate in the army of M. Lepidus, and when the soldiers of Lepidus passed over to Antony, Laterensis put an end to his life.

LATHON, LETHON, LETHRA, LETHRUS (Λᾶθρον, Λᾶθρον, Λᾶθρα), a river of Cyrenæica in Northern Africa, falling into a Lacus Hesperidum, near the city of Hesperia or Berenice, in the region which the early Greek navigators identified with the gardens of the Hesperides.

LATIÁLIS or LATIÁRIUS, a surname of Jupiter as the protecting divinity of Latium. The Latin towns and Rome celebrated to him every year the ferie Latine, on the Alban Mount, which were conducted by one of the Roman consuls. Vid. LATINIUS.

[LATINI. Vid. LATINIUM.

LATINIUS. 1. King of Latium, son of Faunus and the nymph Marica, brother of Lavinius, husband of Amata, and father of Lavinia, whom he gave in marriage to Æneas. Vid. LAVINIA. This is the common tradition; but, according to Hesiod, he was a son of Ulysses and Circe, and brother of Agrius, king of the Tyrrhenians; according to Hyginus, he was a son of Telemachus and Circe; while others describe him as a son of Hercules by a Hyperborean woman, who was afterward married to Faunus, or as a son of Hercules by a daughter of Faunus. According to one account, Latinus, after his death, became Jupiter Latiniar, just as Romulus became Quirinus.—2. A celebrated player in the farces called mimes (vid. Dict. of Anti. &c.) in the reign of Domitian, with whom he was a great favorite, and whom he served as a jester. He frequently acted as mimic with Thymetes as mima.

LÁTRIUM (ἡ Λατρία), a country in Italy, inhabited by the LÁTRIÆ. The origin of the name is uncertain. Most of the ancients derived it from a king Latinus, who was supposed to have been a contemporary of Æneas (vid. LATINIUS); but there can be no doubt that the name of the people was transferred to this fictitious king. Other ancient critics connected the name with the verb latere, either because Saturn had been hidden in the country, or because Italy is hidden the Alps and the Apennines! But these explanations deserve a serious

A modern writer derives Latium (like Campania from campus), and it to mean the "flat land;" but the l in latius is opposed to this etymology. The boundaries of Latium varied at periods. 1. In the most ancient times only from the River Tiber on the south, the River Numicus and the town of the south, and from the sea-coast on the Alban Mount on the east. 2. The city of Latium was subsequently extended northward; and long before the conquest of Latium by the Romans, it stretched from the Tiber on the north, to the Promontorium and Anxur or Tarracina on the south, as in the treaty of peace made between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509, we find Latium, and Tarracina mentioned as the boundaries of Latium. The name of Latium was subsequently given to the whole of the Tiber to the Promontorium. 3. The Romans still further extended the boundaries of Latium by the conquest of the cities of Volturni, and Aurunci, as far as the Gulf of Naples, and even beyond this river to the Gulf of St. Eustachius. 4. The cession of territory was called Latium, or Latium. Latium, therefore, in its widest sense, was bounded by Etruria on the north, from which it was separated by the Tiber; by Campania on the south, from which it was separated by the Liris; by the Tyrrhene Sea on the west, and by the Sabine and Samnitan mountains on the east. The greater part of this extensive plain of volcanic origin, rises an isolated range of mountains the name of Mons Albanus, of which the Tiber and the Tiber hills are branches. The plain, on the coast between Antium and the Gulf of St. Eustachius, which was at one time well cultivated, and in consequence of the marshes, Ufens, and Anagninus find it for their waters (vid. Pontine). The remainder of the country was left for its fertility in antiquity. The name of the most ancient inhabitants. They appear to have been a Pelasgic, and are frequently called Aborigines, or long anterior to the foundation of these Pelasgians or Aborigines in the narrow plain between the River Numicus, expelled or subdued the original inhabitants of that district became known under the name of Latini, to distinguish them from the other Latins, the subjects of Rome, formed a confederation, consisting of thirty towns of Alba Longa subsequently the head of the league. This town, and several colonies, and among them boasted of a Trojan origin; but the story of a Trojan settlement in Italy is an invention of later times. Alba was a colony from Alba, the best known in the reign of her third king, to take Alba and raise it.

In this war Alba seems to have assisted from the other Latin towns. Ancus Marcius and Tarquinius Priscus carried on war successfully with several other Latin towns. Under Servius Tullius Rome was admitted into the Latin league; and his successor Tarquinius Superbus compelled the other Latin towns to acknowledge Rome as the head of the league, and to become dependent upon the latter city. But upon the expulsion of the kings the Latins asserted their independence, and commenced a struggle with Rome, which, though frequently suspended and apparently terminated by treaties, was as often renewed, and was not brought to a final close till B.C. 340, when the Latins were defeated by the Romans at the battle of Mount Vesuvius. The Latin league was now dissolved, and the Latins became the subjects of Rome. The following were the most important institutions of the Latins during the time of their independence: The towns of Latium were independent of one another, but formed a league for purposes of mutual protection. This league consisted, as we have already seen, of thirty cities, a number which could not be exceeded. Each state sent deputies to the meetings of the league, which were held in a sacred grove at the foot of the Alban Mount, by the fountain of Ferentina. On the top of the mountain was a temple of Jupiter Latiaris, and a festival was celebrated there in honor of this god from the earliest times. This festival, which was called the Feria Latina, is erroneously said to have been instituted by Tarquinius Superbus, in commemoration of the alliance between the Romans and Latins. It is true, however, that the festival was raised into one of much greater importance when Rome became the head of the league; for it was now a festival common both to Rome and Latium, and served to unite the two nations by a religious bond. Having thus become a Roman as well as a Latin festival, it continued to be celebrated by the Romans after the dissolution of the Latin league. Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. Feria Latina. The chief magistrate in each Latin town appears to have borne the title of dictator. He was elected annually, but might be re-elected at the close of his year of office. Even in the time of Cicero we find dictators in the Latin towns, as, for instance, in Lanuvium. (Cic. pro Mil., 10). In every Latin town there was also a senate and a popular assembly, but the exact nature of their powers is unknown. The old Latin towns were built for the most part on isolated hills, the sides of which were made by art very steep and almost inaccessible. They were surrounded by walls built of great polygonal stones, the remains of which still excite our astonishment. On the conquest of the Latins in 340, several of the Latin towns, such as Lanuvium, Aricia, Nomentum, Pedum, and Tusculum, received the Roman franchise. All the other towns became Roman Socii, and are mentioned in history under the general name of Nomen Latinum or Latini. The Romans, however, granted to them from time to time certain rights and privileges, which the other Socii did not enjoy; and, in particular, they founded many colonies, consisting of Latins, in various parts of Italy. These Latin colonies formed a part of the Nomen Latinum, although they were not situated in Latium. Thus the Latin league eventually to hold a certain status intermediate between that of Roman citizens and peregrini. (For details, vid. Dict. of Ant., art. LATINI.)

LATMICEUS SINUS (ὁ Λατμικός κόλπος), a gulf on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor, into which the River Mæander fell, named from Mount Latmus, which overhangs it. Its width from Miletus, which stood on its southern side, to Pyrrha, was about thirty stadia. Through the changes effected on this coast by the Mæander, the gulf is now an inland lake, called Akces-Sea, or Ufa-Bassi.

LATMUS (Ἀτάκς; now Monte di Palatia), a mountain in Caria, extending in a southeastern direction from its commencement on the southern side of the Mæander, northeast of Miletus and the Sinus Latmiceus. It was the mythological scene of the story of Luna and Endymion, who is hence called by the Roman poets "Latinius heros" and "Latinius venator;" he had a temple on the mountain, and a cavern in its side was shown as his grave.

LATOBRII, a people in Gallia Belgica, who are mentioned, along with the Tulingi and Raurici, as neighbors of the Helvetii. They probably dwelt near the sources of the Rhine, in Switzerland.

LATONA. Vid. LETO.

LATOPOLIS (Λατόπολις; ruins at Enech), a city of Upper Egypt, on the west bank of the Nile, between Thebes and Apollonopolis; the seat of the worship of the Nile-fish called latas, which was the symbol of the goddess Neith, whom the Greeks identified with Athena.

LATONIA, a people in the southwest of Pannonia, on the River Savus, in the modern Illyria and Croatia.

LATRO, M. Porcius, a celebrated Roman rhetorician in the reign of Augustus, was a Spaniard by birth, and a friend and contemporary of the elder Seneca, by whom he is frequently mentioned. His school was one of the most frequented at Rome, and he numbered among his pupils the Poet Ovid. He died B.C. 4. Many modern writers suppose that he was the author of the Declamations of Sallust against Cicero, and of Cicero against Sallust.

[LATYMNUS MONS (Λατμυμός), a mountain of Bruttium, near Croton.]

LAUREACUM or LAURACUM (now Lorch, near Ena), a strongly fortified town on the Danube, in Noricum Ripense, the head-quarters of the second legion, and the station of a Roman fleet.

LAURENTIA, ACCA. Vid. ACCA LAURENTIA.

LAURENTIUS LYDUS. Vid. LYDUS.

LAURENTUM (Laurens, -ntis; now Casale di Copocotta, not Palermo), one of the most ancient towns of Latium, was situated on a height between Ostia and Ardea, not far from the sea, and was surrounded by a grove of laurels, from which the place was supposed to have derived its name. According to Virgil, it was the residence of King Latinus and the capital of Latium; and it is certain that it was a place of importance in the time of the Roman kings, as it is mentioned in the treaty concluded between Rome and Carthage in B.C. 509. The younger Pliny and the Emperor Commodus had villas at Laurentum, which appears to have been a healthy place, notwithstanding the marshes in the neighborhood. These marshes supplied the tables of the Romans with excellent hares. In the time of the Antonines Laurentum was united with Lavinium, from which it was only six miles distant, so that the two formed only one town, which was called LAUROLAVINIUM, and its inhabitants were named Laurentes Lavinates.

LAURACUM. Vid. LAUREACUM.

LAURIUM (Λαύριον, Λαύριον), a mountain in the south of Attica, a little north of the Promontorium Sunium, celebrated for its silver mines, which in early times were so productive that every Athenian citizen received annually ten drachmas. On the advice of Themistocles, the Athenians applied this money to equip two hundred triremes shortly before the invasion of Xerxes. In the time of Xenophon the produce of the mines was one hundred talents. They gradually became less and less productive, and in the time of Strabo they yielded nothing.

[LAUROLAVINIUM. Vid. LAVINIUM.]

LAURON (now Laury, west of Xucar in Valencia), a town in the east of Hispania Tarraconensis, near the sea and the River Sucro, celebrated on account of its siege by Sertorius, and at the place where Cn. Pompey, the younger, was put to death after the battle of Munda.

LAUS (Ἀῶς; Ἀαίως), a Greek city in Loccum, situated near the mouth of the River Lams, which formed the boundary between Loccum and Bruttium. It was founded by the Sybarites after their own city had been taken by the inhabitants of Croton, B.C. 510, but it had disappeared in the time of Pliny. The gulf into which the River Laus flowed was also called the Gulf of Laus.

LAUS POMPEII (now Lodi Vecchio), a town in Gallia Cisalpina, northwest of Piacentia, and southeast of Mediolanum. It was founded by the Boii, and was afterward made a municipium by Pompeius Strabo, the father of Pompeius Magnus, whence it was called by his name.

LAUSUS, 1. Son of Mezentius, king of the Etruscans, slain by Aeneas.—2. Son of Numitor and brother of Ilia, killed by Amulius.

LAUTULA, a village of the Volsci in Latium, in a narrow pass between Terracina and Fundi.

LAVERNA, the Roman goddess of thieves and impostors. A grove was sacred to her on the Via Salaria, and she had an altar near the Porta Lavernalis, which derived its name from her.

LAVIUM. Vid. LABIUM.

LAVINIA, daughter of Latinus and Amata, was betrothed to Turnus (vid. TURNUS), but was afterward given in marriage to Aeneas, by whom she became the mother of Aeneas Silvius.

LAVINIUM (Lavinienensis; now Pratice), an ancient town of Latium, three miles from the sea and six miles east of Laurentum, on the Via Appia, and near the River Numicus, which divided its territory from that of Ardea. It is said to have been founded by Aeneas, and to have been called Lavinium in honor of his wife Lavinia, the daughter of Latinus. It possessed a temple of Venus, common to all the Latins, of which the inhabitants of Ardea had the oversight. It was at Lavinium that the King Titus Tatius was said to have been murdered. Lavini-um was at a later time united with Laurentum, respecting which, vid. LAURENTUM.

LAZÆ or LAZI (Λάζαι, Λάζοι), a people of Colchis, south of the Phasis.

[LÆA (now probably Piana or Pianosa), a small island in the southern part of the Ægean Sea.]

LÆAKA (Λαίκα), an Athenian hetæra, beloved by Aristogiton or Harmodius. On the murder of Hipparchus she was put to the torture; but she died under her sufferings without making any disclosure, and, if we may believe one account, she bit off her tongue that no secret might be wrung from her. The Athenians honored her memory greatly, and, in particular, by erecting a statue of a lioness (Λαίκα) without a mane, in the vestibule of the Acropolis.

[LÆAGROS (Λαίγρος), son of Glaucus, one of the commanders of the Athenians in the attempt to colonize Amphipolis, B.C. 455, perished in a battle with the Thracians at Drabescus or Darus.]

LÆANDER (Λαίανδρος or Λαάνδρος), the famous youth of Abydos, who was in love with Hero, the priestess of Venus (Aphrodite) in Sestos, and swam every night across the Hellepont to visit her, and returned before daybreak. Once during a stormy night he perished in the waves. Next morning his corpse was washed on the coast of Sestos, whereupon Hero threw herself into the sea. This story is the subject of the poem of Musæus, entitled De Amore Heris et Læandri (vid. Musæus), and is also mentioned by Ovid (Her. xviii, 19) and Virgil (Georg. iii, 245).

LÆARCHUS (Λαίαρχος). 1. Vid. ATHENÆS.—2. Of Rhégium, one of those Dædalian artists who stand on the confines of the mythical and historical periods, and about whom we have extremely uncertain information. One account made him a pupil of Dædalus, another of Diponius and Seyllia.

LÆARËA (Λαίρεια: now Livadia), a town in Beotia, west of the Lake Copia, between Theropæa and Mount Helicon, at the foot of a rock from which the River Hersynia flows. In a cave of this rock, close to the town, was the celebrated oracle of Trophonius, to which the place owed its importance.

[LÆREA (Λαίρειν), an ancient city in Upper Macedonia, mentioned only by Herodotus (viii, 131); not a trace of it now exists.]

LÆRIDOS (Λαίριδος: Λαίριδος), one of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy, in Asia Minor, and on the coast of Lydia, between Colophon and Teos, ninety stadia east of the promontory of Myonnesus. It was said to have been built at the time of the Ionian migration, on the site of an earlier Carian city; and it flourished, chiefly by commerce, until Lygimachus transplanted most of its inhabitants to Ephesus. Near it were some mineral springs, which still exist near Ekklesia, but no traces remain of the city itself.

LÆRÆA or LÆRÆNA (Λαίρην, Λαίρηννα), a town on the southern coast of Crete, ninety stadia south-east of Gortyna, of which it was regarded as the harbor. It possessed a celebrated temple of Æsculapius.

LERINÆTHUS (Λέρινθος: now Lobitha), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Sporades, west of Calymnus, east of Amorgos, and north of Ægypalæa.

LECHÆUM (τὸ Λεχαιόν: Λεχαιός), one of the two harbors of Corinth, with which it was connected by two long walls. It was twelve stadia from Corinth, was situated on the Corinthian Gulf, and received all the ships which came from Italy and Sicily. It possessed a temple of Neptune (Poseidon), who was hence sur-named Lechæus.

LECUM (τὸ Λεκτόν: now Cape Baba or S. Maria), the southwestern promontory of the Troad is formed where the western extremity of Mount Ida juts out into the sea, opposite to the northern side of the island of Lesbos. It was the southern limit of the Troad; and, under the Byzantine emperors, the northern limit of the province of Asia. An altar was shown here in Strabo's time, which was said to have been erected by Agamemnon to the twelve chief gods of Greece.

LEDA (Λήδα), daughter of Thestius, whence she is called Thestias, and wife of Tyndareus, king of Sparta. One night she was embraced both by her husband and by Jupiter (Zeus); by the former she became the mother of Castor and Clytemnestra, by the latter of Pollux and Helena. According to Homer (Od. xi, 298), both Castor and Pollux were sons of Tyndareus and Leda, while Helena is described as a daughter of Jupiter (Zeus). Other traditions reverse the story, making Castor and Pollux the sons of Jupiter (Zeus), and Helena the daughter of Tyndareus. According to the common legend, Jupiter (Zeus) visited Leda in the form of a swan; and she brought forth two eggs, from the one of which issued Helena, and from the other Castor and Pollux. The visit of Jupiter (Zeus) to Leda in the form of a swan was frequently represented by ancient artists. The Roman poets sometimes call Helena Ledæa, and Castor and Pollux Ledæi Dii.

LËDON (Λέδων), a town in Phocia, northwest of Tithorea; the birth-place of Philomelus, the commander of the Phocians in the Sacred war; it was destroyed in this war.

LEDRUS or LËDRUM (now Les or Les, near Mont pellier), a small river in Gallia Narbonensis.

LËGÆ (Λήγαι or Λήγες), a people on the southern shore of the Caspian Sea, belonging to the same race as the Cadusii. A branch of them was found by the Romans in the northern mountains of Albania, at the time of Pompey's expedition into those regions.

LËGIO SEPTIMA GERMINA (now Levi), a town in Hispania Tarraconensis, in the country of the Astures, which was originally the head-quarters of the legion so called.

LËTRUS (Λίτρης), son of Alector or Alectryon by Cleobule, and father of Peneleus, was one of the Argonauts, and commanded the Boeotians in the war against Troy.

LELANTUS CAMPUS (τὸ Ἀγλαντον πεδίοι), a plain in Eubœa, between Eretria and Chalcis, for the possession of which these two cities often contended. It contained warm springs and mines of iron and copper, but was subject to frequent earthquakes.

LËLEGENS (Λέλεγες), an ancient race which is inhabited Greece before the Hellenes. They are frequently mentioned along with the Pelasgians as the most ancient inhabitants of Greece. Some writers erroneously identify them with the Pelasgians, but their character and habits were essentially different: the Pelasgians were a peaceful and agricultural people, whereas the Leleges were a warlike and migratory race. They appear to have first taken possession of the coasts and the islands of Greece, and afterward to have penetrated into the interior. Piracy was probably their chief occupation; and they are represented as the ancestors of the Teleboans and the Taphians, who sailed as far as Phœnicia, and were notorious for their piracies. The coasts of Arcarnania and Ætolia appear to have been inhabited by Leleges at the earliest times, and from thence they spread over other parts of Greece. Thus we find them in Phocis and Locris, in Boeotia, in Megaris, in Laconia, which is said to have been more anciently called Lelegia, in Elis, in Subœa, in several of the islands of the Ægean Sea, and also on the coasts of Asia Minor, in Caria, Ionia, and the south of Troas. The origin of the Leleges is uncertain. Many of the ancients connected them with the Carians, and according to Herodotus (i. 171), the Leleges were the same as the Carians; but whether there was any real connection between these people can not be determined. The name of the Leleges was derived, according to the custom of the ancients, from an ancestor Lelex, who is called king either of Megaris or of Laœdæmon. According to some traditions, this Lelex came from Egypt, and was the son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Libya; but the Egyptian origin of the people was evidently an invention of later times. The Leleges must be regarded as a branch of the great Indo-Germanic race, who became gradually incorporated with the Hellenes, and thus ceased to exist as an independent people.

LELEX. Vid. LELEGES.

LEMANNUS or LEMANUS LAcus (now Lake of Geneva), a large lake formed by the River Rhodanus, was the boundary between the old Roman province in Gaul and the land of the Helvetii. Its greatest length is fifty-five miles, and its widest breadth six miles.

[LEMANNUS PORTUS, a harbor on the southern coast of Britain, directly south of Durovernum, and supposed to correspond to the modern Larne.]

LEMNOS (Ἀἴμνος: Ἀἴμιος, fem. Ἐμνιάς; now S. Limene, i. e., ἐκ τῶν Ἀἴμων), one of the largest islands in the Ægean Sea, was situated nearly midway between Mount Athos and the Hellespont, and about twenty-two miles southwest of Imbros. Its area is about one hundred and forty-seven square miles. In the earliest times it appears to have contained only one town, which bore the same name as the island (Hom., Il. xiv. 299); but at a later period we read of two towns, Myrina (now Palæo Castro) on the west of the island, and Hephestia or Hephestias (near Rapanidi) on the northwest, with a harbor. Lemnos was sacred to Hephestos (Vulcan), who is said to have fallen here when Zeus (Jupiter) hurled him down from Olympus. Hence the workshop of the god is sometimes placed in this island. The legend appears to have arisen from the volcanic nature of Lemnos, which possessed in antiquity a volcano called Morsychlus (Μόρσυχλος). The island still bears traces of having been subject to the action of volcanic fire, though the volcano has long since disappeared. The most ancient inhabitants of Lemnos, according to Homer, were the Thracian Sinties; a name, however, which probably only signifies robbers (Σίντιες, from σίνωαι). When the Argonauts landed at Lemnos, they are said to have found it inhabited only by women, who had murdered all their husbands, and had chosen as their queen Hypsipyle, the daughter of Thoas, the king of the island. Vid. HYSIPYLE. Some of the Argonauts settled here, and became by the Lemnian women the fathers of the Minyas, the later inhabitants of the island. The Minyas are said to have been driven out of the island by the Pelasgians, who had been expelled from Attica. These Pelasgians are further said to have carried away from Attica some Athenian women; but, as the children of these women despised their half-brothers, born of Pelasgian women, the Pelasgians murdered both them and their children. In consequence of this atrocity, and of the former murder of the Lemnian husbands by the wives, Lemnian Deeds became a proverb in Greece for all atrocious acts. Lemnos was afterward conquered by one of the generals of Darius; but Miltiades delivered it from the Persians, and made it subject to Athens, in whose power it remained for a long time. Pliny speaks of a remarkable labyrinth at Lemnos, but no traces of it have been discovered by modern travellers. The principal production of the island was a red earth called terra Lemnia or argillata, which was employed by the ancient physicians as a remedy for wounds and the bites of serpents, and which is still much valued by the Turks and Greeks for its supposed medicinal virtues.

LEMUVIENS, a people in Gallia Aquitania, between the Bituriges and Arverni, whose chief town was Augustoritum, subsequently called Lemovices, the modern Lémoign.

LEMUVI, a people of Germany, mentioned along with the Rugii, who inhabited the shores of the Baltic in the modern Pomerania.

LEMŪRES, the spectres or spirits of the dead. Some writers describe Lemures as the common name for all the spirits of the dead, and divide them into two classes; the Lares, or the souls of good men, and the Larvæ, or the souls of wicked men. But the common idea was that the Lemures and Larvæ were the same. They were said to wander about at night as spectres, and to torment and frighten the living. In order to propitiate them, the Romans celebrated the festival of the Lemuralia or Lemuria Vid. Dict. of Antig. &c.

LEMŪS (Ἀγυαλός), a surname of Bacchus (Dionysus), derived from ἀγυός, the wise-pratt or the vintage.

LENTIA (now Lina), a town in Noricum, on the Danube.

LENTIENŌES, a tribe of the Alemanni, who lived on the northern shore of the Lacus Bris in Lake of Constance), in the modern

Laenucia, a follower of M. Antony. He of Antony's seven agrarian commissions (agrorum divisores) in B.C. 44, for apportioning Campanian and Leontine lands, whence he is called divisor Italiae.

3. Corculius, one of the haughtiest milites at Rome; so that Cicero coins Appianus and Lentulus to express the high aristocratic party (ad Rom., the name was derived from lena, like 1. cicer. 1. He became praetor, and must have lived to a good old age, as he was wounded in the contest with C. in 121.—9. P., surnamed the chief note in Catiline's crew. Praetor to Sulla in 81: before him and Verres had to give an account of what he had received as quaestor in Cisalpine Gaul. He was soon after himself called praetor for the same matter, but was accused and said that he got his cognomen of the chief from his conduct on this occasion; for he called him to account, he answered by putting out his leg, "like boys," he said, "when they make a blunder in all." Other persons, however, had called him before, one perhaps of the Lentuli.

In 75 he was praetor; and Horatius before such a judge, had no prospect of procuring the acquittal of Terentius, accused of extortion. In 71 he was praetor. But in the next year he was elected censor, with sixty-three others, for his conduct and manners. It was this, probably, that led him to join Catiline and his crew. He distinguished birth and high rank he was becoming chief of the conspiracy of the Sibylline books was appearing haruspices to him. Three years to rule Rome, and he was the chief of the the chief and Cinnas; the twentieth year of the reign of the Capitol, &c., was to be the city. To gain power, and recover place in the senate, he became praetor again in 63. When Catiline quitted the city for Etruria, Lentulus was left as chief of the home conspirators, and his irresolution probably saved the city from being fired, for it was by his over-caution that the negotiation with the ambassadors of the Allobroges was entered into; these unstable allies revealed the secret to the consul Cicero, who directed them to feign compliance with the conspirators' wishes, and thus to obtain written documents which might be brought in evidence against them. The well-known sequel will be found under the life of Catiline. Lentulus was deposed from the praetorship, and was strangled in the Capitoline prison on the 8th of December. His step-son Antony pretended that Cicero refused to deliver up his corpse for burial.—10. P., surnamed Struarius. He received this nickname from his resemblance to the actor Spithæus. Caesar commonly calls him by his name; not so Cicero; but there could be no harm in it, for he used it on his coins when propraetor in Spain, simply to distinguish himself from the many of the same family; and his son bore it after him. He was curule ædile in 68, the year of Cicero's consulship, and was intrusted with the care of the apprehended conspirator, P. Sura (vid. No. 9). His games were long remembered for their splendor; but his toga, edged with Tyrian purple, gave offence. He was praetor in 60, and by Caesar's interests he obtained Hither Spain for his next year's province, where he remained into part of 58. In 57 he was consul, which dignity he also obtained by Caesar's support. In his consulship he moved for the immediate recall of Cicero, brought over his colleague Metellus Nepos to the same views, and his services were gratefully acknowledged by Cicero. Now, therefore, notwithstanding his obligations to Caesar, he had openly taken part with the aristocracy. He received Cilicia as his province, but he attempted in vain to obtain a decree of the senate charging him with the office of restoring Ptolemy Auletes, the exiled king of Egypt. He remained as proconsul in Cilicia from 56 till July, 53, and obtained a triumph, though not till 51. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49 he joined the Pompeian party. He fell into Caesar's hands at Corfinium, but was dismissed by the latter uninjured. He then joined Pompey in Greece: and after the battle of Pharsalia, he followed Pompey to Egypt, and got safe to Rhodes.—11. P., surnamed Servilius, son of No. 10, followed Pompey's fortunes with his father. He was pardoned by Caesar, and returned to Italy. In 46 he was divorced from his abandoned wife, Metella. (Comp. Hor., Serv., li. 3, 239.) After the murder of Caesar (44) he joined the conspirators. He served with Cassius against Rhodes; with Brutus in Lycia.—12. Cn., surnamed Clootarius, a Claudius adopted into the Lentulus family. He was consul in 72 with L. Gallius Publicola. In the war with Spartacus both he and his colleague were defeated, but after their consulship. With the same colleague he held the censorship in 70, and ejected sixty-three members from the senate for infamous life, among whom were Lentulus Sura (vid. No. 9) and C. Antonius, afterward Cicero's colleague in the consulship. Yet the majority of those expelled were acquitted by the courts, and restored; and Lentulus supported the Manilian law, appointing Pompey to the command against Mithradates. As an orator he concealed his want of talent by great skill and art, and by a good voice.—13. L., surnamed Cava, appeared in 61 as the chief accuser of P. Clodius for violating the mysteries of the Bona Dea. In 58 he was prætor, and in 49 consul with C. Marcellus. He was raised to the consulship in consequence of his being a known enemy of Cæsar. He did all he could to excite his wavering party to take arms and meet Cæsar: he called Cicero cowardly; blamed him for seeking a triumph at such a time; urged war at any price, in the hope, says Cæsar (B.C., l. 4), of retrieving his ruined fortunes, and becoming another Sulla. It was mainly at Lentulus's instigation that the violent measures passed the senate early in the year, which gave the tribunes a pretence for flying to Cæsar at Ravenna. He himself fled from the city at the approach of Cæsar, and afterward crossed over to Greece. After the battle of Pharsalia he fled to Egypt, and arrived there the day after Pompey's murder. On landing he was apprehended by young Ptolemy's ministers, and put to death in prison.—14. L., surnamed Nigra, flamen of Mars. In 57 he was one of the priests to whom was referred the question whether the site of Cicero's house was consecrated ground. In 56 he was one of the judges in the case of P. Sextius, and he died in the same year, much praised by Cicero.—15. L., son of the last, and also flamen of Mars. He defended M. Scaurus in 54, when accused of extortion: he accused Gabinius of high treason about the same time, but was suspected of collusion. In the Philippics he is mentioned as a friend of Antony's.—16. Cossus, surnamed Gæstulicus, consul B.C. 1, was sent into Africa in A.D. 6, where he defeated the Gæstuli; hence his surname. On the accession of Tiberius, A.D. 14, he accompanied Drusus, who was sent to quell the mutiny of the legions in Pannonia. He died 25, at a very great age, leaving behind him an honorable reputation.—17. Cn., surnamed Gæstulicus, son of the last, consul A.D. 26. He afterward had the command of the legions of Upper Germany for ten years, and was very popular among the troops. In 39 he was put to death by order of Calpurnia, who feared his influence with the soldiers. He was an historian and a poet; but we have only three lines of his poems extant, unless he is the author of nine epigrams in the Greek Anthology, inscribed with the name of Gæstulicus.

LEO or LEON (Λεων). 1. Also called LEONTIDES (Λεωνίδης), of Heraclea on the Pontus, disciple of Plato, was one of the conspirators who, with their leader Chion, assassinated Clearchus, tyrant of Heraclea. B.C. 358.—2. Of Byzantium, a rhetorician and historical writer of the age of Philip and Alexander the Great.—3. Diaconus or the Deacon, Byzantine historian of the tenth century. His history, in ten books, includes the period from the Cretan expedition of Nicephorus Phocas, in the reign of the Emperor Romanus II. A.D. 959, to the death of Joannes I. Zimisces, 975. The style of Leo is vicious: he employs unusual and inappropriate words

(many of them borrowed from Homer, Agathas the historian, and the Septuagint), in the place of simple and common ones; and he abounds in tautological phrases. His history, however, is a valuable contemporary record of a stirring time, honestly and fearlessly written. Edited for the first time by Hase, Paris, 1818.—4. Grammaticus, one of the continuators of Byzantine history from the period when Theophanes leaves off. His work, entitled Chronographia, extends from the accession of Leo V. the Armenian, 813, to the death of Romanus Lecapenus, 944. Edited with Theophanes by Combéfis, Paris, 1655; [reprinted in the collection of the Byzantine Historians with an emended text by Bekker, Bonn, 1842].—5. Archbishop of Thessalonica, an eminent Byzantine philosopher and ecclesiastic of the ninth century. His works are lost, but he is frequently mentioned in terms of the highest praise by the Byzantine writers, especially for his knowledge of geometry and astronomy.—6. Magentenus, a commentator on Aristotle, flourished during the first half of the fourteenth century. He was a monk, and afterward archbishop of Mytilene. Several of his commentaries on Aristotle are extant, and have been published.—7. Leo was also the name of six Byzantine emperors. Of these, Leo VI., surnamed the philosopher, who reigned 886-911, is celebrated in the history of the later Greek literature. He wrote a treatise on Greek usages, seventeen oracles, thirty-three orations, and several other works, which are still extant. He is also celebrated in the history of legislation. As the Latin language had long ceased to be the official language of the Eastern empire, Basil, the father of Leo, had formed and partly executed the plan of issuing an authorized Greek version of Justinian's legislation. This plan was carried out by Leo. The Greek version is known under the title of Βασιλικὴ Νομορράφει, or, shortly, Βασιλική; in Latin Basilica, which means "Imperial Constitution" or "Laws." It is divided into sixty books, subdivided into titles, and contains the Institutes, the Digest, the Codex, and the Novellæ; and likewise such constitutions as were issued by the successors of Justinian down to Leo VI. There are, however, many laws of the Digest omitted in the Basilica, which contain, on the other hand, a considerable number of laws or extracts from ancient jurists which are not in the Digest. The publication of this authorized body of law in the Greek language led to the gradual disuse of the original compilations of Justinian in the East. But the Roman law was thus more firmly established in Eastern Europe and Western Asia, where it has maintained itself among the Greek population to the present day. The best edition of the Basilica is the one now publishing by Heimbach, Lipsa, 1835 seq.

[LEOCHARIS (Λεωχάρης), an Athenian statuary and sculptor, was one of the great artists of the later Athenian school, at the head of which were Scopas and Praxiteles. He flourished B.C. 352-338. The master-piece of Leochares seems to have been his statue of the rape of ΛΕΩΝΙΔΗΣ. 1. I. King of Sparta was one of the sons of Anaxandrides, first wife, and, according to some, a twin-brother to Cleombrotus. He had his half-brother Cleomenes I., and his elder brother Dorieus also having reigned. When Greece was invaded by Xerxes, Leonidas was sent with a small army to stand against the enemy at the Thermopylae. The number of his army was about 7,000; according to Herodotus, it was somewhat more than five thousand. Of these, three hundred were Spartans; the rest, the regular band of (so called) hoplites. The Persians in vain attempted to pass through the pass of Thermopylae; they were driven back by Leonidas and his band with immense slaughter.

Malian Ephialtes betrayed the secret of the Anopsea to the Persians, who were able to fall upon the rear of the Spartans. It became known to Leonidas that the Persians were crossing the mountain, and he ordered all the other Greeks except the Theban forces, declaring that he would stand upon his command must guard the post they had been sent to before the body of Persians, who were attacking the mountain under Hydarnes, to attack him in the rear, he advised the Spartans to take the narrow pass and charged the enemy with his handful of troops, preserving their lives, and anxiously cheering them dearly. In the desperate struggle, Leonidas himself fell soon.

Leonidas was succeeded by his son Cleomenes II. On the hill of the pass, a monument of the Greeks made their devotion of stone was set up in his honor. King of Sparta, was son of the Anaxandrides. He acted as guardian to the throne, Arcus II., on whose death he succeeded, about 266. Being opposed to projected reforms of his contemporary, he was deposed, and the throne passed to his son-in-law Cleombrotus; he died afterward recalled, and caused to be put to death, 240. He died about 246, and was succeeded by his son, Cleomenes III.—3. A kinsman of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great, was intrusted with the main superintendence of Alexander's education in his earlier years, before he became the pupil of Aristotle. Leonidas was a man of austere character, and trained the young prince in hardy and self-denying habits. They were two excellent cooks (said Alexander afterward) with which Leonidas had furnished him—a night's march to season his breakfast, and a scanty breakfast to season his dinner.—4. Of Tarentum, the author of upward of one hundred epigrams in the Doric dialect. His epigrams formed a part of the Garland of Meleager. They are chiefly inscriptions for dedicatory offerings and works of art, and, though not of a very high order of poetry, are usually pleasing, ingenious, and in good taste. Leonidas probably lived in the time of Pyrrhus.—5. Of Alexandria, also an epigrammatic poet, flourished under Nero and Vespasian. In the Greek Anthology, forty-three epigrams are ascribed to him: they are of a very low order of merit.

ΛΕΩΝΝΑΤΟΣ (Λεωννάτος). 1. A Macedonian of Pella, one of Alexander's most distinguished officers. His father's name is variously given, as Antreas, Anthes, Onasus, and Eunus. He saved Alexander's life in India in the assault on the city of the Malli. After the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he obtained the satrapy of the Lesser or Hellespontine Phrygia, and in the following year he crossed over into Europe, to assist Antipater against the Greeks; but he was defeated by the Athenians and their allies, and fell in battle.—[2. Another officer in the service of Alexander, a native of Ægæ, and son of Antipater.—3. A Macedonian officer in the service of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who saved the life of that monarch at the battle of Heraclea, B.C. 280.]

ΛΕΟΝΤΙΛΔΗΣ (Λεοντιλῆς). 1. A Theban, commanded at Thermopylae the forces supplied by Thebes to the Grecian army, B.C. 480.—2. A Theban, assisted the Spartans in seizing the Cadmea, or citadel of Thebes, in 382. He was slain by Pelopidas in 379, when the Theban exiles recovered possession of the Cadmea.

LEONTINI (of Λεοντινῶν: Λεοντινός: now Leontini), a town in the east of Sicily, about five miles from the sea, northwest of Syracuse, was situated upon the small river Lisus. It was built upon two hills, which were separated from one another by a valley, in which were the forum, the senate house, and the other public buildings, while the temples and the private houses occupied the hills. The rich plains north of the city, called Leontini Campi, were some of the most fertile in Sicily, and produced abundant crops of most excellent wheat. Leontini was founded by Chalcidians from Naxos, B.C. 730, only six years after the foundation of Naxos itself. It never attained much political importance in consequence of its proximity to Myracæ, to which it soon became subject, and whose fortunes it shared. At a later time it joined the Carthaginians, and was, in consequence, taken and plundered by the Romans. Under the Romans it sunk into insignificance. Leontias was a native of Leontini.

LEONTIS (Λεοντίς), one of the ten Attic tribes created by Cleisthenes, and deriving its name from the hero Leos. Vid. LEOS.

LEONTIUM (Λεόντιον), an Athenian hetæra, the disciple and mistress of Epicurus, wrote a treatise against Theophrastus. She had a daughter, Danaë, who was also an hetæra of some notoriety.

LEONTIUM (Λεόντιον), a town in Achaia, between Phærgæ and Ægium.

LEONTOPOLIS (Λεοντόπολις, Λεόντων πόλις). 1. A city in the Delta of Egypt south of Thabuis, and northwest of Athribis, was the capital of the Nomos Leontopolitea, and probably of late foundation, as no writer before Strabo mentions it. Its site is uncertain.—2. Vid. NICEPHORIUM.

LEOPREPIDES, i. e., Simonides, the son of Leoprepes.

LEOS (Λεώς), one of the heroes eponyms of the Athenians, said to have been a son of Orpheus. The phyle or tribe of Leontis derived its name from him. Once, when Athens was suffering from famine or plague, the Delphic oracle demanded that the daughters of Leos should be sacrificed, and the father complied with the command of the oracle. The maidens were afterward honored by the Athenians, who erected the Leocorium (from Λεώς and κόρος) to them. Their names were Praxithea, Theope, and Eubule.

LEOSTHENES (Λεωσθένης), an Athenian commander of the combined Greek army in the Lamian war. In the year after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he defeated Antipater near Thermopylæ; Antipater thereupon threw himself into the small town of Lamia. Leosthenes pressed the siege with the utmost vigor, but was killed by a blow from a stone. His loss was mourned by the Athenians as a public calamity. He was honored with a public burial in the Ceramicus, and his funeral oration was pronounced by Hyperides.

LEOTYCHIDES (Λεωτυχίδης, Λευτυχίδης, Herodotus). 1. King of Sparta, B.C. 491-469. He commanded the Greek fleet in 479, and defeated the Persians at the battle of Mycale. He was afterward sent with an army into Thessaly to punish those who had sided with the Persians; but, in consequence of his accepting the bribes of the Aleuadae, he was brought to trial on his return home, and went into exile to Tegea, 469, where he died. He was succeeded by his grandson, Archidamus II.—2. Grandson of Archidamus II., and son of Agis II. There was, however, some suspicion that he was, in reality, the fruit of an intrigue of Alcibiades with Timæa, the queen of Agis; in consequence of which he was excluded from the throne, mainly through the influence of Lysander, and his uncle, Agesilaus II., was substituted in his room.

LEPIDUS ÆMILIA, a distinguished patrician family. 1. M., ædile B.C. 192; prætor 191, with Sicily as his province; consul 187, when he defeated the Ligurians; pontifex maximus

180; censor 179 with M. Fulvius Nobilior; consul a second time 175. He was six times chosen by the censors princeps senatus, and died 152, full of years and honors. Lepidus the triumvir is called by Cicero (Phil. xiii., 7) the prosopos of this Lepidus; but he would more probably have been his ancestor, or great-great-grandson.—2. M., consul 157, engaged on war in Spain against the Vaccaei, unsuccessfully. Since he had attacked the senate in opposition to the express orders of the senate, he was deprived of his command, and condemned to pay a fine. He was a man of education and refined taste. Cicero, who read his speeches, speaks of him as the greatest orator of his age. He helped to form the policy of Tiberius Gracchus and C. Carbo, who was accustomed to listen to him with great care.—3. M., the father of the triumvir, was prætor in Sicily in 81, where he earned a character for his oppressions only second to that of Verres. In the civil wars between Marius and Sulla, he belonged at first to the party of the latter, but afterward came forward as a leader of the popular party. In his consulship, 78, he attempted to rescind the laws of Sulla, but he lately died, but he was opposed by his colleague, Catulus, who received the powerful support of Pompey. In the following year (77) Lepidus took up arms and marched against Rome. He was defeated by Pompey and Catulus, and the walls of the city, in the Campus Martius, and was obliged to take to flight. Finding it impossible to hold his ground in Italy, Lepidus sailed with the remainder of his forces to Sardinia; but repulsed even in this island by the prætor, he died shortly afterward of grief and sorrow, which is said to have been increased by the discovery of his wife's infidelity.—4. MAM., surnamed LIVIANUS, because he belonged originally to the Livia gens, consul in 59, belonged to the aristocratical party, and was one of the influential persons who prevailed upon Sulla to spare the life of the young Julius Cæsar.—5. M., consul 56, with L. Volcatius Tullus, the same year in which Cicero was prætor. He belonged to the aristocratical party, but, at the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he retired to his Formian villa to watch the progress of events.—6. L. ÆMILIUS PAULUS, son of M. 8, and brother of M. Lepidus, the triumvir. His surname of Paulus was probably given him by his father, in honor of the celebrated Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Macedonia; but, since he belonged to the family of the Lepidi, and not to that of the Pauli, he is inserted in this place, and not under PAULUS. Æmilius Paulus did not follow the example of his father, but commenced his public career by supporting the aristocratical party. His first public act was the accusation of Catiline in 63. He was quaestor in Macedonia 59; ædile 56; prætor 54; and consul 50, along with M. Claudius Marcellus. Paulus was raised to the consulship on account of his being one of the most determined enemies of Cæsar, but Cæsar gained him over to his side by a bribe of fifteen hundred talents, which he is said to have expended on the completion of a magnificent basilica which he had commenced in his ædileship. After the murder of Cæsar (44), Paulus joined the senatorial party.

was one of the senators who declared a public enemy on account of his sedition; and, accordingly, when the state was turned, his name was set in the proscription list by his own soldiers, however, who were unwilling him, allowed him to escape. He fled to Brutus in Asia, and after the latter repaired to Miletus. Here he refused to go to Rome, and was pardoned by the triumvirs.—7.

LEPIDUS, the TRIUMVIR, brother of the breaking out of the civil wars, who was then prætor, joined Antony; and as the consuls had fled from Italy, Lepidus, as prætor, best magistrate remaining in Italy, took his absence in Spain, Lepidus pre-emptoria in which the former was stator. In the following year (46) the province of Nearer Spain. On the 1st of Rome in 47, Caesar granted him and made him his magister equitum; next year (46), his colleague in the In 44 he received from Caesar the of Narbonese Gaul and Nearer did not quitted the neighborhood of time of the dictator's death. Having of an army near the city, he rendered M. Antony efficient assistance; and, in consequence, allowed to be chosen pontifex maximus, which became vacant by Caesar's death.

Afterward repaired to his province and Spain. He remained neutral between Antony and the senate; and, eventually joined Antony, when he summoned him in Gaul after his defeat at the battle of Munda. He was in the end of May, 43; and as he reached Rome, the senate pronounced a public enemy. In the summer Antony crossed the Alps at the head of a powerful army. Octavianus (afterwards Augustus) joined them; and in the winter the celebrated triumvirate was formed. The Roman world was divided into three parts: Octavianus, Antony, and Lepidus.

In 42 Lepidus remained in Italy while the two other triumvirs prepared for the war against Brutus and Cassius. After the division of the provinces after the battle of Philippi, Lepidus received Africa, and remained there till 36. In this year Octavianus sent him to Sicily to assist him against Sextus Pompey. Lepidus refused to be treated as a subordinate, and made an effort to acquire power for himself and to regain his lost power. He was subdued by Octavianus, who deprived him of his triumph, and his province, and ordered him to live at Circesi, under surveillance. He allowed him, however, the dignity of pontifex maximus. He was succeeded by Augustus.

Lepidus was freed of care and it is not improbable that he was capable of effecting much more than he ever did.—8. PAULUS AMILIUS of No. 6, with whom he is friended. His name is variously given by the ancient writers, Amilius Paulus or Paulus Amilius, or Amilius Lepidus Paulus, but Paulus Amilius Lepidus seems to be the most correct form. He probably fled with his father to Brutus, but he afterward made his peace with the triumvirs. He accompanied Octavianus in his campaign against Sex. Pompey in Sicily in 36. In 34 he was consul suffectus. In 22 he was censor with L. Munatius Plancus, and died while holding this dignity.—9.

10. M. AMILIUS LEPIDUS, son of the triumvir (No. 7) and Junia, formed a conspiracy in 34 for the purpose of assassinating Octavianus on his return to Rome after the battle of Actium. Maecenas, who had charge of the city, became acquainted with the plot, seized Lepidus, and sent him to Octavianus in the East, who put him to death. His father was ignorant of the conspiracy, but his mother was privy to it. Lepidus was married twice: his first wife was Antonia, the daughter of the triumvir, and his second Servilia, who put an end to her life by swallowing burning coals when the conspiracy of her husband was discovered.—10.

11. Q. AMILIUS LEPIDUS, consul in 21 with M. Lollius (Hor. Ep. i. 90, 28).—12. L. AMILIUS PAULUS, son of No. 8 and Cornelia, married Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus. Vid. JULIA, No. 6. Paulus is therefore called the progenitor of Augustus. He was consul A.D. 1, with C. Cæsar, his wife's brother. He entered into a conspiracy against Augustus, of the particulars of which we are not informed.—13.

14. M. AMILIUS LEPIDUS, brother of the last, consul A.D. 6 with L. Arruntius. He lived on the most intimate terms with Augustus, who employed him in the war against the Dalmatians in A.D. 8. After the death of Augustus, he was also held in high esteem by Tiberius.—15. M. AMILIUS LEPIDUS, consul with T. Statilius Taurus in A.D. 11, must be carefully distinguished from the last. In A.D. 21 he obtained the province of Asia.—16. AMILIUS LEPIDUS, the son of No. 11 and Julia, the grand-daughter of Augustus, and consequently the great-grandson of Augustus. He was one of the minions of the Emperor Caligula, with whom he had the most shameful connection. He married Drusilla, the favorite sister of the emperor; but he was, notwithstanding, put to death by Caligula, A.D. 39.

LEPONTI, a people inhabiting the Alps, in whose country Caesar places the sources of the Rhine, and Pliny the sources of the Rhone. They dwelt on the southern slope of the St. Gotthard and the Simplan, toward the Lago Maggiore, and their name is still retained in the Val Leventina. Their chief town was Ossola (now Domo d'Ossola).

LEPRA (Λεπρα) daughter of Pyrgæus, from whom the town of Lepreum in Elis was said to have derived its name. Vid. LEPREUM. Another tradition derived the name from Lepreus, a son of Cæneus, Glaucus, or Pyrgæus, by Asytodamia. He was a grandson of Neptune (Poseidon), and a rival of Hercules both in his strength and his powers of eating, but he was conquered and slain by the latter. His tomb was believed to exist in Phigalia.

LEPREUM (Λεπρεον, Λεπρεον: Λεπρεον: now Strovoliti), a town of Elis in Triphylia, situated forty stadia from the sea, was said to have been founded in the time of Theseus by Minyans from Lemnos. After the Messenian wars it was subdued by the Eleans with the aid of Sparta: but it recovered its independence in the Peloponnesian war, and was assisted by the Spartans against Elis. At the time of the Achaean league it was subject to Elis.

[LEPREUM (Λεπρεύς). Vid. LEPREA.]

LEPTA, Q., a native of Oales in Campania, and praefectus fabrum to Cicero in Cilicia, B.C. 57. He joined the Pompeian party in the civil war, and is frequently mentioned in Cicero's letters.

LEPTINES (Λεπτινός). 1. A Syracusan, son of Hermocrates, and brother of Dionysius the Elder, tyrant of Syracuse. He commanded his brother's fleet in the war against the Carthaginians, B.C. 397, but was defeated by Mago with great loss. In 390 he was sent by Dionysius with a fleet to the assistance of the Lucanians against the Italian Greeks. Some time afterward he gave offence to the jealous temper of the tyrant by giving one of his daughters in marriage to Philistus, without any previous intimation to Dionysius, and on this account he was banished from Syracuse, together with Philistus. He thereupon retired to Thurii, but was subsequently recalled by Dionysius to Syracuse. Here he was completely reinstated in his former favor, and obtained one of the daughters of Dionysius in marriage. In 383 he again took an active part in the war against the Carthaginians, and commanded the right wing of the Syracusan army in the battle near Cronium, in which he was killed.—2. A Syracusan, who joined with Calippus in expelling the garrison of the younger Dionysius from Rhegium, 351. Soon afterward he assassinated Calippus, and then crossed over to Sicily, where he made himself tyrant of Apollonia and Engyum. He was expelled in common with the other tyrants by Timoleon; but his life was spared, and he was sent into exile at Corinth, 342.—3. An Athenian, known only as the proposer of a law taking away all special exemptions from the burden of public charges (ἀρτέλειαι τῶν λειτουργιῶν), against which the celebrated oration of Demosthenes is directed, usually known as the oration against Leptines. This speech was delivered 355; and the law must have been passed above a year before, as we are told that the lapse of more than that period had already exempted Leptines from all personal responsibility. Hence the efforts of Demosthenes were directed solely to the repeal of the law, not to the punishment of its proposer. His arguments were successful, and the law was repealed.—4. A Syrian Greek, who assassinated with his own hand, at Laodicea, On. Octavius, the chief of the Roman deputies, who had been sent into Syria, 162. Demetrius caused Leptines to be seized, and sent as a prisoner to Rome; but the senate refused to receive him, being desirous to reserve this cause of complaint as a public grievance.

LEPTIS (Λεπτίς). 1. LEPTIS MAGNA or NEAPOLIS (ἡ Λεπτίς μεγάλη, Νεάπολις), a city on the coast of Northern Africa, between the Syrtes, east of Abrotomum, and west of the mouth of the little river Cinyra, was a Phoenician colony, with a flourishing commerce, though it possessed no harbor. With Abrotomum and Uca it formed the African Tripolis. The Romans made it a colony: it was the birth-place of the Emperor Septimius Severus; and it continued to flourish till A.D. 366, when it was almost ruined by an attack from a Libyan tribe. Justinian did something toward its restoration, but the Arabian invasion completed its destruction. Its ruins are still considerable.—2. LEPTIS MINOR or PARVA (Λεπτίς ἡ μικρά: ruins at Lamta), usually called simply Leptis, a Phoenician colony on the coast of Byzacium, in Northern Africa, between Hadrumetum and Thapsus: an important place under both the Carthaginians and the Romans.

LESTINA (now St. Honorat), an island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, opposite Antipolis (now Antibes).

LEUNA or LERNE (Λέρνη), a district in Argolis, not far from Argos, in which was a marsh and a small river of the same name. It was celebrated as the place where Hercules killed the Lernean Hydra. Vid. p. 357, a.

LEZO (now St. Marguerite), a small island off the coast of Gallia Narbonensis.

LÍKOS (Λίκος: Λίπιος), a small island, one of the Sporades, opposite to the mouth of the Sinus Inasius, on the coast of Caria. Its inhabitants, who came originally from Miletus, bore a bad character. Besides a city of the same name, it had in it a temple of Diana (Artemis), where the transformation of the sisters of Meager into Guinea-fowls was said to have taken place, in memory of which Guinea-fowls were kept in the court of that temple.

LESSONAX (Λεσσώναξ). 1. Son of Potamæ of Mytilene, a philosopher and sophist in the time of Augustus. He was the father of Pulemon, the teacher and friend of the Emperor Tiberius. Lessonax wrote several political orations, of which two have come down to us, one entitled περί τοῦ κολλήμου Κορυθαίου, and the other ποροπεριουδὸς λόγος, both of which are not unsuccessful imitations of the Attic orators of the best times. They are printed in the collections of the Greek orators (vid. Demosthenes), and separately by Orelli, Lipsa, 1820.—2. A Greek grammarian, of uncertain age, but later than No. 1, the author of an extant work on grammatical figures (περί σχημάτων), published by Valckenær in his edition of Arrianonius.

LESSOS (Λέσβος: Λέσβιος; Lesbios: now Mytilene, Metelin), the largest, and by far the most important, of the islands of the Aegean along the coast of Asia Minor, lay opposite to the Gulf of Adramyttium, off the coast of Mysia, the direction of its length being northwest and southeast. It is intersected by lofty mountains, and indented with large bays, the chief of which, on the western side, runs more than half way across the island. It had three chief headlands, Argæum, on the northeast, Signum on the west, and Mæla on the south. Its valleys were very fertile, especially in the northern part, near Methymna; and it produced corn, oil, and wine renowned for its excellence. In early times it was called by various names, the chief of which were Les Pelagias, Mytania, and Macaria: the late Greek writers called it Mytilene, from its chief city and this name has been preserved to modern

LEUCA (Λεύκη), a village ward from Argos, on the west- the territory of Epidaurus, and Mount Arachneus: it contained nerva (Athena).]

LEUCA, a small island of the Aegean Sea, the Cyclades, lying near Gyarus. (Ἰσθαιός). 1. A river of Ionia, in wing south past Magnesia into -2. A river in the south of Crete, rtyia.—3. Vid. LATRON.

1), the personification of oblivion, called by Hesiod a daughter of Eria. A river in the lower world was likewise called Lethe. The souls of the departed drank of this river, and thus forgot all they had said or done in the upper world; [and, according to Virgil (Æn., vi, 718), the souls destined by the Fates to in- habit new bodies on earth also drank of its waters, to remove the remembrance of the joys of Elysium.]

LETHE, a river in Spain. Vid. LIMXA.

LÊTO (Λητώ), called LATONA by the Romans, is described by Hesiod as a daughter of the Titan Coeus and Phœbe, a sister of Asteria, and the mother of Apollo and Diana (Artemis) by Jupiter (Zeus), to whom she was married be- fore Juno (Hera). Homer likewise calls her the mother of Apollo and Diana (Artemis) by Jupiter (Zeus); he mentions her in the story of Niobe, who paid so dearly for her conduct toward Latona (Leto) (vid. NIOBE), and he also describes her as the friend of the Trojans in the war with the Greeks. In later writers these elements of her story are variously embellish- ed, for they do not describe her as the lawful wife of Jupiter (Zeus), but merely as his mis- tress, who was persecuted by Juno (Hera) during her pregnancy. All the world being afraid of receiving Latona (Leto) on account of Juno (Hera), she wandered about till she came to Delos, which was then a floating island, and bore the name of Asteria or Ortygia. When Latona (Leto) arrived there, Jupiter (Zeus) fas- tened it by adamantine chains to the bottom of the sea, that it might be a secure resting place for his beloved, and here she gave birth to Apollo and Diana (Artemis). The tradition is also re- lated with various other modifications. Some said that Jupiter (Zeus) changed Latona (Leto) into a quail (ὄρνις), and that in this state she arrived in the floating island, which was hence called Ortygia. Others related that Jupiter (Zeus) was enamored with Asteria, but that she, being metamorphosed into a bird, flew across the sea; that she was then changed into a rock, which for a long time lay under the surface of the sea; and that this rock arose from the waters and received Latona (Leto) when she was pursued by Python. Latona (Leto) was generally worshipped only in conjunction with her children. Delos was the chief seat of her worship. Vid. APOLLO. It is probable that the name of Leto belongs to the same class of words as the Greek λήθη and the Latin latco. Leto would therefore signify "the obscure" or "con- cealed," not as a physical power, but as a di- vinity yet quiescent and invisible, from whom issued the visible divinity with all his splendor and brilliancy. This view is supported by the account of her genealogy given by Hesiod. From their mother Apollo is frequently called Letoïus or Latoïus, and Artemis (Diana) Letoïa, Letoia, Latoia, or Latoë.

LEUCA (ἡ Λεύκη), town at the extremity of the lapygian promontory in Calabria, with a fetid fountain, under which the giants who were vanquished by Hercules are said to have been buried. The promontory is still called Capo de Leuca.

LEUCADIA. Vid. LEUCAL.

LEUCA, LEUCA (Λεύκη; Λεύκη; now Leski), a small town on the coast of Ionia, in Asia Minor.

near Phocæa, built by the Persian general Tachos in B.C. 352, and remarkable as the scene of the battle between the consul Licinius Crassus and Aristonicus in 131.

LEUCAS or Λευκάδια [Λευκάς, Leukadia: Λευκάδιος; now Santa Maura], an island in the Ionian Sea, off the western coast of Acarnania, about twenty miles in length, and from five to eight miles in breadth. It has derived its name from the numerous calcareous hills which cover its surface. It was originally united to the main land at its northeastern extremity by a narrow isthmus. Homer speaks of it as a peninsula and mentions its well-fortified town Nericus (Νήρικος). It was at that time inhabited by the Teleboans and Leleges. Subsequently the Corinthians under Cypselus, between B.C. 665 and 625, founded a new town, called Leucas, in the northeast of the country, near the isthmus, in which they settled one thousand of their citizens, and to which they removed the inhabitants of Nericus, which lay a little to the west of the new town. The Corinthians also cut a canal through the isthmus, and thus converted the peninsula into an island. This canal was afterward filled up by deposits of sand; and in the Peloponnesian war it was no longer available for ships, which during that period were conveyed across the isthmus on more than one occasion (Thuc., iii., 81; iv., 8). The canal was opened again by the Romans. At present the channel is dry in some parts, and has from three to four feet of water in others. The town of Leucas was a place of importance, and during the war between Philip and the Romans was at the head of the Acarnanian league, and the place where the meetings of the league were held. It was, in consequence, taken and plundered by the Romans, B.C. 197. The remains of this town are still to be seen. The other towns in the island were Helloménium (Ἑλλομένιον) on the southeastern coast, and Phæra (Φαρά) on the southwestern coast. At the southern extremity of the island, opposite Oephalenia, was the celebrated promontory, variously called Leucas, Leucatas, Leucades, or Leucæ (now Cape Ducato), on which was a temple of Apollo, who hence had the surname of Leucadius. At the annual festival of the god it was the custom to cast down a criminal from this promontory into the sea: to break his fall, birds of all kinds were attached to him, and if he reached the sea uninjured, boats were ready to pick him up. This appears to have been an expiatory rite; and it gave rise to the well-known story that lovers leaped from this rock in order to seek relief from the pangs of love. Thus Sappho is said to have leaped down from this rock when in love with Phaon; but this well-known story vanishes at the first approach of criticism.

[LEUCÆ COMÆ (Λευκæ Κωμæ), a fortified place in the north of Arabia Felix, on the Arabian Sinus, which served as a depot for goods sent to Petra and Northern Arabia.]

LEUCÆ, a people in the southeast of Galia Belgica, south of the Mediomatrici, between the Matrona and Mosella. Their chief town was Tullum (now Toul).

LEUCÆ MONTES, called by the Romans Ala Montes, a range of mountains in the west of Crete. Vid. ALBI MONTES.

LEUCIPPE. Vid. ALCATHOR.

LEUCIPPIDES (Λευκιππίδης), i. e., Phædra and Hilaira, the daughters of Leucippus. They were priestesses of Minerva (Athena) and Diana (Artemis), and betrothed to Idæus and Lynceus, the sons of Aphareus; but Castor and Pollux, being charmed with their beauty, carried them off and married them.

LEUCIPPUS (Λευκιππός). 1. Son of Democritus. For details, vid. DAPHNE.—2. Son of Perseus and Gorgophone, brother of Aphareus, and prince of the Meessenians, was one of the Calydonian hunters. By his wife Philodice he had two daughters, Phoebe and Hilaira, usually called LEUCIPPIDES.—3. A Grecian philosopher, the founder of the atomic theory of the ancient philosophy, which was more fully developed by Democritus. Where and when he was born we have no data for deciding. Miletus, Aldem, and Elea have been assigned as his birth-place; the first, apparently, for no other reason than that it was the birth-place of several natural philosophers; the second, because Democritus came from that town; the third, because he was looked upon as a disciple of the Eleatic school. The period when he lived is equally uncertain. He is called the teacher of Democritus, the disciple of Parmenides, or according to other accounts, of Zeno, of Melissus, as even of Pythagoras. With regard to his philosophical system it is impossible to speak with certainty, since the writers who mention him either mention him in conjunction with Democritus, or attribute to him doctrines which are in like manner attributed to Democritus. Vid. DEMOCRITUS.

LEUCON (Λεύκων). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) or Athamas and Themisto, and father of Erythrus and Evippe.—2. A powerful king of Bosphorus, who reigned B.C. 393–353. He was in close alliance with the Athenians, whom he supplied with corn in great abundance, and who, in return for his services, admitted him and his sons to the citizenship of Athens.—3. An Athenian poet, of the old comedy, a contemporary and rival of Aristophanes. [A fragment preserved in Hezychius is given in Meleke's Comic. Græc. Fragm., vol. i., p. 433].

LEUCONORÆ (Λευκονόρη), daughter of Mæon, usually called Leucippe. Vid. ALCATHOR.

LEUCOPITRA (Λευκοπίτρα; now Cape dell'Armi), a promontory in the southwest of Sicily, on the Sicilian Straits, and a few miles south of Rhegium, to whose territory it belonged. It was regarded by the ancient writers as the termination of the Apennines, and is derived its name from the white color of its rocks.

LEUCOPHRYNE. Vid. LEUCOPHYNA.

της (Λευκόφρυς). 1 A city of Caria, on the Meander, close to a curious warm water, and having a renowned Diana (Artemis) Leucophryne.—2. A town on the island of Tauris, from its location (now Πέριος), a small town south of the Gulf of Paestum, off Lucania, and opposite the Promontory, said to have been called after Iria.

1 (Λευκόφρυς, i. e., White Syriana), early applied by the Greeks to the people of Cappadocia, who were of the darker color beyond the Taurus. When Cappadocia came to be the name for the people of Southern Cappadocia Leucosyri was applied to the people in the north of the country (Pontus) on the coast of the Euxine. The rivers Halys and Iris: these are Syrians of Xenophon (Anab. v., 10). Macedonian conquest the name have fallen into disuse.

1 (Λευκοθήα), a marine goddess, was the wife of Athamas. For details.

1 daughter of the Babylonian king Eurynome, was beloved by Apollo. She was betrayed by the jealous father, who buried her alive; Apollo metamorphosed her into an eagle. Leucothoe is in some writers the name for Lencothoe.

2 Leuca: now Lefka or Lefka. A town in Boeotia, on the road from Eleusis, memorable for the victory of the Thebans here gained over the Spartans, B.C. 427.

1 (Λευκόρυς). 1. Or Leucoria (now Leucoria) in Messenia, on the eastern side of the Gulf, between Cardamyle and the small river Pamisos. The Messenians disputed for the possession. 2. A small town in Achaia, destroyed.

1 (Λευκός) a companion of Ulysses in the Trojan War, slain by Antiphilus.]

1 (Λευκονόμος), a small river of Mount Phloe, and the source of the river. On its banks was a temple of Dionysus Leuconytes.]

1 (Λευκονόμος), a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, west of the mouth of the Rhine. Their capital was Noviomagus.

1, a city of Mesopotamia, between the Tigris and the Euphrates.

1 (Λιβανός), a distinguished Greek rhetorician, was born at Antioch, about A.D. 314. He studied at Antioch, where he imbibed an ardent love for the study of Greek; and he opened a private school of rhetoric at Antioch, which was attended by so large a number of pupils that the classes of the public schools were completely deserted. The emperor, charged Libanus with being a heretic, obtained his expulsion from Constantinople about 344. He then went to Nicomedia, where he taught with equal success but also drew upon himself an equal degree of malice from his opponents. After a stay of five years at Nicomedia, he was recalled to Constantinople. Eventually he took up his abode at Antioch, where he spent the remainder of his life. Here he received the greatest marks of favor from the Emperor Julian, 362. In the reign of Valens he was at first persecuted, but he afterward succeeded in winning the favor of that monarch also. The Emperor Theodosius likewise showed him marks of respect, but his enjoyment of life was disturbed by ill health, by misfortunes in his family, and more especially by the disputes in which he was incessantly involved, partly with rival sophists, and partly with the prefects. It can not, however, be denied, that he himself was as much to blame as his opponents, for he appears to have provoked them by his querulous disposition, and by the pride and vanity which every where appear in his orations, and which led him to interfere in political questions which it would have been wiser to have left alone. He was the teacher of St. Basil and Chrysostom, with whom he always kept up a friendly connection. The year of his death is uncertain, but from one of his epistles it is evident that he was alive in 391, and it is probable that he died a few years after, in the reign of Arcadius. The extant works of Libanus are, 1. Models for rhetorical exercises (Προγραμματίων προοιμίματα). 2. Orations (Λόγοι), sixty-seven in number. 3. Declamations (Μελέτραι), i. e., orations on fictitious subjects, and descriptions of various kinds, fifty in number. 4. A life of Demosthenes, and arguments to the speeches of the same orator. 5. Letters (Ἐπιστολαί), of which a very large number is still extant. Many of these letters are extremely interesting, being addressed to the most eminent men of his time, such as the Emperor Julian, Athanasius, Basil, Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, and others. The style of Libanus is superior to that of the other rhetoricians of the fourth century. He took the best of the classic age as his model, and we can often see in him the disciple and happy imitator of Demosthenes; but he is not always able to rise above the spirit of his age, and we rarely find in him that natural simplicity which constitutes the great charm of the best Attic orators. His diction is a curious mixture of the pure old Attic with what may be termed modern. Moreover, it is evident that, like all other rhetoricians, he is more concerned about the form than the substance. As far as the history of his age is concerned, some of his orations, and still more his epistles, are of great value, such as the oration in which he relates the events of his own life, the eulogies on Constantine and Constantius, the orations on Julian, several orations describing the condition of Antioch, and those which he wrote against his professional and political opponents. There is no complete edition of all the works of Libanus. The best edition of the orations and declamations is by Reiske, Altenburg, 1791-97, 4 vols. 8vo, and the best edition of the epistles is by Wolf, Amsterdam, 1738, fol.

ΛΙΒΑΝΟΣ (ὁ Λιβανός, τὸ Λιβανός: Heb. Libanus)

LIBANUS, the White Mountain: now Jebel Libnan, a lofty and steep mountain range on the confines of Syria and Palestine, dividing Phoenice from Coele-Syria. It extends from above Sidon, about latitude $33\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$ north, in a direction north-northeast as far as about latitude $34\frac{1}{2}^{\circ}$. Its highest summits are covered with perpetual snow; its sides were in ancient times clothed with forests of cedars, of which only scattered trees now remain, and on its lower slopes grow vines, figs, mulberries, and other fruits: its vines were highly celebrated in ancient times. It is considerably lower than the opposite range of ANTILIBANUS. In the Scriptures the word Libanon is used for both ranges, and for either of them; but in classical authors the names Libanus and Antilibanus are distinctive terms, being applied to the western and eastern ranges respectively.

LIBARNA or LIBARNUM, a town of Liguria, on the Via Aurelia, northwest of Genoa.

LIBENTINA, LIBENTINA, LIBENTIA, a surname of Venus among the Romans, by which she is described as the goddess of sexual pleasure (dea libidinis).

LIBER, or LIBER PATER, a name frequently given by the Roman poets to the Greek Bacchus or Dionysus, who was accordingly regarded as identical with the Italian Liber. But the god LIBER and the goddess LIBERA were ancient Italian divinities, presiding over the cultivation of the vine and the fertility of the fields. Hence they were worshipped even in early times in conjunction with Ceres. A temple to these three divinities was vowed by the dictator A. Postumius in B.C. 496, and was built near the Circus Flaminius; it was afterward restored by Augustus, and dedicated by Tiberius. The name Liber is probably connected with liberare. Hence Seneca says, Liber dictus est quia liberat servitio carum animi; while others, who were evidently thinking of the Greek Bacchus, found in the name an allusion to licentious drinking and speaking. Poets usually called him Liber Pater, the latter word being very commonly added by the Italians to the names of gods. The female LIBERA was identified by the Romans with Cora or Proserpina, the daughter of Demeter (Ceres); whence Cicero calls Liber and LIBERA children of Ceres; whereas Ovid calls Ariadne LIBERA. The festival of the Liberalia was celebrated by the Romans every year on the 17th of March.

LIBERA. Vid. LIBER.

[LIBERALIS. Vid. ANTONINUS LIBERALIS.]

LIBERTAS, the personification of Liberty, was worshipped at Rome as a divinity. A temple was erected to her on the Aventine by Tib. Sempronius Gracchus. Another was built by Clodius on the spot where Cicero's house had stood. A third was erected after Caesar's victories in Spain. From these temples we must distinguish the Atrium Libertatis, which was in the north of the forum, toward the Quirinal. This building, under the republic, served as an office of the censors, and also contained tables with laws inscribed upon them. It was rebuilt by Asinius Pollio, and then became the repository of the first public library at Rome. Libertas is usually represented in works of art as a matron, with the pileus, the symbol of liberty, on a wreath of laurel. Sometimes she appears holding the Phrygian cap in her hand.

LIBETHRIDÆA. Vid. LIBETHRUM.

LIBETHRIUS MONS (τὸ Λιβηθριον ὄρος), a mountain in Boeotia, a branch of Mount Helicon, forty stadia from Coronea, possessing a grotto of the Libethrian nymphs, adorned with their statues, and two fountains Libethrias and Petra.

LIBETHRUM (Λιβηθρον, τὸ Λιβηθρον, τὸ Λιβηθρον), an ancient Thracian town in Pieria in Macedonia, on the slope of Olympus, and southwest of Diium, where Orpheus is said to have lived. This town and the surrounding country were sacred to the Muses, who were hence called Libethrides; and it is probable that the worship of the Muses under this name was transferred from this place to Boeotia.

[LIBISSONIS TURRIS (Λιβισσωνος πύργος), a city on the northern coast of Sardinia, and, according to Pliny, the only Roman colony in the island: probably the usual landing place for ships coming from Corsica. Its ruins are now seen on a height near a harbor which still bears the name Porto Torre.]

LIBITINA, an ancient Italian divinity, who was identified by the later Romans sometimes with Persephone (Proserpina), on account of her connection with the dead and their burial, and sometimes with Aphrodite (Venus). The latter was probably the consequence of etymological speculations on the name of Libitina, which people connected with libido. Her temple at Rome was a repository of every thing necessary for burials, and persons might there either buy or hire those things. Hence a person undertaking the burial of a person (an undertaker) was called libitinarius, and his business libitina; hence the expressions libitinam exercere or facere, and libitina funeribus non sufficiebat, i. e., they could not all be buried. It is related that King Servius Tullius, in order to ascertain the number of deaths, ordained that for every person who died, a piece of money should be deposited in the temple of Libitina. Owing to this connection of Libitina with the dead, Roman poets frequently employ her name in the sense of death itself.

LIBO, SCRIBONIUS, a plebeian family. L. L. tribune of the plebs, B.C. 119, accused Ser. Sulpicius Galba on account of the outrages which he had committed against the Lucanians. Vid. GALBA, No. 6. It was perhaps this Libo who consecrated the Puteal Scribonianum or Puteal Libonis, of which we so frequently read in ancient writers. The Puteal was an inclosed place in the forum, near the Arco Fabianus, and was so called from its being open at the top, like a puteal or well. It appears that there was only one such puteal at Rome, and not two, as is generally believed. It was dedicated in very ancient times either on account of the whetstone of the augur Navius (comp. Liv., i. 36), or because the spot had been struck by lightning; it was subsequently repaired and re-dedicated by Libo, who erected in its neighborhood a tribunal for the praetor, in consequence of which the place was frequented by persons who had lawsuits, such as money-lenders and the like. (Comp. Hor., Sat. ii. 6, 26 Epist. i. 19, 8.)—L., the father-in-law of Sen. Pompey, the son of Pompey the Great. On the t of the civil war in 49 he satirized Pompey, and was instructed with the (Etruria. Shortly afterward he accompanied Pompey to Greece, and was actively in the war that ensued. On the death (48) he had the chief command of an fleet. In the civil wars which saw his death, he followed the fortunes of the lawless Pompey. In 40 Octavian followed his sister Scribonia, and this marriage was followed by a peace between the triumvir Pompey (39). When the war was 36, Libo for a time continued with seeing his cause hopeless, he died the following year. In 34 he was M. Antony.

Libo, an Eleas, the architect of the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) in the Altis at Elis about B.C. 450.

Libos, a town of the Carpetani, Hispania (q. v.) of Livy.] Libicis, a Gallic tribe in Gallia Cispadana, to the west of Brixia and Verona formerly in which they were expelled by the Romans. They are probably the same people as the Libi, toward find in the neighborhood under the name of Lebecii or Libici, a district of Illyricum, along the Adriatic Sea, was separated from the northwest by the River Arsia, and to the south by the River Titius, leading to the western part of Croatia. The northern part of the modern Dalmatian country is mountainous and unproductive. The Liburni, supplanted chiefly by commerce and navy were celebrated at a very early date and skillful sailors, and they appear to have been the first people who had the mastery of the Adriatic. They took possession of the islands of this sea as well as the coast, and had settlements even on the coast of Italy. Their ships were renowned for their swift sailing, and hence were called Liburna nave. It was to light of a description that Augustus was led for his victory over Antony's fleet at Actium. The Liburnians, Illyrian people who submitted to Rome. Being hard pressed by the Iapydes and by the Dalmatians on the coast, they sought the protection of Rome at a very early period. Hence we find that the towns were immune, or exempt from taxation.

The islands off the coast were called Liburnia, and are known by the name of Liburnides or Liburnica Insulae. Liburnia, daughter of Epaphus and Memnon Libya (Africa) is said to have been named. By Neptune (Poseidon) she obtained the name of Agenor, Belus, and Lelex (q. v. Libyes, Libyae). 1. The Greek continent of Africa in general. — 2. L. Libyca (Δ. ἡ ἑστὴς), the south of Africa, as distinguished from the regions on the northern and eastern coasts. — 3. Libya, specifically, or Libyca (Λιβύη), a district of North Africa between Egypt and Marmarica, so called because it once formed an Egyptian Nubia. It is sometimes called Libya Exterior.

Libyca Montes (τὰ Λιβυκὸν ὄρος: now Selach), the range of mountains which form the western margin of the valley of the Nile. Vid. Egyptus.

Libyca Mare (τὸ Λιβυκὸν πέλαγος), the part of the Mediterranean between the island of Crete and the northern coast of Africa.

Libyca Phoeniciae (Λιβυκοφαινικαί, Libycofaiνικαί), a term applied to the people of those parts of Northern Africa in which the Phoenicians had founded colonies, and especially to the inhabitants of the Phoenician cities on the coast of the Carthaginian territory: it is derived from the fact that these people were a mixed race of the Libyan natives with the Phoenician settlers.

Libyca (Λιβύα: now Heraclea), according to Leake, Malsum), a town of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, on the northern coast of the Sinus Asiaticus, west of Nicomedia, celebrated as the place where the tomb of Hannibal was to be found.

Libyca or Libyca, a people of Vindelicia, on the eastern bank of the River Licus or Licia (now Lech), one of the fiercest of the Vindelic tribes.

Libyades (Λιβυάδες: now Ponticonesi), three small islands between Euboea and the coast of Locria, called Scaphia, Careia, and Phocaria. Vid. Libyca, No. 1.

Libyca (Λιβύς). 1. An attendant on Hercules, brought his master the poisoned garment which destroyed the hero. (Vid. p. 359, a) Hercules, in anguish and wrath, threw Libyca into the sea, and the Libyca islands were believed to have derived their name from him. — 2. A Spartan, son of Areolus, was proxenus of Argos, and is frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war. He was famous throughout Greece for his hospitality, especially in his entertainment of strangers at the Gymnopaedia.

Libyca of Libyca. Vid. Libyca.

Libyca. 1. A Vestal virgin, accused of incest, together with two other Vestals, Emilia and Marcia, B.C. 114. L. Metellus, the pontifex maximus, condemned Emilia, but acquitted Libyca and Marcia. The acquittal of the two last caused such dissatisfaction that the people appointed L. Cassius Longinus to investigate the matter, and he condemned both Libyca and Marcia. — 2. Wife of C. Sempronius Gracchus, the celebrated tribune. — 3. Daughter of Crassus the orator, and wife of the younger Marius.

Libyca gens, a celebrated plebeian house, to which belonged C. Licinius Calvus Stolo, whose exertions threw open the consulship to the plebeians. Its most distinguished families at a later time were those of Crassus, Lucullus, and Munia. There were likewise numerous other surnames in the gens, which are also given in their proper places.

Libyca. 1. C. LICINIUS CALVUS, surnamed Stolo, which he derived, it is said, from the care with which he dug up the shoots that sprang up from the roots of his vines. He brought the contest between the patricians and plebeians to a happy termination, and thus became the founder of Rome's greatness. He was tribune of the people from B.C. 376 to 367, and was faithfully supported in his exertions by his colleagues

1. Sextius. The laws which he proposed were: 1. That in future no more consular tribunes should be appointed, but that consuls should be elected, one of whom should always be a plebeian. 2. That no one should possess more than five hundred jugera of the public land, or keep upon it more than one hundred head of large and five hundred of small cattle. 3. A law regulating the affairs between debtor and creditor. 4. That the Sibylline books should be intrusted to a college of ten men (decemviri), half of whom should be plebeians. These rogations were passed after a most vehement opposition on the part of the patricians, and L. Sextius was the first plebeian who obtained the consulship, 386. Licinius himself was elected twice to the consulship, 364 and 361. Some years later he was accused by M. Popilius Laenas of having transgressed his own law respecting the amount of public land which a person might possess. He was condemned and sentenced to pay a heavy fine.—2. C. Licinius Macrus, an annalist and an orator, was a man of praetorian dignity, who, when impeached (66) of extortion by Cicero, finding that the verdict was against him, forthwith committed suicide before the formalities of the trial were completed, and thus averted the dishonor and loss which would have been entailed upon his family by a public condemnation and by the confiscation of property which it involved. His Annales commenced with the very origin of the city, and extended to twenty-one books at least; but how far he brought down his history is unknown.—3. C. Licinius Macrus Calvus, son of the last, a distinguished orator and poet, was born in 82, and died about 47 or 46, in his thirty-fifth or thirty-sixth year. His most celebrated oration was delivered against Vatinius, who was defended by Cicero, when he was only twenty-seven years of age. So powerful was the effect produced by this speech, that the accused started up in the midst of the pleading, and passionately exclaimed, "Rogo vos, iudices, num, si iste disertus est, ideo me damnari oporteat?" His poems were full of wit and grace, and possessed sufficient merit to be classed by the ancients with those of Catullus. His elegies, especially that on the untimely death of his mistress Quintilla, have been warmly extolled by Catullus, Propertius, and Ovid. Calvus was remarkable for the shortness of his stature, and hence the vehement action in which he indulged while pleading was in such indignant contrast with his insignificant person, that even his friend Catullus has not been able to resist a joke, and has presented him to us as the "Salaputium disertum," "the eloquent Tom Thumb."

Licinius, Roman emperor A.D. 307–324, whose full name was PUBLIUS FLAVIUS GABRIUS VALERIUS LICINIUS LICINIUS. He was a Daecian peasant by birth, and the early friend and companion in arms of the Emperor Galerius, by whom he was raised to the rank of Augustus, and invested with the command of the Illyrian provinces at Carnuntum, on the 11th of November, A.D. 307. Upon the death of Galerius in 311, he concluded a peaceful arrangement with MAXIMINUS II., in virtue of which the Hellespont and the Bosphorus were to form the boundary of the two empires. In 313 he married at Milan, Constantia, the sister of Constantine, and in the same year set out to encounter Maximinus, who had invaded his dominions. Maximinus was defeated by Licinius near Heraclaea, and died a few months afterward at Tarsus. Licinius and Constantine were now the only emperors, and each was anxious to obtain the undivided sovereignty. Accordingly, war broke out between them in 315. Licinius was defeated at Cibalae in Pannonia, and afterward at Adrianople, and was compelled to purchase peace by ceding to Constantine Greece, Macedonia, and Illyria. This peace lasted about nine years, at the end of which time hostilities were renewed. The great battle of Adrianople (July, 323), followed by the reduction of Byzantium, and a second great victory achieved near Chalcedon (September), placed Licinius at the mercy of Constantine, who, although he spared his life for the moment, and merely sentenced him to an honorable imprisonment at Thessalonica, soon found a convenient pretext for putting him to death, 324.

Licinius. 1. A Gaul by birth, was taken prisoner in war, and became a slave of Julius Caesar, whose confidence he gained so much as to be made his dispenser or steward. Caesar gave him his freedom. He also gained the favor of Augustus, who appointed him, in B.C. 15, governor of his native country, Gaul. By the plunder of Gaul and by other means, he acquired enormous wealth, and hence his name is frequently coupled with that of Crassus. He lived to see the reign of Tiberius.—2. The barber (tonsor) Licinius spoken of by Horace (Art. Poet., 301) must have been a different person from the preceding, although identified by the Scholiast.—3. Clodius Licinus, a Roman annalist, who lived about the beginning of the first century B.C., wrote the history of Rome from its capture by the Gauls to his own time. This Clodius is frequently confounded with Q. Clodius Quadrigarius. Vid. QUADRIGARIUS.—4. L. Porcius Licinus, plebeian edile 210, and praetor 207, when he obtained Cisalpine Gaul as his province.—5. L. Porcius Licinus, praetor 193, with Sardinia as his province, and consul 184, when he carried on war against the Ligurians.—6. Porcius Licinus, an ancient Roman poet, who probably lived in the latter part of the second century B.C.

[Licinus, a river of Vindelicia. Vid. LICINUS] Licynia, spoken of by Horace (Carin., i. 12, 13, seq.), is probably the same as Terenia, the wife of Maeecenas.

Licynius (Aethyrius). 1. Son of Electryon and the Phrygian slave Miden, and consequently half-brother of Alcmena. He was married to Permeda, by whom he became the father of Eleus, Arges, and Mela. He was a friend of Hercules, whose son Tlepolemus slew him, according to some unintentionally, and according to others in a fit of anger.—2. Of Chios, a distinguished dithyrambic poet, of uncertain date. Some writers place him before Stesichorus; but it is perhaps more likely that he belonged to the later Athenian dithyrambic school about the end of the fourth century B.C.—3. Of Sicily, a rhetorician, the pupil of Gorgias, and the teacher of Polus.

lusa*.

LIGARIUS, Q., was legate, in Africa, of C. Constantius Longus, who left him in command of the province, B.C. 50. Next year (49) Ligarius resigned the government of the province into the hands of L. Attius Varus. Ligarius fought under Varus against Curio in 49, and against Cæsar himself in 46. After the battle of Thap-sua, Ligarius was taken prisoner at Adrumetum; his life was spared, but he was banished by Cæsar. Meantime, a public accusation was brought against Ligarius by Q. Ælius Tubero.
The case was pleaded before Cæsar himself in the forum. Cicero defended Ligarius in a speech, still extant, in which he maintains that Ligarius had as much claims to the mercy of Cæsar, as Tubero and Cicero himself. Ligirius was pardoned by Cæsar, who was on the point of setting out for the Spanish war. The speech which Cicero delivered in his defence was subsequently published, and was much admired. Ligarius joined the conspirators who assassinated Cæsar in 44. Ligarius and his two brothers perished in the proscription of the triumvirs in 43.

[Leclia, a daughter of Nereus and Doris, one of the nymphs in the train of Cyrene.]

LIGER or LIGERIS (now Loire), one of the largest rivers in Gaul, rises in Mount Oevenna, flows through the territories of the Arverni, Ædi, and Carnutes, and falls into the ocean between the territories of the Nannetes and Nictomes.

LIGURIA (ἡ Λιγυρία, ἡ Λιγυρία), a district of Italy, was, in the time of Augustus, bounded on the west by the river Varus and the Maritime Alps, which separated it from Transalpine Gaul, on the southeast by the River Maora, which separated it from Etruria, on the north by the River Po, and on the south by the Mare Ligusticum. The country is very mountainous and unproductive, as the Maritime Alps and the Apennines run through the greater part of it.
The mountains run almost down to the coast, leaving only space sufficient for a road, which formed the highway from Italy to the south of Gaul. The chief occupation of the inhabitants was the rearing and feeding of cattle. The numerous forests on the mountains produced excellent timber, which, with the other products of the country, was exported from Genoa;
the principal town of the country. The inhabitants were called by the Greeks Λιγυες (Ligyes) and Λιγυριῖναι (Li-gyrioi), and by the Romans Ligures (sing. Ligus, more rarely Ligur).
They were in early times a powerful and widely-extended people; but their origin is uncertain, some writers supposing them to be Celts, others Iberians, and others, again, of the same race as the Sicilians, or most ancient inhabitants of Italy. It is certain that the Ligurians at one time inhabited the southern coast of Gaul, as well as the country afterward called Liguria, and that they had possession of the whole coast from the mouth of the Rhone to Pisa in Etruria. The Greeks probably became acquainted with them first from the Samiens and Phocæans, who visited their coasts for the purposes of commerce; and so powerful were they considered at this time, that Hesiod names them, along with the Seythians and Ethiopians, as one of the chief people of the earth. Tradition also related that Hercules fought with the Ligurians on the plain of stoa near Massilia; and even a writer so late as Eratosthenes gave the name of Ligytiæ to the whole of the western peninsula of Europe. So widely were they believed to be spread, that the Ligyæ in Germany and Asia were supposed to be a branch of the same people. The Ligurian tribes were divided by the Romans into Ligures Transalpini and Cisalpini. The tribes which inhabited the Maritime Alps were called in general Alpini, and also Oppillati or Comati, from their custom of allowing their hair to grow long. The tribes which inhabited the Apennines were called Montani.

The names of the principal tribes were: on the western side of the Alps, the SALTES or SALLU-VI, OXYER, and DEGIATES; on the eastern side of the Alps, the INTEMELI, INGAUNI, and APUANI near the coast, the VAGIENNI, SALAMNI, and TAU-RINI on the upper course of the Po, and the LEVI and MANIACI north of the Po. The Liguri-ans were small of stature, but strong, active, and brave. In early times they served as mercenaries in the armies of the Carthaginians, and subsequently they carried on a long and fierce struggle with the Romans. Their country was invaded for the first time by the Romans in B.C. 238; but it was not till after the termination of the second Punic war, and the defeat of Philip and Antiochus, that the Romans were able to devote their energies to the subjugation of Liguria. It was many years, however, before the whole country was finally subdued. Whole tribes, such as the Apunni, were transplanted to Samnium, and their place supplied by Roman colonists. The country was divided between the provinces of Gallia Narbo-nensis and Gallia Cisalpinia; and in the time of Augustus and of the succeeding emperors, the tribes in the mountains were placed under the government of an imperial procurator, called Procurator or Prefectus Alpium Maritimarum.

LIGURIUM: MARE, the name originally of the whole sea south of Gaul and of the northwest of Italy, but subsequently only the eastern part of this sea, or the Gulf of Genoa, whence later writers speak only of a Sinus Ligusticus.

[Λιγυες (Algyes), the inhabitants of Liguria.
Vid. Liguria.]

LILÆA (Λίλαξ: Alacax), an ancient town in Phocia, near the source of the Ophiium.

LILYBÆUM (Λιλύβαιον: now Marsala), a town in the west of Sicily, with an excellent harbor, situated on a promontory of the same name (now Cape Bon or di Marsala), opposite to the Promontorium Hermaeum or Mercurii (now Cape Bon) in Africa, the space between the two being the shortest distance between Sicily and Africa. The town of Lilybæum was founded by the Carthaginians, about B.C. 397, and was made the principal Carthaginian fortress in Sicily. It was surrounded by massive walls and by a trench sixty feet wide and forty feet deep.
On the destruction of Sellinus in 249, the inhabitants of the latter city were transplanted to Lilybæum, which thus became still more powerful. Lilybæum was besieged by the Romans in the first Punic war, but they were unable to take it; and they only obtained possession of it by the treaty of peace. Under the Romans lalybæum continued to be a place of importance. At Marsala, which occupies only the southern half of the ancient town, there are the ruins of a Roman aqueduct, and a few other ancient remains.

LIMÆA, LIMIA, LIMIUS, BELION (now Lima), a river in Gallæcia in Spain, between the Durus and the Minius, which flowed into the Atlantic Ocean. It was also called the river of Forgetfulness (ἡ τῆς Ἀθήνης, Flumen Oblivionis); and it is said to have been so called because the Turbani and the Celts on one occasion lost here their commander, and forgot the object of their expedition. This legend was so generally believed that it was with difficulty that Brutus Calliæus could induce his soldiers to cross the river when he invaded Gallæcia, B.C. 186. On the banks of this river dwelt a small tribe called LIMICI.

LIMITES ROMANI, the name of a continuous series of fortifications, consisting of castles, walls, earthen ramparts, and the like, which the Romans erected along the Rhine and the Danube, to protect their possessions from the attacks of the Germans.

LIMNÆ (Λίμνα, Αἰμυλαός). 1. A town in Messenia, on the frontiers of Laconia, with a temple of Diana (Artemis), who was hence surnamed Limnæa. This temple was common to the people of both countries; and the outrage which the Messenian youth committed against some Lacedæmonian maidens, who were sacrificing at this temple, was the occasion of the first Messenian war. Limnæ was situated in the ager Denthelintia, which district was a subject of constant dispute between the Lacedæmonians and Messenians after the re-establishment of the Messenian independence by Epaminondas.—2. A town in the Thracian Chersonesus on the Hellespont, not far from Sestus, founded by the Milesians.—3. Vid. SPARTA.

LIMNÆA (Αἰμυλαία, Αἰμυλαός), a town in the north of Acarnania, on the road from Argos Amphilocheium to Stratos, and near the Ambracian Gulf, on which it had a harbor.

LIMNÆA, LIMNÆTES, LIMNÆGONES (Αἰμυλαίοι, Αἰμυλῆται, ἱς, Αἰμυλῆνες), i. e., inhabiting or born in a lake or marsh, a surname of several divinities who were believed either to have sprung from a lake, or who had their temples near a lake. Hence we find this surname given to Bacchus (Dionysus) at Athens, and to Diana (Artemis) at various places.

LIMONUM. Vid. PICTONIA.

LIMYRA (τὰ Λίμυρα: ruins north of Pineka ?), a city in the southeast of Lycia, on the River Limyrus, twenty stadia from its mouth.

LIMYRUS (Αἰμυρός: now Phineka ?), a river of Lycia, flowing into the bay west of the Sacrum Promontorium (now Phineka Bay): navigable as far up as LIMYRA. The recent travellers differ as to whether the present River Phineka is the Limyrus or its tributary the Arycaudus.

LINDUM (now Lincoln), a town of the Coritani in Britain, on the road from Londinium to Eboracum, and a Roman colony. The modern name Lincoln has been formed out of Lindum Colonia.

LINDUS (Λίνδος: Ἀλνδος: ruins at Lindo), on the eastern side of the island of Rhodes, was one of the most ancient Dorian colonies on the Asiatic coast. It is mentioned by Homer (Il. ii, 686), with its kindred cities Lalysus and Camirus. These three cities, with Coa, Cnidus, and Halicarnassus, formed the original hexapolis, is the southwestern corner of Asia Minor. Lindus stood upon a mountain in a district abounding in vines and figs, and had two celebrated temples, one of Minerva (Athena), surnamed Λινδία, and one of Hercules. It was the birth-place of Cleobulus, one of the seven wise men. It retained much of its consequence even after the foundation of Rhodes. Inscriptions of some importance have lately been found in its Acropolis.

LINGONÆ. 1. A powerful people in Transalpine Gaul, whose territory extended from the foot of Mount Vogesus and the sources of the Matrona and Mosa, north as far as the Treviri, and south as far as the Sequani, from whom they were separated by the River Arar. The Emperor Otho gave them the Roman franchise. Their chief town was Andematunnum, afterward Lingones (now Langres).—2. A branch of the above-mentioned people, who migrated into Cisalpine Gaul along with the Boii, and shared the fortunes of the latter. Vid. Boni. They dwelt east of the Boii, as far as the Adriatic Sea, in the neighborhood of Ravenna.

LINTERNUM. Vid. LITERNUM.

LINUS (Λίνος), the personification of a dirge or lamentation, and therefore described as a son of Apollo by a Muse (Calliope or Pamæthe or Chalciope), or of Amphimarus by Urania. Both Argos and Thebes claimed the honor of his birth. An Argive tradition related that Linus was exposed by his mother after his birth, and was brought up by shepherds, but was afterward torn to pieces by dogs. Pamæthe's grief at the occurrence betrayed her misfortune to her father, who condemned her to death. Apollo, indignant at the father's cruelty, visited Argos with a plague; and, in obedience to an oracle, the Argives endeavored to propitiate Pamæthe and Linus by means of sacrifices. Matrons and virgins sang dirges which were called linoi. According to a Boeotian tradition, Linus was killed by Apollo because he had ventured upon a musical contest with the god; and every year before sacrifices were offered to the Muses, a funeral sacrifice was offered to him, and dirges (linoi) were sung in his honor. His tomb was claimed by Argos and by Thebes, and likewise by Chalcis in Eubœa. It is probably owing to the difficulty of reconciling the different mythoses about Linus that the Thebans thought it necessary to distinguish between an earlier and later Linus; the latter is said to have instructed Hercules in music, but to have been killed by the hero. In the time of the Alexandrine grammarians, Linus was considered as the author of apocryphal works, in which the exploits of Bacchus (Dionysus) were described.

LIPARA and LIPARENÆ INSULÆ. Vid. MELLÆ.

LIPARIS (Λίπαρις), a small river of Orléans, flowing past Solos, [deriving its name from the unctuous character of its waters.]

[LIPAXUS (Λίπαρος), a city on the coast of CROESSA, in Macedonia.]

LIQUENTIA (now Livenza), a river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, between Altinum and Concordia, which flowed into the Sinus Tergestinus.

[LIRIOPE, an ocean nymph, who became by Cepheus the mother of the beautiful Narcissus.]

LIRIS (now Garigliano), more anciently called CLANIS or GLANIS, one of the principal rivers in central Italy, rises in the Apennines west of Lake Fucinus, flows first through the territory of the Marsi in a southeasterly direction, then turns southwest near Sora, and at last flows southeast into the Sinus Caietanum near Minturnum, forming the boundary between Latium and Campania. Its stream was sluggish, whence the "Liris quieta aqua" of Horace (Carm., i. 81).

LISSUS (Λίσσος: Λίσσιος, Λίσσος). 1. (Now Alasio), a town in the south of Dalmatia, at the mouth of the River Drilon, founded by Dionysius of Syracuse, B.C. 385. It was situated on a hill near the coast, and possessed a strongly fortified acropolis, called ACOLIAEUS, which was considered impregnable. The town afterward fell into the hands of the Illyrians, and was eventually colonized by the Romans.—2. A small river in Thrace, west of the Hebrus.

LISTA (now S. Anatolia), a town of the Sabines, south of Reate, is said to have been the capital of the Aborigines, from which they were driven out by the Sabines, who attacked them in the night.

LITANA SILVA (now Silea di Lupe), a large forest on the Apennines, in Cisalpine Gaul, southeast of Mutina, in which the Romans were defeated by the Gauls, B.C. 216.

LITERNUM or LINTERNUM (now Patria), a town in the coast of Campania, at the mouth of the River Clanis or Glanis, which in the lower part of its course takes the name of LITERNUS (now Patria or Clanio), and which flows through a marsh to the north of the town called LITERNÆ PALUS. The town was made a Roman colony B.C. 194, and was re-colonized by Augustus. It was to this place that the elder Scipio Africanus retired when the tribunes attempted to bring him to trial, and here he is said to have died. His tomb was shown at Liternum; but some maintained that he was buried in the family sepulchre near the Porta Capena at Rome.

[LITERNUS. Vid. LITERNUM.]

LIVIA. 1. Sister of M. Livius Drusus, the celebrated tribune, B.C. 91, was married first to M. Porcius Cato, by whom she had Cato Uticensis, and subsequently to Q. Servilius Capius, by whom she had a daughter, Servilia, the mother of M. Brutus, who killed Caesar.—2.

LIVIA DRUSILLA, the daughter of Livius Drusus Claudianus (vid. DRUSUS, No. 3), was married first to Tib. Claudius Nero, and afterward to Augustus, who compelled her husband to divorce her, B.C. 88. She had already borne her husband one son, the future emperor Tiberius, and at the time of her marriage with Augustus was six months pregnant with another, who subsequently received the name of Drusus. She never had any children by Augustus, but she retained his affections till his death. It was generally believed that she caused C. Caesar and L. Caesar, the two grandsons of Augustus to be poisoned, in order to secure the succession for her own children; and she was even suspected of having hastened the death of Augustus. On the accession of her son Tiberius to the throne, she at first attempted to gain an equal share in the government; but this the jealous temper of Tiberius would not brook. He commanded her to retire altogether from public affairs, and soon displayed even hatred toward her. When she was on her death-bed he refused to visit her. She died in A.D. 39, at the age of eighty-two or eighty-six. Tiberius took no part in the funeral rites, and forbade her consecration, which had been proposed by the senate.—3. Or LIVILLA, the daughter of Drusus senior and Antonia, and the wife of Drusus junior, the son of the Emperor Tiberius. She was seduced by Sejanus, who persuaded her to poison her husband, A.D. 28. Her guilt was not discovered till the fall of Sejanus eight years afterward, 31.—3. JULIA LIVILLA, daughter of Germanicus and Agrippina. Vid. JULIA, No. 7.

LIVIA GENA, plebeian, but one of the most illustrious houses among the Roman nobility. The Livii obtained eight consulships, two censorships, three triumphs, a dictatorship, and a mastership of the horse. The most distinguished families are those of DRUSUS and SALINATOR.

LIVIVS, T., the Roman historian, was born at Patavium (now Padua), in the north of Italy, B.C. 59. The greater part of his life appears to have been spent at Rome, but he returned to his native town before his death, which happened at the age of seventy-six, in the fourth year of Tiberius, A.D. 17. We know that he was married, and that he had at least two children, a son and a daughter, married to L. Mægius, a rhetorician. His literary talents secured the patronage and friendship of Augustus; he became a person of consideration at court, and by his advice Claudius, afterward emperor, was induced in early life to attempt historical composition; but there is no ground for the assertion that Livy acted as preceptor to the young prince. Eventually his reputation rose so high and became so widely diffused, that a Spaniard travelled from Cadiz to Rome solely for the purpose of beholding him, and, having gratified his curiosity in this one particular, immediately returned home. The great and only extant work of Livy is a History of Rome, termed by himself Annales (xliii, 13), extending from the foundation of the city to the death of Drusus, B.C. 9, comprised in one hundred and forty-two books. Of these thirty-five have descended to us; but of the whole, with the exception of two, we possess Epitomes, which must have been drawn up by one who was well acquainted with his subject. By some they have been ascribed to Livy himself, by others to Florus; but there is nothing in the language or context to warrant either of these conclusions, and external evidence is altogether wanting. From the circumstance that a short introduction or preface is found at the beginning of books one, twenty-one, and thirty-one, and that each of these marks the commencement of an important epoch, the whole work has been divided into decades, containing ten books each; but the grammarians Priscian and Diomedes, who quote repeatedly from particular books, never allude to any such distribution. The commencement of book forty-two is lost, but there is certainly no remarkable crisis at this place which invalidates one part of the argument in favor of the antiquity of the arrangement. The first decade (books one to ten) is entire. It embraces the period from the foundation of the city to the year B.C. 294, when the subjugation of the Samnites may be said to have been completed. The second decade (books eleven to twenty) is altogether lost. It embraced the period from 294 to 219, comprising an account, among other matters, of the invasion of Pyrrhus and of the first Punic war. The third decade (books twenty-one to thirty) is entire. It embraces the period from 219 to 201, comprehending the whole of the second Punic war. The fourth decade (books thirty-one to forty) is entire, and also one half of the fifth (books forty-one to forty-five.) These fifteen books embrace the period from 201 to 167, and develop the progress of the Roman arms in Cisalpine Gaul, in Macedonia, Greece, and Asia, ending with the triumph of Æmilius Paulus. Of the remaining books nothing remains except inconsiderable fragments, the most notable being a few chapters of the ninety-first book, concerning the fortunes of Sertorius. The composition of such a vast work necessarily occupied many years; and we find indications which throw some light upon the epochs when different sections were composed. Thus, in book first (c. 19), it is stated that the temple of Janus had been closed twice only since the reign of Numa, for the first time in the consulship of T. Manlius (B.C. 235), a few years after the termination of the first Punic war; for the second time by Augustus Cæsar, after the battle of Actium, in 29. But we know that it was shut again by Augustus, after the conquest of the Cantabrians, in 25; and hence it is evident that the first book must have been written between the years 29 and 25. Moreover, since the last book contained an account of the death of Drusus, it is evident that the task must have been spread over seventeen years, and probably occupied a much longer time. The style of Livy may be pronounced almost faultless. The narrative flows on in a calm, but strong current; the diction displays richness without heaviness, and simplicity without tameness. There is, moreover, a distinctness of outline and a warmth of coloring in all his delineations, whether of living men in action, or of things inanimate, which never fail to call up the whole scene before our eyes. In judging of the merits of Livy as an historian, we are bound to ascertain, if possible, the end which he proposed to himself. No one who reads Livy with attention can suppose that he ever conceived the project of drawing up a critical history of Rome. His aim was to offer to his countrymen a clear and pleasing narrative, which, while it gratified their vanity, should contain no startling improbabilities or gross amplifications. To effect this purpose, he studied with care the writings of some of his more celebrated predecessors on Roman history. Where his authorities were in accordance with each other, he generally rested satisfied with this agreement; where their testimony was irreconcilable, he was content to point out their want of harmony, and occasionally to offer an opinion of their comparative credibility. But in no case did he ever dream of ascending to the fountain head. He never attempted to test the accuracy of his authorities by examining monuments of remote antiquity, of which not a few were accessible to every inhabitant of the metropolis. Thus it is perfectly clear that he had never read the Leges Regiæ, nor the Commentaries of Servius Tullius, nor even the Licinian Rogations; and that he had never consulted the vast collection of decrees of the senate, ordinances of the plebs, treaties and other state papers, which were preserved in the city. Nay, more, he did not consult even all the authors to whom he might have resorted with advantage, such as the Annals and Antiquities of Varro, and the Origines of Cato. And even those writers whose authority he followed he did not use in the most judicious manner. He seems to have performed his task piecemeal. A small section was taken in hand, different accounts were compared, and the most plausible was adopted: the same system was adhered to in the succeeding portions, so that each, considered by itself, without reference to the rest, was executed with care; but the witnesses who were rejected in one place were admitted in another, without sufficient attention being paid to the dependence and the connection of the events. Hence the numerous contradictions and inconsistencies which have been detected by sharp-eyed critics. Other mistakes also are found in abundance, arising from his want of any thing like practical knowledge of the world, from his never having acquired even the elements of the military art, of jurisprudence, or of political economy, and, above all, from his singular ignorance of geography. But while we fully acknowledge these defects in Livy, we cannot admit that his general good faith has ever been impugned with any show of justice. We are assured (Tacit. Ann. iv. 34) that he was fair and liberal upon matters of contemporary history; we know that he praised Cassius and Brutus, that his character of Cicero was a high eulogium, and that he spoke so warmly of the unsuccessful leader in the great civil war, that he was sportively styled a Pompeian by Augustus. It is true that, in recounting the domestic strife which agitated the republic for nearly two centuries, he represents the plebeians and their leaders in the most unfavorable light. But this arose, not from any wish to pervert the truth, but from ignorance of the exact relation of the contending parties. It is manifest that he never can separate in his own mind the spirited plebeians of the infant commonwealth from the base and venal rabble which thronged the forum in the days of Marius and Cicero; while, in like manner, he confounds those bold and honest tribunes, who were the champions of liberty, with such men as Sulpicius or Sulpicius, Clodius or Vatinius. There remains one topic to which we must advert. We are told by Quintilian (i. 5, § 56; viii. 1, § 3) that Asinius Pollio had remarked a certain Potestatis in Livy. Scholars have given themselves a vast deal of trouble to discover what this term may indicate, and various hypotheses have been propounded; but if there is any truth in the story, it is evident that Pollio must have intended to censure some provincial peculiarities of expression, which we, at all events, are in no position to detect. The best edition of Livy is by Drakenborch, Lugd. Bat. 1738-46, 7 vols. 4to. There is also a valuable edition, now in course of publication, by Alscholzi, Berl. 9vo, 1841, seq.

LIVIVS ANDRONICUS. Vid. ANDRONICUS.

LIX, LEXA, LEXUS (Λίξ, Λίφα, Λίφος: now Al-draish), a city on the western coast of Mauritania Tingitana, in Africa, at the mouth of a river of the same name: it was a place of some commercial importance.

LOCRI (Λοκροί), sometimes called LOCUS (by the Romans, the inhabitants of Locum (ἡ Λοκὴ), were an ancient people in Greece, descended from the Leleges, with which some Hellenic tribes were intermingled at a very early period. They were, however, in Homer's time regarded as Hellenes; and, according to tradition, even Deucalion, the founder of the Hellenic race, was said to have lived in Locris, in the time of Opus or Oynoa. In historical times the Locrians were divided into two distinct tribes, differing from one another in customs, habits, and civilization. Of these, the Eastern Locrians, called Epionemidii and Opuntii, who dwelt on the eastern coast of Greece, opposite the island of Euboea, were the more ancient and more civilized, while the Western Locrians, called Ozolæ, who dwelt on the Corinthian Gulf, were a colony of the former, and were more barbarous. Homer mentions only the Eastern Locrians. At a later time there was no connection between the Eastern and Western Locrians; and in the Peloponnesian war we find the former siding with the Spartans, and the latter with the Athenians. 1.

Eastern Locri, extended from Thebes and the pass of Thermopylæ along the coast to the frontiers of Boeotia, and was bounded by Doris and Phocia on the west. It was a fertile and well-cultivated country. The northern part was inhabited by the Locri Epionemidii (Ἐπειονεμίδαι), who derived their name from Mount Oemis. The southern part was inhabited by the Locri Opuntii (Ὀπουντίαι), who derived their name from their principal town, Opus. The two tribes were separated by Daphnus, a small strip of land, which at one time belonged to Phocia. These two tribes are frequently confounded with one another; and ancient writers sometimes use the name either of Epionemidii or of Opuntii alone, when both tribes are intended. The Epionemidii were for a long time subject to the Phocians, and were included under the name of the latter people, whence the name of the Opuntii occurs more frequently in Greek history.—2. Western Locri, or the country of the Locri Ozolæ (Ὀζῶλαι), was bounded on the north by Doris, on the west by Ætolia, on the east by Phocia, and on the south by the Corinthian Gulf. The origin of the name of Ozolæ is uncertain. The ancients derived it either from the undressed skins worn by the inhabitants, or from ὀζειν, "to smell," on account of the great quantity of asphodel that grew in their country, or from the stench arising from mineral springs, beneath which the centaur Nessus is said to have been buried. The country is mountainous, and for the most part unproductive. Mount Corax from Ætolia, and Mount Parnassus from Phocia, occupy the greater part of it. The Locri Ozolæ resembled their neighbors, the Ætolians, both in their predatory habits and in their mode of warfare. They were divided into several tribes, and are described by Thucydides as a rude and barbarous people, even in the time of the Peloponnesian war. From B.C. 815 they belonged to the Ætolian league. Their chief town was AMPHISÆA.

Locri Epizephyrii (Λοκροὶ Ἐπιζεφύριοι: now Motta di Burzano), one of the most ancient Greek cities in Lower Italy, was situated in the southeast of Bruttium, north of the promontory of Zephyrium, from which it was said to have derived its surname Epizephyrii, though others suppose this name given to the place simply because it lay to the west of Greece. It was founded by the Locrians from Greece, B.C. 688. Strabo expressly says that it was founded by the Ozolæ, and not by the Opuntii, as most writers related; but his statement is not so probable as the common one. The inhabitants regarded themselves as descendants of Ajax Oileus; and as he resided at the town of Naryx among the Opuntii, the poets gave the name of Narycia to Locris (Or., Met., xv., 705), and called the founders of the town the Naryci Locri (Virg., Æn., iii., 399). For the same reason, the pitch of Bruttium is frequently called Narycia (Virg., Georg., ii., 438). Locri was celebrated for the excellence of its laws, which were drawn up by Zaleucus soon after the foundation of the city. Vid. ZALEUCUS. The town enjoyed great prosperity down to the time of the younger Dionysius, who resided here for some years after his expulsion from Syracuse and committed the greatest atrocities against the inhabitants. It suffered much in the war against Pyrrhus, and in the second Punic war. The Romans allowed it to retain its freedom and its own constitution, which was democratical; but it gradually sunk in importance, and is rarely mentioned in later times. Near the town was an ancient and wealthy temple of Proserpina.

[Locrus (Λοκρός), son of Phycius and grand son of Amphictyon, became by Cabya the father of Locrus, the mythical ancestor of the Locri Ozolæ.]

LOCUSTA, or, more correctly, LUCUSTA, a woman celebrated for her skill in concocting poisons. She was employed by Agrippina in poisoning the Emperor Claudius, and by Nero for dispatching Britannicus. She was rewarded by Nero with ample estates, but under the Emperor Galba she was executed with other malefactors of Nero's reign.

LOLLIA PAULINA, grand-daughter of M. Lollius mentioned below, and heiress of his immense wealth. She was married to C. Memmius Regulus; but, on the report of her grandmother's beauty, the Emperor Caligula sent for her, divorced her from her husband, and married her but soon divorced her again. After Claudius had put to death his wife Messalina, Lollia was one of the candidates for the vacancy, but she was put to death by means of Agrippina.

LOLLIANUS (Λολλιανός), a celebrated Greek sophist in the time of Hadrian and Antoninus

Pisa, was a native of Ephesus, and taught at Athens.

LOLLIUS. 1. M. LOLLIVS PALICANVS, tribune of the plebs B.C. 71, and an active opponent of the aristocracy.—2. M. LOLLIVS, consul 21, and governor of Gaul in 16. He was defeated by some German tribes who had crossed the Rhine. Lollivs was subsequently appointed by Augustus as tutor to his grandson, C. Cæsar, whom he accompanied to the East, B.C. 2. Here he incurred the displeasure of C. Cæsar, and is said, in consequence, to have put an end to his life by poison. Horace addressed an Ode (iv., 9) to Lollivs, and two Epistles (i., 2, 18) to the eldest son of Lollivs.

LONDINIVM, also called OFFIDIVM LONDINIENSIVM, LONDINIUM, or LONDINVM (now London), the capital of the Cantii in Britain, was situated on the southern bank of the Thames, in the modern Southwark, though it afterward spread over the other side of the river. It is not mentioned by Cæsar, probably because his line of march led him in a different direction; and its name first occurs in the reign of Nero, when it is spoken of as a flourishing and populous town, much frequented by merchants, although neither a Roman colony nor a municipium. On the revolt of the Britons under Bonduca, A.D. 62, the Roman governor Suetonius Paulinus abandoned Londinium to the enemy, who massacred the inhabitants and plundered the town. From the effects of this devastation it gradually recovered, and it appears again as an important place in the reign of Antoninus Pius. It was surrounded with a wall and ditch by Constantine the Great or Theodosius, the Roman governor of Britain; and about this time it was distinguished by the surname of Augusta, whence some writers have conjectured that it was then made a colony. Londinium had now extended so much on the northern bank of the Thames, that it was called at this period a town of the Trinobantes, from which we may infer that the new quarter was both larger and more populous than the old part on the southern side of the river. The wall built by Constantine or Theodosius was on the northern side of the river, and is conjectured to have commenced at a fort near the present site of the tower, and to have been continued along the Minories, to Cripplegate, Newgate, and Ludgate. London was the central point, from which all the Roman roads in Britain diverged. It possessed a Milliarium Aureum, from which the miles on the roads were numbered; and a fragment of this Milliarium, the celebrated London Stone, may be seen affixed to the wall of Saint Swithin's Church in Cannon Street. This is almost the only monument of the Roman Londinium still extant, with the exception of coins, tessellated pavements, and the like, which have been found buried under the ground.

LONGANVS (now Saint Lucia), a river in the northeast of Sicily, between Myla and Tyndaria, on the banks of which Hieron gained a victory over the Mamertines.

LONGINVS, a distinguished Greek philosopher and grammarian of the third century of our era. His original name seems to have been Dionysius; but he also bore the name of Dionysius Longinus, Cassius Longinus, or Dionysius Cas- sius Longinus, probably because he or one of his ancestors had received the Roman franchise through the influence of some Cassius Longinus. The place of his birth is uncertain: he was brought up with care by his uncle Fronto, who taught rhetoric at Athens, whence it has been conjectured that he was a native of that city. He afterward visited many countries and became acquainted with all the illustrious philosophers of his age, such as Ammonius Saccas, Origen, the disciple of Ammonius, not to be confounded with the Christian writer, Plotinus, and Amelius. He was a pupil of the two former, and was an adherent of the Platonic philosophy; but instead of following blindly the system of Ammonius, he went to the fountain head, and made himself thoroughly familiar with the works of Plato. On his return to Athens he opened a school, which was attended by numerous pupils, among whom the most celebrated was Porphyry. He seems to have taught philosophy and criticism, as well as rhetoric and grammar; and the extent of his information was so great, that he was called "a living library" and "a walking museum." After spending a considerable part of his life at Athens he went to the East, where he became acquainted with Zenobia of Palmyra, who made him her teacher of Greek literature. On the death of her husband Odenathus, Longinus became her principal adviser. It was mainly through his advice that she threw off her allegiance to the Roman empire. On her capture by Aurelian in 272, Longinus was put to death by the emperor. Longinus was unquestionably the greatest philosopher of his age. He was a man of excellent sense, sound judgment, and extensive knowledge. His work on the Sublime (Περὶ ὑψηλοῦ) a great part of which is still extant, surpasses in oratorical power every thing written after the time of the Greek orators. There is scarcely any work in the range of ancient literature which, independent of its excellence of style, contains so many exquisite remarks upon oratory, poetry, and good taste in general. The best edition of this work is by Weiske, Lips. 1809, 8vo, reprinted in London, 1820. Longinus wrote many other works, both rhetorical and philosophical, all of which have perished.

LONGŪLA (Longulinus: now Buon Riposo), town of the Volsci in Latium, not far from Curioli, and belonging to the territory of Antium, but destroyed by the Romans at an early period.

LONGVS (Δόρυς), a Greek sophist, of uncertain date, but not earlier than the fourth or fifth century of our era, is the author of an erotic work, entitled Ποικίλων τῶν κατὰ Δόρυον ἡ Χλόη, or Pastoralia de Daphnide et Chloë, written in pleasing and elegant prose. The best editions are by Villouin, Paris, 1778; Schenck Lips. 1808; and Passow, Lips. 1811.

Λόγισσα (Λογισσία: now Lampadusa), island in the Mediterranean, between Malta (now Malta) and the coast of Byzantium in Asia.

LORIUM or LOZIVM, a small place in Etruria with an imperial villa, twelve miles northwest in the Via Aurelia, where Antoninus was brought up, and where he died.

(ῥὰ Λαίψα: ruins at Aplollakti), a southern coast of Caria, close to the mouth of the Cynossema (now Cape Aloupo), in the island of Rhodes, the space between being about the shortest distance between the coast of Caria.

Lotus, who, to escape the embraces of the nymph, was metamorphosed into a tree, her Lotus. (Ov., Met. ix, 847.)

(Λωτοφυῖον, i. e., lotus-estate). Hom. Odyssey, represents Ulysses as commanding a coast inhabited by a people fed upon a fruit called lotus, the fruit of which was so delicious that every one who ate it wished to return to his native land; desired to remain there with the lotus and to eat the lotus (Od. ix, 94). In historical times, the Greeks found a people on the northern coast of Africa, the Syrtes, and especially about the Syrtis, used to a great extent, as an article of food, the fruit of a plant, which they called the lotus of Homer, and they called the people Lotophagi. To this day, the people of the same part of the coast of Tripoli eat the fruit of the plant supposed to be the lotus of the ancients; drink a wine made from its juice, and the Lotophagi are also said to have a plant, the Zizyphus lotus of the ancients, is a prickly branching tree, the fruit of the size of a wild plum, of a sweetish taste. The ancients also place the Lotophagi in the land of Meninx or Lotophagitis (now Meninx) to this coast. They carried on commercial intercourse with Egypt and the interior of Africa by the very same sea which are used to the present day, a surname of Apollo, derived from his intricate and ambiguous name, but better from ἄλυσεν, as the interpreter of Jupiter (Zeus). Ἥρα, daughter of Boreas, one of the maidens, who brought the word (Artemis) to Delos, whence the word is used as a surname of Diana (Artemis).

called Lotus or Lotus Saturni, an early Italian divinity, whose worship was forgotten in later times. It may be the same as Ops, the wife of Saturnus, whose name was sometimes given from a defeated enemy were killed, and burned as a sacrifice, with the name of Lotus.

Lotus: now Luca, a Ligurian city, at the foot of the Apennines and Augusta, northeast of Pisa. It was Etruria by Augustus, but in the time of Caesar it was the most southerly city, and belonged to Cisalpine Gaul. A Roman colony B.C. 177. The name of Luca may still be seen at the present day in a state of tolerable preservation. The great size proves the importance of the ancient city.

Lotus, a district in Lower Italy, was bounded on the north by Campania and Samnium, on the east by Apulia and the Gulf of Tarentum, on the south by Bruttium, and on the west by the Tyrrhene Sea, thus corresponding, for the most part, to the modern provinces of Principato, Ciliorio, and Basilicata, in the kingdom of Naples. It was separated from Campania by the River Silarus, and from Bruttium by the River Liris, and it extended along the Gulf of Tarentum from Thurii to Metapontum. The country is mountainous, as the Apennines run through the greater part of it; but toward the Gulf of Tarentum there is an extensive and fertile plain. Lucania was celebrated for its excellent pastures (Hor., Ep. i, 28), and its oxen were the finest and largest in Italy. Hence the elephant was at first called by the Romans a Lucanian ox (Lucanus ovis). The swine, also, were very good; and a peculiar kind of sausage was celebrated at Rome under the name of Lucanica. The coast of Lucania was inhabited chiefly by Greeks, whose cities were numerous and flourishing. The most important were Metapontum, Heraclaea, Thurii, Buxentum, Elea or Velia, Posidonia or Pestum. The interior of the country was originally inhabited by the Chones and Enotrians. The Lucanians proper were Samnites, a brave and warlike race, who left their mother-country and settled both in Lucania and Bruttium. They not only expelled or subdued the Enotrians, but they gradually acquired possession of most of the Greek cities on the coast. They are first mentioned in B.C. 396 as the allies of the elder Dionysius in his war against Thurii. They were subdued by the Romans after Pyrrhus had left Italy. Before the second Punic war their forces consisted of thirty thousand foot and three thousand horse; but in the course of this war their country was repeatedly laid waste, and never recovered its former prosperity.

Lucanus, M. Annus, usually called Lucan, a Roman poet, was born at Corduba in Spain, A.D. 39. His father was L. Annus Mellus, a brother of M. Seneca, the philosopher. Lucan was carried to Rome at an early age, where his education was superintended by the most eminent preceptors of the day. His talents developed themselves at a very early age, and excited such general admiration as to awaken the jealousy of Nero, who, unable to brook competition, forbade him to recite in public. Stung to the quick by this prohibition, Lucan embarked in the famous conspiracy of Piso, was betrayed, and by a promise of pardon, was induced to turn informer. He began by denouncing his own mother Acilia (or Atilia), and then revealed the rest of his accomplices without reserve. But he received a traitor's reward. After the more important victims had been dispatched, the emperor issued the mandate for the death of Lucan, who, finding escape hopeless, caused his veins to be opened. When, from the rapid effusion of blood, he felt his extremities becoming chill, he began to repeat aloud some verses which he had once composed, descriptive of a wounded soldier perishing by a like death, and, with these lines upon his lips, expired, A.D. 65, in the twenty-sixth year of his age. Lucan wrote various poems, the titles of which are preserved, but the only extant production is an heroic poem, in ten books, entitled Pharsalia, in which the progress of the struggle between Cæsar and Pompey is fully detailed, the events, commencing with the passage of the Rubicon, being arranged in regular chronological order. The tenth book is imperfect, and the narrative breaks off abruptly in the middle of the Alexandrian war, but we know not whether the conclusion has been lost, or whether the author ever completed his task. The whole of what we now possess was certainly not composed at the same time, for the different parts do not by any means breathe the same spirit. In the earlier portions we find liberal sentiments expressed in very moderate terms, accompanied by open and almost fulsome flattery of Nero; but, as we proceed, the blessings of freedom are loudly proclaimed, and the invectives against tyranny are couched in language the most offensive, evidently aimed directly at the emperor. The work contains great beauties and great defects. It is characterized by copious diction, lively imagination, and a bold and masculine tone of thought; but it is, at the same time, disfigured by extravagance, far-fetched conceits, and unnatural similes. The best editions are by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1728; by Burmann, 1740; and by Weber, Lips., 1821-1831.

LUCANUS, OCELLUS. Vid. OCELLUS.

LUCCEIUS. 1. L., an old friend and neighbor of Cicero. His name frequently occurs at the commencement of Cicero's correspondence with Atticus, with whom Lucecius had quarrelled. Cicero attempted to reconcile his two friends. In B.C. 68 Lucecius accused Catiline; and in 60 he became a candidate for the consulship, along with Julius Cæsar, who agreed to support him; but he lost his election in consequence of the aristocracy bringing in Bibulus as a counterpoise to Cæsar's influence. Lucecius seems now to have withdrawn from public life and to have devoted himself to literature. He was chiefly engaged in the composition of a contemporaneous history of Rome, commencing with the Social or Marsic war. In 58 he had nearly finished the history of the Social and of the first Civil war, when Cicero wrote a most urgent letter to his friend, pressing him to suspend the thread of his history, and to devote a separate work to the period from Catiline's conspiracy to Cicero's recall from banishment (ad Fam., v., 12). Lucecius promised compliance with his request, but he appears never to have written the work. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he espoused the side of Pompey. He was subsequently pardoned by Cæsar and returned to Rome, where he continued to live on friendly terms with Cicero.—2. O., surnamed HIRUS, of the Pupinian tribe, tribune of the plebs 58, proposed that Pompey should be created dictator. In 59 he was a candidate with Cicero for the aurgurship, and in the following year a candidate with M. Cælius for the ædileship, but he failed in both. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, he joined Pompey. He was sent by Pompey as ambassador to Orodes, king of Parthia, but he was thrown into prison by the Parthian king. He was pardoned by Cæsar after the battle of Pharsalia, and returned to Rome.

LUCIENUS CALLATOS, one of the two chief tribes of the Callæoi or Gallæci, on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, derived their name from their town Lucus A gusti.

LUCERUM (now Alicante), a town of the Ostestani, on the coast of Hispania Tarraconensis. LUCULIA (Lucerius: now Lucera), sometimes called Nuceria, a town in Apulia, on the borders of Samnium, southwest of Arpi, was situated on a steep hill, and possessed an ancient temple of Minerva. In the war between Rome and Samnium, it was first taken by the Samnites (B.C. 321), and next by the Romans (319); but having revolted to the Samnites in 314, all the inhabitants were massacred by the Romans, and their place supplied by two thousand five hundred Roman colonists. Having thus become a Roman colony, it continued faithful to Rome in the second Punic war. In the time of Augustus it had declined greatly in prosperity; but it was still of sufficient importance in the third century to be the residence of the prætor of Apulia.

LUCIANUS (Λουκιανός), usually called LUCIUS, a Greek writer, born at Samosata, the capital of Commagene, in Syria. The date of his birth and death is uncertain; but it has been conjectured, with much probability, that he was born about A.D. 120, and he probably lived till toward the end of this century. We know that some of his more celebrated works were written in the reign of M. Aurelius. Lucian's parents were poor, and he was at first apprenticed to his maternal uncle, who was a statuary. He afterward became an advocate, and practised at Antioch. Being unsuccessful in this calling, he employed himself in writing speeches for others instead of delivering them himself. But he did not remain long at Antioch; and, at an early period of his life, he set out upon his travels, and visited the greater part of Greece, Italy, and Gaul. At that period it was customary for professors of the rhetorical art to proceed to different cities, where they attracted audiences by their displays, much in the same manner as musicians or itinerant lecturers in modern times. He appears to have acquired a good deal of money as well as fame. On his return to his native country, probably about his fortieth year, he abandoned the rhetorical profession, the artificer of which, he tells us, were foreign to his temper, the natural enemy of deceit and pretension. He now devoted most of his time to the composition of his works. He still, however, occasionally travelled; for it appears that he was in Achaia and Ionia about the close of the Parthian war, 160-165; on which occasion, too, he seems to have visited Olympia, and beheld the self-immolation of Peregrinus. About the year 170, or a little previously, he visited the false oracles of the impostor Alexander, in Paphlagonia. Late in life he obtained the office of procurator of part of Egypt, which office was probably bestowed upon him by the Emperor Commodus. The nature of Lucian's writings inevitably procured him many enemies, by whom he has been painted in very black colors. According to Suidas he was surnamed the Black phemer, and was torn to pieces by dogs as a punishment for his impiety; but on this account no reliance can be placed. Other writers state that Lucian apostatized from Christianity; but proof in support of this charge; and he entitled Philopatris, which would prove that the author had once been a, was certainly not written by Lucian, probably composed in the reign of Apollonius. As many as eighty-two come down to us under the name, but some of these are spurious. Important of them are his Dialogues, of very various degrees of merit, and in the greatest possible variety of seriousness down to the broadest buffoonery. Their subjects and two, vary considerably; for, while employed in attacking the heathen and religion, others are mere pictures without any polemical drift. Our allow us to mention a few of the riant of these dialogues. The Dialogus de Deo, twenty-six in number, contains dramatic narratives of some of the incidents in the heathen mythology; however, is generally left to win conclusions from the story, the taking care to put it in the most of view. In the Jupiter Convoluted style of attack is adopted; and the to Jupiter's face, that, every thing the dominion of fate, he has no ever. As this dialogue shows Jupiter of power, so the Jupiter the Tragic in his very existence, and that of ities. The Vitarum Auctio, or Sale ophers, is an attack upon the ancient. In this humorous piece the heads of sects are put up to sale, Hermes ctioneer. The Fisherman is a sort of the preceding piece, and may be long Lucian's best dialogue. The are represented as having obtained or the purpose of taking vengeance, who confesses that he has borrowed beauties of his writings from Banquet, or the Lopitha, is one of the humorous attacks on the philosophy scene is a wedding feast, at which ive of each of the principal philosophy is present. A discussion ensues, the philosophers by the ears, and shed battle. The Nigrinus is also philosophy pride; but its main atirize the Romans, whose pomp, id luxury are unfavorably contrasted with the simple habits of the Athenians. The scellaceous class of Lucian's distinguish the attacks upon mythology y are not direct, but incidental, or are pictures of manners, containing est. At the head must be placed may, perhaps, be regarded as Lucian's piece. The Dialogues of the Dead the best known of all Lucian's subject affords great scope for ion, and for satire on the vanity ists. Wealth, power, beauty, forgetting the vain disputations of fford the materials. Among the dialogues have been imitated by Lord Lyttleton. The Scuro-Mo Lucian's best vein, and a master-stroke of humor. Menippus, disgusted with the disputes and pretensions of the philosophers, resolves on a visit to the stars, for the purpose of seeing how far their theories are correct. By the mechanical aid of a pair of wings he reaches the moon, and surveys thence the miserable passions and quarrels of men. Hence he proceeds to Olympus, and is introduced to the Thunderer himself. Here he is witness of the manner in which human prayers are received in heaven. They ascend by enormous vent-holes, and become audible when Jupiter removes the covers. Jupiter himself is represented as a partial judge, and as influenced by the largeness of the rewards promised to him. At the end he pronounces judgment against the philosophers, and threatens in four days to destroy them all. Charon is a very elegant dialogue, but of a graver turn than the preceding. Charon visits the earth to see the course of life there, and what it is that always makes men weep when they enter his boat. Mercury sets as his censor. Lucian's merits as a writer consist in his knowledge of human nature; his strong common sense; the fertility of his invention; the raciness of his humor; and the simplicity and Attic grace of his diction. There was abundance to justify his attacks in the systems against which they were directed. Yet he establishes nothing in their stead. His aim is only to pull down—to spread a universal skepticism. Nor were his assaults confined to religion and philosophy, but extended to every thing old and venerated, the poems of Homer and Hesiod, and the history of Herodotus. The best editions of Lucian are by Hemsterhuis and Reitz, Amst., 1748, 4 vols. 4to; by Lehmann, Lips., 1821-1831, 9 vols. 8vo; and by Dindorf, with a Latin version, but without notes, Paris, 1840, 8vo.

Lucifera or Προσφύλας (Φωσφόρος, also by the poets Έσπερος or Φαεσφόρος), that is, the bringer of light, is the name of the planet Venus, when seen in the morning before sunrise. The same planet was called Hesperus, Vesperugo, Vesper, Noctifer, or Nocturnus, when it appeared in the heavens after sunset. Lucifer, as a personification, is called a son of Astræus and Aurora or Eos, of Cephalus and Aurora, or of Atlas. By Philonis he is said to have been the father of Ceyx. He is also called the father of Dedalion and of the Hesperides. Lucifera is also a surname of several goddesses of light, as Diana (Artemis), Aurora, and Hecate.

LUCILIUS. 1. C., was born at Suessa of the Aurunci, B.C. 148. He served in the cavalry under Scipio in the Numantine war; lived upon terms of the closest familiarity with Scipio and Lælius; and was either the maternal grandfather, or, which is less probable, the maternal grandfather of Pompey the Great. He died at Naples, 103, in the forty-sixth year of his age. Ancient critics agree that, if not absolutely the inventor of Roman satire, he was the first to mould it into that form which afterward received full development in the hands of Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. The first of these three great masters, while he censures the harsh versification and the slovenly haste with which Lucilius threw off his compositions, acknowledges with admiration the fierceness and boldness of his attacks upon the vices and follies of his age.

semporaria. The Satires of Lucilius were divided into thirty books. Upward of eight hundred fragments from these have been preserved, but the greatest number consist of isolated couplets or single lines. It is clear from these fragments that his reputation for caustic pleasantry was by no means unmerited, and that in coarseness and broad personalities he in no respect fell short of the license of the old comedy, which would seem to have been, to a certain extent, his model. The fragments were published separately, by Franciscus Dousa, Lugd. Bat., 4to, 1597, reprinted by the brothers Volpi, 8vo, Patav., 1735; and, along with Censorinus, by the two sons of Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 8vo, 1748.—2. LUCILLUS JUNIOR, probably the author of an extant poem in six hundred and forty hexameters, entitled Ætina, which exhibits throughout great command of language, and contains not a few brilliant passages. Its object is to explain upon philosophical principles, after the fashion of Lucretius, the causes of the various physical phenomena presented by the volcano. Lucilius Junior was the procurator of Sicily, and the friend to whom Seneca addresses his Epistles, his Natural Questions, and his tract on Providence, and whom he strongly urges to select this very subject of Ætina as a theme for his muse.

LUCILLA, ANNIA, daughter of M. Aurelius and the younger Faustina, was born about A.D. 147. She was married to the Emperor L. Verus, and after his death (169) to Claudius Pompeianus. In 183 she engaged in a plot against the life of her brother Commodus, which having been detected, she was banished to the island of Caprea, and there put to death.

The plebeian families are known by the surnames of Gallus, Ofella, and Vezillo, but none of them is of sufficient importance to require notice.

LUCRETIVS CARUS, T., the Roman poet, respecting whose personal history our information is both scanty and suspicious. The Ænebian Chronicle fixes B.C. 95 as the date of his birth, adding that he was driven mad by a lunatic potion, that during his lucid intervals he composed several works which were revised by Cicero, and that he perished by his own hand in his forty-fourth year, B.C. 52 or 51. Another ancient authority places his death in 55. From what source the tale about the philtre may have been derived, we know not, but it is not improbable that the whole story was an invention of some enemy of the Epicureans. Not a hint is to be found any where which corroborates the assertion with regard to the editorial labors of Cicero. The work, which has immortalized the name of Lucretius, is a philosophical didactic poem, composed in heroic hexameters, divided into six books, containing upward of seven thousand four hundred lines, addressed to C. Memmius Gemellus, who was praetor in 58, and is entitled De Rerum Natura. It was probably published about 57 or 56; for, from the way in which Cicero speaks of it in a letter to his brother, written in 56, we may conclude that it had only recently appeared. The poem has been sometimes represented as a complete exposition of the religious, moral, and physical doctrines of Epicurus, but this is far from being a correct description. Epicurus maintained that the unhappiness and degradation of mankind arose in a great degree from the slavish dread which they entertained of the power of the gods, and from terror of their wrath; and the fundamental doctrine of his system was that the gods, whose existence he did not deny, lived in the enjoyment of absolute peace, and totally indifferent to the world and its inhabitants. To prove this position, Epicurus adopted the atomic theory of Leucippus, according to which the material universe was not created by the Supreme Being, but was formed by the union of elemental particles which had existed from all eternity, governed by certain simple laws. He further sought to show that all those striking phenomena which had been regarded by the vulgar as direct manifestations of divine power were the natural results of ordinary processes. To state clearly and develop fully the leading principle of this philosophy, in such a form as might render the study attractive to his countrymen, was the object of Lucretius; his work being simply an attempt to show that there is nothing in the history or actual condition of the world which does not admit of explanation without having recourse to the active interposition of divine beings. The poem of Lucretius has been admitted by all modern critics to be the greatest of didactic poems. The most abstruse speculations are clearly explained in majestic verse, while the subject, which in itself was dry and dull, is enlivened by digressions of matchless power and beauty. The best editions are by Wakefield, London, 1796, 3 vols. 4to, reprinted at Glasgow, 1813, 4 vols. 8vo; and by Forster, Leipzig, 1824, 2 vols. Lucretius Lucus, was 1400; rly. in some part

But at a very early period the bay was separated from the remainder by a dike eight stadia in length, probably formed originally by some surge, and was subsequently rendered complete by the work of man. Being detached from the rest of the sea, it acquires the character of an inland lake, and is called Lacus Lucinus. Its waters remained salt, and were celebrated for medicinal purposes. Behind the Lucrine Lake is a lake called Lacus Avernus. In Augustus, Agrippa made a communication between the Lake Avernus and the sea, and also between the Lucrine and Sinus Campanus, thus forming out of the celebrated Julian Harbor. The lake was filled up by a volcanic eruption, when a conical mountain rose in the place called Monte Nuovo. The Avernus remains some again a separate lake, and no dike is to be seen in the Gulf of

LUCILIUS, a celebrated plebeian, the grandfather of the conqueror, was consul B.C. 151, together with Albinus, and carried on war against the Vaccaei.—2. L., son of the praetor 103, and carried on war against the slaves in Sicily. On Rome he was accused, condemned, and exiled.—3. L., son of the preceding, was the conqueror of Mithradates, probably born about 110. He distinguished himself in the Marseic or Social War, accompanied Sulla as his quaestor into Asia, 88. When Sulla returned to Rome, Lucullus was left behind in Asia, and continued till 80. In 79 he was curule, and younger brother Marcus. So he was in favor at this time enjoyed by Sulla, that the dictator, on his only confided to him the charge of correcting his Commentaries, and him guardian of his son Faustus, son of Pompey; a circumstance which may have first given rise to the rivalry that ever after subsisted between them.

In 77 Lucullus was praetor, and in the execution of this magistracy obtained the province of Africa, where he distinguished himself by the justice of his administration. He was consul with M. Aurelius in the year 74, when the war with Mithradates and Lucullus received the conclusion carried on this war for eight years. The details are given in the preceding outline. Lucullus defeated Mithradates with great slaughter, and drove him out of his hereditary dominions, and compelled him to take refuge in Armenia with his son-in-law Tigranes (71). He afterward invaded Armenia, defeated Tigranes, and took his capital Tigranocerta (69). In the next campaign (68) he again defeated the combined forces of Mithradates, and laid siege to Nisibis; but in the spring of the following year (67) a mutiny among his troops compelled him to raise the siege of Nisibis and return to Pontus. Mithradates had already taken advantage of his absence to invade Pontus, and had defeated his lieutenants Fabius and Triarius in several successive actions. But Lucullus, on his arrival, was unable to effect any thing against Mithradates, in consequence of the mutinous disposition of his troops. The adversaries of Lucullus availed themselves of so favorable an occasion, and a decree was passed to transfer to Acilius Glabrio, one of the consuls for the year, the province of Bithynia and the command against Mithradates. But Glabrio was wholly incompetent for the task assigned him; on arriving in Bithynia, he made no attempt to assume the command, but remained quiet within the confines of the Roman province. Mithradates meanwhile ably availed himself of this position of affairs, and Lucullus had the mortification of seeing Pontus and Cappadocia occupied by the enemy before his eyes, without being able to stir a step in their defense. But it was still more galling to his feelings when, in 66, he was called upon to resign the command to his old rival Pompey, who had been appointed by the Manilian law to supersede both him and Glabrio. Lucullus did not obtain his triumph till 63, in consequence of the opposition of his enemies. He was much courted by the aristocratical party, who sought in Lucullus a rival and antagonist to Pompey; but, instead of putting himself prominently forward as the leader of a party, he soon began to withdraw gradually from public affairs, and devote himself more and more to a life of indolence and luxury. He died in 67 or 68. Previous to his death he had fallen into a state of complete dotage, so that the management of his affairs was confined to his brother Marcus. The name of Lucullus is almost as celebrated for the luxury of his later years as for his victories over Mithradates. He amassed vast treasures in Asia; and these supplied him the means, after his return to Rome, of gratifying his natural taste for luxury, together with an ostentatious display of magnificence. His gardens in the immediate suburbs of the city were laid out in a style of extraordinary splendor; but still more remarkable were his villas at Tusculum and in the neighborhood of Neapolis. In the construction of the latter, with its parks, fish-ponds, &c., he had laid out vast sums in cutting through hills and rocks, and throwing out advanced works into the sea. So gigantic, indeed, was the scale of these labors for objects apparently so insignificant, that Pompey called him, in derision, the Roman Xerxes. His feasts at Rome itself were celebrated on a scale of inordinate magnificence: a single supper in the hall, called that of Apollo, was said to have cost the sum of fifty thousand denarii. Even during his campaign pains the pleasures of the table had not been forgotten; and it is well known that he was the first to introduce cherries into Italy, which he had brought with him from Cerasus in Pontus. Lucullus was an enlightened patron of literature, and had from his earliest years devoted much attention to literary pursuits. He collected a valuable library, which was opened to the free use of the literary public; and here he himself used to associate with the Greek philosophers and literati, and would enter warmly into their metaphysical and philosophical discussions. Hence the picture drawn by Cicero at the commencement of the Academics was probably, to a certain extent, taken from the reality. His constant companion from the time of his quaestorship had been Antiochus of Ascalon, from whom he imbibed the precepts of the Academic school of philosophy, to which he continued through life to be attached. His patronage of the poet Archias is well known. He composed a history of the Marsic war in Greek.

—4. L. or M., son of the preceding and of Servilia, half-sister of M. Cato, was a mere child at his father's death. His education was superintended by Cato and Cicero. After Caesar's death he joined the republican party, and fell at the battle of Philippî, 42.—5. M., brother of No. 3, was adopted by M. TERENTIUS VARRO LUCULLA. He fought under Sulla in Italy, 82; was curule ædile with his brother, 79; prætor, 77; and consul, 73. After his consulship he obtained the province of Macedonia. He carried on war against the Dardaniæ and Bessi, and penetrated as far as the Danube. On his return to Rome he obtained a triumph, 71. He was a strong supporter of the aristocratical party. He pronounced the funeral oration of his brother, but died before the commencement of the civil war, 49.

LUGDUNUM (Lugdunensis). 1. (Now Lyon), the chief town of Gallia Lugdunensis, situated at the foot of a hill at the confluence of the Arar (now Saône) and the Rhodanus (now Rhone), is said to have been founded by some fugitives from the town of Vienna, farther down the Rhone. In the year after Cæsar's death (B.C. 48) Lugdunum was made a Roman colony by L. Munatius Plancus, and became under Augustus the capital of the province and the residence of the Roman governor. Being situated on two navigable rivers, and being connected with the other parts of Gaul by roads, which met at this town as their central point, it soon became a wealthy and populous place, and is described by Strabo as the largest city in Gaul next to Narbo. It received many privileges from the Emperor Claudius; but it was burned down in the reign of Nero. It was, however, soon rebuilt, and continued to be a place of great importance till A.D. 197, when it was plundered and the greater part of it destroyed by the soldiers of Septimius Severus, after his victory over his rival Albinus in the neighborhood of the town. From this blow it never recovered, and was more and more thrown into the shade by Vienna. Lugdunum possessed a vast aqueduct, of which the remains may still be traced for miles, a mint, and an imperial palace, in which Claudius was born, and in which many of the other Roman emperors resided. At the tongue of land between the Rhone and the Arar stood an altar dedicated to Augustus by the different states of Gaul; and here Caligula instituted contests in rhetoric, prizes being given to the victors, but the most ridiculous punishments inflicted on the vanquished (Comp. Juv. i, 44.) Lugdunum is mentioned in the history of the Christian Church as the seat of the bishopric of Irenæus, and on account of the persecutions which the Christians endured here in the second and third centuries.—2. LUNA (Lucusis: now Luni), an Etruscan town, situated on the left bank of the Macra, about four miles from the coast, originally formed part of Liguria, but became the most northerly city of Etruria when Augustus extended the boundaries of the latter country as far as the Macra. The town itself was never a place of importance, but it possessed a large and commodious harbor at the mouth of the river, called LUNÆ PORTUS (now Gulf of Spezia). B.C. 177 Luna was made a Roman colony, and two thousand Roman citizens were settled there. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey it had sunk into utter decay, but was colonized a few years afterward. Luna was celebrated for its white marble, which now takes its name from the neighboring town of Carrara. The quarries from which this marble was obtained appear not to have been worked before the time of Julius Cæsar, but it was extensively employed in the public buildings erected in the reign of Augustus. The wine and the cheese of Luna also enjoyed a high reputation; none of these cheeses are said to have weighed less than a thousand pounds. The ruins of Luna are few and unimportant, consisting of the vestiges of an amphitheatre, fragments of columns, &c.

It was one of the chief seats of the worship of Jupiter (Zeus), who was hence surnamed Lycabettus. Here was a temple of this god; and here, also, was celebrated the festival of the Lycabettus (vid. Dict. of Ant. s. v.). Pan was likewise called Lycabettus, because he was born and had a sanctuary on this mountain.

LYCABETTES (Λυκάων). 1. King of Arcadia, son of Pelasgus by Meliboea or Oylene. The traditions about Lycabettus represent him in very different lights. Some describe him as the first civilizer of Arcadia, who built the town of Lycabettus, and introduced the worship of Jupiter (Zeus) Lycabettus. But he is more usually represented as an impious king, with a large number of sons as impious as himself. Jupiter (Zeus) visited the earth in order to punish them. The god was recognized and worshipped by the Arcadian people. Lycabettus resolved to murder him; and, in order to try if he were really a god, served before him a dish of human flesh. Jupiter (Zeus) pushed away the table which bore the horrible food, and the place where this happened was afterward called Trapeza. Lycabettus and all his sons, with the exception of the youngest (or eldest), Nyctimus, were killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning, or, according to others, were changed into wolves. Callisto, the daughter of Lycabettus, is said to have been changed into the constellation of the Bear, whence she is called by the poets Lycabettus Arctos, Lycabettus Arctos, or Lycabettus Virgo, or by her patronymic Lycabettus.—2. LYCAONIA (Λυκαονία; Λυκαόνες: part of Karaman), a district of Asia Minor, assigned, under the Persian Empire, to the satrapy of Cappadocia, but considered by the Greek and Roman geographers the southeastern part of Phrygia; bounded on the north by Galatia, on the east by Cappadocia, on the south by Cilicia Aspera, on the southwest by Isauria (which was sometimes reckoned as a part of it) and by Phrygia Paroreios, and on the northwest by Great Phrygia. Its boundaries, however, varied much at different times. It was a long, narrow strip of country, its length extending in the direction of northwest and southeast. Xenophon, who first mentions it, describes its width as extending east of Iconium (its chief city) to the borders of Cappadocia, a distance of thirty parasangs, about one hundred and ten miles. It forms a table-land between the Taurus and the mountains of Phrygia, deficient in good water, but abounding in flocks of sheep. The people were, so far as can be traced, an aboriginal race, speaking a language which is mentioned in the Acts of the Apostles as a distinct dialect. They were warlike, and especially skilled in archery. After the overthrow of Antiochus the Great by the Romans, Lycaonia, which had belonged successively to Persia and to Syria, was partly assigned to Eumenes and partly governed by native chieftains, the last of whom, Antipater, a contemporary of Cicero, was conquered by Amyntas, king of Galatia, at whose death, in B.C. 26, it passed, with Galatia, to the Romans, and was finally united to the province of Cappadocia. Lycaonia was the chief scene of the labors of the Apostle Paul on his first mission to the Gentiles (Acts, xiv).

It is celebrated as the place where Aristotle and the Peripatetics taught.

LYCOS (Λύκος), a surname of Apollo, the meaning of which is not quite certain. Some derive it from λύκος, a wolf, so that it would mean "the wolf-slayer;" others from λύκη, light, according to which it would mean "the giver of light;" and others, again, from the country of Lycia.

LYCHNITES. Vid. LYCHNIDUS.

LYCHNIDUS, more rarely LYCHNIDIUM or LYCHNUS (Λύχνιδος, Λυχνιδίου, Λυχνίς; Λυχνίδιος: now Achrita, Ochrida), a town of Illyricum, was the ancient capital of the Desaretii, but was in the possession of the Romans as early as their war with King Gentius. It was situated in the interior of the country, on a height on the north bank of the Lake LYCHNITES (Λυχνίτης or ἡ Λυχνίδια λίμνη) from which the River Drilo rises. The town was strongly fortified, and contained many springs within its walls. In the Middle Ages it was the residence of the Bulgarian kings, and was called Achris or Achritia, whence its modern name.

LYCIA (Λύκία; Λύκιος, Lycius: now Mén), a small but most interesting district on the south side of Asia Minor, jutting out into the Mediterranean in a form approaching to a rough semicircle, adjacent to parts of Caria and Pamphylia on the west and east, and on the north to the district of Cibyratis in Phrygia, to which, under the Byzantine emperors, it was considered to belong. It was bounded on the northwest by the little river Glaucus and the gulf of the same name, on the northeast by the mountain called Olunax (the northern part of the same range as that called Solyma), and on the north its natural boundary was the Taurus, but its limits in this direction were not strictly defined. The northern parts of Lycia and the district of Cibyratis form together a high table-land, which is supported on the north by the Taurus, on the east by the mountains called Solyma (now Taktalu-Dagh), which run from north to south along the eastern coast of Lycia, far out into the sea, forming the southeastern promontory of Lycia, called Sacrum Promontorium (now Cape Khelidonia); the summit of this range is seven thousand eight hundred feet high, and is covered with snow;* the southwestern and southern sides of this table-land are formed by the range called Massicytus (now Altas-Dagh), which runs southeast from the eastern side of the upper course of the River Xanthus: its summits are about four thousand feet high, and its southern side descends toward the sea in a succession of terraces, terminated by bold cliffs. The mountain system of Lycia is completed by the Cragus, which fills up the space between the western side of the Xanthus and the Gulf of Glaucus, and forms the southwestern promontory of Lycia; its summits are nearly six thousand feet high. The chief rivers are the Xanthus (now Echen-Chai), which has its sources in the table-land south of the Taurus, and flows from north to south between the Cragus and Massicytus, and the Limyrus, which flows from north to south between the Massicytus and the Solyma Mountains. The valleys of these and the smaller rivers, and the terraces above the sea in the south of the country, were fertile in corn, wine, oil, and fruits, and the mountain slopes were clothed with splendid cedars, firs, and plane-trees: saffron also was one chief product of the land. The total length of the coast, from Telmisus on the west to Phaselis on the east, including all windings, is estimated by Strabo at one thousand seven hundred and twenty stadia (one hundred and seventy-two geographical miles), while a straight line drawn across the country, as the chord of this arc, is about eighty geographical miles in length. The general geographical structure of the peninsula of Lycia, as connected with the rest of Asia Minor, bears no little resemblance to that of the peninsula of Asia Minor itself, as connected with the rest of Asia. According to the tradition preserved by Herodotus, the coast use of the country was Milyas (δ Μίλῳ), the earliest inhabitants (probably of Arabian race) were called Milyæ, and Solymi; subsequently the Termilæ, &c. settled in the country; and lastly, as Lycus, the son of Pandion, fled to the other Ægeus to Lycia, and gave his name to the country. Homer, who gives Lycia its place in the Iliad, represents its Glaucus and Sarpedon, as descended from the royal family of Argos (Æolids): he mentions the name of Milyas; and he calls the Solymi as a warlike race, inhabiting the mountains, against whom the Greek Æneas is sent to fight, by his relatives of Lycia. Besides the legend of the chimaera, Lycia is the mother of the popular Greek story, that of the daughters of Pandarus; details of both are preserved on the monuments now in the British Museum. Hence, it is clear that Lycia was a Hellenic race (probably from Crete) in the early period, and that its historical records were Greek, though with a mixture of local. The earlier names were pre-Doric, and the district in the north of the country was, and in the mountains called Solymians always kept the reputation of being a brave warriors.

Homer as brave warriors. They were the only people west of whom Croesus did not conquer, and he last who resisted the Persians. Under the Persian empire they were a powerful maritime people, and had fifty ships to the fleet of Xerxes. After the Macedonian conquest, Lycia formed a satrapy in the Lydian kingdom, from which it was separated by the Romans after their victory over the Great, and given to the Rhodians as soon restored to independence, as a flourishing federation of cities, its own republican form of government, which whole presided over by a chief called Ἀρχαῖος. There was a federal assembly composed of deputies from the cities of the federation, in which of cities, Xanthus, Patara, Pinara, &c., and Tlos, had three votes each, and the cities two each, and the rest one vote each. The assembly determined matters relating to the government of the country, the Lyciarches, as well as the judges and magistrates. Internal dissension broke up this constitution, and was united by the emperor Claudius, who separated Pamphylia, from which it was separated by Theodosia, who was a separate province, with Myra for its capital; there were numerous and flourishing cities, and its people celebrated for their industry. Their customs are said to be those both of the Carians and of the Lycians.

Λύκιος, an Athenian, one of the five hundred, stoned to death by the Athenians because he advised them to propose of peace offered by Mar-

Λύκιος (Λύκιος). 1. The Lycian, a surname of Apollo, who was worshipped in several places of Lycia, especially at Patara, where he had an oracle. Hence the Lycian oracles are the responses of the oracle at Patara (Virg. Æn. iv, 348).—2. Of Eleuthera in Boeotia, a distinguished statuary, the disciple or son of Myron, flourished about B.C. 438.

Λύκομεδης (Λύκομεδης). 1. A king of the Dolopians, in the island of Scyros, near Euboea. It was to his court that Achilles was sent disguised as a maiden by his mother Thetis, who was anxious to prevent his going to the Trojan war. Here Achilles became by Deidamia, the daughter of Lyeomedes, the father of Pyrrhus or Neoptolemus. Lyeomedes treacherously killed Theseus by thrusting him down a rock.—2. A celebrated Arcadian general, was a native of Mantinea, and one of the chief founders of Megalopolis, B.C. 870. He afterward showed great jealousy of Thebes, and formed a separate alliance between Athens and Arcadia in 366. He was murdered in the same year, on his return from Athens, by some Arcadian exiles.

Λύκος (Λύκος). 1. Son of Hippocoon, slain by Hercules.—2. A Trojan, slain before Troy by Peneleus.]

Λύκος (Λύκος). 1. An orator and demagogue at Athens, was one of the three accusers of Socrates, and prepared the case against him. When the Athenians repeated of their condemnation of Socrates, they put Meletus to death, and banished Anytus and Lycus.—2. Of Tros, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, and the disciple of Straton, whom he succeeded as the head of the Peripatetic school, B.C. 272. He held that post for more than forty-four years, and died at the age of seventy-four. He enjoyed the patronage of Attalus and Eumenes. He was celebrated for his eloquence and for his skill in educating boys. He wrote on the boundaries of good and evil (De Finibus).—[3. A celebrated comic actor of Scarphæa, who performed before Alexander the Great, and received from him on one occasion a present of ten talents.]

Λύκοφρων (Λύκοφρων). 1. Son of Autophonus, a Theban, who, in conjunction with Maeon, lay in ambush with fifty men against Tydeus, but was slain by him.—2. A Trojan warrior, slain by Teucer.]

Λύκοφρων (Λύκοφρων). 1. Younger son of Periander, tyrant of Corinth, by his wife Melissa. For details, vid PERIANDER.—2. A citizen of Phæra, where he put down the government of the nobles and established a tyranny about B.C. 405. He afterward endeavored to make himself master of the whole of Thessaly, and in 404 he defeated the Larissæans and others of the Thessalians who opposed him. He was probably the father of Jason of Phæra.—3. A son, apparently, of Jason, and one of the brothers of Thebe, wife of Alexander, the tyrant of Phæra, in whose murder he took part, together with his sister and his two brothers, Tisiphonus and Pitholaus, 367. On Alexander's death the power appears to have been wielded mainly by Tisiphonus, though Lycophron had an important share in the government. Lycophron succeeded to the supreme power on the death of Tisiphonus, but in 352 he was obliged to surrender

Thera to Philip, and withdraw from Thessaly.
—4. A grammarian and poet, was a native of Chalcis in Euboea, and lived at Alexandria, under Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 285–247), who intrusted to him the arrangement of the works of the comic poets in the Alexandrian library. In the execution of this commission Lycophron drew up an extensive work on comedy. Nothing more is known of his life. Ovid (Ibis, 538) states that he was killed by an arrow. As a poet, Lycophron obtained a place in the Tragic Pleiad. He also wrote a satyric drama. But the only one of his poems which has come down to us is the Cassandra or Alexandra. This is neither a tragedy nor an epic poem, but a long iambic monologue of one thousand four hundred and seventy-four verses, in which Cassandra is made to prophesy the fall of Troy, the adventures of the Grecian and Trojan heroes, with numerous other mythological and historical events, going back as early as the fables of Io and Europa, and ending with Alexander the Great. The work has no pretensions to poetical merit. It is simply a cumbrous store of traditional learning. Its obscurity is proverbial. Its author obtained the epithet of the Obscure (σκοτεινός). Its stores of learning and its obscurity alike excited the efforts of the ancient grammarians, several of whom wrote commentaries on the poem. The only one of these works which survives is the Scholía of Isaac and John Tzetzes, which are far more valuable than the poem itself. The best editions are by Potter, Oxon., 1697, folio; Reichard, Lips., 1788, 2 vols. 8vo; and Bachmann, Lips., 1828, vols. 8vo.

ΛΥΚΟΠΟΛΙΣ (ἡ Λύκων πόλις; ruins at Siout), a city of Upper Egypt, on the western bank of the Nile, between Hermopolis and Ptolemais, said to have derived its name from the circumstance that an Ethiopian army was put to flight near it by a pack of wolves.

ΛΥΚΟΡΕΑ (Λυκώρεια; Λυκωρεΐς, Λυκώριος, Λυκωόρις), an ancient town at the foot of Mount Lycorea (now Liakura), which was the southern of the two peaks of Mount Parnassus. Vid. PARNASSUS. Hence Apollo derived the surname of Lycoreus. The town Lycorea is said to have been the residence of Deucalion, and Delphi is also reported to have been colonized by it.

ΛΥΚΟΡΙΑ. Vid. ΟΥΤΤΕΡΙΑ.

ΛΥΚΟΥΡΤΑΣ (Λυκούρτας), of Megalopolis, was the father of Polybius the historian, and the close friend of Philopomen, whose policy he always supported. He is first mentioned, in B.C. 169, as one of the ambassadors sent to Rome; and his name occurs for the last time in 168.

ΛΥΚΟΣΒΑ (Λυκόσβα; Λυκοσβαΐς; now Peletrambou or Siddirobastro, near Stala), a town in the south of Arcadia, and on the north-western slope of Mount Lycosus, and near the small river Plataniston, said by Pausanias to have been the most ancient town in Greece, and to have been founded by Lyceus, the son of Pelasgus.

ΛΥΚΟΥΣ (Λύκος; Λύσιος), sometimes called LUTUS (Λύττος), an important town in the east of Oreta, southeast of Cnosus, was situated on a height of Mount Argus, eighty stadia from the coast. Its harbor was called Chersonesus. It was one of the most ancient cities in the island, and is mentioned in the Iliad. It was generally considered to be a Spartan colony and its inhabitants were celebrated for their bravery. At a later time it was conquered and destroyed by the Cnosians, but it was afterwards rebuilt, and was extant in the seventh century of our era.

ΛΥΚΟΥΡΓΟΣ (Λυκούργος). 1. Son of Dryas, king of the Edonians in Thracia. He is famous for his persecution of Dionysus (Bacchus) and his worship in Thracia. Homer relates that in order to escape from Lycourgos, Bacchus (Dionysus) leaped into the sea, where he was kindly received by Thetis; and that Jupiter (Zeus) thereupon blinded the impious king, who did soon afterward, hated by the immortal gods. This story has received many additions from later poets and mythographers. Some relate that Bacchus (Dionysus), on his expedition, came to the kingdom of Lycourgos, but was expelled by the impious king. Thereupon the god drove Lycourgos mad, in which condition he killed his son Dryas, and also bowed off one of his legs, supposing that he was cutting down vines. The country now produced no fruit; and the oracle declaring that fertility should not be restored unless Lycourgos were killed, the Edonians carried him to Mount Pangaion, where he was torn to pieces by horses. According to Sophocles (Antig., 955), Lycourgos was entombed in a rock.—2. King in Arcadia, son of Aleus and Neaira, brother of Cepheus and Auge, husband of Cleophris, Eurymachus, Antinoe, and father of Anceus, Epichus, Amphidamas, and Iasus. Lycourgos killed Arethous, who used to fight with a club. Lycourgos bequeathed this club to his slave Erichonius, his sons having died before him.—3. Son of Pronax and brother of Amphitheia, the wife of Adrastus. He took part in the war of the Seven against Thebes, and fought with Amphiarus. He is mentioned among those whom Eteocles called to life again after their death.—4. King of Nemea, son of Phereos and Periclymene, brother of Admetus, husband of Eurydice or Amphithea, and father of Opheltas.

ΛΥΚΟΥΡΓΟΣ. 1. The Spartan legislator. Of his personal history we have no certain information; and there are such discrepancies respecting him in the ancient writers, that many modern critics have denied his real existence altogether. The more generally received account about him was as follows: Lycourgos was the son of Eunomus, king of Sparta, and brother of Polydeutes. The latter succeeded his father as king of Sparta, and afterward died, leaving his queen with child. The ambitious woman proposed to Lycourgos to destroy her offspring if he would share the throne with her. He seemingly consented; but when she had given birth to a son (Charilaus), he openly proclaimed him king, and as next of kin acted as his guardian. But, to avoid all suspicion of ambitious designs, with which the opposite party charged him, Lycourgos left Sparta, and set out on his celebrated travels, which have been magnified to a fabulous extent. He is said to have visited Oreta, and there to have studied the laws of Minos. Next he went to Ionia and Egypt, and is reported to have penetrated into Libya, Iberia, and even India. In Ionia he is and to have met either with Homer himself, or at least with the Homeric poems, which he introduced into the mother country. The return of Lycurgus to Sparta was hailed by all parties. Sparta was in a state of anarchy and confusion, and he was considered as the man who alone could cure the growing diseases of the state. He undertook the task; yet, before he set to work, he strengthened himself with the authority of the Delphic oracle, and with a strong party of influential men at Sparta. His reform seems not to have been carried altogether peaceably. The new division of the land among the citizens must have violated many existing interests. But all opposition was overborne, and the whole constitution, military and civil, was remodelled. After Lycurgus had obtained for his institutions an approving oracle of the national god of Delphi, he exacted a promise from the people not to make any alteration in his laws before his return. And now he left Sparta to finish his life in voluntary exile, in order that his countrymen might be bound by their oath to preserve his constitution inviolate forever. Where and how he died nobody could tell. He vanished from the earth like a god, leaving no traces behind but his spirit; and he was honored as a god at Sparta with a temple and yearly sacrifices down to the latest times. The date of Lycurgus is variously given, but it is impossible to place it later than B.C. 825. Lycurgus was regarded through all subsequent ages as the legislator of Sparta, and therefore almost all the Spartan institutions were ascribed to him as their author. We therefore propose to give here a sketch of the Spartan constitution, referring for details to the Dict. of Antiq.; though we must not imagine that this constitution was entirely the work of Lycurgus. The Spartan constitution was of a mixed nature: the monarchical principle was represented by the kings, the aristocracy by the senate, and the democratical element by the assembly of the people, and subsequently by their representatives, the ephors. The kings had originally to perform the common functions of the kings of the heroic age. They were high priests, judges, and leaders in war; but in all of these departments they were in course of time superseded more or less. As judges they retained only a particular branch of jurisdiction, that referring to the succession of property. As military commanders, they were restricted and watched by commissioners sent by the senate; the functions of high priest were virtually least, perhaps because least obnoxious. In compensation for the loss of power, the kings enjoyed great honors, both during their life and after their death. Still the principle of monarchy was very weak among the Spartans. The powers of the senate were very important: they had the right of originating and discussing all measures before they could be submitted to the assembly of the popular assembly; they had, in conjunction with the ephors, to watch over the observance of the laws and institutions; and they were judges in all criminal cases, and were bound by any written code. For all this they were not responsible, holding their office for life. But with all these powers, the senate formed no real aristocracy. They were not chosen either for property qualification or for noble birth. The senate was open to the poorest citizen, who, during sixty years, had been obedient to the laws and zealous in the performance of his duties. The mass of the people, that is, the Spartans of pure Doric descent, formed the sovereign power of the state. The popular assembly consisted of every Spartan of thirty years of age and of unblemished character; only those were excluded who had not the means of contributing their portion to the syssitia. They met at stated times, to decide on all important questions brought before them, after a previous discussion in the senate. They had no right of amendment, but only that of simple approval or rejection, which was given in the rudest form possible, by shouting. The popular assembly, however, had neither frequent nor very important occasions for directly exerting their sovereign power. Their chief activity consisted in delegating it; hence arose the importance of the ephors, who were the representatives of the popular element of the constitution. The ephors answer in every characteristic feature to the Roman tribunes of the people. Their origin was lost in obscurity and insignificance; but at the end they engrossed the whole power of the state. With reference to their subjects, the few Spartans formed a most decided aristocracy. On the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, part of the ancient inhabitants of the country, under name of the Periæci, were allowed, indeed, to retain their personal liberty, but lost all civil rights, and were obliged to pay to the state a rent for the land that was left them. But a great part of the old inhabitants were reduced to a state of perfect slavery, different from that of the slaves of Athens and Rome, and more similar to the villanage of the feudal ages. These were called Periæci. They were allotted with patches of land to individual members of the ruling class. They tilled the land, and paid a fixed rent to their masters, not, as the periæci, to the state. The number of these miserable creatures was large. They were treated with the utmost cruelty by the Spartans, and were frequently put to death by their oppressors. The Spartans formed, as it were, an army of invaders in an enemy's country, their city was a camp, and every man a soldier. At Sparta, the citizen only existed for the state; he had no interest but the state's, and no property but what belonged to the state. It was a fundamental principle of the constitution, that all citizens were entitled to the enjoyment of an equal portion of the common property. This was done in order to secure to the commonwealth a large number of citizens and soldiers, free from labor for their sustenance, and able to devote their whole time to warlike exercises, in order thus to keep up the ascendancy of Sparta over her periæci and helots. The Spartans were to be warriors, and nothing but warriors. Therefore, not only all mechanical labor was thought to degrade them; not only was husbandry despised and neglected, and commerce prevented, or at least impeded, by prohibitive laws and by the use of iron money, but also the nobler arts and sciences were so effectually stifled, that Sparta is a blank in the history of the arts and

LITERATURE OF GREECE. The state took care of a Spartan from his cradle to his grave, and superintended his education in the minutest points. This was not confined to his youth, but extended throughout his whole life. The syssitia, or, as they were called at Sparta, phiditia, the common meals, may be regarded as an educational institution; for at these meals subjects of general interest were discussed and political questions debated. The youths and boys used to eat separately from the men, in their own divisions.—2. A Lacedæmonian, who, though not of the royal blood, was chosen king in B.C. 220, together with Agesipolis III., after the death of Cleomenes. It was not long before he deposed his colleague and made himself sole sovereign, though under the control of the ephori. He carried on war against Philip V. of Macedon and the Achæans. He died about 210, and Machanidas then made himself tyrant.—3. An Attic orator, son of Lycophron, who belonged to the noble family of the Eteobutades, was born at Athens about B.C. 396. He was a disciple of Plato and Isocrates. In public life he was a warm supporter of the policy of Demosthenes, and was universally admitted to be one of the most virtuous citizens and upright statesmen of his age. He was thrice appointed Treasurer or manager of the public revenue, and held this office each time for five years, beginning with 337. He discharged the duties of this office with such ability and integrity, that he raised the public revenue to the sum of twelve hundred talents. One of his laws enacted that bronze statues should be erected to Æschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, and that copies of their tragedies should be preserved in the public archives. He often appeared as a successful accuser in the Athenian courts, but he himself was as often accused by others, though he always succeeded in silencing his enemies. He died while holding the office of president of the theatre of Dionysus in 323. A fragment of an inscription, containing an account of his administration of the finances, is still extant. There were fifteen orations of Lycourus extant in antiquity, but only one has come down to us entire, the oration against Leocrates, which was delivered in 330. The style is noble and grand, but neither elegant nor pleasing. The oration is printed in the various collections of the Attic orators. [Separately by A. G. Becker, Magdeburg, 1821; and by Matzner, Berlin, 1838. The fragments of his other orations are collected by Kieseling, Lycurgi Perierd. Oratt. Fragmenta, Halle, 1847.] Vid. DEMOSTHENES.

LYCOS (Λύκος). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Celæno, who was transferred by his father to the islands of the blessed. By Alcione, the sister of Celæno, Neptune (Poseidon) begot Hyrieus, the father of the following.—2. Son of Hyrieus and Clonia, and brother of Nycteus. Polydorus, king of Thebes, married the daughter of Nycteus, by whom he had a son, Labdacus; and on his death he left the government of Thebes and the guardianship of Labdacus to his father-in-law. Nycteus afterward fell in battle against Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who had carried away his beautiful daughter Antiope. Lycus succeeded his brother in the government of Thebes and in the guardianship of Labdacus. He surrendered the kingdom to Labdacus when the latter had grown up. On the death of Labdacus, soon afterward, Lycus again succeeded to the government of Thebes, and undertook the guardianship of Laius, the son of Labdacus. Lycus marched against Epopeus, whom he put to death (according to other accounts, Epopeus fell in the war with Nycteus), and he carried away Antiope to Thebes. She was treated with the greatest cruelty by Dirce, the wife of Lycus, in revenge for which, her sons by Jupiter (Zeus), Amphion and Zethus, afterward put to death both Lycus and Dirce. Vid. AMPHION.—3. Son of No. 2. or, according to others, son of Neptune (Poseidon), was also king of Thebes. In the absence of Hercules, Lycus attempted to kill his wife Megara and her children, but was afterward put to death by Hercules.—4. Son of Pandion, and brother of Ægeus, Nisus, and Pallas. He was expelled by Ægeus, and took refuge in the country of the Termili, which was called Lycia after him. He was honored at Athens as a hero, and the Lyceum derived its name from him. He is said to have introduced the Eleusinian mysteries into Andania in Messenia. He is sometimes, also, described as an ancient prophet, and the family of the Lycæædæ, at Athens, traced their name and origin from him.—5. Son of Dæcylus, and king of the Mariandynians, who received Hercules and the Argonauts with hospitality.—6. A companion of Æneas in his voyage from Troy to Italy: he was slain by Turnus in Italy.—7. Of Rhegium, the father, real or adoptive, of the poet Lycophron, was an historical writer in the time of Demetrius Phalereus.

LYCOS (Λύκος), the name of several rivers, which are said to be so called from the impetuosity of their current. 1. (Now Kılıç), a little river of Bithynia, falling into the sea south of Heraclea Pontica.—2. (Now Germeneh-Chai), a considerable river of Pontus, rising in the mountains on the north of Armenia Minor, and flowing west into the Iris at Eupatoria.—3. (Now Chorak-Su), a considerable river of Phrygia, flowing from east to west past Colossæ and Laodicea into the Meander.—4. (Now Nahr-el-Keb), a river of Phœnicia, falling into the sea north of Berytus.—5. (Now Great Zab or Ulu Su), a river of Assyria, rising in the mountains on the south of Armenia, and flowing south-west into the Tigris, just below Larissa (now Ninroud). It is undoubtedly the same as the Zabatus of Xenophon.

LYDIA (τὰ Λύδία, ἡ Λύδῃς; now Lud), a town of Palestine, southeast of Joppa and northwest of Jerusalem, at the junction of several roads which lead from the sea-coast, was destroyed by the Romans in the Jewish war, but soon after rebuilt, and called Diopolis.

LYDIA (Λύδῃς), the wife or mistress of the poet Antimachus, dearly beloved by him: he followed her to Lydia, but she appears to have died early, and the poet sought to allay his grief by the composition of an elegy, which he named, from her, Lyde.]

LYDIA (Λύδία: Λύδῃς, Lydus), a district of Asia Minor, in the middle of the western side of the peninsula, between Mysia on the north and Caria on the south and between Phrygia on and the Egean Sea on the west. Its extent varied so much at different times, that it can not be described with any accuracy till we come to the time when it was ruled over by Western Asia. At that time its northern boundary, toward Mysia, was of mountains which form the northern valley of the Hermus, called Saruthwestern branch of the Phrygian; the eastern boundary, toward Phrygia, an imaginary line; and the southern toward Caria, was the River Mæander, according to some authorities, the range of mountains which, under the name of Mæandrus Daghi, forms the northern valley of the Mæander, and is a prolongation of the Taurus. From the part of this range, in the southeast of Lydia, another branch goes off to the west and runs to the west far out into the sea, where it forms the peninsula opposite the island of Chios. This chain, which divides into two unequal valleys, of which the smaller is watered by the River Hermus, and the northern forms the great range of Hæmus: these valleys are very fertile, and that of the Hermus, is one of the most delicious regions in Asia. The eastern part of Lydia, and a portion of Phrygia, about the upper of the Hermus and its tributaries, is a plain, showing traces of volcanic hence called Catacecaumene (κατακαυμένη). In the boundaries of Lydia, as just be a strip of coast belonging to Ionia, but the name is sometimes used in a signification, so as to exclude Ionia. The country had another name, Lydia, by which alone it is known; and this name was applied specifically to the eastern and part of Lydia, and then, in contradistinction, the name Lydia was used for the whole part. In the mythical legends, the name of the people and country, Lydia, is derived from Lydus, the son first king. The Lydians appear to be a race closely connected with the Mysians, with whom they obtained worship in the temple of Jupiter at Mylasa: they also practiced worship of Cybele and other Phrygian amid the uncertainties of the early clear that Lydia was a very early civilization, and that it exerted a great influence on the Greeks. The archy, which was founded at Sardis, time of authentic history, grew empire, under which the many different of Asia Minor west of the River or the first time united. Tradition three dynasties of kings: the Atyæ (according to the backward of chronologists) about B.C. 1221; the, which reigned five hundred and down to 716; and the Mermonidae, and sixty years, down to 556. The dynasty can be safely regarded as the fabulous element has a the details of their history: their names and computed dates were: (1.) Gragus B.C. 716-678; (2.) Arads, 678-629; (3.) Sadyattes, 629-617; (4.) Altyattes, 617-560; (5.) Cæmus, 560 (or earlier)-546; under whose names an account is given of the rise of the Lydian empire in Asia Minor, and of its overthrow by the Persians under Cyrus. Under these kings, the Lydians appear to have been a highly civilized, industrious, and wealthy people, practicing agriculture, commerce, and manufactures, and acquainted with various arts and exercising, through their intercourse with the Greeks of Ionia, an important influence on the progress of Greek civilization. Among the inventions or improvements which the Greeks are said to have derived from them were the weaving and dyeing of fine fabrics; various processes of metallurgy; the use of gold and silver money, which the Lydians are said first to have coined, the former from the gold found on Tmolus and from the golden sands of the Pactolus; and various metrical and musical improvements, especially the scale or mode of music called the Lydian, and the form of the lyre called the magadis. (Vid. Dict. of Antiquities, art. Musica.) The Lydians had, also, public games similar to those of the Greeks. Their high civilization, however, was combined with a lax morality, and, after the Persian conquest, when they were forbidden by Cyrus to carry arms, they sank gradually into a by-word for effeminate luxuriousness, and their very name and language had almost entirely disappeared by the commencement of our era. Under the Persians, Lydia and Mysia formed the second satrapy. After the Macedonian conquest, Lydia belonged first to the kings of Syria, and next (after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans) to those of Pergamum, and so passed, by the bequest of Attalus III, to the Romans, under whom it formed part of the province of Asia.

LYDIDES (Λυδίδης), a citizen of Megalopolis, who, though of an obscure family, raised himself to the sovereignty of his native city about B.C. 244. In 234 he voluntarily abdicated the sovereignty, and permitted Megalopolis to join the Achaean league as a free state. He was elected several times general of the Achaean league, and became a formidable rival to Aratus. He fell in battle against Cleomenes, 226.

LYDIAS or LUDIAS (Λυδίας, Ion. Λυδίας, Λογυδίας; now Karasmak or Mavronero), a river in Macedonia, rises in Eordæa, passes Edessa, and, after flowing through the lake on which Pella is situated, falls into the Aegean a short distance from the Thermaic Gulf. In the upper part of its course it is called the Eordæan River (Ἐορδαϊκὸς ποταμὸς) by Arrian. Herodotus (vii., 127), by mistake, makes the Lydias unite with the Haliacmon, the latter of which is west of the former.

LYDUS (Λυδός), son of Atys and Callithea, and brother of Tyrrhenus, said to have been the mythical ancestor of the Lydians.

LYDUS, JOANNES LAURENTIUS, was born at Philadelphia, in Lydia (whence he is called Lydus or the Lydian), in A.D. 490. He held various public offices, and lived to an advanced age. He wrote, 1. Περὶ μνησίων συγγράμματα. De Mensibus Liber, of which there are two epitomes, or summaries, and a fragment extant. 2. Περὶ ἑρῶν, κ. τ. λ., De Magistratibus Reipublica Romana. 3. Περὶ διοικητῶν, De Oeconomis. The work De Mensibus is an historical commentary on the Roman calendar, with an account of the various festivals, derived from a great number of authorities, most of which have perished. Of the two summaries of this curious work, the larger one is by an unknown hand, the shorter one by Maximus Planudes. The work De Magistratibus was thought to have perished, but was discovered by Villoison in the suburbs of Constantinople, in 1785. The best edition of these works is by Bekker, Bonn, 1837.

LYGDAMIS (Λυγδάμης). 1. Of Naxos, a distinguished leader of the popular party of the island in the struggle with the oligarchy. He conquered the latter, and obtained thereby the chief power in the state. He assisted Pisistratus in his third return to Athens; but, during his absence, his enemies seem to have got the upper hand again; for Pisistratus afterward subdued the island, and made Lygdamis tyrant of it, about B.C. 540. In 532 he assisted Polyerates in obtaining the tyranny of Samos.—2. Father of Artemisia, queen of Halicarnassus, the contemporary of Xerxes.—3. Tyrant of Halicarnassus, the son of Pisindelis, and the grandson of Artemisia. The historian Herodotus is said to have taken an active part in delivering his native city from the tyranny of this Lygdamis.

LYGŌI or LIGŌI, an important people in Germany, between the Viadus (now Oder) and the Vistula, in the modern Silesia and Posen, were bounded by the Burgundiones on the north, the Goths on the east, the Bastarnæ and Osi on the west, and the Marsingi, Silingæ, and Semnones on the south. They were divided into several tribes, the chief of which were the Manimi, Duni, Elysi, Burii, Arii, Naharvali, and Helvecous. They first appear in history as members of the great Marcomannic league formed by Maroboduus in the reigns of Augustus and Tiberius. In the third century some of the Lygii migrated with the Burgundians westward, and settled in the country bordering on the Rhine.

[LYGŌINUS (Λύγινος), a river of Thrace in the territory of the Triballi, emptying into the Pontus Euxinus.]

[LYMAX (Λύμας), a small river in the southwest of Arcadia, which empties into the Nedæ near Phigalea.]

LYNCESTIS (Λυκνηστις), a district in the southwest of Macedonia, north of the River Erigon, and upon the frontiers of Illyria. Its inhabitants, the LYNCESTÆ, were Illyrians, and were originally an independent people, who were governed by their own princes, said to be descended from the family of the Bacchiadæ. The Lyncestæ appear to have become subject to Macedonia by a marriage between the royal families of the two countries. The ancient capital of the country was LYNCUS (ἢ Λύκος), though HERACLEA, at a later time, became the chief town in the district. Near Lynceus was a river, the waters of which are said to have been as intoxicating as wine. (Ov. Met. xv. 329.)

of Ægyptus, whose life was saved by his wife Hypermnestra, when all his other brothers were murdered by the daughters of Danaus on their wedding night. Vid. ÆGYPTUS. Danaus thereupon kept Hypermnestra in strict confinement, but was afterward prevailed upon to give her to Lynceus, who succeeded him on the throne of Argos. According to a different legend, Lynceus slew Danaus and all the sisters of Hypermnestra in revenge for his brothers. Lynceus was succeeded as king of Argos by his son Abas.—2. Son of Aphareus and Arene, and brother of Idas, was one of the Argonauts, so famous for his keen sight. He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters, and was slain by Pollux. For details respecting his death, vid. p. 266, b.—[3. A Trojan, companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy].—4. Of Samos, the disciple of Theophrastus, and the brother of the historian Duris, was a contemporary of Menander, and his rival in comic poetry. He survived Menander, upon whom he wrote a book. He seems to have been more distinguished as a grammarian and historian than as a comic poet.

LYNCEUS, king of Scythia, or, according to others, of Sicily, endeavored to murder Triptolemus, who came to him with the gifts of Ceres (Demeter), but he was metamorphosed by the goddess into a lynx.

LYNCEÆ or LYNCEUM (Λυκæα, Λύκειον), a small town in Argolia, situated on a mountain of the same name.

LYNCESSUS (Λυκνησός), a town in the interior of Mysia, in Asia Minor, frequently mentioned by Homer: destroyed before the time of Strabo.

LYSANDER (Λύσανδρος), a Spartan, was of servile origin, or, at least, the offspring of a marriage between a freeman and a woman of inferior condition. He obtained the citizenship, and became one of the most distinguished of the Spartan generals and diplomatists. In B.C. 407, he was sent out to succeed Cratesippides in the command of the fleet off the coast of Asia Minor. He fixed his headquarters at Ephesus, and soon obtained great influence, not only with the Greek cities, but also with Cyrus, who supplied him with large sums of money to pay his sailors. Next year, 406, he was succeeded by Callikratides. In one year the reputation and influence of Lysander had become so great, that Cyrus and the Spartan allies in Asia requested the Lacedæmonians to appoint Lysander again to the command of the fleet. The Lacedæmonian law, however, did not allow the office of admiral to be held twice by the same person; and, accordingly, Aracus was sent out in 405 as the nominal commander-in-chief, while Lysander, virtually invested with the supreme direction of affairs, had the title of vice-admiral (ἐπιτορκεύς). In this year he brought the Peloponnesian war to a conclusion by the defeat and capture of the Athenian fleet off Ægospotami. Only eight Athenian ships made their escape under the command of Conon. He afterward sailed to Athens, and in the spring of 404 the city capitulated; the long walls and the fortifications of the Piræus were destroyed and an oligarchical form of government, established, known by the name of the Thirty Tyrants. Lysander was now by far the most powerful man in Greece, and he displayed more than the usual pride and haughtiness which distinguished the Spartan commanders in foreign countries. He was passionately fond of praise, and took care that his exploits should be celebrated by the most illustrious poets of his time. He always kept the poet Chorus in his retinue, and his praises were also sung by Antilochus, Antimachus of Colophon, and Niceratus of Heraclea. He was the first of the Greeks to whom Greek cities erected altars as to a god, offered sacrifices, and celebrated festivals. His power and ambition caused the Spartan government uneasiness, and, accordingly, the ephors recalled him from Asia Minor, to which he had again repaired, and for some years kept him without any public employment. On the death of Agis II. in 397, he secured the succession for Agesilaus, the brother of Agis, in opposition to Leotychides, the reputed son of the latter. He did not receive from Agesilaus the gratitude he had expected. He was one of the members of the council, thirty in number, which was appointed to accompany the new king in his expedition into Asia in 396. Agesilaus purposely thwarted all his designs, and refused all the favors which he asked. On his return to Sparta, Lysander resolved to bring about the change he had long meditated in the Spartan constitution, by abolishing hereditary royalty, and making the throne elective. He is said to have attempted to obtain the sanction of the gods in favor of his scheme, and to have tried in succession the oracles of Delphi, Dodona, and Jupiter (Zeus) Ammon, but without success. He does not seem to have ventured upon any overt act, and his enterprise was cut short by his death in the following year. On the breaking out of the Boeotian war in 396, Lysander was placed at the head of one army and the king Pausanias at the head of another. Lysander marched against Haliartus, and perished in battle under the walls, 395.

LYSANDRA (Λυσάνδρα), daughter of Ptolemy Soter and Eurydice, the daughter of Antipater. She was married first to Alexander, the son of Cassander, king of Macedonia, and after his death to Agathocles, the son of Lysimachus. After the murder of her second husband, B.C. 304 (vid. AGATHOCLES, No. 3), she fled to Asia, and besought assistance from Seleucus. The latter, in consequence, marched against Lysimachus, who was defeated and slain in battle, 281.

LYSIAS (Λυσίας). 1. Tetrarch of Abilene, was put to death by Antony to gratify Cleopatra, B.C. 34.—2. A descendant of the last, who was tetrarch of Abilene at the time when our Saviour entered upon his ministry (Luke, ii. 1).

LYSIAS (Λυσίας). 1. An Attic orator, was born at Athens B.C. 458. He was the son of Cephalus, who was a native of Syracuse, and had taken up his abode at Athens on the invitation of Pericles. At the age of fifteen, Lysias and his brothers joined the Athenians who went as colonists to Thurii in Italy, 443. He there completed his education under the instruction of two Syracusans, Tisias and Nicias. He afterwards enjoyed great esteem among the Thurians, and seems to have taken part in the administration of the city. After the defeat of the Athenians in Sicily, he was expelled by the Spartan party from Thurii as a partisan of the Athenians. He now returned to Athens, 411. During the rule of the Thirty Tyrants (404), he was looked upon as an enemy of the government, his large property was confiscated, and he was thrown into prison; but he escaped, and took refuge at Megara. He joined Thrasybulus and the exiles, and, in order to render them effectual assistance, he sacrificed all that remained of his fortune. He gave the patriots two thousand drachmas and two hundred shields, and engaged a band of three hundred mercenaries. Thrasybulus procured him the Athenian franchise, which he had not possessed hitherto, since he was the son of a foreigner; but he was afterward deprived of this right because it had been conferred without a proboulema. Henceforth he lived at Athens as an isoteles, occupying himself, as it appears, solely with writing judicial speeches for others, and died in 378, at the age of eighty. Lysias wrote a great number of orations, and among those which were current under his name, the ancient critics reckoned two hundred and thirty as genuine. Of these, thirty-five only are extant, and even some of these are in complete, and others are probably spurious. Most of these orations were composed after his return from Thurii to Athens. The only one which he delivered himself is that against Erasthenes, 403. The language of Lysias is perfectly pure, and may be regarded as one of the best specimens of the Attic idiom. All the ancient writers agreed that his orations were distinguished by grace and elegance. His style is always clear and lucid, and his delineations of character striking and true to life. The orations of Lysias are contained in the collections of the Attic orators. Vid. DEMOSTHENES. The best separate editions are by Foertsch, Lipsæ, 1829; and by Franz, Monac, 1831.—[2. LYSIMACHIA or ΛΑ (Λυσμαχία, Λυσμάχεια; Λυσμαχίς). 1. (Now Ekeamil), an important town on the northeast of the Gulf of Melas, and on the isthmus connecting the Thracian Chersonesus with the main land, was founded B.C. 309 by Lysimachus, who removed to his new city the greater part of the inhabitants of the neighboring town of Cardia. It was subsequently destroyed by the Thracians, but was restored by Antiochus the Great. Under the Romans it greatly declined; but Justinian built a strong fortress on the spot, which he called HEXAMILIUM (Ἑξαμίλιον), doubtless from the width of the isthmus, under which name it is mentioned in the Middle Ages.—2. A town in the southwest of Ætolia, near Pleuron, situated on a lake of the same name, which was more anciently called Hydra.

LYSIMACHUS (Λυσίμαχος), king of Thrace, was a Macedonian by birth, and one of Alexander's generals, but of mean origin, his father Agathocles having been originally a Penest or serf in Sicily. He was early distinguished for his undaunted courage, as well as for his great activity and strength of body. We are told by Q. Curtius that Lysimachus, when hunting in Syria, had killed a lion of immense size single-handed; and this circumstance that writer regards as the origin of a fable gravely related by many authors, that, on account of some offence, Lysimachus had been shut up by order of Alexander in the same den with a lion; but, though unarmed, had succeeded in destroying the animal, and was pardoned by the king in consideration of his courage. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), Thrace, and the neighboring countries as far as the Danube, were assigned to Lysimachus. For some years he was actively engaged in war with the warlike barbarians that bordered his province on the north. At length, in 315, he joined the league which Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander had formed against Antigonus, but he did not take any active part in the war for some time. In 306 he took the title of king, when it was assumed by Antigonus, Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Cassander. In 302 Lysimachus crossed over into Asia Minor to oppose Antigonus, while Seleucus also advanced against the latter from the East. In 301 Lysimachus and Seleucus effected a junction, and gained a decisive victory at Ipsus over Antigonus and his son Demetrius. Antigonus fell on the field, and Demetrius became a fugitive. The conquerors divided between them the dominions of the vanquished, and Lysimachus obtained for his share all that part of Asia Minor extending from the Hellespont and the Ægean to the heart of Phrygia. In 291 Lysimachus crossed the Danube and penetrated into the heart of the country of the Getae; but he was reduced to the greatest distress by want of provisions, and was ultimately compelled to surrender with his whole army. Dromichætes, king of the Getae, treated him with the utmost generosity, and restored him to liberty. In 288 Lysimachus united with Ptolemy, Seleucus, and Pyrrhus in a common league against Demetrius, who had in some years been in possession of Macedonia, and was now preparing to march into Asia. Next year, 287, Lysimachus and Pyrrhus invaded Macedonia. Demetrius was abandoned by his own troops, and was compelled to seek safety in flight. Pyrrhus for a time obtained possession of the Macedonian throne, but he was expelled by Lysimachus in 286. Lysimachus was now in possession of all the dominions in Europe that had formed part of the Macedonian monarchy, as well as of the greater part of Asia Minor. He remained in undisturbed possession of these vast dominions till shortly before his death. His downfall was occasioned by a dark domestic tragedy. His wife Arsinoë, daughter of Ptolemy Soter, had long hated her step-son Agathocles, and at length, by false accusations, induced Lysimachus to put his son to death. This bloody deed alienated the minds of his subjects, and many cities of Asia broke out into open revolt. Lysandra, the widow of Agathocles, fled with her children to the court of Seleucus, who forthwith invaded the dominions of Lysimachus. The two monarchs met in the plain of Corus (Corupedion), and Lysimachus fell in the battle that ensued, B.C. 281. He was in his eightieth year at the time of his death. Lysimachus founded LYSIMACHIA, on the Hellespont, and also enlarged and rebuilt many other cities.

LYSIPPUS (Λύσιππος). 1. Of Sicily, one of the most distinguished Greek statuarys, was a contemporary of Alexander the Great. Originally a simple workman in bronze (faber arvarius), he rose to the eminence which he afterward obtained by the direct study of nature. He rejected the last remains of the old conventional rules which the early artists followed. In his imitation of nature the ideal appears almost to have vanished, or perhaps it should rather be said that he aimed to idealize merely human beauty. He made statues of gods, it is true, but even in this field of art his favorite subject was the human hero Hercules; while his portraits seem to have been the chief foundation of his fame. The works of Lysippus are said to have amounted to the enormous number of one thousand five hundred. They were almost all, if not all, in bronze; in consequence of which, none of them are extant. He made statues of Alexander at all periods of life, and in many different positions. Alexander's edict is well known that no one should paint him but Apelles, and no one make his statue but Lysippus. The most celebrated of these statues was that in which Alexander was represented with a lance, which was considered as a sort of companion to the picture of Alexander wielding a thunderbolt, by Apelles.—2. (Μακκαβαῖοι), the descendants of the heroic Judas Maccabæi or Maccabæus, a name which he obtained from his victories. (From the Hebrew makkab, to strike.) They were also called Assmonæi, from Assmonæus, or Chasæus, grandfather of Mattathias, the father of Judas Maccabæus, or, in a shorter form, Assmonæi or Assmonia. This family first obtained distinction from the attempts which were made by Antiochus IV. Epiphanes, king of Syria, to root out the worship of Jehovah, and introduce the Greek religion among the inhabitants of Judæa. Antiochus published an edict, which enjoined uniformity of worship throughout his dominions. At Modin, a town not far from Lydda, lived Mattathias, a man of the priestly line and of deep religious feeling, who had five sons in the vigor of their days, John, Simon, Judas, Eleazar, and Jonathan. When the officer of the Syrian king visited Modin to enforce obedience to the royal edict, Mattathias not only refused to desert the religion of his forefathers, but with his own hand struck dead the first renegade who attempted to offer sacrifice on the heathen altar. He then put to death the king's officer, and retired to the mountains with his five sons (B.C. 167). Their number daily increased; and as opportunities occurred they issued from their mountain fastnesses, cut off detachments of the Syrian army, destroyed heathen altars, and restored in many places the synagogues and the open worship of the Jewish religion. Within a few months the insurrection at Modin had grown into a war for national independence. But the toils of such a war were too much for the aged frame of Mattathias, who died in the first year of the revolt, leaving the conduct of it to Judas, his third son. 1. Judas, who assumed the surname of Maccabæus, as has been mentioned above, carried on the war with the same prudence and energy with which it had been commenced. After meeting with great success, he at length fell in battle against the forces of Demetrius I. Soter, 169 B.C. He was succeeded in the command by his brother, —2. JONATHAN, who maintained the cause of Jewish independence with equal vigor and success, and became recognized as high-priest of the Jews. He was put to death by Tryphon, the minister of Antiochus VI., who treacherously got him into his power, 144. Jonathan was succeeded in the high-priesthood by his brother, —3. SIMON, who was the most fortunate of the sons of Mattathias, and under whose government the country became virtually independent of Syria. He was murdered by his son-in-law Ptolemy, the governor of Jericho, together with two of his sons, Judas and Mattathias, 135 B.C. His other son, Joannes Hyrcanus, escaped, and succeeded his father. —4. JOANNES HYRCANUS I. was high-priest 135–106. MACEDŌNIA (Μακεδονία: Macēdōnes), a country in Europe, north of Greece, which is said to have derived its name from an ancient King Macedon, a son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Thya, a daughter of Deucalion. The name first occurs in Herodotus, but its more ancient form appears to have been Macētia (Μακερία); and, accordingly, the Macedonians are sometimes called Macētae. The country is said to have been originally named Emathia. The boundaries of Macedonia differed at different periods. In the time of Herodotus the name Macēdonis designated only the country to the south and west of the River Lydia. The boundaries of the ancient Macedonian monarchy, before the time of Philip, the father of Alexander, were on the south Olympus and the Cambanian Mountains, which separated it from Thessaly and Epirus, on the east the River Strymon, which separated it from Thrace, and on the north and west Illyria and Paeonia, from which it was divided by no well-defined limits. Macedonia was greatly enlarged by the conquests of Philip. He added to his kingdom Paeonia on the north, so that the mountains Scordus and Orbelus now separated it from Mœsia; a part of Thrace on the east as far as the River Nestus, which Thracian district was usually called Macēdonia adjecta; the peninsula Chalcidice on the south; and on the west a part of Illyria, as far as the Lake Lychnitia. On the conquest of the country by the Romans, B.C. 168, Macedonia was divided into four districts, which were quite independent of one another: 1. The country between the Strymon and the Nestus, with a part of Thrace east of the Nestus, as far as the Hebrus, and also including the territory of Heraclea Sintica and Bialitice, west of the Strymon; the capital of this district was Amphipolis. 2. The country between the Strymon and the Axios, exclusive of those parts already named, but including Chalcidice; the capital Thessalonica. 3. The country between the Axios and Peneus; the capital Pella. 4. The mountainous country in the west; the capital Pelagonia. After the conquest of the Achæans in 146, Macedonia was formed into a Roman province, and Thessaly and Illyria were incorporated with it; but, at the same time, the district east of the Nestus was again assigned to Thrace. The Roman province of Macedonia accordingly extended from the Ægean to the Adriatic Seas, and was bounded on the south by the province of Achaia. It was originally governed by a proconsul; it was made by Tiberius one of the provinces of the Cæsar; but it was restored to the senate by Claudius. Macedonia may be described as a large plain, surrounded on three sides by lofty mountains. Through this plain, however, run many smaller ranges of mountains, between which are wide and fertile valleys, extending from the coast far into the interior. The chief mountains were SCORDUS or SCARDUS, on the northwestern frontier, toward Illyria and Dardania; further east, ORBELUS and SCORRUS, which separated it from Mœsia; and RHODOP, which extended from Scœmia in a southeasterly direction, forming the boundary between Macedonia and Thrace. On the southern frontier were the CAMBANI MOUNTS and OLYMPI. The chief rivers were in the direction of east to west, the Nestus, the STRYMON, the AXUS the largest of all, the LYDIAS or LYDIA and the HALLIAMON. The great bulk of the inhabitants of Macedonia consisted of Thracian and Illyrian tribes. At an early period some Greek tribes settled in the southern part of the country. They are said to have come from Argos, and to have been led by GAUANCES, AËROPUS, and PARDIOCEAS, the three sons of Temenus the Heræid. PARDIOCEAS, the youngest of the brothers, was looked upon as the founder of the Macedonian monarchy. A later tradition, however, regarded CARANUS, who was also a Heræid from Argos, as the founder of the monarchy. These Greek settlers intermarried with the original inhabitants of the country. The dialect which they spoke was akin to the Doric, but it contained many barbarous words and forms; and the Macedonians were accordingly never regarded by the other Greeks as genuine Hellenes. Moreover, it was only in the south of Macedonia that the Greek language was spoken; in the north and northwest of the country the Illyrian tribes continued to speak their own language, and to preserve their ancient habits and customs. Very little is known of the history of Macedonia till the reign of AMYNTAS I., who was a contemporary of Darius Hystaspis, but from that time their history is more or less intimately connected with that of Greece, till at length Philip, the father of Alexander the Great became the virtual master of the whole of Greece. The conquests of Alexander, extended the Macedonian supremacy over a great part of Asia; and the Macedonian kings continued to exercise their sovereignty over Greece till the conquest of PERSEUS by the Romans, 168, brought the Macedonian monarchy to a close. The details of the Macedonian history are given in the list of the separate kings.

He wrote a poem or poems upon birds, snakes, and medicinal plants, in imitation, it would appear, of the Theriaca of Nicander. (Ov. Trist. iv, 19, 44) The work now extant, entitled "Æmilii Macer de Herbarum Virtutibus," belongs to the Middle Ages.—2. We must carefully distinguish from Æmilii Macer of Verona, a poet Macer, who wrote on the Trojan war, and who must have been alive in A.D. 12, since he is addressed by Ovid in that year (ex-Pont. ii, 10, 2).—3. A Roman jurist, who lived in the reign of Alexander Severus. He wrote several works, extracts from which are given in the Digest.

MACER (Μακέρ), son of Æsculapius, was Anticlea, the daughter of Diocles, by became the father of Gorgasus, Nicomachus, Sphyrus, and Polemocrates. With his brother Podalirius, he went with thirty ships, commanding the men from Tricca, Ithome, and Cephallenia. He acted as the surgeon of the army, also distinguished himself in battle. He was wounded by Paris, but was cured by Nestor. Later writers regard him as one of the Greek heroes who died in the wooden horse, and he is called Philoctetes. He was killed by Hector, the son of Telephus, and he received honors at Gerenia, in Messenia.

MACERUS (Μακέρης), son of Mithradates the appointed by his father king of Bosphorus, the repeated defeats of Mithradates made, Macchares proved a traitor, and he was killed by Lucullus: his father, though he was by the Roman troops, marched against him, and the latter put himself to death by falling into his enraged father's hands.

On the capture of that monarch, Macrius was proclaimed emperor, together with his two sons Macrianus and Quietus. He assigned the management of affairs in the East to Quietus, and set out with the younger Macrianus for Italy. They were encountered by Aureolus on the confines of Thrace and Illyria, defeated and slain, 262. Quietus was shortly afterward slain in the East by Odenathus.

MACRINUS, M. OPILIUS SEVERUS, Roman emperor, April, A.D. 217–June, 218. He was born at Caesarea in Mauretania, of humble parents, A.D. 164, and rose at length to be præfect of the prætorians under Caracalla. He accompanied Caracalla in his expedition against the Parthians, and was proclaimed emperor after the death of Caracalla, whom he had caused to be assassinated. He conferred the title of Cæsar upon his son Diademianus, and at the same time gained great popularity by repealing some obnoxious taxes. But in the course of the same year he was defeated with great loss by the Parthians, and was obliged to retire into Syria. While here, his soldiers, with whom he had become unpopular by enforcing among them order and discipline, were easily seduced from their allegiance, and proclaimed Elagabalus as emperor. With the troops which remained faithful to him, Macrinus marched against the usurper, but was defeated, and fled in disguise. He was shortly afterward seized in Chalcedon, and put to death, after a reign of fourteen months.

MACRO, NERVIVS SEPTIMIUS, a favorite of the Emperor Tiberius, was employed to arrest the powerful Sejanus in A.D. 31. On the death of the latter he was made præfect of the prætorians, an office which he continued to hold for the remainder of Tiberius's reign and during the earlier part of Caligula's. Macro was as cruel as Sejanus. He laid informations; he presided at the rack; and he lent himself to the most savage caprices of Tiberius during the last and worst period of his government. During the lifetime of Tiberius he paid court to the young Caligula; and he promoted an intrigue between his wife Ennia and the young prince. It was rumored that Macro shortened the last moments of Tiberius by stifling him with the bedding as he recovered unexpectedly from a swoon. But Caligula soon became jealous of Macro, and compelled him to kill himself with his wife and children, 38.

MACROBIUS, the grammarian, whose full name was Ambrosius Aurelius Theodosius Macrobius. All we know about him is that he lived in the age of Honorius and Theodosius, that he was probably a Greek, and that he had a son named Eustathius. He states in the preface to his Saturnalia that Latin was to him a foreign tongue, and hence we may fairly conclude that he was a Greek by birth, more especially as we had numerous Greek idioms in his style. He was probably a pagan. His extant works are, 1. Saturnaliarum Conviviarum Libri VII., consisting of a series of dissertations on history, mythology, criticism, and various points of antiquarian research, supposed to have been delivered during the holidays of the Saturnalia at the house of Vettius Pretextatus, who was invested with the highest offices of state under Valentinian and Valens. The form of the work is avowedly copied from the dialogues of Plato, especially the Banquet: in substance it bears a strong resemblance to the Noctes Atticæ of A. Gellius. The first book treats of the festivals of Saturnus and Janus, of the Roman calendar, &c. The second book commences with a collection of bon mots, ascribed to the most celebrated wits of antiquity; to these are appended a series of essays on matters connected with the pleasures of the table. The four following books are devoted to criticisms on Virgil. The seventh book is of a more miscellaneous character than the preceding. 2. Commentarius ex Cicerone in Somnium Scipionis, a tract much studied during the Middle Ages. The Dream of Scipio, contained in the sixth book of Cicero's De Republica, is taken as a text, which suggests a succession of discourses on the physical constitution of the universe, according to the views of the New Platonists, together with notices of some of their peculiar tenets on mind as well as matter. 3. De Differentiis et Societatibus Græci Latiniq. Verbi, a treatise purely grammatical, of which only an abridgment is extant, compiled by a certain Joannes. The best editions of the works of Macrobius are by Gronovius, Lugd. Bat., 1670, and by Zeunius, Lips., 1774: [the first volume of a new and more copious critical edition was published at Quedlinburg and Leipzig, 1848, edited by Lud. Janus.]

They do not appear in history after the Babylonish captivity.

MÆANDER (Μαιάνδριος: now Menderah or Mender, or Büyük-Menderah, i. e., the Great Menderah, in contradistinction to the Little Menderah, the ancient Cayster), has its source in the mountain called Aulocrenas, above Celeus, in the south of Phrygia, close to the source of the Marasyas, which immediately joins it. Vid. Cælanæ. It flows in a general western direction, with various changes of direction, but on the whole with a slight inclination to the south. After leaving Phrygia, it flows parallel to Mount Measgis, on its southern side, forming the boundary between Lydia and Caria, and at last falls into the Icarian Sea between Myus and Priene. Its whole length is above one hundred and seventy geographical miles. The Meander is deep, but narrow, and very turbid, and therefore not navigable far up. Its upper course lies chiefly through elevated plains, and partly in a deep rocky valley: its lower course, for the last one hundred and ten miles, is through a beautiful wide plain, through which it flows in those numerous windings that have made its name a descriptive verb (to meander), and which it often inundates. The alluvion made in the coast about its mouth by its alluvial deposit was observed by the ancients, and it has been continual going on. Vid. LARVICUS SIVE MILETUS. The tributaries of the Meander river, on the right or northern side, the Marasyas, Cludrus, Lethæus, and Gæson, and on the left or southern side, the Obrimas, Lycus, Harpasus, and another Marasyas. As a god, Meander is described as the father of the nymph Cynæ, who was the mother of Cænus. Hence the latter is called by Ovid (Met., ix., 573) Mæandrius juvenis.

MÆCENAS, C. CRISPUS, was born some time between B.C. 78 and 63; and we learn from Horace (Carm., iv., 11) that his birth-day was the thirteenth of April. His family, though belonging wholly to the equestrian order, was of high antiquity and honor, and traced its descent from the Lacumones of Etruria. His paternal ancestors, the Cinzi, are mentioned by Livy (2, 3, 5) as having attained great power and wealth at Arretium about B.C. 301. The maternal branch of the family was likewise of Etruscan origin, and it was from them that the name of Mæcenas was derived, it being customary among the Etruscans to assume the mother's as well as the father's name. It is in allusion to this circumstance that Horace (Sat., i., 4, 9) mentions both his gens maternas atque paternas as having been distinguished by commanding numerous legions; a passage, by the way, from which we are not to infer that the ancestors of Mæcenas had ever led the Roman legions. Although it is unknown where Mæcenas received his education, it must doubtless have been a careful one. We learn from Horace that it was versed both in Greek and Roman literature; and his taste for literary pursuits was shown by his patronage of the most eminent his time, but also by several performed his own, both in verse and prose. It is conjectured that he became acquainted with Augustus at Apollonia before the death of Caesar; but he is mentioned for the first time in B.C. 40, and from this year his name constantly occurs as one of the chief advisers and ministers of Augustus. Thus he was employed in B.C. 37 in negotiating the peace with Sextus Pompeius; and it was probably on this occasion that Horace accompanied him to Brundisium, a journey which he has described in the Epistles of the first book. During the absence of Augustus, which was brought to a close by the return of Actium, Mæcenas remained at Rome, being intrusted with the administration of the public affairs of Italy. During this time he was suspected of the conspiracy of the younger Mæcenas, who was not present at the battle of Actium, as some critics have supposed; but the episode of Horace probably does not allude to Actium, but to the Sicilian expedition against Sextus Pompeius. On the return of Augustus from Actium, Mæcenas enjoyed a share of his favor than ever, in connection with Agrippa, had the management of all public affairs. It is related that at this time he took counsel with Agrippa respecting the expediency of the republic; that Agrippa advised him to take that course, but that Mæcenas persuaded him to establish the empire. Mæcenas continued to preserve the favor of Augustus; but, between B.C. 21 and 16, a coolness, to say the least, sprung up between the emperor and his minister, and after the latter year he withdrew entirely from public life. The cause of this withdrawal is enveloped in doubt, but is positively attributed to an incident on the occasion of Augustus with Terentia, his wife. Mæcenas died B.C. 8, and was buried in the Esquiline. He left no children, and bequeathed his property to Augustus, who had amassed an enormous fortune. He had purchased a tract of ground on the Esquiline Hill, which had formerly served as a burial place for the lower orders. (Hor., Epist. i. 1.) Here he had planted a garden, the site of which is remarkable for its loftiness, and from the top of which Nero is afterward reported to have contemplated the burning of Rome.

In this residence he seems to have spent the greater part of his time, and he was seldom absent from the country but seldom. His residence was of all the wits of the time, and whoever could contribute to the amusement of the company was always welcomed at his table. But his really interesting qualities consisted of the greatest general learning of Rome; and if his universal inclination toward letters, that he obtained the reputation of a great patron, it was by his friendship for Virgil and Horace that he derived his fame. Virgil was indebted to him for the completion of his Æneid, which had been approaching completion in the division of lands, and it was at the request of Mæ-cenas that he undertook the Georgics, the most finished of all his poems. To Horace he was a still greater benefactor. He presented him with the means of a comfortable subsistence, a farm in the Sabine country. If the estate was but a moderate one, we learn from Horace himself that the bounty of Mæcenas was regulated by his own contented views, and not by his patron's want of generosity. (Carm. iii. 16, 38.) Of Mæcenas's own literary productions only a few fragments exist. From these, however, and from the notices which we find of his writings in ancient authors, we are led to think that we have not suffered any great loss by their destruction; for, although a good judge of literary merit in others, he does not appear to have been an author of much taste himself. In his way of life Mæcenas was addicted to every species of luxury. We find several allusions in the ancient authors to the effeminacy of his dress. He was fond of theatrical entertainments, especially pantomimes, as may be inferred from his patronage of Bathyllus, the celebrated dancer, who was a freedman of his. That moderation of character which led him to be content with his equestrian rank, probably arose from his love of ease and luxury, or it might have been the result of more prudent and politic views. As a politician, the principal trait in his character was fidelity to his master, and the main end of all his cares was the consolidation of the empire; but, at the same time, he recommended Augustus to put no check on the free expression of public opinion, and, above all, to avoid that cruelty which for so many years had stained the Roman annals with blood.

MÆDICA (Maidich), the country of the Mædi, a powerful people in the west of Thrace, on the western bank of the Strymon, and the southern slope of Mount Scamius. They frequently made incursions into the country of the Macedonians, till at length they were conquered by the latter people, and their land incorporated with Macedonia, of which it formed the northeastern district.

Mælius, SP., the richest of the plebeian knights, employed his fortune in buying up corn in Etruria in the great famine at Rome in B.C. 440. This corn he sold to the poor at a small price, or distributed it gratuitously. Such liberality gained him the favor of the plebeians, but, at the same time, exposed him to the hatred of the ruling class. Accordingly, in the following year he was accused of having formed a conspiracy for the purpose of seizing the kingly power. Thereupon Cincinnatus was appointed dictator, and C. Servilius Ahala the master of the horse. Mælius was summoned to appear before the tribunal of the dictator; but as he refused to go, Ahala, with an armed band of patrician youths, rushed into the crowd and slew him. His property was confiscated, and his house pulled down; its vacant site, which was called the Æquifatium, continued to subsequent ages a memorial of his fate. Later ages fully believed the story of Mælius's conspiracy, and Cicero repeatedly praises the glorious deed of Ahala. But his guilt is very doubtful. None of the alleged accomplices of Mælius were punished, and Ahala was brought up wine, and only escaped condemnation by a voluntary exile.

ΜΕΝΑΙΟΣ (τὸ Μελναῖον or Μαινάϊον ὄρος: now Roinon), a mountain in Arcadia, which extended from Megalopolis to Tegea, was celebrated as the favorite haunt of the god Pan. From this mountain the surrounding country was called Μενάδια (Μαινάδια); and on the mountain was a town Μανάλις. The mountain was so celebrated that the Roman poets frequently use the adjectives Menalius and Manalis as equivalent to Arcadian.

ΜΕΝΙΟΣ. 1. C., consul B.C. 338, with L. Furcius Camillus. The two consuls completed the subjugation of Latium; they were both rewarded with a triumph; and equestrian statues were erected to their honor in the forum. The statue of Menius was placed upon a column, which is spoken of by later writers under the name of Columna Menia, and which appears to have stood near the end of the forum, on the Capitoline. Menius was dictator in 320, and censor in 318. In his censorship he allowed balconies to be added to the various buildings surrounding the forum, in order that the spectators might obtain more room for beholding the games which were exhibited in the forum; and these balconies were called after him Meniana (sc. edificia).—2. The proposer of the law, about 286, which required the patres to give their sanction to the election of the magistrates before they had been elected, or, in other words, to confer, or agree to confer, the imperium on the person whom the comitia should elect.—3. A contemporary of Lucilius, was a great spendthrift, who squandered all his property, and afterward supported himself by playing the buffoon. He possessed a house in the forum, which Cato in his censorship (184) purchased of him, for the purpose of building the basilica Porcia. Some of the scholiasts on Horace ridiculously relate, that when Menius sold his house, he reserved for himself one column, the Columna Menia, from which he built a balcony, that he might thence witness the games. The true origin of the Columna Menia, and of the balconies called Meniana, has been explained above. (Hor., Sat., l. 1, 101; i., 3, 21; Epist., l. 15, 28.)

ΜΕΩΤΙΣ ΠΑΛΟΣ (ἡ Μαιώτις λίμνη: now Sea of Azov), an inland sea on the borders of Europe and Asia, north of the Pontus Euxinus (see Black Sea), with which it communicates by the Bosporus Cimmerius. Its form may be described roughly as a triangle, with its vertex at its northeastern extremity, where it receives the waters of the great river Tanais (now Don); it discharges its superfluous water by a constant current into the Euxine. The ancients had very vague notions of its true form and size: the earlier geographers thought that both it and the Caspian Sea were gulfs of the great Northern Ocean. The Scythian tribes on its banks were called by the collective name of Μεώται or Μελίτιοι (Μαιώται, Μαιωτικοί). The sea had also the names of Cimmerium or Bosporicum Mare (Æschylus (Prom., 781) applies the name of Maeotic Strait to the Cimmerian Bosporus (sc. ἡ λῶν Μαιωτικὴ).

Daughter of Atlas, was married to Tegea, the son of Lycæon. Her tomb was shown both at Tegea and Mantinea in Arcadia.

ΜΕΛΛΑ, JULIA, sister-in-law of Septimius Severus, aunt of Caracalla, and grandmother of Elagabalus and Alexander Severus. She was a native of Emesa in Syria, and secured, at the elevation of Septimius Severus, the husband of her sister Julia Domna, to have lived at the imperial court until the death of Caracalla, so to have accumulated great wealth. She contrived and executed the plot which transferred the supreme power from Macrinus to her grand son ELAGABALUS. When she foresaw the downfall of the latter, she prevailed on him to add his cousin ALEXANDER SEVERUS. By Severus she was always treated with the greatest respect; she enjoyed the title of Augusta during her life, and received divine honors after her death.

He was Macedonian by birth; and he seems to have accompanied his mother to Egypt, where he soon rose to a high place in the favor of Ptolemy. In B.C. 308 he was appointed by the monarch to the command of the expedition destined for the recovery of Cyrene after the death of Ophellus. The enterprise was completely successful, and Magas obtained from his father the government of the province. Although he ruled over the province only as a dependent

MAGNA (now Monte de Breis, on the town on the western frontier of the year which the Gauls were defeated remains shortly before Caesar's arrival

(magi), the name of the order of priestly teachers among the Medes and is said to be derived from the Persian mag, or mugh, i. e., a priest. There is evidence that a class similar to the Medes cases bearing the same name, among other Eastern nations, especially among the Babylonians; nor is it at all probable the Magi, or their religion, were of Median or Persian origin; but, in literature, they are presented to us exclusively in connection with Medo-Persian history. Herodotus represents them as six tribes into which the Median empire was divided. Under the Median empire the supremacy passed to the Persians, who were so closely connected with the Medes that they had so great an influence in the Persian empire that they evidently retained their position of revolution; and they had power to be almost successful in the attempt to overthrow the Persian dynasty of Cambyses, by putting forward a Median prince as a pretender to the throne, claiming that he was Smerdis, the son of Darius, who had been put to death by his subjects. It is clear that this was a store the Median supremacy; but arose from mere ambition, or from the desire of the power of the Magi under a government of Cyrus, can not be certainly. The defeat of this Magian prince by Darius the son of Hystaspes and Persian nobles was followed by a general of the Magi, which was celebrated as a festival (τὰ Μαγιστάρια), during which the Magi was permitted to appear in their position as the only ministers remained unaltered. The breaking of the Persian empire must have greatly changed their condition; but they still continued a history down to the time of the Seleucid empire. The "wise men" who came to Jerusalem at the time of the birth of Jesus were Magi (μάγοι in their original, Matt., ii., 1). Simon, who was put to death by his emissaries, was said the people of Samaria before he led to them (Acts viii.), and Elymas, who tried to hinder the conversion of Sergius Paulus at Cyprus (Acts, xiii.), are both called Magians; but in these cases the words μαγιστάρια and μαγιστάρια are used in a secondary sense, for a person who pretends to the wisdom, or practices the arts of the Magi. This use of the name occurs very early among the Greeks, and from it we get our word magic (ἡ μαγική, i. e., 'the art or science of the Magi'). The constitution of the Magi as an order is ascribed by tradition to Zoroastres, or Zoroaster as the Greeks and Romans called him, the Zarathustra of the Zendavesta (the sacred books of the ancient Persians), and the Zerdusht of the modern Persians; but whether he was their founder, their reformer, or the mythical representative of their unknown origin, can not be decided. He is said to have restored the true knowledge of the supreme good principle (Ormuzd), and to have taught his worship to the Magi, whom he divided into three classes, learners, masters, and perfect scholars. They alone could teach the truths and perform the ceremonies of religion, foretell the future, interpret dreams and omens, and ascertain the will of Ormuzd by the arts of divination. They had three chief methods of divination, by calling up the dead, by cups or dishes, and by waters. The forms of worship and divination were strictly defined, and were handed down among the Magi by tradition. Like all early priesthoods, they seem to have been the sole possessors of all the science of their age. To be instructed in their learning was esteemed the highest of privileges, and was permitted, with rare exceptions, to none but the princes of the royal family. Their learning became celebrated at an early period in Greece, by the name of μάγιστρία, and was made the subject of speculation by the philosophers, whose knowledge of it seems, however, to have been very limited; while their high pretensions, and the tricks by which their knowledge of science enabled them to impose upon the ignorant, soon attached to their name among the Greeks and Romans that bad meaning which is still commonly connected with the words derived from it. Besides being priests and men of learning, the Magi appear to have discharged judicial functions.

MAGNENTIUS, Roman emperor in the West, A.D. 350-353, whose full name was FLAVIUS POPILIUS MAGNENTIUS. He was a German by birth, and after serving as a common soldier was eventually intrusted by Constantine, the son of Constantine the Great, with the command of the Jovian and Herulian battalions who had replaced the ancient prætorian guards when the empire was remodelled by Diocletian. He availed himself of his position to organize a conspiracy against the weak and profligate Constantine, who was put to death by his emissaries. Magnentius thereupon was acknowledged as emperor in all the Western provinces except Illyria.

where Vetrano had assumed the purple. Constantius hurried from the frontier of Persia to crush the usurpers. Vetrano submitted to Constantius at Sardis in December, 350. Magnentius was first defeated by Constantius at the sanguinary battle of Mursa on the Drave, in the autumn of 351, and was obliged to fly into Gaul. He was defeated a second time in the passes of the Cottian Alps, and put an end to his own life about the middle of August, 353. Magnentius was a man of commanding stature and great bodily strength; but not one spark of virtue relieved the blackness of his career as a sovereign. The power which he obtained by treachery and murder he maintained by extortion and cruelty.

MAGNES (Μάγνης), one of the most important of the earlier Athenian comic poets of the old comedy, was a native of the demus of Icaria or Icarium in Attica. He flourished B.C. 460 and onward, and died at an advanced age, shortly before the representation of the Knights of Aristophanes, that is, in 423. (Aristoph., Equit., 524.) His plays contained a great deal of coarse buffoonery. [A few fragments of his plays are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Com. Græc., vol. i., p. 5-6.]

MAGNĒSĪA (Μαγνησία: Μάγνης, pl. Μάγνητες). 1. The most easterly district of Thessaly, was a long, narrow strip of country, extending from the Peneus on the north to the Pagasan Gulf on the south, and bounded on the west by the great Thessalian plain. It was a mountainous country, as it comprehended the Mounts Ossa and Pelion. Its inhabitants, the Magnetes, are said to have founded the two cities in Asia mentioned below.—2. M. AD SIPYLUM (M. πρὸς Σιπύλῳ or ὅτι Σιπύλῳ: ruins at Manissa), a city in the northwest of Lydia, in Asia Minor, at the foot of the northwest declivity of Mount Sipylus, and on the south bank of the Hermus, is famous in history as the scene of the victory gained by the two Scipios over Antiochus the Great, which secured to the Romans the empire of the East, B.C. 190. After the Mithradatic war, the Romans made it a libera civitas. It suffered, with other cities of Asia Minor, from the great earthquake in the reign of Tiberius; but it was still a place of importance in the fifth century.—3. M. AD MÆANDRUM (M. ἢ πρὸς Μαίανδρῳ, M. ἐπὶ Μαίανδρῳ: ruins at Inek-dazar), a city in the southwest of Lydia, in Asia Minor, was situated on the River Lethæus, a northern tributary of the Mæander. It was destroyed by the Cimmerians (probably about B.C. 700) and rebuilt by colonists from Miletus, so that it became an Ionian city by race as well as position. It was one of the cities given to Themistocles by Artaxerxes. It was celebrated for its temple of Artemis Leucophryne, one of the most beautiful in Asia Minor, the ruins of which still exist.

MAGNĒPŌLIS (Μαγνηπόλις), or EUPATORIA MAGNOROLIS, a city of Pontus, in Asia Minor, near the confluence of the rivers Lycus and Iris, begun by Mithradates Eupator and finished by Pompey, but probably destroyed before very long.

[MAGNUS PORTUS. 1. (Now Gulf of Almería), a harbor of Hispania Bætica, on the Iberian Gulf, between Abdera and the promontory Charidemus.—2. (Μίγας λιμὲν), a harbor on the west of the north coast of Hispania Tarraconensis among the Callaici Lucenses.—3. (Μίγας λιμὲν), a haven on the south coast of Britain, opposite the island Vectis (now Isle of Wight) now probably the Gulf of Portsmouth.]

[MAGNUS SINUS ὁ ὑπερὸς ἀλλος, now Gulf of Siam), the great gulf on the east coast of India extra Gangem, or the Chersonesus Anna, separating this from the opposite coast of the Sinae.]

MAGO (Μάγων). 1. A Carthaginian, said to have been the founder of the military power of that city, by introducing a regular discipline and organization into her armies. He flourished from B.C. 550 to 500, and was probably the father of Hasdrubal, who was slain in the battle against Gelo at Himera. Vid. HANNICAR, No. 1.—2. Commander of the Carthaginian fleet under Himilco in the war against Dionysius, 396. When Himilco returned to Africa after the disastrous termination of the expedition, Mago appears to have been invested with the chief command in Sicily. He carried on the war with Dionysius, but in 392 was compelled to conclude a treaty of peace, by which he abandoned his allies the Sicilians to the power of Dionysius. In 388 he again invaded Sicily, but was defeated by Dionysius and slain in battle.—3. Commander of the Carthaginian army in Sicily in 344. He assisted Hicetas in the war against Timoleon; but, becoming apprehensive of treachery, he sailed away to Carthage. Here he put an end to his own life, to avoid a worse fate at the hands of his countrymen, who nevertheless crucified his lifeless body.—4. Son of Hamilcar Barca, and youngest brother of the famous Hannibal. He accompanied Hannibal to Italy, and after the battle of Cannæ (216) carried the news of this great victory to Carthage; but, instead of returning to Italy, he was sent into Spain with a considerable force to the support of his other brother Hasdrubal, who was hard pressed by the two Scipios (215). He continued in this country for many years; and after his brother Hasdrubal quitted Spain in 206, in order to march to the assistance of Hannibal in Italy, the command in Spain devolved upon him and upon Hasdrubal, the son of Gisgo. After their decisive defeat by Scipio at Ilipa in 206, Mago retired to Gades, and subsequently passed the winter in the lesser of the Balearic Islands, where the memory of his sojourn is still preserved in the name of the celebrated harbor, Portus Magonis, or Port Mahon. Early in the ensuing summer (205) Mago landed in Liguria, where he surprised the town of Genoa. Here he maintained himself for two years, but in 203 he was defeated with great loss, in Cisalpine Gaul by Quintilius Varus, and was himself severely wounded. Shortly afterward he embarked his troops in order to return to Africa, but he died of his wound before reaching Africa. Cornelius Nepos, in opposition to all other authorities, represents Mago as surviving the battle of Zama, and says that he perished in a shipwreck, or was assassinated by his slaves.—5. Surnamed the Samnite, was one of the chief officers of Hannibal in Italy, where he held for a considerable time the chief command in Bruttium.—6. Commander of the garrison of New Carthage when that city was taken by Scipio is, Mago was sent a prisoner to Carthaginians of uncertain date, to work upon agriculture in the Punage, in twenty-eight books. So great reputation of this work even at Rome, for the destruction of Carthage, the sense that it should be translated into competent persons at the head of as D. Silanus. It was subsequently into Greek, though with some abridgement, by Cassius Dionysius of Iago's precepts on agricultural matters really cited by the Roman writers on subjects in terms of the highest commen-

MACUM. Vid. MOSONTIACUM.

MACA (now Urmeca, or, according to others), a small river on the northern Hispania Tarraconensis].

MAC (Μακάριος), son of Himilco, and one of the distinguished officers of Hannibal and Punic war. He is first mentioned in the siege of Saguntum. After the battle he urged Hannibal to push on at once against Rome itself; and on the other hand, his commander, he is said to have objected that Hannibal knew indeed how to gain but not how to use them.

MACA or Μακάριος, daughter of Atlas and as the eldest of the Pleiades, and the youngest of the seven sisters. In a grotto of Syllene in Arcadia she became by Jupiter the mother of Mercury (Hermes).

son of Jupiter (Zeus) by Callisto, to her to be reared. Vid. PLEIADAE. Likewise the name of a divinity worshipped at Rome, who was also called Majestas. Mentioned in connection with Vulcan, regarded by some as the wife of that god; it seems for no other reason but that the priest of Vulcan offered a sacrifice to him the first of May. In the popular superstitious times she was identified with the laughter of Atlas.

MACCUS, JULIUS VALERIUS, Roman emperor, West, A.D. 457-461, was raised to the throne by Ricimer. His reign was chiefly occupied in making preparations to invade Africa; but the immense fleet which he had collected for this purpose in the harbor of Cartagena in Spain was destroyed by the Goths in 460. Thereupon he concluded a peace with the Goths. His activity and popularity were the result of Ricimer, who compelled him to abdicate, and then put an end to his reign.

now Malaga), an important town on the coast of Hispania Bética, and on a river of the name (now Guadalmédina), was founded by the Punic or Carthaginian people, and has always been a place of commerce from the earliest times to the present day.

(Μαλάγυα), a city of India, probably the same as Madras.

(Μάλχορ). 1. Of Philadelphus in Syria, a historian and rhetorician, wrote the history of the empire from A.D. 474 to 480, and has some extracts, published along with Dexippus by Bekker and Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829.—2. King of Arabia Petraea, was contemporary with Herod the Great, who fled to him for refuge when he was driven out of Jerusalem by Antigonos and the Parthians, B.C. 40. This was probably the same Malchus who is mentioned by Hirtius as sending an auxiliary force of cavalry to Cæsar in Egypt.

MALÆA (Μαλέα ὕψος; now Cape Maria), the southern promontory of the island of Lesbos.

MALÆA (Μαλέα or Μαλέαι; now Cape St. Angelo or Maisio di St. Angelo), a promontory on the southeast of Laconia, separating the Argolic and Laconic gulfs; the passage round it was much dreaded by sailors. Here was a temple of Apollo, who hence bore the surname Μαλαίαιος. MALÆAS or ΜΑΛΙΛΑΣ, JOANNES (Ἰωάννης ὁ Μαλέας or Μαλίλας) a native of Antioch, and a Byzantine historian, lived shortly after Justinian the Great. The word Malalas signifies in Syriac an orator. He wrote a chronicle of universal history from the creation of the world to the reign of Justinian inclusive. Edited by Dindorf, Bonn, 1831.

MALANE (Μαλήνη), a city of Mysia, only mentioned by Herodotus (vi., 29).

[MALEVENTUM. Vid. BENEVENTUM.]

MALITIOSUS SINUS (Μαλιτιώδης κόλπος; now Bay of Zeiken), a narrow bay in the south of Thessaly, running west from the northwest point of the island of Eubœa. On one side of it is the Pass of Thermopylæ. It derived its name from the Malienses, who dwelt on its shores. It is sometimes called the Lamæcus Sinus, from the town of Lamia in its neighborhood.

MALIS (Μαλὶς γῆ, Ionic and Attic Μαλὶς γῆ; Μαλιεύς or Μηλιεύς, Maliensis, a district in the south of Thessaly, on the shores of the Maliæcus Sinus, and opposite the northwest point of the island of Eubœa. It extended as far as the Pass of Thermopylæ. Its inhabitants, the Maliæans, were Dorians, and belonged to the Amphiolyonic league.

MALLI (Μαλλοί), an Indian people on the sides of the HYDRAOTIS; their capital is supposed to have been on the site of the celebrated fortress of Mooltan.

MALLUS (Μαλλός), a very ancient city of Cilicia, on a hill a little east of the mouth of the River Pyramus, was said to have been founded at the time of the Trojan war by Mopsus and Amphilochus. It had a port called Magarsa.

MALUGINENSIS, a celebrated patrician family of the Cornelia gens in the early ages of the republic, the members of which frequently held the consulship. It disappears from history before the time of the Samnite wars.

MALVA. Vid. MULUCNA.

MAMÆA, JULIA, a native of Emesa in Syria was daughter of Julia Mæsa, and mother of Alexander Severus. She was a woman of integrity and virtue, and brought up her son with the utmost care. She was put to death by the soldiers along with her son, A.D. 235.

MAMERCUS. 1. Son of King Numa according to one tradition, and son of Mars and Silvia according to another.—2. Tyrant of Catana, when Timoleon landed in Sicily, B.C. 344.

After his defeat by Timoleon he fled to Messana, and took refuge with Hippon, tyrant of that city. But when Timoleon laid siege to Messana, Hippon took to flight, and Mamercus surrendered, stipulating only for a regular trial before the Syracusans. But as soon as he was brought into the assembly of the people there, he was condemned by acclamation, and executed like a common malefactor.

MAMERCUS or MAMERCINUS, ÆMILIUS, a distinguished patrician family which professed to derive its name from Mamercus in the reign of Numa. 1. L., thrice consul, namely, B.C. 484, 478, 473.—2. TIB., twice consul, 470 and 467.—3. MAM., thrice dictator, 437, 433, and 426. In his first dictatorship he carried on war against the Veientes and Fidenses. Lar Tolumnius, the king of Veii, is said to have been killed in single combat in this year by Cornelius Cossus. In his second dictatorship Æmilius carried a law limiting to eighteen months the duration of the censorship, which had formerly lasted for five years. This measure was received with great approbation by the people; but the censors then in office were so enraged at it that they removed him from his tribe, and reduced him to the condition of an erarian.—4. L., a distinguished general in the Samnite wars, was twice consul, 341 and 329, and once dictator, 335. In his second consulship he took Privernum, and hence received the surname of Privernus.

MAMERS, the Oscan name of the god MARS.

MAMERTINI. Vid. MESSANA.

MAMERTIUM (Mamerini), a town in Bruttium, of uncertain site, founded by a band of Samnites, who had left their mother country under the protection of Mamers or Mars to seek a new home.

MAMILIA GENS, plebeian, was originally a distinguished family in Tusculum. They traced their name and origin to Mamilia, the daughter of Telegonus, the founder of Tusculum, and the son of Ulysses and the goddess Circe. It was to a member of this family, Octavius Mamilius, that Tarquinus betrothed his daughter; and on his expulsion from Rome he took refuge with his son-in-law, who, according to the beautiful lay preserved by Livy, roused the Latin people against the infant republic, and perished in the great battle at the Lake Regillus. In B.C. 468, the Roman citizenship was given to L. Mamilius, the dictator of Tusculum, because he had two years before marched to the assistance of the city when it was attacked by Herdonius. The gens was divided into three families, Lutetianus, Turrinus, and Vitulus, but none of them became of much importance.

MAMMULA, the name of a patrician family of the Cornelia gens, which never became of much importance in the state.

MAMURIUS VETURIVS. Vid. VETURIVS.

MAMURA, a Roman eques, born at Formis, was the commander of the engineers (præfectus fabrum) in Julius Cæsar's army in Gaul. He amassed great riches, the greater part of which, however, he owed to Cæsar's liberality. He was the first person at Rome who covered all the walls of his house with layers of marble, and also the first all of the columns in whose houses were made of solid marble. He was violently attacked by Catullus in his poems, who called him deceptor Formisana. Mamura seems to have been alive in the time of Horace, who calls Formisæ in ridicule, Mamurææ ævis (Sat., 1, 5, 37), from which we may infer that his name had become a by-word of contempt.

[MANASTABAL. Vid. MASTANABAL.]

MANCIA, HELVIUS, a Roman orator about B.C. 90, who was remarkably ugly, and whose name is recorded chiefly in consequence of a law being raised against him on account of his deformity by C. Julius Cæsar Strabo, who was opposed to him on one occasion in some law.

MANCINIUS, HOSTILIUS. 1. A., was prætor of banus B.C. 180, and consul 170, when he had the conduct of the war against Perseus, king of Macedonia. He remained in Greece for part of the next year (169) as proconsul.—2. L., was legate of the consul L. Calpurnius Piso (148) in the siege of Carthage, in the third Punic war. He was consul 145.—3. C., consul 137, had the conduct of the war against Numantia. He was defeated by the Numantines, and purchased the safety of the remainder of his army by making a peace with the Numantines. The senate refused to recognize it, and went through the hypocritical ceremony of delivering him over to the enemy by means of the fetiales. This was done with the consent of Mancinus, but the army refused to accept him. On his return to Rome Mancinus took his seat in the senate as heretofore, but was violently expelled from it by the tribune P. Rutilius, on the ground that he had lost his citizenship. As the enemy had not received him, it was a disputed question whether he was a citizen or not by the Jus Postliminii (vid. Dict. of Ant., s. v. Postliminium), but the better opinion was that he had lost his civic rights, and they were accordingly restored to him by a lex.

MANDURIA (Μανδύριον in Plut.: now Casi Nuovo), a town in Calabria, on the road from Tarentum to Hydruntum, and near a small lake, which is said to have been always full to the edge, whatever water was added to or taken from it. Here Archidamus III., king of Sparta, was defeated and slain in battle by the Mamæans and Lucanians, B.C. 338.

MANES, the general name by which the Romans designated the souls of the departed; but as it is a natural tendency to consider the souls of departed friends as blessed spirits, the Manes gods as gods, and were worshipped no honors. Hence on Roman sepulchres, and D. M. S., that is, Dis Manibus. Vid. LARSA. At certain seasons, which were reckoned upon as sacred days (ferie denique), were offered to the spirits of the dead. An annual festival, which bore the name of the Mance in general, was celebrated on the nineteenth of February, under the Feriae or Parentalia, because it was for children and heirs to offer sacrifices to their parents and benefactors. (to Manethos or Manethos), an Egyptian of the town of Sebennytus, who lived in the time of the first Ptolemy. He was the first who gave in the Greek language an account of the religion and history of his country, and his information upon the ancient Egyptians themselves, and more upon their sacred books. The work gave an account of the theology of the ancients, and of the origin of the gods and heroes, and bore the title of Tōn Theōn kai Heroōn Historiē. This historical work was entitled a History. It was divided into three parts. The first contained the history of the first dynasty, or the thirty dynasties, or the mythology of Egypt, of the first dynasties. The second contained the eleventh, twelfth, and concluding the nineteenth dynasty. The third story of the remaining eleven dynasties included with an account of Nectanebus, the last of the native Egyptian kings. Of Manetho is lost; but a list of the same is preserved in Julius Africanus and most correct in the Armenian version; however, has introduced various inaccuracies. According to the calculation of the thirty dynasties, beginning with a period of three thousand five hundred and fifty-five years. The lists of the kings and the duration of their reigns were undoubtedly derived by him from the monuments, and their correctness, as they are not interpolated, is said to be by the hieroglyphic inscriptions on the monuments. There exists an astrological work, Ἀποτελεσματικά, in six books, a title the name of Manetho; but this is spurious, and can not have been written in the fifth century of our era. Edited by J. G. Ziegler, Cologne, 1832.

MANETHO, a formidable Italian, probably Etruscan, of the lower world, called the Mothones or Laræ. The festival of the Laræ was celebrated as a propitiation to the Mothones with the Laræ.

1. M., was consul B.C. 149, the third Punic war, and carried on the war against Carthage. He was celebrated as the one of the speakers in Cicero's de Officiis (i., 12).—2. C., tribune of the people, proposed the law granting to the command of the war against Mithridates, and the government of the provinces of Asia, Cilicia, and Bithynia.

as warmly opposed by Q. Catulus, and the leaders of the aristocracy. He was supported by Cicero in the de Officiis has come down to us. At the end of his year Manilius was brought to trial by the aristocratical party, and was condemned, but we do not know of what offence he was accused.—3. Also called MANILIUS or MALLIUS, a Roman poet of uncertain age, but is conjectured to have lived in the time of Augustus. He is the author of an astrological poem in five books, entitled Astronomica. The style of this poem is extremely faulty, being harsh and obscure, and abounding in repetitions and in forced metaphors. But the author seems to have consulted the best authorities, and to have adopted their most sagacious views. The best edition is by Bentley, Lond., 1739.

MANLIA GENS, an ancient and celebrated patrician gens at Rome. The chief families were those of AGRICOLA, TULLIUS, and VULSUS.

MANLIANA (Μανλιανή: ruins at Milana). 1. A city of importance in Mauretania Caesariensis, where one of Pompey's sons died.—2. A city of Etruria, on the road leading from Rome over the Alps Maritima to Arelate: it corresponds to the modern Magliana, near Siena.

MANLIUS, M., consul B.C. 392, took refuge in the Capitol when Rome was taken by the Gauls in 390. One night, when the Gauls endeavored to ascend the Capitol, Manlius was roused from his sleep by the cackling of his geese; collecting hastily a body of men, he succeeded in driving back the enemy, who had just reached the summit of the hill. From this heroic deed he is said to have received the surname of CERVINUS. In 396 he defended the cause of the plebeians, who were suffering severely from their debts, and from the harsh and cruel treatment of their patrician creditors. The patricians accused him of aspiring to royal power, and he was thrown into prison by the dictator Cornelius Cossus. The plebeians put on mourning for their champion, and were ready to take up arms in his behalf. The patricians, in alarm, liberated Manlius; but this act of concession only made him bolder, and he now did not scruple to instigate the plebeians to open violence. In the following year the patricians charged him with high treason, and brought him before the people assembled in the Campus Martius; but as the Capitol which had once been saved by him could be seen from this place, the court was removed to the Pomelian grove, outside the Porta Nomentana. Here Manlius was condemned, and the tribunes threw him down the Tarpeian Rock. The members of the Manlian gens accordingly resolved that none of them should ever bear in future the phenomenon of Marcus.

MANIUS, a son of Tuiscus, was regarded by the ancient Germans, along with his father, as the founders of their race. They further ascribed to Manius three sons, from whom the three tribes of the Ingevenes, Hermiones, and Istævones derived their names.

MANTINŒA (Μαντινεία: Mantinea: now Polioptoli), one of the most ancient and important towns in Arcadia, situated on the small river Ophis, near the centre of the eastern frontier of the country. It is celebrated in history for the great battle fought under its walls between the Spartans and Thebans, in which Epaminondas fell B.C. 362. According to tradition, Man-

MANA was founded by Mantineus, the son of Lycæon, but it was formed in reality out of the union of four or five hamlets. Till the foundation of Megalopolis, it was the largest city in Arcadia, and it long exercised a kind of supremacy over the other Arcadian towns; but in the Peloponnesian war the Spartans attacked the city, and destroyed it by turning the waters of the Ophis against its walls, which were built of bricks. After the battle of Leuctra the city recovered its independence. At a later period it joined the Achæan league, but, notwithstanding, formed a close connection with its old enemy Sparta, in consequence of which it was severely punished by Aratus, who put to death its leading citizens and sold the rest of its inhabitants as slaves. It never recovered the effects of this blow. Its name was now changed into Antigonia, in honor of Antigonus Doson, who had assisted Aratus in his campaign against the town. The Emperor Hadrian restored to the place its ancient appellation, and rebuilt part of it in honor of his favorite Antinous, the Bithynian, who derived his family from Mantinea.

MANTIUS (Μαντιός), son of Melampus, and brother of Antiphatas. Vid. MELAMPUS.

MANTE (Μαντώ, -οῦς). 1. Daughter of the Theban soothsayer Tiresias, was herself prophetic of the Iemnian Apollo at Thebes. After the capture of Thebes by the Epigoni, she was sent to Delphi with other captives, as an offering to Apollo, and there became the prophetess of this god. Apollo afterward sent her and her companions to Asia, where they founded the sanctuary of Apollo near the place where the town of Colophon was afterward built. Rhæcius, a Cretan, who had settled there, married Manto, and became by her the father of Mopsus. According to Euripides, she had previously become the mother of Amphilochous and Tisiphone, by Alcæmon, the leader of the Epigoni. Being a prophetess of Apollo, she is also called Daphne, i. e., the laurel virgin.—2. Daughter of Heracles, was likewise a prophetess, and the person from whom the town of Mantua received its name. (Virg., Æn., x., 199.)

MANTEA (Mantuanus: now Mantua). 1. A town in Gallia Transpadana, on an island in the River Mincius, was not a place of importance, but is celebrated because Virgil, who was born at the neighboring village of Andes, regarded Mantua as his birth-place. It was originally an Etruscan city, and is said to have derived its name from Manto, the daughter of Tiresias.—(2. Now probably Mondejar), a town of the Carpetani in Hispania Tarraconensis, by some erroneously regarded as Madrid.]

MARACANDA (τὰ Μαρακάνδα: now Samarkand), the capital of the Persian province of Sogdiana, in the northern part of the country, was seventy stædia (seven geographical miles) in circuit. It was here that Alexander the Great killed his friend Clitus.

MARAPHI (Μαράφιοι), one of the three nomadic tribes of the Persians, standing, with the Marpii, next in honor to the Pasargadae.

[MARATHA (Μάραθα: now Aizikolo), a small town of Arcadia, at the sources of the Bephagus, and in the neighborhood of Gortys.]

MARATHËIUM (Μαραθῆιον), a town on the coast of Ionia, between Ephesus and Neapolis: it belonged to the Samiæna, who exchanged it with the Ephesians for Neapolis, which lay nearer to their island. The modern Scala Nova marks the site of one of these towns, but is doubtful which.

MARATHON (Μαραθῖν: Μαραθῖνον), a deme in Attica, belonging to the tribe Leontia, was situated near a bay on the eastern coast of Attica, twenty-two miles from Athens by one road, and twenty-six miles by another. It originally belonged to the Attic tetrapolis, and is said to have derived its name from the hero Marathon. This hero, according to one account, was the son of Epopeus, king of Sicyon, who, having been expelled from Peloponnesus by the violence of his father, settled in Attica; while, according to another account, he was an Arcadian, who took part in the expedition of the Tyndaridæ against Attica, and devoted himself to death before the battle. The site of the ancient town of Marathon was probably not at the modern village of Marathon, but at a place called Vrana, a little to the south of Marathon. Marathon was situated in a plain, which extends along the sea-shore, about six miles in length, and from three miles to one mile and a half in breadth. It is surrounded on the other three sides by rocky hills and rugged mountains. Two marshes bound the extremity of the plain; the northern is more than a square mile in extent, but the southern is much smaller, and is almost dry at the conclusion of the great heats. Through the centre of the plain runs a small brook. In this plain was fought the celebrated battle between the Persians and Athenians, B.C. 490. The Persians were drawn up on the plain, and the Athenians on some portion of the high ground above the plain; but the exact ground occupied by the two armies can not be identified, notwithstanding the investigations of modern travellers. The tumulus raised over the Athenians who fell in the battle is still to be seen.

MARITRUS (Μάρατρος), an important city on the coast of Phœnicia, opposite to Aradus and near Antaradus: it was destroyed by the people of Aradus in the time of the Syrian king, Alexander Balas, a little before B.C. 150.

[MARATHRËA (Μαραθρῆα). 1. A small island of the Ægean Sea, on the coast of Ionia, near Clazomenæ.—2. A city in the western part of Crete; according to Hoeck, probably on the Promontorium Drepanum.]

MARCELLA. 1. Daughter of C. Marcellus and Octavia, the sister of Augustus. She was thrice married: first to M. Vipsanius Agrippa, who separated from her in B.C. 31, in order to marry Julia, the daughter of Augustus; secondly, to Julius Antonius, the son of the triumvir, by whom she had a son Lucius; thirdly, to Sextus Appuleius, consul A.D. 14, by whom she had Appuleia Varilia. —2 Wife of the poet on whom he has addressed two epigrams (1, 31, 31). She was a native of Spain; he left him as her dowry an estate. As he was married previously to Cleopatra, he married Marcella probably after his return about A. D. 96.

Marcellus, the author of the life of Theophrastus.

Marcellus, Claudius, an illustrious plebeian

M., celebrated as five times consul, conqueror of Syracuse. In his first consulship (222), Marcellus and his colleague defeated the Insubrians in Cisalpine Gaul, and captured Mediolanum. Marcellus distinguished himself by trying in battle with his brother-in-law, Viridomarus, the king of the Veneti, whose spoils he afterward dedicated in the temple of Jupiter.

This was the third and last instance in which such an offering was made. Marcellus was appointed praetor, and performed important service to the Roman in the south of Italy after the disastrous annus. In 216 he remained in the city, with the title of proconsul. In of the same year he was elected in place of Postumius Albinus, who lived in Cisalpine Gaul; but as the war was that the omens were unfavorable, he resigned the consulship. In his consulship he was consul a third time, and still in the south of Italy, where he carried war with ability, but without ob-decisive results. In the summer he was sent into Sicily, since the Carthaginians had obtained the upper hand in many of the cities in After taking Leontini, he proceeded to Syracuse, both by sea and attacks were vigorous and unremittting, he brought many powerful engines against the walls, these were very slowly unavailing by the superior skill of Archimedes, who directed those engines. Marcellus was at last compelled to give up all hopes of carrying the city

; and to turn the siege into a blockade, not till 213 that he obtained possession of the place. It was given up to Archimedes was one of the inhabitants of the city. The booty found in the Roman soldiers. The booty found in the city was immense; and Marcellus carried off many of the works of which the city had been adorned, to display at Rome. This was the first practice which afterward became common. In 210 he was consul a fourth time, and the conduct of the war against him he fought a battle with the Carthaginians near Numistro in Lucania, but without decisive result. In 209 he retained and of his army with the rank of praetor. In 208 he was consul for the fifth time, and his colleague was defeated by his brother-in-law, Marcellus himself led the battle. He was buried with honors by order of Hannibal. Marcellus is supposed to have been a rude, stern soldier, without excess, but harsh, unyielding. The great praise bestowed upon Marcellus by the Roman historians is certainly undeserved, and probably found its way into history from his funeral oration by his son, which was used as an authority by some of the earlier annalists. —3. M., son of the preceding, accompanied his father as military tribune in 208, and was present with him at the time of his death. In 204 he was tribune of the people; in 200, curule aedile; in 198, praetor; and in 196, consul. In his consulship he carried on the war against the Insubrians and Boii in Cisalpine Gaul. He was censor in 189. —4. M., consul 183, carried on the war against the Li-guriens —4. M., son of No. 2, was thrice consul, first in 166, when he gained a victory over the Alpine tribes of the Gauls; secondly in 155, when he defeated the Ligurians; and thirdly in 152, when he carried on the war against the Celtiberians in Spain. In 148 he was sent ambassador to Masinissa, king of Numidia, because he was shipwrecked on the voyage, and perished.

—5. M., an intimate friend of Cicero, is first mentioned as curule aedile with P. Clodius in

56. He was consul in 51, and showed himself a bitter enemy to Caesar. Among other ways in which he displayed his enmity, he caused a citizen of Comum to be scourged, in order to show his contempt for the privileges lately bestowed by Caesar upon that colony. But the animosity of Marcellus did not blind him to the imprudence of forcing on a war for which his party was unprepared; and at the beginning of 49 he in vain suggested the necessity of making levies of troops, before any open steps were taken against Caesar. His advice was overruled, and he was among the first to fly from

Rome and Italy. After the battle of Pharsalia

(48) he abandoned all thoughts of prolonging the contest, and withdrew to Mytilene, where he gave himself up to the pursuits of rhetoric and philosophy. Marcellus himself was unwilling to sue to the conqueror for forgiveness, but his friends at Rome were not backward in their exertions for that purpose. At length, in 46, in a full assembly of the senate, C. Marcellus, the cousin of the exile, threw himself at Caesar's feet to implore the pardon of his kin-smanship, and his example was followed by the whole body of the assembly. Caesar yielded to this demonstration of opinion, and Marcellus was declared to be forgiven. Cicero thereupon returned thanks to Caesar, in the oration Pro

Marcello, which has come down to us. Marcellus set out on his return; but he was murdered at the Piræus by one of his own attendants,

P. Magius Chilo. —6. C., brother of the preceding, was consul 49. He is constantly confounded with his cousin, C. Marcellus (No. 3), who was consul in 50. He accompanied his colleague, Lentulus, in his flight from Rome, and eventually crossed over to Greece. In the following year (48) he commanded part of Pom-pey's fleet; but this is the last we hear of him.

—7. C., uncle of the two preceding, was praetor in 60, and afterward succeeded M. Lepidus in the government of Sicily. His administration of the province is frequently praised by Cicero in his speeches against Verres, as affording the most striking contrast to that of the accused. Marcellus himself was present on that occasion, as one of the judges of Verres.

—8 C., son of the preceding, and first cousin of M. Marcellus (No. 5), whom he succeeded in the consulship, 60. He enjoyed the friendship of Cicero from an early age, and attached himself to the party of Pompey, notwithstanding his connection with Cæsar by his marriage with Octavia. In his consulship he was the advocate of all the most violent measures against Cæsar; but when the war actually broke out, he displayed the utmost timidity and helplessness. He could not make up his mind to join the Pompeian party in Greece; and after much hesitation, he at length determined to remain in Italy. He readily obtained the forgiveness of Cæsar, and thus was able to intercede with the Dictator in favor of his cousin, M. Marcellus (No. 5). He must have lived till near the close of 41, as his widow, Octavia, was pregnant by him when betrothed to Antony in the following year.—9 M., son of the preceding and of Octavia, the daughter of C. Octavius and sister of Augustus, was born in 43. As early as 39 he was betrothed in marriage to the daughter of Sextus Pompey; but the marriage never took place, as Pompey's death in 35 removed the occasion for it. Augustus, who had probably destined the young Marcellus as his successor, adopted him as his son in 23, and, at the same time, gave him his daughter Julia in marriage. In 23 he was curule ædile, but in the autumn of the same year he was attacked by the disease of which he died shortly after at Baie, notwithstanding all the skill and care of the celebrated physician Antonius Musa. He was in the twentieth year of his age, and was thought to have given so much promise of future excellence that his death was mourned as a public calamity; and the grief of Augustus, as well as that of his mother Octavia, was for a time unbounded. Augustus himself pronounced the funeral oration over his remains, which were deposited in the mausoleum lately erected for the Julian family. At a subsequent period (14) Augustus dedicated in his name the magnificent theatre near the Forum Olitorium, of which the remains are still visible. But the most durable monument to the memory of Marcellus is to be found in the well-known passage of Virgil (Æn., vi., 860-886), which must have been recited to Augustus and Octavia before the end of 22.—10 M., called by Cicero, for distinction's sake, the father of Æternus (Brut., 36), served under Marius in Gaul in 102, and as one of the lieutenants of L. Julius Cæsar in the Maric war, 90.—11 M. CLAUDIUS MARCELLUS ÆERNUS, son or grandson of No. 10, quæstor in Spain in 48, under Q. Cassius Longinus, took part in the mutiny of the soldiers against Cassius.—12 P. CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, son of No. 10, must have been adopted by one of the Cornelli Lenuli. He was one of Pompey's lieutenants in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67.—13 Cn. CORNELIUS LENTULUS MARCELLINUS, son of the preceding, was prætor 48, after which he governed the province of Syria for nearly two years, and was consul 56, when he showed himself a friend of the aristocratical party, and opposed all the measures of the triumvirate.

MARCELLUS, ERNIUS, born of an obscure family at Capua, rose by his oratorical talents to distinction at Rome in the reigns of Claudius, Nero, and Vespasian. He was one of the principal delators under Nero, and accused many of the most distinguished men of his time. He was brought to trial in the reign of Vespasian, but was acquitted, and enjoyed the patronage and favor of this emperor as well. In A.D. 68, however, he was convicted of having taken part in the conspiracy of Alienus Cæcina, and therefore put an end to his own life.

MARCELLUS, NONIUS, a Latin grammarian, the author of an important treatise, entitled De Compensiosa Doctrina per Litteras ad Filium, sometimes, but erroneously, called De Propriate Sermonis. He must have lived between the second and sixth centuries of the Christian era. His work is divided into eighteen chapters, but of these the first twelve are in reality separate treatises on different grammatical subjects. The last six are in the style of the Osmation of Julius Pollux, each containing a series of technical terms in some one department. The whole work contains numerous quotations from the earlier Latin writers. The best edition is by Gerlach and Roth, Basil, 1846.

MARCELLUS, SIMEAS, a native of Side in Pamphylia, lived in the reigns of Hadrian and Antoninus Pius, A.D. 117-161. He wrote a long medical poem in Greek hexameter verse, consisting of forty-two books, of which two fragments remain, [and are found in the Corpus Poetorum of Maittaire.]

MARCELLUS, ULPUS, a jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius. He is cited in the Digest.

MARCIA. 1. Wife of M. Regulus, who was taken prisoner by the Carthaginians.—2. Wife of M. Cato Uticensis, daughter of L. Marcus Philippus, consul B.C. 56. It was about 60 that Cato is related to have ceded her to his friend Q. Hortensius, with the approbation of her father. She continued to live with Hortensius till the death of the latter in 50, after which she returned to Cato.—3. Wife of Fabius Maximus, the friend of Augustus, learned from her husband the secret visit of the emperor to his grandson Agrippa, and informed Livia of it in consequence of which she became the cause of her husband's death, A.D. 13 or 14. She is mentioned on two or three occasions by Ovid.—4. Daughter of Crematius Cordus. Vid. Cordus.—5. The favorite concubine of Commodus, organized the plot by which the emperor perished. Vid. Commodus. She subsequently became the wife of Eolactus, his chamberlain, also a conspirator, and was eventually put to death by Julianus, along with Lætus, who also had been actively engaged in the plot.

MARCIA AQUA, a Roman aqueduct commenced by the prætor Marcus Rex 145 B.C., and finished by him in the following year, his term of office having been renewed for that purpose. It passed near Tibur, and through the country of the Peligni and Marsi, and supplied Rome with its best water: vid. Roma p. 763 b.]

MARCIA GENA, claimed to be descended from Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome. Vid. Ancus Marcius. Hence one of its families subsequently assumed the name of Rex, and the heads of Numa Pompilius and Ancus Marcius were placed upon the coins of the Marcii Rex.

and these claims to such high antiquity of this name, with the ex-Corinthians, are mentioned in the early of the republic (vid. CORIOLANUS); not till after the enactment of the laws that any member of the gens obconsulship. The names of the most illustrious families are CENSORIUS, PHILIP, and RUTILIUS.

MARCIA, the sister of Trajan, and mother of Emperor Hadrian.

MARCIA (Μαρκιανούπολις), an important city of the interior of Moesia Inferior, west of the Danube, founded by Trajan, and named after Marciana. It was situated on the high Constantinian to the Danube. It became the capital of the Bulgaria called Prisla (Προσλαβία), modern name Preslav, but the name is Marcenopolis.

MARCUS. 1. Emperor of the East A.D. 338, as a native of Thrace or Illyricum, for many years as a common soldier in the army. Of his early history we have few particulars; but he had attained to the rank of a common soldier at the death of Theodosius the Great, the widow of the latter, the empress, offered her hand and the empire to Marcian, who thus became Emperor. Marcian was a man of resolute character; and when Attila sent to tribute that the younger Theodosius was to pay annually, the emperor refused, "I have iron for Attila, but no gold." He swore vengeance; but he first died. Western Empire, and his death, however, saved the East. In 451 he died. He was succeeded by Marcian, who thus became Emperor. MARCUS, a Greek of uncertain date, but who perhaps lived in the fifth century of the Christian era. He wrote in prose, entitled "A Periplus of the Euxine Sea, both eastern and western, and the islands in it." The External Periplus in opposition to the Mediterranean. It is in two books; of which the first describes the East and South Seas, has come entire; but of the latter, which describes the West and North Seas, we possess only three last chapters on Africa, and one on the distance from Rome to the cities in the world. In this work follows Ptolemy. He also made an edition of Artemidorus of Ephesus (No. 4), of which we have an introduction, and the periplus of Syria, and Paphlagonia. Marcianus published an edition of Menippus with corrections. Vid. MENIPPUS.

MARCIANUS. Vid. MARCIANUS. An Italian seer, whose prophetic predictions (MARCIA) were first discovered by M. Atilius, the prætor, in B.C. 218. They were written in Latin, and two extracts from them are given by Livy, one containing a prophecy of the defeat of the Romans at Cannæ, and the second, commanding the institution of the Ludi Apollinares. The Marcian prophecies were subsequently preserved in the Cyprian Sibylline books. Some writers mention only one person of this name, but others speak of two brothers, the Marcii.

MARCODURUM (now Düren), a city of the Ubii in Germania Inferior.]

MARCOMANNI, that is, men of the mark or border, a powerful German people of the Suevic race, originally dwelt in the southwest of Germany, between the Rhine and the Danube, on the banks of the Main; but under the guidance of their chieftain Maroboduus, who had been brought up at the court of Augustus, they migrated into the land of the Boii, a Celtic race, who inhabited Bohemia and part of Bavaria. Here they settled after subduing the Boii, and founded a powerful kingdom, which extended south as far as the Danube. Vid. MAROBODUUS. At a later time, the Marcomanni, in conjunction with the Quadi and other German tribes, carried on a long and bloody war with the Emperor M. Aurelius, which lasted during the greater part of his reign, and was only brought to a conclusion by his son Commodus purchasing peace of the barbarians as soon as he ascended the throne, A.D. 180.

MARDIENS OF MARDIENS (Μαρδόνι, Μαρδόνι), a district of Persia, extending north from Tacene to the western frontier and to the sea-coast. It seems to have taken its name from some branch of the great people called Mardians, who are found in various parts of western and central Asia; for example, in Armenia, Media, Margiana, and, under the same form of name as those in Persia, in Sogdiana.

MARDI. Vid. AMARDI, MARDEN.

MARDONIUS (Μαρδόνιος), a distinguished Persian, was the son of Gobryas, and the son-in-law of Darius Hystaspis. In B.C. 492 he was sent by Darius with a large armament to punish Eretria and Athens for the aid they had given to the Ionians. But his expedition was an entire failure. His fleet was destroyed by a storm off Mount Athos, and the greater part of his land forces was destroyed on his passage through Macedonia by the Brygians, a Thracian tribe. In consequence of his failure, he was superseded in the command by Datis and Artaphernes, 490. On the accession of Xerxes, Mardonius was one of the chief instigators of the expedition against Greece, with the government of which he hoped to be invested after its conquest; and he was appointed one of the generals of the land army. After the battle of Salamis (480) he became alarmed for the consequences of the advice he had given, and persuaded Xerxes to return home with the rest of the army, leaving three hundred thousand men under his command for the subjugation of Greece. He was defeated in the following year (479 B.C.), near Platæa, by the combined Greek forces under the command of Pausanias, and was slain in the battle.

MĀRĒA, -ĒA, -IA (Μαρεία, Mareia; Mapia: Mareia), Mareōta: ruins at Marionth, a town of Lower Egypt, in the district of Mareotis, on the southern side of the Lake Mareotis, at the mouth of a canal.

MĀRĒŌTIS (Μαρεώτις). 1. Also called Μαρεώτης Νομός, a district of Lower Egypt, on the extreme northwest, on the borders of the Libyæ Nomos: it produced good wine.—2. A town in the interior of the Libyæ Nomos, between the Oasis of Ammon and the Oasis Minor.

MARĒŌTIS OF MARĒA OF (-IA) LACUS (ἡ Μαρεώτις, Mareia, Mapia λίμνη: now Birket-Mariouth, or El-Krent), a considerable lake in the northwest of Lower Egypt, separated from the Mediterranean by the neck of land on which Alexandria stood, and supplied with water by the Canopic branch of the Nile, and by canals. It was less than three hundred stadia (thirty geographical miles) long, and more than one hundred and fifty wide. It was surrounded with vine, palms, and papyrus. It served as the port of Alexandria for vessels navigating the Nile.

MĀRES (Μᾶρες), a people of Asia, on the northern coast of the Euxine, who served in the army of Xerxes, being equipped with helmets of wicker-work, leathern shields, and javelins.

MARĒSA, MARESCA (Μαρησα, Μαρσά, Μαρσά, Μαρσά; Μαρεσά: probably ruins southeast of Beit Jibrin), an ancient fortress of Palestine, in the south of Judea, of some importance in the history of the early kings of Judah and of the Maccabees. The Parthians had destroyed it before the time of Eusebius; and it is probable that its ruins contributed to the erection of the city of Eleutheropolis (now Beit Jibrin), which was afterward built on the site of the ancient Betogabra, two Roman miles northwest of Maresa.

MARGĪANA (ἡ Μαργιανή): the southern part of Khiva, southwest part of Bokhara, and northeastern part of Khorassan, a province of the ancient Persian empire, and afterward of the Greco-Syrian, Parthian, and Persian kingdoms in Central Asia, north of the mountains called Sariphi (now Ghor), a part of the chain of the Indian Caucasus, which divided it from Aria; and bounded on the east by Bactriana, on the northeast and north by the River Oxus, which divided it from Sogdiana and Scythia, and on the west by Hyrcania. It received its name from the River Margus (now Moorghab), which flows through it, from southeast to northwest, and is lost in the sands of the Desert of Khiva. On this river, near its termination, stood the capital of the district, Antiochia Margiana (now Merv). With the exception of the districts round this and the minor rivers, which produced excellent wine, the country was for the most part a sandy desert. Its chief inhabitants were the Derbices, Parni, Tapuri, and branches of the great tribes of the Massagetae, Dabæ, and Mardi. The country became known to the Greeks by the expeditions of Alexander and Antiochus I., the first of whom founded, and the second rebuilt, Antiochia; and the Romans of the age of Augustus obtained further information about it from the returned captives who had been taken by the Parthians and had resided at Antiochia.

MARIANÆ FORGE. Vid. FORSA.

MARIANDYNI (Μαριανδύνοι), an ancient people of Asia Minor, on the northern coast, east of the River Sangarius, in the northeast part of Bithynia. With respect to their ethnical affinities, it seems doubtful whether they were connected with the Thracian tribes (the Thyai and Bithyni) on the west, or the Paphlagonians on the east; but the latter appears the more probable.

MARIANUS MONS (now Sierra Moresca), a mountain in Hispania Bætica, properly only a western offshoot of the Orospeña. The eastern part of it was called Salus Castuloensis, and derived its name from the town of Castulo.

MARICA, a Latin nymph, the mother of Latinius by Faunus, was worshipped by the inhabitants of Minturnæ in a grove on the River Liris. Hence the country round Minturnæ is called by Horace (Carm., iii., 17, 7) Maremaritima.

MARINUS (Μαρίνος). 1. Of Tyre, a Greek geographer, who lived in the middle of the second century of the Christian era, and was the immediate predecessor of Ptolemy. Marinus was undoubtedly the founder of mathematical geography in antiquity; and Ptolemy based his whole work upon that of Marinus. Vid. PROCLUS. The chief merit of Marinus was, that he put an end to the uncertainty that had hitherto prevailed respecting the positions of places, by assigning to each its latitude and longitude.—2. Of Flavia Neapolis, in Palæstina, a philosopher and rhetorician, was the pupil and successor of Proclus, whose life he wrote, a work which is still extant, edited by Boissacode Lips., 1814.

MARIUS (now Marsack), called MARIS (Μᾶρις) by Herodotus, a river of Dacia, which, according to the ancient writers, falls into the Danube, but which in reality falls into the Thames and, along with this river, into the Danube.

MARITIMA, a sea-port town of the Avanti, was a Roman colony in Gallia Narbonensis.

MARIUS. 1. C., the celebrated Roman, who was seven times consul, was born in B.C. 167, near Arpinum, of an obscure and humble family.

his name was C. Marius, and his mother was; and his parents, as well as Marius, were clients of the noble plebeian he Herennii. They l one Roman any after another, ed that nothing could check their progress. The utmost alarm prevailed through- out Italy; all party quarrels were hushed. Every one felt that Marius was the only man capable of saving the state, and he was accord- ingly elected consul a second time dur- ing his absence in Africa. Marius entered Rome in triumph on the first of January, 104, the first day of his second consulship. Meanwhile, the threatened danger was for a while averted. In- stead of crossing the Alps, the Cimbri marched into Spain, which they ravaged for the next two or three years. But as the return of the bar- barians was constantly expected, Marius was elected consul a third time in 103, and a fourth time in 102. In the latter of these years the Cimbri returned into Gaul. The barbarians now divided their forces. The Cimbri marched round the northern foot of the Alps, in order to enter Italy by the northeast, crossing the Tyro- lese Alps by the defiles of Tridentum (now Trent). The Teutoni and Ambrones, on the other hand, marched against Marius, who had taken up a position in a fortified camp on the Rhone. The decisive battle was fought near Aquæ Sextiæ (now Aix). The carnage was dreadful. The whole nation was annihilated, for those who did not fall in the battle put an end to their own lives. The Cimbri, meantime, had forced their way into Italy. Marius was elected consul a fifth time (101), and joined the proconsul Catulus in the north of Italy. The two generals gained a great victory over the enemy on a plain called the Campi Raudii, near Vercellæ (now Vercelli). The Cimbri met with the same fate as the Teutoni; the whole nation was destroyed. Marius was received at Rome with unprecedented honors. He was hailed as the saviour of the state; his name was coupled with the gods in the libations and at banquets, and he received the title of third founder of Rome. Hitherto the career of Marius had been a glorious one; but the remainder of his life is full of horrors, and brings out the worst features of his character. In order to secure the consulship the sixth time, he entered into close con- nection with two of the worst demagogues that ever appeared at Rome, Saturninus and Glaucia. He gained his object, and was consul a sixth time in 100. In this year he drove into exile his old enemy Metellus; and shortly afterward, when Saturninus and Glaucia took up arms against the state, Marius crushed the insurrec- tion by command of the senate. Vid. SATURNI- nus. His conduct in this affair was greatly blamed by the people, who looked upon him as a traitor to his former friends. For the next few years Marius took little part in public affairs. He possessed none of the qualifications which were necessary to maintain influence in the state during a time of peace, being an unletter- ed soldier, rude in manners, and arrogant in con- duct. The Social war again called him into a- ctive service (90). He served as legate of the consul P. Rutilius Lupus; and after the latter had fallen in battle, he defeated the Marsi in two successive engagements. Marius was now sixty-seven, and his body had grown stout and unwieldy; but he was still as greedy of honor and distinction as he had ever been. He had set his heart upon obtaining the command of the war against Mithradates, which the senate and next wed upon the consul Sulla at the end of the Social war (88). In order to gain his object, Marius allied himself to the tribune P. Sulpicius Rufus, who brought forward a law for distributing the Italian allies, who had just obtained the Roman franchise, among all the Roman tribes. As those new citizens greatly exceeded the old citizens in number, they would, of course, be able to carry whatever they pleased in the comitia. The law was carried, notwithstanding the violent opposition of the consuls; and the tribes, in which the new citizens now had the majority, appointed Marius to the command of the war against Mithradates. Sulla fled to his army, which was stationed at Nola; and when Marius sent thither two military tribunes to take the command of the troops, Sulla not only refused to surrender the command, but marched upon Rome at the head of his army. Marius was now obliged to take to flight. After wandering along the coast of Latium, and encountering terrible sufferings and privations, which he bore with unflinching fortitude, he was at length taken prisoner in the marshes formed by the River Liris, near Minturnæ. The magistrates of this place resolved to put him to death, in accordance with a command which Sulla had sent to all the towns in Italy. A Gallic or Cimbrian soldier undertook to carry their sentence into effect, and with a drawn sword entered the apartment where Marius was confined. The part of the room in which Marius lay was in the shade; and to the frightened barbarian the eyes of Marius seemed to dart out fire, and from the darkness a terrible voice exclaimed, "Man, durst thou murder C. Marius?" The barbarian immediately threw down his sword, and rushed out of the house. Straightway there was a revulsion of feeling among the inhabitants of Minturnæ. They got ready a ship, and placed Marius on board. He reached Africa in safety, and landed at Carthage; but he had scarcely put his foot on shore before the Roman governor sent an officer to bid him leave the country. This last blow almost unmanned Marius; his only reply was, "Tell the prætor that you have seen C. Marius a fugitive sitting on the ruins of Carthage." Soon afterwards Marius was joined by his son, and they took refuge in the island of Cercina. During this time a revolution had taken place at Rome, in consequence of which Marius was enabled to return to Italy. The consul Cinna (87), who belonged to the Marian party, had been driven out of Rome by his colleague Octavius, and had subsequently been deprived by the senate of the consulate. Cinna collected an army, and resolved to recover his honors by force of arms. As soon as Marius heard of these changes, he left Africa, and joined Cinna in Italy. Marius and Cinna now laid siege to Rome. The failure of provisions compelled the senate to yield, and Marius and Cinna entered Rome as conquerors. The most frightful scenes followed. The guards of Marius stabbed every one whom he did not salute, and the streets ran with the blood of the noblest of the Roman aristocracy. Among the victims of his vengeance were the great orator M. Antonius and his former colleague Q. Catulus. Without going through the form of an election, Marius and Cinna named themselves consuls for the following year (86). But he did not long enjoy the honor: he was now in his seventy-first year; his body was worn out by the fatigues and sufferings he had recently undergone; and on the eighteenth day of his consulship he died of an attack of pleurisy, after seven days' illness.—2. C., the son of the preceding, but only by adoption. He followed in the footsteps of his father, and was equally distinguished by merciless severity against his enemies. He was consul in 82, when he was twenty-seven years of age. In this year he was defeated by Sulla near Sacriportus on the frontiers of Latium, whereupon he took refuge in the strongly-fortified town of Praeneste. Here he was besieged for some time; but after Sulla's great victory at the Colline gate of Rome over Pontius Telesinus, Marius put an end to his own life, after making an unsuccessful attempt to escape.—3. MARIUS MERCATOR, an ecclesiastical writer, distinguished as a zealous antagonist of the Pelagians and Nestorians. He appears to have commenced his literary career during the pontificate of Zosimus, A.D. 418, at Rome, and he afterwards repaired to Constantinople. Mercator seems doubtfully to have been a layman, but was ignorant of every circumstance connected with his origin and personal history. The works of Mercator refer exclusively to the Pelagian and Nestorian heresies, and consist, for the most part, of passages extracted and translated from the chief Greek authorities. ΜΑΡΜΑΡΙΚΑ (ἡ Μαρμαρική: Μαρμαρική: the eastern part of Tripoli and northwestern part of Egypt), a district of Northern Africa, between Cyrenæa and Egypt, but by some ancient geographers reckoned as a part of Cyrenæa, and by others as a part of Egypt; while others again, call only the western part of it, from the borders of Cyrenæa to the Catæbathmus Magnus, by the name of Marmarica, and the eastern part, from the Catæbathmus Magnus to the Sinus Pliathinætes, Libyæ Nomos. Libyæ extended as far as the Oasis of Ammon, and was, for the most part, a sandy desert, intersected with low ranges of hills. Its inhabitants were called by the general name of Marmaridæ. Their chief tribes were the Machidæ and Gûlgammæ on the coast, and the Nasamonæ and Augilæ in the interior.

Their chief town was TEATE, south of the Aterno they possessed, along with the Vestini, the sea-port along with the Marsi, Peligni, and abellian tribes, they fought against, together with them, they submitted to the Romans in B.C. 304, and concluded with the republic.

UM or MAROVIVM. 1. (Now S. Benches) chief town of the Marsi (who are called gens Marsia, Virg., Æn., vii., 750). situated on the eastern bank of the Liris, Fucinus, and on the road between Corfinium and Alba Fucentina—2. (Now Morro), an ancient town of the Aborigines in the country of the Sabines, not to be confounded with the Marsic Marruvium.

MARS, an ancient Roman god, who was at an early period identified by the Romans with the Greek Ares, or the god delighting in bloody war. Vid. ARES. The name of the god in the Sabine and Oscan was Mamers; and Mars itself is a contraction of Mamers or Mavors. Next to Jupiter, Mars enjoyed the highest honors at Rome. He is frequently designated as Father Mars, whence the forms Marsipiter and Maspiter, analogous to Jupiter. Jupiter, Mars, and Quirinus were the three tutelary divinities of Rome, to each of whom King Numa appointed a flamen. He was worshipped at Rome as the god of war, and war itself was frequently designated by the name of Mars. His priests, the Salii, danced in full armor, and the place dedicated to warlike exercises was called after his name (Campus Martius). But, being the father of the Romans, Mars was also the protector of the most honorable pursuit, i. e., agriculture; and under the name of Silvanus, he was worshipped as the guardian of cattle. Mars was also identified with Quirinus, who was the deity watching over the Roman citizens in their civil capacity as Quirites. Thus Mars appears under three aspects. As the warlike god, he was called Gradivus; as the rustic god, he was called Silvanus; while, in his relation to the state, he bore the name of Quirinus. His wife was called Neria or Nerene, the feminine of Nereus which in the Sabine language signified "strong." The wolf and the woodpecker (picus) were sacred to Mars. Numerous temples were dedicated to him at Rome, the most important of which was that outside the Porta Capena, on the Appian road, and that of Mars Ultor, which was built by Augustus in the forum.

[MARBACI, a people in Gallia Belgica, on one of the islands formed by the Rhine, which first became known to the Romans through the war with Civilis.]

MARSI. 1. A brave and warlike people of the Sabellian race, dwelt in the centre of Italy, in the high land surrounded by the mountains of the Apennines, in which the Lake Fucinus is situated. Along with their neighbors the Peligni, Marrucini, &c., they concluded a peace with Rome, B.C. 304. Their bravery was proverbial; and they were the prime movers of the celebrated war waged against Rome by the Socii or Italian allies in order to obtain the Roman franchise, and which is known by the name of the Marsic or Social war. Their chief town was MAROVIVM. The Marsi appear to have been acquainted with the medicinal properties of several of the plants growing upon their mountains, and to have employed them as remedies against the bites of serpents, and in other cases. Hence they were regarded as magicians, and were said to be descended from a son of Circe. Others, again, derived their origin from the Phrygian Marsyas simply on account of the resemblance of the name.—2. A people in Germany, appear to have dwelt originally on both banks of the Elbe, and to have even only a tribe of the Cherusi, although Tacitus makes them one of the most ancient tribes in Germany. They joined the Cherusi in the war against the Romans, which terminated in the defeat of Varus, but they were subsequently driven into the interior of the country by Germanicus.

MARSIANI, a people in the southeast of Germany, of Suevic extraction.

MARSUS, DOMITIUS, a Roman poet of the Augustan age. He wrote poems of various kinds, but his epigrams were the most celebrated of his productions. Hence he is frequently mentioned by Martial, who speaks of him in terms of the highest admiration. He wrote a beautiful epitaph on Tibullus, which has come down to us.

MARSYAS (Μαρσύας). 1. A mythological personage, connected with the earliest period of Greek music. He is variously called the son of Hyagnis, or of Cægnus, or of Olympus. Some make him a satyr, others a peasant. All agree in placing him in Phrygia. The following is the outline of his story: Minerva (Athena) having, while playing the flute, seen the reflection of herself in water, and observed the distortion of her features, threw away the instrument in disgust. It was picked up by Marsyas, who no sooner began to blow through it, than the flute, having once been inspired by the breath of a goddess, emitted of its own accord the most beautiful strains. Elated by his success, Marsyas was rash enough to challenge Apollo to a musical contest, the conditions of which were that the victor should do what he pleased with the vanquished. The Muses, or, according to others, the Nysseans, were the umpires. Apollo played upon the cithara, and Marsyas upon the flute; and it was not till the former added his voice to the music of his lyre that the contest was decided in his favor. As a just punishment for the presumption of Marsyas, Apollo bound him to a tree, and flayed him alive. His blood was the source of the River Marsyas, and Apollo hung up his skin in the cave out of which that river flows. His flutes (for, according to some, the instrument on which he played was the double flute) were carried by the River Marsyas into the Mæander, and again emerging in the Asopus, were thrown on land by it in the Sicyonian territory, and were dedicated to Apollo in his temple at Sicyon. The fable evidently refers to the struggle between the citharædic and aulædic styles of music, of which the former was connected with the worship of Apollo among the Dorians, and the latter with the orgiastic rites of Cybele in Phrygia. In the fœra of ancient cities there was frequently placed a statue of Marsyas, which was probably intended to hold forth an example of the severe punishment of arrogant presumption. The statue of Marsyas in the forum of Rome is well known by the allusions of Horace (Sat., i., 6, 120), Juvenal (ix., 1, 2), and Martial (ii., 64, 7).—2. A Greek historian, was the son of Periander, a native of Pella in Macedonia, a contemporary of Alexander, with whom he is said to have been educated. His principal work was a history of Macedonia, in ten books, from the earliest times to the wars of Alexander. He also wrote other works, the titles of which are given by Suidas. 3. C. Philippi, commonly called the younger to distinguish him from the preceding, was also a Greek historian. The period at which he lived is uncertain: the earliest writers by whom he is cited are Pliny and Athenæus.

MARSYAS (Μαρσύας). 1. A small and rapid river of Phrygia, a tributary of the Mæander took its rise, according to Xenophon, in the face of the Persian kings at Celæne, beneath the Acropolis, and fell into the Mæander outside the city. Pliny, however, states that its source was in the valley called Aulocræne, about 60 miles from Apamea Cibotus (which city was or near the site of Celæne), and that after its subterranean course it first came out to light at Apamea. Colonel Leake reconciles the statements by the natural explanation that the place where the river first broke forth from its subterranean course was regarded as its origin. Tradition ascribed its name to the fable of Marsyas.—2. (Now Çinar-Çhai), a considerable river of Caria, having its source in a district called Idrias, flowing northwest a north through the middle of Caria, past Sclatonia and Alabanda, and falling into the southern side of the Mæander nearly opposite Trailes.—3. In Syria, a small tributary of the Orontes, into which it falls on the eastern side near Apamea.—4. A name given to the extensive plain in Syria through which the course of the Orontes flows, lying between the ranges of Casius and Lebanon, and reaching from Apamea on the north to Laodicea on the south.

MARTIALIS. 1. M. VALERIUS, the epigrammatic poet, was born at Bilbilis in Spain in the third year of Claudius, A.D. 43. He came to Rome in the thirteenth year of Nero, 66; after residing in the metropolis thirty-five years he returned to the place of his birth in the fifth year of Trajan, 100. He lived there for a space of three years at least, on the property of his wife, a lady named Marcælla, whom he seems to have married after his return to Bilbilis. His death can not have taken place before 104. His fame was extended, and his books were eagerly sought for, not only in the city, but also in Germany, and Britain; he secured the patronage of the emperors Titus and Domitian, obtained by his influence the freedom of the city for several of his friends, and received for himself, although apparently without family, the privileges accorded to those who were the fathers of three children (jus trium liberorum), together with the rank of tribune and the rights of the equestrian order. His circumstances appear to have been easy during his residence in Rome, for he had a mansion in the city which situation he describes, and a suburban villa near Nomentum, to which he frequently alludes with pride. The extant works of Martial consist of a collection of short poems, all included under the general appellation Epigrammata, upwards of fifteen hundred in number, divided into sixteen books. Those which form the two last books, usually distinguished respectively as Lucania and Apophoreta, amounting to three hundred and fifty, consist of distichs, descriptive of a vast variety of small objects, chiefly articles of food or clothing, such as were usually sent us among friends during the Saturnalia or other festive occasions. In addition now, nearly all the printed copies contain thirty-three epigrams, forming a book in the rest, which has been commonly called Liber de Spectaculis, because the contents to the shows exhibited by Titus at Nîmes, but there is no ancient authority for it. The different books were collected by the author, sometimes simultaneously several at one time. The Spectaculis and the first nine books of the series involve a great number of allusions, extending from the games (80) down to the return of Domitian's Sarmatian expedition in January, 94. Books were composed at Rome abroad, which was written during a tour of Egypt. The tenth book was published; the first edition was given hastily to the second, that which we now read celebrates the arrival of Trajan at Rome, his accession to the throne (99). The eleventh seems to have been published at Nîmes in 100, and at the close of the year added to Bibbiana. After keeping silence for years (xii., proem.), the twelfth book reached from Bibbiana to Rome (xii., 3), must therefore be assigned to 104. In xiv., Xenia and Apophoreta, the latter taken under Domitian, although its publication may have been spread over a number of many years. It is well known as Epigram, which originally denoted a description, was, in process of time, any brief metrical effusion, whatever subject might be, or whatever the occasion upon which it was presented. Martial placed the epigram upon the sarcophagus, which it now occupies, and from his time has been in a great measure re-denominated a short poem, in which allusions and expressions converge to one point, which forms the termination of the poet's epigrams are distinguished by their variety of imagination, prodigies flow from delicate felicity of language; and hence do we derive more copious illustrations of the national customs and social life of the Romans during the first century after Christ. But, however much we may admire the genius of the author, we feel no real sympathy with the character of the man. The servility with which he lauds Domitian, and the flattery he pays him, he was a courtier of the lowest type; his works are defiled by the most vulgar flattery, too clearly denoting habitual dishonesty, combined with habitual oppression. The best edition is by G. H. Schenck, 1842.—2. GARGILIUS, a Roman, and a contemporary of Alexander, who is cited by Vopiscus. There is a short fragment on veterinary surgery bearing the name of Gargilius Martialis; Mai discovered on a palimpsest in a library at Naples part of a work De Medicina Veterinaria ascribed to Gargilius Martialis; but Gargilius Martialis the horticulturalist, and Gargilius Martialis the veterinarian, being two different persons, of them, or either, any particulars can not be determined.

MAZINISBA (Μαζανίσβα), king of the Numidians, was the son of Gala, king of the Massylians, the easternmost of the two great tribes into which the Numidians were at that time divided; but he was brought up at Carthage, where he appears to have received an education superior to that usual among his countrymen. In B.C. 213 the Carthaginians persuaded Gala to declare war against Syphax, king of the neighboring tribe of the Massessylians, who had lately entered into an alliance with Rome. Mazinisba was appointed by his father to command the invading force, with which he attacked and totally defeated Syphax. In the next year (212) Mazinisba crossed over into Spain and supported the Carthaginian generals there with a large body of Numidian horse. He fought on the side of the Carthaginians for some years; but after their great defeat by Scipio in 206, he secretly promised the latter to support the Romans as soon as they should send an army into Africa. In his desertion of the Carthaginians he is said to have been also actuated by resentment against Hasdrubal, who had previously betrothed to him his beautiful daughter Soponisba, but violated his engagement in order to bestow her hand upon Syphax. During the absence of Mazinisba in Spain his father Gala had died, and the throne had been seized by a usurper; but Mazinisba, on his re-

was, soon expelled the usurper and obtained possession of the kingdom. He was now attacked by Syphax and the Carthaginians, who were anxious to crush him before he could receive assistance from Rome. He was repeatedly defeated by Syphax and his generals, and with difficulty escaped falling into the hands of his enemies. But the arrival of Scipio in Africa (204) soon changed the posture of affairs. He instantly joined the Roman general, and rendered the most important services to him during the remainder of the war. He took a prominent part in the defeat of the combined forces of Syphax and Hasdrubal, and, in conjunction with Lælius, he reduced Cirta, the capital of Syphax. Among the captives that fell into their hands on this occasion was Sophonisba, the wife of Syphax, and the same who had been formerly promised in marriage to Masinissa himself. The story of his hasty marriage with her, and its tragical termination, is related elsewhere. Vid. SOPHONISBA. In the decisive battle of Zama (202), Masinissa commanded the cavalry of the right wing, and contributed in no small degree to the successful result of the day. On the conclusion of the final peace between Rome and Carthage, he was rewarded with the greater part of the territories which had belonged to Syphax, in addition to his hereditary dominions. For the next fifty years Masinissa reigned in peace, though constantly making aggressions upon the Carthaginian territory. At length, in 150, he declared open war against Carthage, and these hostilities led to the outbreak of the third Punic war. Masinissa died in the second year of the war, 148. On his death-bed he had sent for Scipio Africanus the younger, at that time serving in Africa as a military tribune, but he expired before his arrival, leaving it to the young officer to settle the affairs of his kingdom. He died at the advanced age of ninety, having retained in an extraordinary degree his bodily strength and activity to the last, so that in the war against the Carthaginians, only two years before, he not only commanded his army in person, but was able to go through all his military exercises with the agility and vigor of a young man. His character has been extolled by the Roman writers far beyond his true merits. He possessed, indeed, unconquerable energy and fortitude; but he was faithless to the Carthaginians as soon as fortune began to turn against them; and though he afterward continued steady to the cause of the Romans, it was because he found it uniformly his interest to do so. He was the father of a very numerous family; but it appears that three only of his legitimate sons survived him, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Guluasa. Between these three the kingdom was portioned out by Scipio, according to the dying directions of the old king. None of the ancient geographers give them a great extent toward the southeast, and Herodotus appears to include under the name all the nomadic tribes of Asia east of the Caspian. They appear to have been of the Turkoman race; the manners and customs resembled those of the Scythians in general; but they had some peculiarities, such as the killing and eating of the aged people. MASSILIA (Massalia: Μασσαλιώτης, Massiliensis: now Marseilles), a Greek city in Gallia Iarboensis, on the coast of the Mediterranean, in the country of the Salyes. It was situated on a promontory, which was connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, and was washed on three sides by the sea. Its excellent harbor, called Lacydon, was formed by a small inlet of the sea, about half a mile long and quarter of a mile broad. This harbor had only narrow opening, and before it lay an island where ships had good anchorage. Massilia was ruled by the Phœceans of Asia Minor about B.C. 600, and soon became a very flourishing city. It extended its dominion over the barbarous tribes in its neighborhood, and planted several colonies on the coast of Gaul and Spain, such as Antipolis, Nicæa, and Emporium. Its naval power and commercial greatness soon excited the jealousy of the Carthaginians, who made war upon the city, but the Massilians not only maintained their independence, but defeated the Carthaginians in a sea-fight. At an early period they cultivated the friendship of the Romans, to whom they always continued faithful allies. Accordingly, when the southeast corner of Gaul was made a Roman province, the Romans allowed Massilia to retain its independence and its own constitution. This constitution was aristocratic. The city was governed by a senate of six hundred persons called Timuli. From these were selected fifteen presidents, who formed a sort of committee for carrying on the ordinary business of the government, and three of these were intrusted with the executive power. The inhabitants retained the religious rites of their mother country, and they cultivated with especial reverence the worship of the Ephesian Artemis or Diana. Massilia was for many centuries one of the most important commercial cities in the ancient world. In the civil war between Cæsar and Pompey (B.C. 49) it espoused the cause of the latter, but after a protracted siege, in which it lost its fleet, it was obliged to submit to Cæsar. From the effects of this blow it never fully recovered. Its inhabitants had long paid attention to literature and philosophy; and under the early emperors it became one of the chief seats of learning, to which the sons of many illustrious Romans resorted to complete their studies. The modern Marseilles occupies the site of the ancient town, but contains no remains of ancient buildings.

MASSIVA. 1. A Numidian, grandson of Gala, king of the Massylians, and nephew of Masinissa, whom he accompanied into Spain.—3. Son of Calpurnia, and grandson of Masinissa, was assassinated at Rome by order of Jugurtha because he had put in his claim to the kingdom of Numidia.

MASVORADA, a son of Masinissa, king of Numidia, by a concubine. Vid. DABAR.

MASVORUS SABINUS. Vid. SABINUS.

MASVILI or IL. Vid. MAURUNTANIA, NUMIDIA.

MASTANBAL or MANASTANBAL, the youngest of the three legitimate sons of Masinissa, between whom the kingdom of Numidia was divided by Scipio after the death of the aged king (B.C. 145). He died before his brother Micipsa, and left two sons Jugurtha and Gauda.

MASTURA (ὁ Μάστουρας: now ruins of Mastaura-Kaleri), a city of Lydia, on the borders of Caria, near Nysa.

[MASTOR (Μάστρος)] 1 Father of Lycophron of Cythera.—2 Father of the diviner Halitherses, mentioned in the Odyssey.

MASTRANĒLA, a town on the southern coast of Gallia Narbonensis, east of the Rhone, and a lake of the same name, called by Mele Ascorum stagnum.

MASTRŪFA. 1. The southwest point of the Thracian Chersonesus, opposite Sigeum.—2. A mountain of Lydia, on the southern slope of which Smyrna lay.

MATERNUS, CURIATIUS, a Roman rhetorician and tragic poet, one of the speakers in the Dialogus de Oratoribus ascribed to Tacitus.

MATERNUS FIRMICUS. Vid. FIRMICUS.

MATRO. 1. One of the leaders of the Carthaginian mercenaries in their war against Carthage, after the conclusion of the first Punic war, B.C. 241. He was eventually taken prisoner and put to death.—2. A pompous, blustering advocate, ridiculed by Juvenal and Martial.

MATRO, POWŌNIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 233, carried on war against the Sardinians, whom he defeated. In 217 he was magister equitum, in 216 prætor, and in 215 prætor in Cisalpine Gaul.—2. M., brother of the preceding, consul 231, also carried on war against the Sardinians. He was likewise prætor in 217. He died in 204.—3. M., probably son of No. 2, ædile 206, and prætor 204, with Sicily as his province.

MATIĀNA (Ματιάνη, Ματιάνα, νηή, νηολ, Herod.), the southwesternmost district of Media Atropatene, along the mountains separating Media from Assyria, which were also called Matiani. The great salt lake of Spaura (Μαριάνη λίμνη: now Lake of Urmī) was in this district. Herodotus also mentions a people on the Halys in Asia Minor by the name of Matieni.

MATINUS, a mountain in Apulia running out into the sea, was one of the offshoots of Mount Garganus, and is frequently mentioned by Horace in consequence of his being a native of Apulia.

MATISCO (now Maçon), a town of the Ædus in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the Arar, and on the road from Lugdunum to Augustodunum.

MATIUS CALVĒNA, C., a Roman eque, and a friend of Cæsar and Cicero. After Cæsar's death he espoused the side of Octavianus, with whom he became very intimate. [This is probably the same C. Matius who translated the Iliad into Latin verse, and was the author of several other works. Matius also wrote "Mimiambi," which were as celebrated as his translation of the Iliad, and paid great attention to economics and agriculture. He also wrote a work on the whole art and science of cookery, in three books, entitled respectively Cocus, Celtarius, Salmagarrus. The fragments are given by Bothe, Poet. Scen. Lat. Vet., vi., p. 265, 268; and by Zell, Stuttgart, 1829.]

MATRON (Μάρπων), of Pitana, a celebrated writer of parodies upon Homer, probably lived a little before the time of Philip of Macedon.

MATRŌNA (now Marna), a river in Gaul, which formed the boundary between Gallia Lugdunensis and Belgica, and which falls into the Sequana a little south of Paris.

MATTIACI, a people in Germany, who dwelt on the eastern bank of the Rhine, between the Main and the Lahn, and were a branch of the Chatti. They were subdued by the Romans, who, in the reign of Claudius, had fortresses and silver mines in their country. After the death of Nero they revolted against the Romans, and took part with the Chatti and other German tribes in the siege of Moguntiacum. From this time they disappear from history; and their country was subsequently inhabited by the Alemanni. Their chief towns were Aquæ Mattiacæ (now Wiesbaden), and Mattiacum (now Marburg), which must not be confounded with Mattium, the capital of the Chatti.

MATTIUM (now Maden), the chief town of the Chatti, situated on the Adrana (now Eder), was destroyed by Germanicus.

MATŪTA, commonly called MATER MATŪTA, is usually considered as the goddess of the dawn of morning, and her name is considered to be connected with maturus or matutinus. It seems, however, to be well attested that Matuta was only a surname of Juno; and it is probable that the name is connected with mater, so that Mater Matuta is an analogous expression with Hostus Hostilius, Faunus Fatuus, Aius Locutius, and others. Her festival, the Matralia, was celebrated on the 11th of June (vid. Dict. of Ant., art. MATRALIA). The Romans identified Matuta with the Greek Leucothea. A temple was dedicated to Matuta at Rome by King Servius, and was restored by the dictator Camillus, after the taking of Veii. There was also a temple of Matuta at Satricum.

MAURĒTĀNIA or MAURITĀNIA (ἡ Μαυροβία: Μαυροβία, Μαύροι, Mauri), the westernmost of the principal divisions of Northern Africa, lay between the Atlantic on the west, the Mediterranean on the north, Numidia on the east, and Gætulia on the south; but the districts embraced under the names of Mauretania and Numidia respectively were of very different extent at different periods. The earliest known inhabitants of all Northern Africa west of the Syrtis were the Gætulians, who were displaced and driven inland by tribes of Asiatic origin, who are found in the earliest historical accounts, settled along the northern coast under various names; their chief tribes being the Mauri or Maurusii, west of the River Malva or Malucha (now Muluis or Mohalou); thence the Massæsylii (or nearly to the River Ampsaga (now Wady-el-Kebir), and the Massylii between the Ampsaga and the Tusoa (now Wady-Zain), the western boundary of the Carthaginian territory. Of these people, the Mauri, who possessed a greater breadth of fertile country between the Atlas and the coasts, seem to have applied themselves more to the settled pursuits of agriculture than their kindred neighbors on the east, whose unsettled warlike habits were moreover confirmed by their greater exposure to the intrusions of the Phœnician settlers. Hence arose a difference, which the Greeks marked by applying the general name of Νομάδες to the tribes between the Malva and the Tusoa; whence came the Roman names of Numidia for the district, and Numidæ for its people. VID. NUMIDIA. Thus Mauretania was at first only the country west of the Malva, and corresponded to the later district of Maurtana Tingitana, and to the modern empire of Morocco, except that the latter extends further south; the ancient boundary on the south was the Atlas. The Romans first became acquainted with the country during the war with Jugurtha, B.C. 106; of their relations with it till it became a Roman province, about 33, an account is given under Bocchus. During this period the kingdom of Mauretania had been increased by the addition of the western part of Numidia, as far as Saldæ, which Julius Cæsar bestowed on Bogud, as a reward for his services in the African war. A new arrangement was made about 25, when Augustus gave Mauretania to Juba II., in exchange for his paternal kingdom of Numidia. Upon the murder of Juba's son, Ptolemæus, by Caligula (A.D. 40), Mauretania became finally a Roman province, and was formally constituted as such by Claudius, who added to it nearly half of what was still left of Numidia, namely, as far as the Ampsaga, and divided it into two parts, of which the western was called Tingitana, from its capital Tinge (now Tangier), and the eastern Cæsariensis, from its capital Julia Cæsarea (now Zerda), the boundary between them being the River Malva, the old limit of the kingdom of Bocchus I. The latter corresponded to the western and central part of the modern regency (the now French colony) of Algiers. These "Mauretanis dux" were governed by an equestrian procurator. In the later division of the empire under Diocletian and Constantine, the eastern part of M. Cæsariensis, from Saldæ to the Ampsaga, was erected into a new province, and called M. Sitifensis, from the inland town of Sitif (now Setif); at the same time, the western province, M. Tingitana, seems to have been placed under the same government as Spain, that we still find mention of the "Mauretanis dux," meaning now, however, Cæsariensis or Sitifensis. From A.D. 429 to 534 Mauretania was in the hands of the Vandals, and in the following years it was conquered by the Arabs. Its ancient inhabitants still exist, powerful tribes in Morocco and Algiers, and the names of Berberi, Schillæ, Kahyles, and Turiks. Its chief physical features are described under AFRICA and ATLAS. Under the later Roman emperors it was remarkable for the great number of its episcopal sees.

MAURI. VID. MAURETANIA.

MAURICIŪS, JUNIUS, a Roman jurist, lived under Antoninus Pius (A.D. 139-161). His works are cited a few times in the Digest.

MAURICIVS, JUNIUS, an intimate friend of P. was banished by Domitian, but recalled from exile by Nerva.

MAUSOLVS (Μαύσωλος or Μαύσωλλος), king of Caria, was the eldest son of Hecatomnus, whom he succeeded in the sovereignty B.C. 377. In 362 he took part in the general revolt of the satraps against Artaxerxes Mnemon, and availed himself of that opportunity to extend his dominions. In 358 he joined with the Rhodians and others in the war waged by them against the Athenians, known by the name of al war. He died in 363, leaving a son and was succeeded by his wife and remissa. The extravagant grief of the father at his death, and the honors she paid to her son—especially by the erection of the monument, which was called from him solennis—are related elsewhere. Vid. 14.

16. MAXIMIANUS, Roman emperor A.D. 306–312, full name was M. AURELIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS. He was the son of Maximianus trapias, and received in marriage the daughter of Galerius; but he was passed over in the division of the empire which followed the death of his father and Diocletian in A.D. 305. Maximianus, however, did not tamely accept this arrangement, and, being supported by praetorian troops, who had been deprived of their exclusive privileges, he claimed emperor at Rome in 306. He expelled his father, Maximianus, from his residence in Lucania, who again assumed the throne. The military abilities of Maximianus rendered great service to his son, who was of a cold and dissolute habit. Maximianus, like the Caesar Severus, who had marched to Rome, to retreat in haste to Ravenna, afterward put the latter to death when he treacherously got him into his power. The Emperor Galerius now marched in against Rome, but Maximianus compelled him to retreat. Maxentius, relieved of imminent dangers, proceeded to dispossess himself from the control which his father had to exercise, and succeeded in driving him from his court. Soon afterward he crossed over to Africa, which he ravaged by fire and sword, because it had subverted the independent authority of a certain province. Upon his return to Rome Maxentius aspired to dominion over all the provinces; and soon afterward declared against Constantine, alleging, as a pretext, that the latter had put to death his father Maximianus. He began to make preparations to pass into Gaul; but Constantine anticipated his movements, and invaded Italy. Maxentius was brought to a close by the defeat of Maxentius at Saxa Rubra, near Rome, in 312. Maxentius tried to escape by the Milvian bridge into Rome, but perished there. Maxentius is represented by all as a monster of rapacity, cruelty, and only favored class was the military, which he depended for safety; and in order to secure their devotion and to gratify his passions, all his other subjects were made the objects of the most revolting licentiousness, and by the most grinding exactions.

17. MAXIMUS, a town in Hispania Betica, where he made so light as to swim upon water. CALENTUM.

18. CÆSARINUS. Vid. BRITANNIA, p.

19. MAVORIA, previously called POREULUM, a town in Thrace, on the Via Egnatia, east of Philippopolis (the same place as the town synopolis (Μακεδονόπολις) by the Byzantines.

20. MAVORIA (Μακεδονόπολις: in the Old Testament, Hadad Rimmon), a city of Palestine in the valley of Megiddo, a little to the south west of Megiddo.

21. MAXIMIANUS. I. Roman emperor A.D. 283–305, whose full name was M. AURELIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS. He was born of humble parents in Pannonia, and had acquired such fame by his services in the army, that Diocletian selected this rough soldier for his colleague, as one whose abilities were likely to prove valuable in the disturbed state of public affairs, and accordingly created him first Cæsar (293), and then Augustus (296), conferring at the same time the honorary appellation of Hercules, while he himself assumed that of Junius. The subsequent history of Maximian has been fully detailed in former articles. Vid. DIOCLETIANUS, CONSTANTINUS I., MAXENTIUS. It is sufficient to relate here, that after having been reluctantly compelled to abdicate, at Milan (305), he was again invested with the imperial title by his son Maxentius, in the following year (306), to whom he rendered the most important services in the war with Severus and Galerius. Having been expelled from Rome shortly afterward by his son, he took refuge in Gaul with Constantine, to whom he had previously given his daughter Fausta in marriage. Here he again attempted to resume the imperial crown, but was easily deposed by Constantine (308). Two years afterward, he endeavored to induce his daughter Fausta to destroy her husband, and was, in consequence, compelled by Constantine to put an end to his own life.—II., Roman emperor A.D. 305–311, usually called GALERIUS. His full name was GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMIANUS. He was born near Sardica in Dacia, and was the son of a shepherd. He rose from the ranks to the highest commands in the army, and was appointed Cæsar by Diocletian, along with Constantius Chlorus, in 293. At the same time he was adopted by Diocletian, whose daughter Valeria he received in marriage, and was intrusted with the command of Illyria and Thrace. In 297 he undertook an expedition against the Persian monarch Narses, in which he was unsuccessful, but in the following year (298) he defeated Narses with great slaughter, and compelled him to conclude a peace. Upon the abdication of Diocletian and Maximian (305), Galerius became Augustus or emperor. In 307 he made an unsuccessful attempt to recover Italy, which had owned the authority of the usurper Maxentius. Vid. MAXENTIUS. He died in 311, of the disgusting disease known in modern times by the name of morbus pediculosus. He was a cruel persecutor of the Christians; and it was at his instigation that Diocletian issued the fatal ordinance (303), which for so many years deluged the world with innocent blood.

22. MAXIMINUS. I., Roman emperor A.D. 235–238, whose full name was C. JULIUS VERUS MAXIMINUS. He was born in a village on the confines of Thrace, of barbarian parentage, his father being a Goth, and his mother a German from the tribe of the Alani. Brought up as a shepherd, he attracted the attention of Septimius Severus by his gigantic stature and marvellous feats of strength, and was permitted to enter the army. He eventually rose to the highest rank in the service; and on the murder of Alexander

Severus by the numerous troops in Gaul (235), he was proclaimed emperor. He immediately bestowed the title of Cæsar on his son Maximus. During the three years of his reign he carried on war against the Germans with success; but his government was characterized by a degree of oppression and sanguinary excess hitherto unexampled. The Roman world became at length tired of this monster. The senate and the provinces gladly acknowledged the two Gordiani, who had been proclaimed emperors in Africa; and after their death the senate itself proclaimed Maximus and Balbinus emperors (238). As soon as Maximinus heard of the elevation of the Gordians, he hastened from his winter-quarters at Sirmium. Having crossed the Alps, he laid siege to Aquileia, and was there slain by his own soldiers, along with his son Maximus, in April. The most extraordinary tales are related of the physical powers of Maximinus, which seem to have been almost incredible. His height exceeded eight feet. The circumference of his thumb was equal to that of a woman's wrist, so that the bracelet of his wife served him for a ring. It is said that he was able single-handed to drag a loaded wagon, could with his fist knock out the grinders, and with a kick break the leg of a horse; while his appetite was such, that in one day he could eat forty pounds of meat, and drink an amphora of wine.—II. Roman emperor 305-314, originally called Daza, and subsequently GALERIUS VALERIUS MAXIMINUS. He was the nephew of Galerius by a sister, and in early life followed the occupation of a shepherd in his native Illyria. Having entered the army, he rose to the highest rank in the service; and upon the abdication of Diocletian in 305, he was adopted by Galerius, and received the title of Cæsar. In 308 Galerius gave him the title of Augustus; and on the death of the latter in 311, Maximinus and Licinius divided the East between them. In 313 Maximinus attacked the dominions of Licinius, who had gone to Milan for the purpose of receiving in marriage the sister of Constantine. He was, however, defeated by Licinius near Heracles, and fled to Tarsus, where he soon after died. Maximinus possessed no military talents. He owed his elevation to his family connection. He surpassed all his contemporaries in the profligacy of his private life, in the general cruelty of his administration, and in the furious hatred with which he persecuted the Christians.

MAXIMUS. I. Of Ephesus or Smyrna, one of the teachers of the Emperor Julian, to whom he was introduced by Ædesius. Maximus was a philosopher of the New Platonic school, and, like many others of that school, both believed in and practiced magic. It is said that Julian, through his persuasion, was induced to abjure Christianity. On the accession of Julian, Maximus was held in high honor at the court, and accompanied the emperor on his fatal expedition against the Persians, which he had prophesied would be successful. In 364 he was accused of having caused by sorcery the illness of the Emperors Valens and Valentinian, and was thrown into prison, where he was exposed to cruel tortures. He owed his liberation to the philosopher Themistius. In 371 Maximus was accused of taking part in a conspiracy against Valens, and was put to death.—2. Of Epirus, or perhaps of Byzantium, was also an instructor of the Emperor Julian in philosophy and heathen theology. He wrote in Greek, de insolubilibus Oppositionibus, published by H. Stephanus, Paris, 1554, appended to the edition of Dionysius of Halicarnassus, as well as other works.

MAXIMUS, FABIVS. I. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS RULLIANVS, was the son of M. Fabius Attilianus, consul B.C. 360. Fabius was master of the horse to the dictator L. Papirius Cursor in 336, whose anger he incurred by giving battle to the Samnites during the dictator's absence, and contrary to his orders. Victory availed Fabius nothing in exculpation. A hasty flight to Rome, where the senate, the people, and his aged father interceded for him with Papirius, barely rescued his life, but could not avert his degradation from office. In 322 Fabius obtained his first consulship. It was the second year of the second Samnite war, and Fabius was the most eminent of the Roman generals in that long and arduous struggle for the empire of Italy. Yet nearly all authentic traces are lost of the acts and circumstances of his numerous campaigns. His defeats have been suppressed or extenuated, and the achievements of others ascribed to him alone. In 315 he was dictator, and was completely defeated by the Samnites at Lacus. In 310 he was consul for the second time, and carried on the war against the Etruscans. In 308 he was consul a third time, and is said to have defeated the Samnites and Umbrians. He was censor in 304, when he seems to have confined the libertini to the four city tribes, and to have increased the political importance of the equites. In 297 he was consul for the fifth time, and in 296 for the sixth time. In the latter year he commanded at the great battle of Sentinum, when the combined armies of the Samnites, Gauls, Etruscans, and Umbrians were defeated by the Romans.—2. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS GURGES, or the Glutton, from the dissoluteness of his youth, son of the last. His mature manhood atoned for his early irregularities. He was consul 292, and was completely defeated by the Pentrian Samnites. He escaped degradation from the consulate only through his father's offer to serve as his lieutenant for the remainder of the war. In a second battle the consul retrieved his reputation, and was rewarded with a triumph, of which the most remarkable feature was old Fabius riding beside his son's chariot. He was consul the second time 276. Shortly afterward he went as legatus from the senate to Ptolemy Philadelphus king of Egypt. He was consul a third time 265.—3. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS, with the agnomen VERRUCOSVS, from a wart on his upper lip, ORCULA, or the Lamb, from the mildness or spathy of his temper, and CUNCTATOR, from his caution in war, was grandson of Fabius Gurges. He was consul for the first time 233, when he was his province; censor 230; consul a second time 228; opposed the agrarian law of C. Flaminius 227; was dictator for holding the comitia in 221; and in 218 was legatus from the senate to Carthage, to demand reparation for the attack on Saguntum. In 217 way after the defeat at Thrasymenus, Fabius was appointed dictator. From this period, so long as the war with Hannibal was merely defensive, Fabius became the leading man at Rome. On taking the field he laid down a simple and immutable plan of action. He avoided all direct encounter with the enemy; moved his camp from highland to highland, where the Numidian horse and Spanish infantry could not follow him; watched Hannibal's movements with unrelaxing vigilance, and cut off his stragglers and foragers. His inclosure of Hannibal in one of the upland valleys between Cales and the Volturnus, and the Carthaginian's adroit escape by driving oxen with blazing fagots fixed to their horns up the hill-sides, are well-known facts. But at Rome and in his own camp the caution of Fabius was misinterpreted; and the people, in consequence, divided the command between him and M. Minucius Rufus, his master of the horse. Minucius was speedily trapped, and would have been destroyed by Hannibal had not Fabius generously hastened to his rescue. Fabius was consul for the third time in 215, and for the fourth time in 214. In 213 he served as legatus to his own son, Q. Fabius, consul in that year, and an anecdote is preserved which exemplifies the strictness of the Roman discipline. On entering the camp at Suessula, Fabius advanced on horseback to greet his son. He was passing the dictators when the consul sternly bade him dismount. "My son," exclaimed the elder Fabius, alighting, "I wished to see whether you would remember that you were consul." Fabius was consul for the fifth time in 209, in which year he retook Tarentum. In the closing years of the second Punic war Fabius appears to less advantage. The war had become aggressive under a new race of generals. Fabius disapproved of the new tactics; he dreaded the political supremacy of Scipio, and was his uncompromising opponent in his scheme of invading Africa. He died in 203.—4. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS, elder son of the preceding, was prætor 214, and consul 213. He was legatus to the consul M. Livius Salinator 207. He died soon after this period, and his funeral oration was pronounced by his father.—5. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS EMILIANVS, was by birth the eldest son of L. Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perseus, and was adopted by No. 3. Fabius served under his father (Æmilius) in the Macedonian war, 168, and was dispatched by him to Rome with the news of his victory at Pydna. He was prætor in Sicily 149-148, and consul in 146. Spain was his province, where he encountered, and at length defeated Viriathus. Fabius was the pupil and patron of the historian Polybius.—6. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS ALLOBROGICVS, son of the last. He was consul 121; and he derived his surname from the victory which he gained in this year over the Allobroges and their ally, Bituitus, king of the Arverni in Gaul. He was censor in 118. He was an orator and a man of letters.—7. Q. FABIVS MAXIMVS SERVILIANVS, was adopted from the gens Servilia by No. 5. He was uterine brother of Cn. Servilius Cæpio, consul in 141. He himself was consul in 142, when he carried on war with Viriathus.

MAXIMVS MAGNVS CLEMENS, Roman emperor

A.D. 383-388, in Gaul, Britain, and Spain, was a native of Spain. He was proclaimed emperor by the legions in Britain in 383, and forthwith crossed over to Gaul to oppose Gratian, who was defeated by Maximus, and was shortly afterward put to death. Theodosius found it expedient to recognize Maximus as emperor of Gaul, Britain, and Spain, in order to secure Valentinian in the possession of Italy. Maximus, however, aspired to the undivided empire of the West, and accordingly, in 387, he invaded Italy at the head of a formidable army. Valentinian was unable to resist him, and fled to Theodosius in the East. Theodosius forthwith prepared to avenge his colleague. In 388 he forced his way through the Noric Alps, which had been guarded by the troops of Maximus, and shortly afterward took the city of Aquileia by storm, and there put Maximus to death. Victor, the son of Maximus, was defeated and slain in Gaul by Arbogastes, the general of Theodosius.

MAXIMVS PERRONIVS, Roman emperor A.D. 465, belonged to a noble Roman family, and enjoyed some of the highest offices of state under Honorius and Valentinian III. In consequence of the violence offered to his wife by Valentinian, Maximus formed a conspiracy against this emperor, who was assassinated, and Maximus himself proclaimed emperor in his stead. His reign, however, lasted only two or three months. Having forced Eudoxia, the widow of Valentinian, to marry him, she resolved to avenge the death of her former husband, and accordingly Genseric was invited to invade Italy. When Genseric landed at the mouth of the Tiber, Maximus prepared to fly from Rome, but was slain by a band of Burgundian mercenaries, commanded by some old officers of Valentinian.

MAXIMVS PLATONIDES. Vid. PLATONIDES.

MAXIMVS TYRIVS, a native of Tyre, a Greek rhetorician and Platonic philosopher, lived during the reigns of the Antonines and of Commodus. Some writers suppose that he was one of the tutors of M. Aurelius; but it is more probable that he was a different person from Claudius Maximus, the Stoic, who was the tutor of this emperor. Maximus Tyrius appears to have spent the greater part of his life in Greece, but he visited Rome once or twice. There are extant forty-one Dissertations (Διαλέξεις or Λόγοι) of Maximus Tyrius on theological, ethical, and other philosophical subjects, written in an easy and pleasing style, but not characterized by much depth of thought. The best edition is by Reiske, Lips., 1774-5, 2 vols 8vo.

MAZÏCA. Vid. CASSAREA, No. 1.

MAZEVS (Μάζαος). 1. Satrap of Cilicia, who, with Belesys, satrap of Syria, made head against the revolted Phœnicians in the reign of Ochus while the latter was preparing to march against them. 2. A Persian officer under Darius, sent to guard the passage of the Euphrates on the approach of Alexander the Great; he behaved subsequently with great bravery at the battle of Gaugamela, in which he commanded the Persian cavalry. After the flight of Darius he retired to Babylon, but surrendered himself to Alexander, who appointed him satrap of Babylon B.C. 331.]

MAZARA (Μαζάρα: Μαζαραίος; now Mazara), a town on the western coast of Sicily, situated on a river of the same name, between Lilybæum and Selinus, and founded by the latter city, was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war.

[MAZARES (Μαζάρης), a Median officer in the service of Cyrus the Great; he compelled the Lydians to submit to the terms imposed on them by Cyrus at the suggestion of Cræsus, and reduced and enslaved the city of Priene.]

MAZÆES (Μαζαίης), a people of Northern Africa, in Mauretania Cæsariensis, on the southern slope of Mount Zalacus. They, as well as the MAXES, are thought to be the ancestors of the Amazirghs.

[MECISTEUS (Μηκιστεύς). 1. A son of Talus and Lysimache, brother of Adrastus, and father of Euryalus of Thebes.—2. A son of Echius, and one of the companions of Teucer at Troy, was slain by Polydamas.]

MECYBERNA (Μηκυβέρνη: Μηκυβερναίος; now Makovo), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic Gulf, east of Olynthus, of which it was the sea-port. From this town part of the Toronaic Gulf was subsequently called Sinus Mecybernæus.

MEDAJA (Μήδαβα), a city of Persia in Palestine.

MEDAMA, MEDMA, or MESMA, a Greek town on the western coast of Bruttium, founded by the Locrians, with a celebrated fountain and a harbor called Emporium.

MEDAURA, AD MEDERA, or AMEDERA (ruins at Aydrakh), a flourishing city of Northern Africa, on the borders of Numidia and Byzacena, between Lares and Theveste; a Roman colony, and the birth-place of Appuleius.

MEDÆA (Μήδεια), daughter of Æetes, king of Colchis, by the Oceanid Idyia, or, according to others, by Hecate, the daughter of Perses. She was celebrated for her skill in magic. The principal parts of her story are given under ANAXRUS, ARGONAUTÆ, and JASON. It is sufficient to state here that, when Jason came to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece, she fell in love with the hero, assisted him in accomplishing the object for which he had visited Colchis, and afterward fled with him as his wife to Greece; that, having been deserted by Jason for the youthful daughter of Creon, king of Corinth, she took fearful vengeance upon her faithless spouse by murdering the two children which she had had by him, and by destroying his young wife by a poisoned garment; and that she then fled to Athens in a chariot drawn by winged dragons. So far her story has been related elsewhere. At Athens she is said to have married King Ægeus, or to have been beloved by Sisyphus. Jupiter (Zeus) himself is said to have sued for her, but in vain, because Medea dreaded the anger of Juno (Hera); and the latter rewarded her by promising immortality to her subjects. Her children are, according to some accounts, Mermerus, Phores, or Thessalus, ACUMENES and TISANDER; according to others, she had seven sons and seven daughters, while others mention only two children, Medus (some call him Polyxenus) and Eriopis, or one son Argon. Respecting her flight from Corinth there are different traditions. Some say, as we remark ed above, that she fled to Athens, and married Ægeus, but when it was discovered that she had laid snares for Theseus, she escaped and went to Asia, the inhabitants of which were called after her Medes. Others relate that she first fled from Corinth to Hercules at Thebes, who had promised her his assistance while yet in Colchis, in case of Jason being unfaithful to her. She cured Hercules, who was seized with madness; and, as he could not afford her the assistance he had promised, she went to Athens. She is said to have given birth to her son Medus after her arrival in Asia, where she had married a king; whereas others state that her son Medus accompanied her from Athens to Colchis, where her son slew Perseus, and restored her father Æetes to his kingdom. The restoration of Æetes, however, is attributed by some to Jason, who accompanied Medea to Colchis. At length Medea is said to have become immortal, to have been honored with divine worship, and to have married Achilles in Elysium.

MEDION (Μεδίων: Μεδώνιος). 1. Or MEDON (now Katuna), a town in the interior of Armenia, near the road which led from Limmæ to Stratos.—2. A town on the coast of Phœcia, near Anticyra, destroyed in the sacred war, and never rebuilt.—3. An ancient town in Beotia, mentioned by Homer, situated at the foot of Mount Phœnicus, near Onchestus and the Lake Copais.—4. A town of the Labeates in Dalmatia, near Scodra.

MEDIA (ἡ Μῆδία: Μῆδος, Medus), an important country of Western Asia, occupying the extreme west of the great table-land of Iran, and lying between Armenia on the north and northwest, Assyria and Susiana on the west and southwest, Persia on the south, the great desert of Aria on the east, and Parthia, Hyrcania, and the Caspian on the northeast. Its boundaries were, on the north the Araxes, on the west and southwest the range of mountains called Zagros and Parachoatras (now Mountains of Kurdistan and Luristan), which divided it from the Tigris and Euphrates valley, on the east the desert, and on the northeast the Caspi Montes (now Elburs Mountains), the country between which and the Caspian, though reckoned as a part of Media, was possessed by the Getai, Mardi, and other independent tribes. Media then corresponded nearly to the modern province of Irak-Ajemi. It was for the most part a fertile country, producing wine, figs, oranges, and citrons, and honey, and supporting an excellent breed of horses. It was well peopled, and was altogether one of the most important provinces of the ancient Persian empire. After the Macedonian conquest it was divided into two parts, Great Media (ἡ μεγάλη Μῆδία) and Atropatene Vid. ATROPATENE. The earliest history of Media is involved in much obscurity. Herodotus

Medes (in Diodorus) give different chronologies for the early kings. Ctesias makes Artabanus the founder of the monarchy, about B.C. 700. He reckons eight kings from him to the fall of the kingdom by Cyrus. Herodotus only four kings of Media, namely, 1. CYRUS, 653-657; 2. PHRAORTES, 657-653; 3. CYRUS, 653-657; 4. ARTABANUS, 657-653. The last king was dethroned by a revolution, transferred the supremacy to the Persians, who had formerly been the subordinate of the united Medo-Persian empire. Vid. The Medes made more than one attempt to regain their supremacy; the usurper Magianus Pseudo-Smerdis was no doubt attempt (vid. MAGI); and another occurred during the reign of Darius II., when the revolted, but were soon subdued (B.C. 405). With the rest of the Persian empire, Media fell under the power of Alexander; it formed a part of the kingdom of the Seleucids from whom it was conquered by the Romans in the second century B.C., from which it passed to the Parthians, and then to the Persian empire. The people of Media were a branch of the Indo-Germanic family; they spoke a dialect of the Zend, and their religion was Magian. They called themselves Arii, the native name of the Persians means nobles. They were divided, according to Herodotus, into six tribes, the Buzi, the Struchates, Arizanti, Budii, and the early period of their history they were brave warriors, especially as horsemen, but the long prevalence of peace, and luxury reduced them to a by-word. It is important to notice the names Medus and Medes by the Romans for the nations of Asia east of the Tiber, and the Parthians in partic-

MURUS (τὸ Μῦριος καλούμενον τείχος), a wall which ran from the Euphrates to the point where they approach the Tiber, a little above 33° north latitude, and separated Mesopotamia from Babylonia. It is described by Xenophon (Anab., ii., 4) as being 100 fathoms long, one hundred feet high, 10 feet thick, and as built of baked bricks, with asphalt. Its erection was ascribed to Semiramis, and hence it was also called ἐμψάμιδος διατείχισμα. MEDIOLANUM (Mediolanensis), more frequently Greek writers Μεδιολάνιον (Mediolanum), the name of several cities founded by the Romans. 1. (Now Milan), the capital of the Cisalpine Gaulia Transpadana, was situated on a fertile plain between the rivers Ticinus and Padana. It was taken by the Romans in 222 B.C. and afterward became both a municipal and a colony. On the new division of Gaul made by Diocletian, it became the chief residence of Maximianus, and continued to be the usual residence of the emperors of the West till the irruption of Attila, who plundered the town, induced them to leave the seat of government to the more fortified town of Ravenna. Mediolanum at this time one of the first cities of the West, possessed an imperial mint, and was the seat of an archbishopric. It is celebrated in ecclesiastical history as the see of St. Ambrose. On the fall of the Western empire, it became the residence of Theodoric the Great and the capital of the Ostrogothic kingdom, and surpassed even Rome itself in populousness and prosperity. It received a fearful blow in A.D. 539, when, in consequence of having sided with Belisarius, it was taken by the Goths under Vitiges, a great part of it destroyed, and its inhabitants put to the sword. It, however, gradually recovered from the effects of this blow, and was a place of importance under the Lombards, whose capital, however, was Pavia. The modern Milan contains no remains of antiquity, with the exception of sixteen handsome fluted pillars near the Church of S. Lorenzo.—2. (Now Saintes), a town of the Santones in Aquitania, northeast of the mouth of the Garumna; subsequently called Santones after the people, whence its modern name.—3. (Now Châcaux Meulan), a town of the Bituriges Cubi in Aquitania, northeast of the town last mentioned.—4. (Now Evréux), a town of the Aulerici Eboracenses in the north of Gallia Lugdunensis, south of the Sequana, on the road from Rotomagus to Lutetia Parisiorum; subsequently called Civitas Ebroicorum, whence its modern name.—5. A town of the Segusiavi in the south of Gallia Lugdunensis.—6. A town in Gallia Belgica, on the road from Colonia Trajana to Colonia Agrippina.

MEJONATAICI, a people in the southeast of Gallia Belgica, on the Moselle, south of the Treviri. Their territory originally extended to the Rhine, but in the time of Augustus they had been driven from the banks of this river by the Vangiones, Nemetes, and other German tribes. Their chief town was Divodurum (now Metz).

MEDITRINUM MARE. Vid. INTERNUM MARE. MEDITRINA, a Roman divinity of the art of healing, in whose honor the festival of the Meditrinalia was celebrated in the month of October. (Vid. Dict. of Ant., art. MEDITRINALIA.)

MEDIUS (Μήδιος), son of Onythemis, a native of Larissa in Thessaly, and a friend of Alexander the Great, whom he accompanied in his expedition into India. After the death of Alexander he espoused the side of Antigonus, and was one of his most useful and successful naval officers.]

MEDMA. Vid. MEDANA. MEDOLUS or MEDOLUS, a river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, formed by the union of two rivers, the Medolus Major (now Brenta) and Medolus Minor (now Bacchiglione), which falls into the Adriatic Sea near Edron, the harbor of Patavium.

MEDONISIA (now Marsus), on the frontiers of Portugal, a town in Lusitania, on the road from Emerita to Scalabis.

MEDOCUS. Vid. ANADOCUS.

MEJON (Μέδων). 1. Son of Oileus, and brother of the lesser Ajax, fought against Troy, and was slain by Aeneas.—2. Son of Codrus. Vid. CODRUS.—3. A herald in the house of Ulysses, in the suite of the suitors, disclosed to Penelope the danger of her son Telemachus, and was on this account preserved by the latter when the suitors were slain.—4. Son of Pylades and Electra.—5. A Lacedæmonian statuary, brother of Ioryclendas, and the disciple of Dipœnus and Scyllis, made the gold and ivory statue of Minerva (Athena) in the Herœum at Olympia.]

MEDULLA, a people in Aquitania, on the coast of the ocean, south of the mouth of the Garumna, in the modern Medoc. There were excellent oysters found on their shores.

MEDULLI, a people on the eastern frontier of Gallia Narbonensis and in the Maritime Alps, in whose country the Druentia (now Durance) and Duria (now Doria Minor) took their rise.

MEDULLIA (Medullinus: now St. Angelo), a colony of Alba, in the land of the Sabines, was situated between the Tiber and the Anio, in the neighborhood of Corniculum and Ameriola. Tarquinius Priscus incorporated their territory with the Roman state.

MEDULLINUS, Furius, an ancient patrician family at Rome, the members of which held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic.

MEDULLUS, a mountain in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Minius.

MEDUS, a son of Medea. Vid. MEDEA.

MEDUS (Mēdos: now Farwar or Schamior), a small river of Persia, flowing from the confines of Media and falling into the Araxes (now Band-Emir) near Persepolis.

MEDUSA. Vid. GORGONES.

ΜΕΓΑΒΑΖΟΣ or ΜΕΓΑΒΑΖΟΣ. 1. One of the seven Persian nobles who conspired against the magian Smerdis, B.C. 521. Darius left him behind with an army in Europe when he himself recrossed the Hellespont on his return from Scythia, 506. Megabazus subdued Perinthus and the other cities on the Hellespont and along the coast of Thrace.—2. Son of Zopyrus, and grandson of the above, was one of the commanders in the army of Xerxes, 480. He afterward commanded the army sent against the Athenians in Egypt, 459.

ΜΕΓΑΚΛΗΣ (Μεγακλής). 1. A name borne by several of the Athenian family of the Alcmaeonidae. The most important of these was the Megacles who put to death Cylon and his adherents after they had taken refuge at the altar of Minerva (Athena), B.C. 612. Vid. CYLON.—[2. Son of Alcmaeon, son-in-law of Cleisthenes, leader of the Alcmaeonidae in the time of Solon. At first he was opposed to Pisistratus, and expelled him from Athens; but afterward he became reconciled to him, gave him his daughter Cæsara in marriage, and assisted in his restoration to Athens. Pisistratus not having treated his wife in a proper manner, Megacles resented the affront, and again drove the former out of Athens: with the aid of large sums from the Thebans and other states, Pisistratus again raised an army, defeated his opponents, and drove Megacles and the partisans of the Alcmaeonidae into exile.]—3. A Syracusan, brother of Dion, and brother-in-law of the elder Dionysius. He accompanied Dion in his flight from Syracuse, 369, and afterward returned with him to Sicily.

ΜΕΓΑΡΑ. Vid. ERINNYES.

ΜΕΓΑΛΙΑ or ΜΕΓΑΙΡΙΑ, a small island in the Tyrrhene Sea, opposite Neapolis.

ΜΕΓΑΛΟΠΟΛΙΣ (ἡ Μεγάλη πόλις, Μεγαλόπολις; Μεγαλοπούλις). 1. (Now Sinano or Sinawu), the most recent but the most important of the cities of Arcadia, was founded on the advice of Epaminondas, after the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371, and was formed out of the inhabitants of thirty-eight villages. It was situated in the district Menalia, near the frontiers of Messenia, on the River Helisson, which flowed through the city, dividing it into nearly two equal parts. It stood on the site of the ancient town Orestia or Orestia, was fifty stadia (six miles) circumference, and contained, when it was besieged by Polysperchon, about fifteen thousand men capable of bearing arms, which would give it a population of about seventy thousand inhabitants. Megalopolis was for a time subject to the Macedonians, but soon after the death of Alexander the Great it was governed by a series of native tyrants, the last of whom, Licymachus, voluntarily resigned the government and united the city to the Achaean league, B.C. 146. It became, in consequence, opposed to Sparta and was taken and plundered by Cleomenes, who either killed or drove into banishment its inhabitants, and destroyed a great part of the city, 222. After the battle of Sellasia in the following year it was restored by Philopoemen, who again collected its inhabitants, but it never recovered its former prosperity, and gradually sunk into insignificance. Philopoemen and the historian Polybius were natives of Megalopolis. The ruins of its theatre, once the largest in Greece, are the only remains of the ancient town to be seen in the village of Sinano, a town in Caria. Vid. APHRODISIAS.—2. A town in Pontus. Vid. SEBASTIA.—4. A town in the north of Africa, was a Carthaginian city in the interior of Byzacena, in a beautiful situation, it was taken and destroyed by the troops of Agathocles.

ΜΕΓΑΝΙΡΑ (Μεγανίρα), wife of Celeus, usually called ΜΕΤΑΝΙΡΑ.

ΜΕΓΑΝΙΤΑΣ (Μεγανίτας), a small river of Achaia, in the territory of Ægium, flowing into the sea west of that city.]

ΜΕΓΑΠΕΝΘΗΣ (Μεγαπένθης). 1. Son of Pelops, father of Anaxagoras and Iphianira, king of Argos. He exchanged his dominion with that of Perseus, so that the latter reigned at Tiryns instead of Argos.—2. Son of Menelaus by an Ætolian slave, Pieris or Teridast. Menelaus brought about a marriage between Megapenthes and a daughter of Alector. According to a Rhodian tradition, Megapenthes, after the death of his father, expelled Helen from Argos, who thereupon fled to Polyxo at Rhodes.

ΜΕΓΑΡΕΥΚΗΣ (Μεγαρεύκης), a Persian sent to death by Cyrus on the charge of having conspired against that prince.]

ΜΕΓΑΙΡΑ (Μεγαιρά), daughter of Creon, king of Thebes, and wife of Hercules. Vid. p. 35.

ΜΕΓΑΙΡΑ (ἡ Μεγαιρά, in Lat. Megara, a small city of Megara, -orum: Μεγαρεύς, Megarensis) (Now Megara), the capital of MEGARIS, was situated eight stadia (one mile) from the seaport, opposite the island Salamis, about twenty miles from Athens and thirty-one miles from Corinth. It consisted of three parts: 1. an ancient Pelasgian citadel, called Caria, said to have been built by Car, the son of Phoroneus, which was situated on a hill northwest of the city. This citadel contained the ancient and celebrated Megaron (μεγαρον) or temple

res (Demeter), from which the town is supposed to have derived its name. 2. The model citadel, situated on a lower hill to the south of the preceding, and called Alcathous, in its reputed founder Alcathous, son of Peleus. 3. The town properly so called, situated the foot of the two citadels, said to have been founded by the Pelopidae under Alcathous, and subsequently enlarged by a Doric colony under Theseus and Athenes at the time of Codrus. It appears to have been originally called Polich (Πολίχνη). The town contained many public buildings, which are described at length by Pausanias. Its sea-port was Nisaea (Νίσαια), which was connected with Megara by two walls, eight stadia in length, built by the Athenians when they had possession of Megara, B.C. 461-445. Nisaea is said to have been built by Nisus, the son of Pandion; and the inhabitants of Megara were sometimes called Nisæan Megarians (οἱ Νισαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) to distinguish them from the Hyblæan Megarians (οἱ Ἰβηλαῖοι Μεγαρεῖς) in Sicily. In front of Nisaea lay the small island Misura (Μίσυρα), which added greatly to the security of the harbor. In the most ancient times Megara and the surrounding country was inhabited by Leleges. It subsequently became annexed to Attica; and Megaris formed one of the four ancient divisions of Attica. It was first conquered by the Dorians, and was for a time subject to Corinth; but it finally asserted its independence, and rapidly became a wealthy and powerful city. To none of these events is any date to be assigned with certainty. Its power at an early period is attested by the flourishing colonies which it founded, of which Sembrina, Chalcædon, and Byzantium, and the Hyblæan Megara in Sicily, were the most important. Its navy was a match for that of Athens, with which it contested the island of Salamis; and it was not till after a long struggle that the Athenians succeeded in obtaining possession of this island. The government was originally an aristocracy, as in most of the Doric cities; but Theagenes, who put himself at the head of the popular party, obtained the supreme power about B.C. 620. Theagenes was afterwards expelled, and a democratical form of government established. After the Persian wars, Megara was for some time at war with Corinth, and was thus led to form an alliance with Athens, and to receive an Athenian garrison into the city, 461; but the oligarchical party having got the upper hand, the Athenians were expelled, 441. Megara is not often mentioned after this period. It was taken and its walls destroyed by Demetrius Poliorcetes; it was taken again by the Romans under Q. Metellus; and in the time of Augustus it had ceased to be a place of importance. Megara is celebrated in the history of philosophy as the seat of a philosophical school, usually called the Megarian, which was founded by Euclid, a native of the city, and a disciple of Socrates. Vid. LECTURES, No. 3. There are no remains of any importance of the ancient city of Megara.—2. A town in Sicily, on the eastern coast, north of Syracuse, founded by Dorians from Megara in Greece, B.C. 728, on the site of a small town Hybla, and hence called MEGARA HYBLÆA, and its inhabitants Megarenes Hyblæi (Μεγαρεῖς Ἰβηλαῖοι). From the time of Gelon it belonged to Syracuse. It was taken and plundered by the Romans in the second Punic war, and from that time sunk into insignificance, but it is still mentioned by Cicero under the name of Megaris.

MEGAREUS (Μεγαρεῦς), son of Onchestus, also called a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Cœneus, of Hippomenes, of Apollo, or of Ægeus. He was a brother of Abrote, the wife of Nisus, king of Megara, and the father of Evippus, Timalcua, Hippomenes, and Evæchme. Megara is said to have derived its name from him.

MEGARA (ἡ Μεγαρίς or ἡ Μεγαρινή, sc. γῆ), a small district in Greece, between the Corinthian and Saronic gulfs, originally reckoned part of Hellas proper, but subsequently included in the Peloponnesus. It was bounded on the north by Boeotia, on the east and northeast by Attica, and on the south by the territory of Corinth. It contained about seven hundred and twenty square miles. The country was very mountainous; and its only plain was the one in which the city of Megara was situated. It was separated from Boeotia by Mount Cithæron, and from Attica by the mountains called the Horns (τὰ κέρατα), on account of their two projecting summits. The Cœnean Mountains extended through the greater part of the country, and formed its southern boundary toward Corinth. There are two roads through these mountains from Corinth, one called the Scironian pass, which ran along the Saronic Gulf, passed by Crommyon and Megara, and was the direct road from Corinth to Athens; the other ran along the Corinthian Gulf, passed by Geranea and Pegææ, and was the road from Corinth into Boeotia. The only town of importance in Megaris was its capital Megara. Vid. MEGARA.

MEGASTHENES (Μεγασθένης), a Greek writer, who was sent by Seleucus Nicator as ambassador to Sandracottus, king of the Prasii, where he resided some time. He wrote a work on India, in four books, entitled Indica (τὰ Ἰνδικά), to which later Greek writers were chiefly indebted for their accounts of the country. [The fragments of Megasthenes have been collected by Schwanbeck, Megasth. Fragm., &c., Bonn, 1846; and by Müller, Hist. Græc. Fragm., vol. ii., p. 397-439.]

MEGÆA (Μεγία), son of Phyleus, and grandson of Augeas, was one of the suitors of Helen, and led his bands from Dulichium and the Echinades against Troy.

MEGIDDO (Μεγιδδῶ, Μεγιδῶ: now Lejjun?), a considerable city of Palestine, on the River Kishon, in a valley of the same name, which formed a part of the great plain of Jezreel or Esdraelon, on the confines of Galilee and Samaria. It was a residence of the Canaanite kings before the conquest of Palestine by the Jews. It was fortified by Solomon. It was probably the same place which was called Lxxæ under the Romans.

MEGIESTA (Μεγίστη), an island on the coast of Lycia, between Rhodes and the Chelidonia islands, with a city of the same name, which, according to Strabo, was also called Cistiene. Vid. CISTHENE, No. 3.]

MEGISTINI, a people of Armenia, in the district of Sophene, near the Euphrates.]

MELA, river. Vid. MELLA.

MELA, FABIVS, a Roman jurist, who is often cited in the Digest, probably lived in the time of Antoninus Pius.

MELA or MELLA, M. ANNÆVS, the youngest son of M. Annæus Seneca the rhetorician, and brother of L. Seneca the philosopher, and Gallio. By his wife Acilia he had at least one son, the celebrated Lucan. After Lucan's death, A.D. 45, Mela laid claim to his property; and as he was rich, he was accused of being privy to Piso's conspiracy, and anticipated a certain sentence by suicide.

MELA, POMRONIVS, the first Roman author who composed a formal treatise upon Geography, was a native of Spain, and probably flourished under the Emperor Claudius. His work is entitled De Situ Orbis Libri III. It contains a brief description of the whole world as known to the Romans. The text is often corrupt, but the style is simple, and the Latinity is pure; and although every thing is compressed within the narrowest limits, we find the monotony of the catalogue occasionally diversified by animated and pleasing pictures. The best edition is by Tzschucke, seven parts, 8vo, Lips., 1807.

MELÆNA ACRA (ἡ Μελαινα ἀκρα). 1. (Now Kara Burnu, which means the same as the Greek name, i. e., the Black Cape), the north-western promontory of the great peninsula of Ionia: formed by Mount Mimas; celebrated for the millstones hewn from it.—2. (Now Cape San Nicolo), the northwestern promontory of the island of Chios.—3. (Now Kara Burnu), a promontory of Bithynia, a little east of the Bosphorus, between the rivers Rhebas and Artanes; also called Καλινάκρον and Βιθυνίας ἀκρον.

MELÆNÆ (Μελαινάι: Μελαννί). 1. Or MELÆNÆÆ (Μελαιναί), a town in the west of Arcadia, on the Alpheus, northwest of Buphagium, and southeast of Heræa.—2. A demus in Attica, on the frontiers of Bœotia, belonging to the tribe Antiochis.

MELAMBIVM (Μελάμβιον), a town of Thessaly in Pelasgiotis, belonging to the territory of Scotussa.

MELAMPVS (Μελάμπος). 1. Son of Amythaon by Idomene, or, according to others, by Aglaia or Rhodope, and a brother of Bias. He was looked upon by the ancients as the first mortal who had been endowed with prophetic powers, as the person who first practiced the medical art, and who established the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) in Greece. He is said to have been married to Iphianassa (others call her Iphianira or Cyrianassa), by whom he became the father of Mantius and Antiphates. Abas, Bias, Manto, and Pronoe are also named by some writers as his children. Before his house there stood an oak tree containing a serpent's nest. The old serpents were killed by his servants, but Melampus took care of the young ones and fed them carefully. One day, when he was asleep, they cleaned his ears with their tongues. On his waking, he perceived, to his astonishment, that he now understood the language of birds, and that with their assistance he could foretell the future. In addition to this, he acquired the power of prophesying from the vic-times that were offered to the gods; and, after having an interview with Apollo on the banks of the Alpheus, he became a most renowned soothsayer. During his residence at Pylon his brother Bias was one of the suitors for the hand of Pero, the daughter of Neleus. The latter promised his daughter to the man who should bring him the oxen of Iphiclus, which were guarded by a dog whom neither man nor animal could approach. Melampus undertook the task of procuring the oxen for his brother, although he knew that the thief would be caught and kept in imprisonment for a year, after which he was to come into possession of the oxen. Things turned out as he had said; Melampus was thrown into prison, and in his captivity he learned from the wood-worms that the building in which he was imprisoned would soon break down. He accordingly demanded to be let out, and as Phylacus and Iphiclus thus became acquainted with his prophetic powers, they asked him in what manner Iphiclus, who had no children, was to become father. Melampus, on the suggestion of a vulture, advised Iphiclus to take the rust from the knife with which Phylacus had once cut his son, and drink it in water during ten days. This was done, and Iphiclus became the father of Podarces. Melampus then received the oxen as a reward for his services, drove them to Pylon, and thus gained Pero for his brother. Afterward Melampus obtained possession of a third of the kingdom of Argos in the following manner: In the reign of Anaxagoras, king of Argos, the women of the kingdom were seized with madness, and roamed about the country in a frantic state. Melampus cured them of their phrensy, on condition that he and his brother Bias should receive an equal share with Anaxagoras in the kingdom of Argos. Melampus and Bias married the two daughters of Prætus, and received over two thirds of Argos.—2. The author of a little Greek work still extant, entitled De medicis palpitatione and De Navis Oleaceis in Cereis. He lived probably in the third century B.C. at Alexandria. Both the works are full of superstitions and absurdities. Edited by Franz in his Scriptores Physiognomiae Veteres, Altonæ, 1780.

MELANCHLÆNI (Μελαγχλαῖνοι), a people in the north of Sarmatia Asiatica, about the upper course of the River Tanais (now Don), resembling the Scythians in manners, though of a different race. Their Greek name was derived from their dark clothing.

[MELANDEPTÆ (Μελανδέπται) or MELANDEIRÆ (Μελανδείραι), a people of Thrace, in the mountainous northwest of Byzantium, along the coast of the Pontus Euxinus.]

[MELANEVS (Μελανεύς). 1. Son of Apollo king of the Dryopes, was a famous archer; he obtained from Perieres, king of Messenia, a town which he named after his wife Oechalia.—2. Father of Amphimedon in Ithaca.]

MELANIPPE (Μελανίππη). 1. Daughter of Erechon, also called Evippe. Being with child to Æolus, she fled to Mount Pelion; and in order that her condition might not become known, she prayed to be metamorphosed into a mare. Diana (Artemis) granted her prayer, and in the form of a horse she was placed among the mares another account describes her metamorphosis as a punishment for having despised Diana (Artemis), or for having divulged the counsels of the gods.—[2. A queen of the Amazons, taken captive by Hercules; she obtained her freedom by surrendering her girdle to the hero.]

MELANIPIDES (Μελανίπιδης), of Melos, a celebrated lyric poet in the department of the dithyramb. He flourished about B.C. 440, and lived some time at the court of Perdiccas, of Macedonia, and there died. His high reputation as a poet is intimated by Xenophon, who makes Aristodemus give him the first place among dithyrambic poets, by the side of Homer, Sophocles, Polycletus, and Zeuxis, as the chief masters in their respective arts; and by Plutarch, who mentions him, with Simonides and Euripides, as among the most distinguished masters of music. Several verses of his poetry are still preserved. Vid. Bergk, Poet. Lyr. Græc., p. 847-88. Some writers, following the authority of Hesiod, make two poets of this name.

MELANIPPEUS (Μελανίππεος). 1. Son of Astacus of Thebes, who, in the attack of the Seven on his native city, slew Tydeus and Mecisteus. His tomb was shown in the neighborhood of Thebes, on the road to Chalcis.—[2. A Trojan, slain by Teucer.—3. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Hector, slain by Antiochus.—4. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Patroclus.—5. A son of Theseus and Perigone, gained the prize at boxing at the games celebrated by the Epigoni after the capture of Thebes.]

MELANOMETOLI. Vid. Gættula.

MELANTHUS (Μελάνθιος). 1. Also called Melanthus, son of Dolius, was a goat-herd of Ithaca, who sided with the suitors of Penelope, and was killed by Ulysses.—[2. An Athenian comic poet, of whom little is known beyond the attacks made on him by Aristophanes and the other comic poets. The most important passage respecting him is in the Peace of Aristophanes (700, &c.). He was celebrated for his skill, of which several specimens are preserved by Plutarch.—3. Or Melanthus, an eminent Greek painter of the Sicyonian school, was contemporary with Apelles (B.C. 332), with whom he studied under Pamphilus. He was one of the best colorists of all the Greek painters.—[4. Leader of the twenty ships sent by the Athenians to the aid of Aristagoras of Miletus in his revolt against the Persian government.]

MELANTHUS (Μελάνθιος, now probably Meletanus), a river of Pontus, in Asia Minor, east of the Promontorium Jasonium; the boundary between Pontus Polemoniacus and Pontus Capadocicus.

MELANTHO (Μελάνθη), daughter of Dolius, sister of the goat-herd Melanthus (vid. MELANTHUS), female attendant upon Penelope, was put to death by Ulysses because she had aided the suitors.]

MELANTHUS or MELANTHIUS (Μελάνθος). 1. One of the Nélides, and king of Messonia, whence he was driven out by the Heræclides, on their conquest of the Peloponnese; and, following the instructions of the Delphic oracle, took refuge in Attica. In a war between the Athenians and Boeotians, Xanthus, the Boeotian king, challenged Thymonæes, king of Athens and the son of the Theseids, to single combat. Thymonæes declined the challenge on the ground of age and infirmity. So ran the story, which strove afterward to disguise the violent change of dynasty; and Melanthus undertook it on condition of being rewarded with the throne in the event of success. He slew Xanthus, and became king, to the exclusion of the Theseids. According to Pausanias, the conqueror of Xanthus was Andropompus, the father of Melanthus; according to Aristotle, it was Codrus, his son.—[2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who wished to carry off Bacchus (Dionysus), but were changed into dolphins.]

MELAS (Μέλας). 1. A son of Phrixus and Chalciope, married Euryclæa, by whom he became father of Hyperes.—[2. A son of Porthæon and Euryte, and brother of Ceneus.]

MELAS (Μέλας), the name of several rivers, whose waters were of a dark color. 1. (Now Mauvo Nero or Mauvo Potamo), a small river in Boeotia, which rises seven stadia north of Orchomenus, becomes navigable almost from its source, flows between Orchomenus and Aspledon, and loses the greater part of its waters in the marshes connected with Lake Copais. A small portion of its waters fell in ancient times into the River Cephissus.—[2. A river of Thessaly, in the district Malis, flows near Heraclæa and Traehis, and falls into the Malæic Gulf.—3. A river of Thessaly in Phthiotis, falls into the Apidanus.—4. A river of Thrace, flows first southwest, then northwest, and falls north of Cardia into the Melas Sinus.—5. A river in the northeast of Sicily, which flows into the sea between Mylæ and Naulochus, through excellent meadows, in which the oxen of the sun are said to have fed.—6. (Now Manavgat-Su), a navigable river, fifty stadia (five geographical miles) east of Side, was the boundary between Pamphylia and Cilicia.—7. (Now Kara-Su, i. e., the Black River), in Cappadocia, rises in Mount Argæus, flows past Mazaca, and, after forming a succession of morasses, falls into the Halys, and not (as Strabo says) into the Euphrates.]

MELAS SINUS (Μέλας κόλπος: now Gulf of Serres), a gulf of the Ægean Sea, between the coast of Thrace on the northwest and the Thracian Chersonesus on the southeast, into which the River Melas flows.

MELNI or MELDNE, a people in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the borders of Belgica, and upon the River Sequana (now Seine), in whose territory Cæsar built forty ships for his expedition against Britain.

MELTICEUS (Μελτίειος). 1. Son of Ceneus and Althæa, the daughter of Thestius, husband of Cleopatra, and father of Polydora. Others call him a son of Mars (Ares) and Althæa. He was one of the most famous Ætolian heroes of Calydon, and distinguished himself by his skill in throwing the javelin. He took part in the Argonautic expedition. On his return home, the fields of Calydon were laid waste by a monstrous boar, which Diana (Artemis) had sent against the country as a punishment, because Ceneus, the king of the place, once neglected to offer up a sacrifice to the goddess. No one dared encounter the terrible animal, till at length Meleager, with a band of other heroes, went out to hunt the boar. He slew the animal; but the Calydonians and Curetus quarrelled about the head and hēdā, and at length waged open war against each other. The Calydonians were always victorious, so long as Meleager went out with them. But when his mother Althæa pronounced a curse upon him, enraged at the death of her brother who had fallen in the fight, Meleager stayed at home with his wife Cleopatra. The Curetes now began to press Calydon very hard. It was in vain that the old men of the town made him the most brilliant promises if he would again join in the fight, and that his father, his sisters, and his mother supplicated him. At length, however, he yielded to the prayers of his wife Cleopatra: he put the Curetes to flight, but he never returned home, for the Erinyes, who had heard the curse of his mother, overtook him. Such is the more ancient form of the legend, as we find it in Homer (Il. ix., 527, seq.) In the later traditions Meleager collects the heroes from all parts of Greece to join him in the hunt. Among others was the fair maiden Atalanta; but the heroes refused to hunt with her, until Meleager, who was in love with her, overcame their opposition. Atalanta gave the animal the first wound, which was at length slain by Meleager. He presented the hide to Atalanta, but the sons of Thestius took it from her, whereupon Meleager in a rage slew them. This, however, was the cause of his own death, which came to pass in the following way. When he was seven days old the Mærsæ appeared, declaring that the boy would die as soon as the piece of wood which was burning on the hearth should be consumed. Althæa, upon hearing this, extinguished the firebrand, and concealed it in a chest. Meleager himself became invulnerable; but after he had killed the brothers of his mother, she lighted the piece of wood, and Meleager died. Althæa, too late repenting of what she had done, put an end to her life; and Cleopatra died of grief. The sisters of Meleager wept unceasingly after his death, until Diana (Artemis) changed them into Guinea-hens (melæagrides), which were transferred to the island of Leros. Even in this condition they mourned during a certain part of the year for their brother. Two of them, Gorge and Deianira, through the mediation of Bacchus (Dionysus), were not metamorphosed.—2. Son of Neoptolemus, a Macedonian officer in the service of Alexander the Great. After the death of Alexander the Great (B.C. 323) Meleager resisted the claims of Perdiccas to the regency, and was eventually associated with the latter in this office. Shortly afterward, however, he was put to death by order of Perdiccas.—[3. Commander of a squadron of cavalry in the army of Alexander the Great at the battle of Arbela. He was afterward slain in an insurrection against the officers left by Antigonus in the government of Media.]—4. Son of Eucrates, the celebrated writer and collector of epigrams, was a native of Gadara in Palestine, and lived about B.C. 60. There are one hundred and thirty-one of his epigrams in the Greek Anthology, written in a good Greek style, though somewhat affected, and distinguished by sophistical acumen and amatory fancy. An account of his collection of epigrams is given under PLAUTUS.

ing by Smyrna, on the banks of which Homer is said to have been born; (according to another account, he composed his poems in a grotto at its source). and hence was called Melæigenes (Μελίσιγενής): from this also was derived the phrase Meleæta charta in Tibullus. Another account makes Meleæ, the god of the stream, to have been the father of Homer.]

[MELEANDER (Μελήσανδρος), an Athenian general, who was sent out with six ships in the year 430 B.C. against Caria and Lycia; fell in battle in Lycia.]

[MELEAGRIUS (Μελήσιππος), a Lacedæmonian, one of the ambassadors sent to Athens B.C. 432, and again the next year to demand the restoration of the independence of the Greek states, but without success.]

MELÆTUS or MELITUS (Μέλητος: Μέλιτος), an obscure tragic poet, but notorious as one of the accusers of Socrates, was an Athenian, of the Pitthean demus. He is represented by Plato and Aristophanes and their scholiasts as a frigid and licentious poet, and a worthless and profligate man. In the accusation of Socrates Meletus who laid the indictment before the archon Basileus; but, in reality, he was the most insignificant of the accusers; and, according to one account, he was bribed by Anaxagoras and Lycon to take part in the affair. Soon after the death of Socrates, the Athenians repented of their injustice, and Meletus was stoned to death as one of the authors of their folly.

MELIA (Μελία), a nymph, daughter of Cœtus; became by Inachus the mother of Phoroneus; and Ægialeus or Pegeus; and by Silenus the mother of the centaur Pholus; and by Neptune (Poseidon) of Amycus. She was carried off by Apollo, and became by him the mother of Ismenius and of the seer Tenerus. She was worshipped in the Ismenius, the sanctuary of Apollo, near Thebes. In the plural form MELIÆ or MELIÆDES (Μελιαι, Μελιαιδες) are the nymphs who, along with the Gigantes and Erinyes, sprang from the drops of blood that fell from Cœlus (Uranus) and were received by Terra (Gæa). The nymphs that nursed Jupiter (Zeus) are likewise called Meliæ.

MELIBCEA (Μελίβοια: Μελιβορεύ). 1. A town on the coast of Thessaly, in Magnesia, between Mount Ossa and Mount Pelion, is said to have been built by Magnes, and to have been named Melibcea in honor of his wife. It is mentioned by Homer as belonging to the dominions of Philoctetes, who is hence called by Virgil (Æn. iii., 401) dux Melibœus. It was celebrated for its purple dye. (Lucret. ii., 499; Virg. Æn. v., 251.)—2. A small island at the mouth of the River Orontes, in Syria.

MELICERTES. Vid. PLAUTUS. [MELINOPHAGI (Μελινοφάγοι, "Millet-eaters"), a Thracian people on the coast of Salmodynes, whom the Greeks named after their chief article of food, not knowing their real name.]

MELISSA (Μέλισσα). 1. A nymph said to have discovered the use of honey, and from whom bees were believed to have received their name (melissoi). There can be no doubt, however, that the name really came from μέλι, honey, and was hence given to nymphs. According to some traditions, bees were nymphs metamorphosed. Hence the nymphs who fed the pter (Zeus) with honey are called Melissa. The name of priestesses in general, especially of the priestesses of Ceres, Proserpina (Persephone), Apollo, Artemis).—3. Wife of Perander, of Corinth, and daughter of Procles. Epidauros, was slain by her husband.

MELISSA.

MELISSA (Μέλισσα), a village in the eastern Phrygia Magna, between Synnada and Synnada, with the tomb of Alcibiades, where, in an order, a statue was erected to honor his marble and sacrifices annually.

MELISSA (Μέλισσα). 1. Of Samos, a Greek, the son of Ithagenes, was, according to common account, the commander of the expedition to Sicily, B.C. 440. But he is mentioned by Thucydides, and ought to be placed much earlier, as he is said to be connected with Heracitus, and was a disciple of Parmenides. It appears from the fragments of his work, which are in prose, and in the Ionic dialect, that he was a philosopher of the Eleatic school, a grammarian and a comic poet, a friend of Mæneas, and was intrusted with the arrangement of the library of Octavia.

MELISSA (Μέλισσα; Μελισσαίος, Melissaios). (Now Malta), an island in the Mediterranean Sea, situated fifty-eight miles from the point of Sicily, and one hundred and nine miles from the nearest point.

Its greatest length is seventeen miles, and its greatest breadth is four miles. The island was first discovered by the Phœnicians, who used it as a refuge for their ships, on account of its arborescence. It afterward passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, but was taken possession of by the Romans in the second Punic war, and annexed to the province of Sicily. It is, however, appear to have neglected, and it is mentioned by Cicero as a resort of pirates. It contained a city of the same name, founded by the Carthaginians, and two celebrated temples, one of which was on a promontory near the town, and another in the southeast of the island.

It is mentioned in sacred history as the island where the Apostle Paul was shipwrecked; and writers erroneously suppose that he was shipwrecked on the island of Malta off the Illyrian coast. The inhabitants manufactured fine cloth, which was in great request at Rome. They also exported a considerable quantity of honey; and from according to some authorities, came the felitæ, the favorite lap-dogs of the Romans, though other writers make them the island off the Illyrian coast.—2.

MELISSA, a small island in the Adriatic coast of Illyria (Dalmatia), north of Epidauros.—3. A demus in Attica, formed part of the city of Athens, and south of the inner Ceramicus, and included the hill of the Museum. It has derived its name from a nymph to whom Hercules was in love, and who contained a temple of this god.

One of the gates of Athens was called the Melitian gate, because it led to this demus. Vid. p. 123, b.—4. A lake in Ætolia, near the mouth of the Achelous, belonging to the territory of the town Ceniade.

MELITÆA, MELITÆA, or MELITIA (Μελιταία, Melitæia, Melitia; Μελιταίος, Melitaios), a town of Thessaly, in Phthiotis, on the northern slope of Mount Othrys, and near the River Enipeus. It is said to have been called Pyrrha at very ancient times, and the sepulchre of Helen was shown in its market-place.

MELITÆA (Μελιτή). 1. A nymph, one of the Nereides, a daughter of Nereus and Doris.—[2. A Naiad, daughter of the river-god Ægeus, became by Hercules mother of Hyllus in the land of the Phœnicians.]

MELITENE (Μελιτηνή), a district of Armenia Minor, between the Anti-Taurus and the Euphrates, celebrated for its fertility, and especially for its fruit-trees, oil, and wine. It possessed no great town until the first century of our era, when a city, also called Melitene (now Malatya) was built on a tributary of the Euphrates, and near that river itself, probably on the site of a very ancient fort. This became a place of considerable importance; the centre of several roads; the station, under Titus, of the twelfth legion; and, in the later division of the provinces, the capital of Armenia Secunda. In A.D. 577 it was the scene of a victory gained by the Romans over the Persians under Chosroes I.

MELITO (Μελίτων), a Christian writer of considerable eminence, was bishop of Sardes in the reign of M. Aurelius, to whom he presented an Apology for the Christians. Of his numerous works only fragments are extant.

MELLA or MELA (now Mella), a river in Gallia Transpadana, which flows by Brixia and falls into the Ollus (now Oglio).

MELLARIA. 1. A town of the Bastuli in Hispania Bætica, between Belon and Calpe, on the road from Gades to Malaca.—2. A town in the same province, considerably north of the former, on the road from Corduba to Emerita.

MELONUM (now Melan), a town of the Senones in Gallia Lugdunensis, on an island of the Sequana (now Seine), and on the road from Agendicum to Lutetia Parisiorum.

MÉLOS (Μῆλος; Μήλιος; now Milo), an island in the Ægean Sea, and the most westerly of the group of the Cyclades, whence it was called Zephyria by Aristotle. It is about seventy miles north of the coast of Crete, and sixty-five east of the coast of Peloponnesus. Its length is about fourteen miles from east to west, and its breadth about eight miles. It contains on the north a deep bay, which forms an excellent harbor, and on which was situated a town, bearing the same name as the island. The island is of volcanic origin; it contains hot springs, and mines of sulphur and alum. The soil is very fertile, and it produced in antiquity as it does at present, abundance of corn, oil, wine, &c. It was first colonized by the Phœnicians, who are said to have called it Byblis or Byblis, after the Phœnician town Byblus. It was afterward colonized by Lacedæmonians, or at least by Dorians; and consequently in the Peloponnesian war it embraced the side of Sparta. In B.C. 426 the Athenians made an unsuccessful attack upon the island; but in 416 they obtained possession of the town after a siege of several months, whereupon they killed all the adult males, sold the women and children as slaves, and peopled the island by an Athenian colony. Melos was the birth-place of Diogenes, the atheist, whence Aristophanes calls Socrates also the Melian.

[MEIPOM (now Melza), a city of Gallia Transpadana, in the territory of the Insubres.]

[MEIPUS (now Narcea), a small stream in the territory of the Astures, in Hispania Tarracensis, flowing into the Oceanus Cantabricus, west of Flavionovia.]

MEMINI, a people in Gallia Narbonensis, on the western bank of the Druentia, whose chief town was Carpentoracte (now Carpentras).

MEMNA GENS, a plebeian house at Rome, whose members do not occur in history before B.C. 173, but who pretended to be descended from the Trojan Mnestheus. (Virg., Æn., v. 117.)

MEMMIUS 1. C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 111, was an ardent opponent of the oligarchical party at Rome during the Jugurthine war. Among the nobles impeached by Memmius were L. Calpurnius Bestia and M. Emilius Scaurus. Memmius was slain by the mob of Saturninus and Glaucia, while a candidate for the consulship in 100.—2. C. MEMMIUS GEMELLUS, tribune of the plebs 66, curule ædile 60, and prætor 58. He belonged at that time to the Senatorian party, since he impeached P. Vatinius, opposed P. Clodius, and was vehement in his invectives against Julius Cæsar. But before he competed for the consulship, 54, he had been reconciled to Cæsar, who supported him with all his interest. Memmius, however, again offended Cæsar by revealing a certain coalition with his opponents at the comitia. He was impeached for ambitus, and, receiving no aid from Cæsar, withdrew from Rome to Mytilene, where he was living in the year of Cicero's proconsulate. Memmius married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla, whom he divorced after having by her at least one son, C. Memmius. Vid. No. 3. He was eminent both in literature and in eloquence. Lucretius dedicated his poem, De Rerum Natura, to him. He was a man of profligate character, and wrote indecent poems.—3. C. MEMMIUS, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs 54, when he prosecuted A. Gabinius for malversation in his province of Syria, and Domitius Calvinus for ambitus at his consular comitia. Memmius was step-son of T. Annius Milo, who married his mother Fausta after her divorce. He was consul suffectus 34.—4. P. MEMMIUS REGILLUS, consul suffectus A.D. 31, afterward præfect of Macedonia and Achaia. He was the husband of Lollia Paulina, and was compelled by Caligula to divorce her.

MEMNON (Μήνων). 1. The beautiful son of Ithionus and Eos (Aurora), and brother of Emealion. He is rarely mentioned by Homer, and must be regarded essentially as a post-Homeric hero. According to these later traditions, he was a prince of the Ethiopians, who came to the assistance of his uncle Priam, for Ithionus and Priam were half-brothers, being both sons of Laomedon by different mothers. Respecting his expedition to Troy there are different legends. According to some, Memnon the Ethiopian first went to Egypt, thence to Susa, and thence to Troy. At Susa, which had been founded by Ithionus, Memnon built the acropolis, which was called after him the Memnonium. According to others, Ithionus was the governor of a Persian province and the favorite of Teutamus; and Memnon obtained the command of a large host of Ethiopians and Scythians to succor Priam. Memnon came to the war in armor made for him by Vulcan (Hephaestus). He slew Antilochus, the son of Nestor, but was himself slain by Achilles after a long and fierce combat. While the two heroes were fighting Jupiter (Zeus) weighed their fates, and the scale containing Memnon's sank. His mother was inconsolable at his death. She wept for him every morning; and the dew-drops of the morning are the tears of Aurora (Eos). To soothe the grief of his mother, Jupiter (Zeus) caused a number of birds to issue out of the funeral pile, on which the body of Memnon was burning, which, after flying thrice around the burning pile, divided into two separate bodies, which fought so fiercely that half of them fell down upon the ashes of the hero, and thus formed a funeral sacrifice for him. These birds were called Memnonides, and, according to a subsequent current on the Hellespont, they visited every year the tomb of the hero. At the entrance of Aurora (Eos), Jupiter (Zeus) conferred immortality upon Memnon. At a comparatively late period, the Greeks gave the name of Memnon to the colossal statue in the neighborhood of Thebes, which was said to give forth a sound like the snapping asunder of a chord when it was struck by the first rays of the rising sun. Although the Greeks gave this name to the statue, they were well aware that the Egyptians did not call the statue Memnon, but Amenophis. This figure was made of black stone, in a sitting posture, with its feet close together, and its hands leaning on the seat. Several very ingenious conjectures have been propounded respecting the alleged meaning of the so-called statue of Memnon. Some have asserted that it served for astronomical purposes, and others that it had reference to the mystic worship of the sun and light, but there can be little doubt that the statue represented nothing else than the Egyptian king Amenophis.—2. A native of Rhodes, joined Artabazus, satrap of Lower Phrygia, who had married his sister, in his revolt against Darius Ocbus. When fortune deserted the insurgents, they fled to the court of Philip. Mentor, the brother of Memnon, being high in favor with Darius, interceded on behalf of Artabazus and Memnon, who were pardoned and again received into favor. On the death of Mentor, Memnon, who possessed great military skill and experience, succeeded him in his authority, which extended over all the western coast of Asia Minor (about B.C. 336). When Alexander invaded Asia, Memnon defeated Halicarnassus against Alexander until it was no longer possible to hold out. he then with-my and a fleet, with the design of carrying into Greece, but died at Mytilene in 1010 B.C. as he could carry his plan into execution his death was an irreparable loss to the cause, for several Greek states were to join him had he carried the war into —3. A native of Heraclea Pontica, wrote work on the history of that city. Of how old it consisted, we do not know. Phocæ read from the ninth to the sixteenth, of which portion he has made a tedious abstract. The first eight books of read, and he speaks of other books sixteen. The ninth book began with that of the tyrant Clearchus, the disciple and Isocrates, and the sixteenth book was to the time of Julius Cæsar, after which had obtained the supreme power. It was probably written in the time of Augustus, and certainly not later than the time of the Antonines. The Excerpta are published separately by Orelli, 1827.

MEMNON and -IA (Μεμνόνιος, Μεμνόνια), was applied by the Greeks to certain buildings and monuments in Egypt which they supposed to have been erected in honor of MEMNON. 1. The statue of these was a great temple at Thebes, described by Strabo, and commonly by modern travellers with the magnificence of the temple of Nemesis at Western Thebes, or, as it is usually called, the tomb of Ozymandias, from its agreeing with the description of that monument given by Pausanias. There are, however, strong reasons for supposing that the true Memnonion at Thebes, stood behind the two statues on the plain of Thebes, and that the clearly the vocal statue of Memnon at Thebes is entirely disappeared.—2. The citadel of Susa was and its erection was ascribed to the hero Memnon in the legends of the Trojan War. There is no reason to suppose that the Memnon with the Persian captive before the Persian conquest of Egypt. Μεμνόνιος, Μερν: in the Old Testament, Memphites: now ruins at Memphis, a great city of Egypt, second only to Thebes, after the fall of Thebes, the capital of the whole country, which it had previously shared with Thebes of unknown antiquity, its foundations ascribed to Menes. It stood on the west bank of the Nile, about ten miles from the pyramids of Giza, near the northern frontier of Egypt, or Middle Egypt, a city (Μεμνόνιος) was named after the hero connected by canals with the lakes of Mareotis, and was the great centre of Egypt until the Persian conquest (524), when Cambyses partially destroyed it. After the foundation of Alexandria into insignificance, and was finally at the Arab conquest in the seventh century. In the time of its splendor it is said to have been one hundred and fifty stadia in extent, and half a day's journey in length. Of the splendid buildings with which it was adorned, the chief were the palace of the Pharaohs; the temple-palace of the god bull Apis; the temple of Serapis, with its avenue of sphinxes, now covered by the sand of the desert; and the temple of Vulcan (Hephestus), the Egyptian Phtha, of whose worship Memphis was the chief seat. The ruins of this temple, and of other buildings, still cover a large portion of the plain between the Nile and the western range of hills which skirt its valley.

MEMNONIUM or MEMN (Menenius, Cic., Menenius, Plin., but on coins Menenius: now Mineo, a town on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Hybla, the birth-place and residence of the Sicilian chief Ducetius, who was long a formidable enemy of the Greek cities in Sicily. Vid DUCKETIUS. On his fall the town lost all its importance.

MEMALIPPUS. Vid MELANIPPUS.

MENANDER (Μένανδρος), of Athens, the most distinguished poet of the New Comedy, was the son of Diopithes and Hegesistratus, and flourished in the time of the successors of Alexander. He was born B.C. 342. His father, Diopithes, commanded the Athenian forces on the Hellespont in the year of his son's birth. Alexander, the comic poet, was the uncle of Menander on the father's side; and we may naturally suppose that the young Menander derived from his uncle his taste for the comic drama, and was instructed by him in its rules of composition. His character must have been greatly influenced by his intimacy with Theophrastus and Epicurus, of whom the former was his teacher and the latter his intimate friend. His taste and sympathies were altogether with the philosophy of Epicurus; and in an epigram he declared that "as Themistocles rescued Greece from slavery, so Epicurus from unreason." From Theophrastus, on the other hand, he must have derived much of that skill in the discrimination of character which we so much admire in the Characters of the philosopher, and which formed the great charm of the comedies of Menander. His master's attention to external elegance and comfort he not only imitated, but, as was natural in a man of an elegant person, a joyous spirit, and a serene and easy temper, he carried it to the extreme of luxury and effeminacy. The moral character of Menander is defended by modern writers against the aspersions of Suidas and others. Thus much is certain, that his comedies contain nothing offensive, at least to the taste of his own and the following ages, none of the purest, it must be admitted, as they were frequently acted at private banquets. Of the actual events of his life we know but little. He enjoyed the friendship of Demetrius Phalereus, whose attention was first drawn to him by admiration of his works. Ptolemy, the son of Lagus, was also one of his admirers; and he invited the poet to his court at Alexandria, but Menander seems to have declined the proffered honor. He died at Athens B.C. 291, at the age of 53, and is said to have been drowned while swimming in the harbor of Piræus. Notwithstanding Menander's fame as a poet, his public dramatic career was not eminently successful; for, though he composed upward of one hundred comedies, he gained the prize only eight times. His preference for elegant exhibitions of character above coarse jest ing may have been the reason why he was not so great a favorite with the common people as his principal rival, Philemon, who is said, moreover to have used unfair means of gaining popularity. Menander appears to have borne the popular neglect very lightly, in the consciousness of his superiority; and once when he happened to meet Philemon, he is said to have asked him, "Pray, Philemon, do not you blush when you gain a victory over me?" The neglect of Menander's contemporaries has been amply compensated by his posthumous fame. His comedies retained their place on the stage down to the time of Plutarch, and the unanimous consent of antiquity placed him at the head of the New Comedy, and on an equality with the great masters of the various kinds of poetry. His comedies were imitated by the Roman dramatists, particularly by Terence, who was little more than a translator of Menander. But we can not form, from any one play of Terence, a fair notion of the corresponding play of Menander, as the Roman poet frequently compressed two of Menander's plays into one. It was this mixing up of different plays that Cæsar pointed to by the phrase O dimidiata Menander, in the epigram which he wrote upon Terence. Of Menander's comedies only fragments are extant. The best edition of them is by Meineke, in his Fragmenta Comicorum Græcorum, Berol., 1841.

[MENANDER (Μένανδρος). 1. An Athenian officer in the Sicilian expedition, associated in the supreme command with Nicias, toward the end of the year B.C. 414; he afterward served with Alcibiades against Pharnabazus, and was one of the commanders at the disastrous battle of Ægos-potami.—2. King of Bactria, was one of the most powerful of all the Greek rulers of that country, and one of those who made the most extensive conquests in India, reaching beyond the Hypanis or Sutledj.—3. Surnamed Protector, a Greek writer of Byzantium in the latter half of the sixth century. He wrote a history of the Eastern empire from A.D. 559 to 582 in eight books, of which considerable extracts have been preserved in the "Eclogæ Legationum" attributed to Constantinus Porphyrogenitus. Edited by Bekker and Niebuhr, Bonn, 1830.]

MENAPIA (Μενάπια), a city of Bactriana, on the River Zariaspis.

MENAPII, a powerful people in the north of Gallia Belgica, originally dwelt on both banks of the Rhine, but were afterward driven out of their possessions on the right bank by the Usi-petes and Tenchteri, and inhabited only the left bank near its mouth, and west of the Mosæ. Their country was covered with forests and swamps. They had a fortress on the Mosæ called Castellum Menapiorum (now Kessel).

MENAS (Μηνάς), also called MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος) by Appian, a freedman of Pompey the Great, was one of the principal commanders of the fleet of Sextus Pompey in his war against Octavianus and Antony, B.C. 40. In 39 he tried in vain to dissuade his master from concluding a peace with Octavianus and Antony; and, at an entertainment given to them by Sextus on board his ship at Misenum, Menas suggested to him to cut the cables of the vessel, and, running it out to sea, dispatch both his rivals. The treacherous proposal, however rejected by Pompey. On the breaking the war again in 38, Menas deserted Pompey and went over to Octavianus. In 36 he returned to his old master's service; but in the course of the same year he again played the deserter, and joined Octavianus. In 35 he accompanied Octavianus in the Pannonian campaign, and was slain at the siege of Siscia. According to the old scholiasts, this Menas is the person so vehemently attacked by Horace in his fourth epode. This statement has been called in question by many modern commentators; but their arguments are far from satisfactory.

MENDE or MENDÆ (Μένδη, Μενδαίος), a town on the western coast of the Macedonian peninsula Pellene and on the Thermaic Gulf, was a colony of the Eretrians, and was celebrated for its wine. It was for some time a place of considerable importance, but was ruined by the foundation of Cassandrea.

MENDES (Μένδης; Μενδιόσιος; ruins near Metarich), a considerable city of the Delta of Egypt, on the southern side of the Lake of Tanis (now Menzaleh), and on the bank of one of the lesser arms of the Nile, named after it Μενδιόσιος οὐχίος, the chief seat of the worship of Mendes.

MENECLÆS (Μενεκλῆς). 1. Of Barca in Cyrene, an historian of uncertain date.—2. Of Alabanda, a celebrated rhetorician. He and his brother Hierocles taught rhetoric at Rhodes, where the orator M. Antonius heard them, about B.C. 94.

MENECRITES (Μενεκρίτης). 1. A Syracusan physician at the court of Philip, king of Macedonia, B.C. 359-336. He made himself ridiculous by calling himself "Jupiter," and assuming divine honors. There is a tale that he was invited one day by Philip to a magnificent entertainment, where the other guests were continually fed, while he himself had nothing but incense and libations, as not being subject to the human infirmity of hunger. He was at first pleased with his reception, but afterward perceiving the joke, and finding that no more substantial food was offered him, he left the party in disgust.—2. TIBERIUS CLAUDIUS MENECRITES, a physician mentioned by Galen, composed more than one hundred and fifty medical works of which only a few fragments remain.

MENEDEMUS (Μενέδημος), a Greek philosopher was a native of Eretria, and, though of noble birth, was poor, and worked for a livelihood either as a builder or as a tent-maker. According to one story, he seized the opportunity afforded by his being sent on some military service to MEGARA to hear Plato, and abandoned the army to addict himself to philosophy; but it may be questioned whether he was old enough to have heard Plato before the death of the latter. According to another story, he and his friend Asclepiades got their livelihood as candle-workers during the night, that they might have leisure for philosophy in the day. The two friends afterward became disciples of Socrates at Megara. From Megara they went to Etha, and placed themselves under the instruction of some disciples of Phædo. On his return to Eretria Menedemus established a school of philosophy, which was called the Eretrian. He did not, however, confine himself to scholastic results, but took an active part in the politics of his native city, and came to be a leading man in the state. He went on various missions to Lysimachus, Demetrius, and others, but, being suspected of the treacherous conduct of betraying Eretria into the power of Demetrius, he quitted his native city secretly, and took refuge with Antigonus in Asia. Here he devoted himself to death in the seventy-fourth year of his age, probably about B.C. 277. Of the philosophy of Menedemus little is known, that it closely resembled that of the Megaric school. Vid. EUCLIDUS, No. 2.

MENELAI or -US. PORTUS (Μενελαίος λιμήν), now Marsa-Toubrouk, or Ras-el-Medinet, an ancient city on the coast of Mar- in Northern Africa, founded, according to tradition, by Menelaus. It is remarkable in as the place where Agesilaus died.

LIUM (Μενελαίου), a mountain in Laconia, northeast of Sparta, near Therapne, on which the heron of Menelaus was situated, the remains of which temple were discovered in 1834.

LIUS (Μενέλαος, Μενέλεως, or Μενέλας), of Plutarch, of Atreus, and younger of Agamemnon. His early life is related by AGAMEMNON. He was king of Lacedaemon, and married to the beautiful Helen, when he became the father of Hermione. Helen had been carried off by Paris, Menelaus and Ulysses sailed to Troy in order to her restitution. Menelaus was hospitably received by Antenor, but the journey was all in vain; and the Trojan Antimachus even killed his fellow-citizens to kill Menelaus and Therapne Menelaus and his brother Menelaus resolved to march against Troy the forces that Greece could muster. Menelaus was chosen the commander-in-chief, the Trojan war Menelaus was under the protection of Juno (Hera) and Minerva, and distinguished himself by his valor in battle. He killed many illustrious Trojans, and would have slain Paris also in combat, had not the latter been carried off by Aphrodite in a cloud. Menelaus of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse, and as soon as Troy was taken, he and his wife Helen fled to the house of Deiphobus, married Helen after the death of Paris, and lived to death in a barbarous manner.

It is said to have been secretly introduced into the chamber of Deiphobus by Helen, became reconciled to her former husband, was among the first that sailed away from Troy, accompanied by his wife Helen and his son Telemachus. He was eight years wandering about the coast of the Mediterranean before he returned home. He arrived at Sparta on the coast of Laconia, where Orestes was engaged in a contest with Iphigeneia and Aegisthus. Hence he lived with Helen at Sparta in peace and happiness, and his palace shone in its splendor as in the moon. When Telemachus came to Sparta to inquire after his father, Menelaus, remarking the marriage of his daughter with Neoptolemus, and of his son with a daughter of Alector. In epic poems Menelaus is described as a brave and athletic figure; he spoke little, but what he said was always impressive; he was brave and courageous, but milder than Agamemnon, intelligent and hospitable. According to the prophecy of Proteus in the Odyssey, Menelaus and Helen were not to die, but the gods were to conduct them to Elysium. According to a later tradition, he and Helen went to the Taurians, where they were sacrificed by Iphigeneia to Diana (Artemis). Menelaus was worshipped as a hero at Therapne, where his tomb and that of Helen were shown. Respecting the tale that Helen never went to Troy, but was detained in Egypt, vid. HELENA.—2. Son of Lagos, and brother of Ptolemy Soter, held possession of Cyprus for his brother, but was defeated and driven out of the island by Demetrius Poliorcetes, B.C. 308.—3. A Greek mathematician, a native of Alexandria, the author of an extant treatise in three books, on the Sphere. He made some astronomical observations at Rome in the first year of the Emperor Trajan, A.D. 98.

MENELAIUS (Μενέλαος), a city of Lower Egypt, on the Canopic branch of the Nile, named after the brother of Ptolemy the son of Lagos. It was made the capital of the district between the lakes of Mœris and Mareotis (τοπος Μενελαίου).

MENENIUS LANATUS. 1. AGRIFFA, consul B.C. 503, conquered the Sabines. It was owing to his mediation that the first great rupture between the patricians and plebeians, when the latter seceded to the Sacred Mount, was brought to a happy and peaceful termination in 493, and it was upon this occasion he is said to have related to the plebeians his well-known fable of the belly and its members.—2. T., consul 477, was defeated by the Etruscans. He had previously allowed the Fabii to be destroyed by the Etruscans, although he might have assisted them with his army. For this act of treachery he was brought to trial by the tribunes and condemned to pay a fine. He took his punishment so much to heart, that he shut himself up in his house and died of grief.

MENES (Μήνης), first king of Egypt, according to the traditions of the Egyptians themselves. Herodotus records of him that he built Memphis on a piece of ground which he had rescued from the river by turning it from its former course, and erected therein a magnificent temple to Hephaestus (Phthah). Diodorus tells us that he introduced into Egypt the worship of the gods and the practice of sacrifices, as well as a more elegant and luxurious style of living. That he was a conqueror, like other founders of kingdoms, we learn from an extract from Manetho preserved by Eusebius. By Marsham and others he has been identified with the Mizraim of Scripture. According to some accounts he was killed by a hippopotamus.

MENESTHEUS PORTUS (now Porto de S. Maria), a harbor in Hispania Bætica, not far from Gades, with an oracle of Menestheus, who is said in some legends to have settled in Spain.

MENESTHEUS (Μενέσθευς). 1. Son of Peteus, an Athenian king, who led the Athenians against Troy, and surpassed all other mortals in arranging the war-steeds and men for battle. With the assistance of the Tyndarids, he is said to have driven Theseus from his kingdom.—2. Son of Iphicrates, the famous Athenian general, by the daughter of Cotys, king of Thrace. He married the daughter of Timotheus; and in 356 was chosen commander in the Social war, his father and his father-in-law being appointed to aid him with their counsel and experience. They were all three impeached by their colleague, CHARES, for alleged misconduct and treachery in the campaign; but Iphicrates and Menestheus were acquitted.

[MENESTHIUS (Μενεσθιος). 1. Son of Areithous, king of Arne in Boeotia, was slain by Paris.—2. Son of Sperchius or of Borus and Polydora, nephew of Achilles, a leader of the Myrmidons before Troy.]

[MENESTRATUS (Μενεστρατος), a sculptor, whose Hercules and Hecate were greatly admired. The latter stood in the opisthodomus of the temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, and was made of marble of such brilliancy that it was necessary to warn beholders to shade their eyes, says Pliny.]

[MENEXENUS (Μενέξενος), an Athenian, son of Demophon, was a disciple of Socrates, and is introduced by Plato as one of the interlocutors in the dialogues Lysis and Menexenus.]

MENINX or LOTOPHAGITES, afterward GIBBA (Μηνίξ, Λωτοφαγίτις, Δωτοφάγην νήσος: now Jerbah), a considerable island, close to the coast of Africa Propria, at the southeastern extremity of the Lesser Syrtis, with two cities, Meninx (now Menaz) on the northeast, and Gierba, or Gerra, on the southwest. It was the birth-place of the emperors Vibius Gallus and Volusianus.

MENIPPE (Μενίππη), daughter of Orion and sister of Metioche. These two sisters put themselves to death of their own accord in order to propitiate the two Erinyes, who had visited Aonia with a plague. They were metamorphosed by Proserpina (Persephone) and Pluto (Hades) into comets, and the Aonians erected to them a sanctuary near Orchomenos.

MENIPPUS (Μένιππος). 1. A cynic philosopher, and originally a slave, was a native of Gadara in Coele-Syria. He seems to have been a hearer of Diogenes, and flourished about B.C. 60. He amassed great wealth as a usurer (ἡμεροδραστής), but was cheated out of it all, and committed suicide. We are told that he wrote nothing serious, but that his books were full of jests; whence it would appear that he was one of those cynic philosophers who threw all their teaching into a satirical form. In this character he is several times introduced by Lucian. His works are now entirely lost; but we have considerable fragments of Varro's Satura Menippeæ, written in imitation of Menippus.—[2. Of Stratonice, a Carian by birth, was the most accomplished orator of his time in all Asia. Cicero, who heard him, puts him almost on a level with the Attic orators.—3. Of Pergamus, a geographer, lived in the time of Augustus, and wrote a Περίπλους τῆς ἐντὸς θαλάττης, of which an abridgment was made by Marcianus, and of which some fragments are preserved. Vid. MARCIANUS.]

MENNIS, a city of Adiabene, in Assyria, only mentioned by Curtius (v., 1).

[MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος) Vid. MENAS.]

MENODORUS (Μηνόδορος), a physician of Nymmedia in Bithynia, who was a pupil of Asclepius of Landicea, and tutor to Herodotus of Tarsus; he belonged to the medical sect of the Empirici, and lived probably about the beginning of the second century after Christ.

MENŒCEUS (Μενόκεός). 1. A Theban, grand son of Pentheus, and father of Hipponome, Icasta, and Creon.—2. Grandson of the former, and son of Creon. He put an end to his life because Tiresias had declared that his death would bring victory to his country, when the seven Argive heroes marched against Thebes. His tomb was shown at Thebes near the Neitan gate.

[MENŒTES. 1. Pilot of the ship of Gyas, who threw him overboard for having delayed his vessel in the race at the celebration of the games in honor of Anchises.—2. An Arcadian who fought on the side of Æneas in Italy, and was slain by Turnus.]

MENŒTIUS (Μενότιος). 1. Son of Iapetus and Clymene or Asia, and brother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. He was killed by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning in the battle with the Titans, and was hurled into Tartarus.—2. Son of Actor and Ægina, husband of Polymele or Sthenele, and father of Patroclus, who is hence called Menæteus. After Patroclus had slain the son of Amphidamas, Menæteus fled with him to Peleus in Phthia, and had him educated there.

[MENON (Μένων). 1. A Trojan warrior slain by Leonteus.—2. A citizen of Pharsalus in Thessaly, who aided the Athenians at Marathon with twelve talents and two hundred horsemen raised by himself from his own penestæ, and was rewarded for these services with the freedom of the city.—3. A Thessalian adventurer, was one of the generals of the Greek mercenaries in the army of Cyrus the Younger when the latter marched into Upper Asia against his brother Artaxerxes, B.C. 401. After the death of Cyrus he was apprehended along with the other Greek generals by Tissaphernes, and was put to death by lingering tortures, which lasted for a whole year. His character is drawn in the blackest colors by Xenophon. He is the same as the Menon introduced in the dialogues of Plato, which bears his name.

MENS, a personification of mind, worshipped by the Romans. She had a sanctuary on the Capitol; and the object of her worship was, that the citizens might always be guided by her right spirit.

[MENŒTES (Μένωτης). 1. Leader of the Gigantes, under whose form Apollo encouraged Hector to prevent Menelaus carrying off the armor of Euphorbus.—2. Son of Anchialus, leader of the Taphians, guest-friend of Ulysses. Minerva assumed his form when she appeared to Telemachus to arouse him to go in search of the absent Ulysses.]

MENTĒSA (Mentesānus). 1. Surnamed BASTIA, a town of the Oretani in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Castulo to Carthago Nova.—2. A small town of the Bastuli in the south of Hispania Bética.

MENTOR (Μέντωρ). 1. Son of Alcione, and a faithful friend of Ulysses, [to whom the latter confided the supervision of his household when going out for Troy. Minerva assumed his arm to give instructions to the young Telemachus, and accompanied him as Mentor to the court of Nestor.—2. Father of Imbrius of Caria, who fought on the side of the Trojans, is called by Homer "rich in horses."—3. A Greek of Rhodes, who, with his brother Memnon, rendered active assistance to Artabazus. When the latter found himself compelled to take refuge at the court of Philip, Mentor entered the service of Nectanabis, king of Egypt. He was sent to the assistance of Tennes, king of Sidon, his revolt against Darius Ochus; and when the Greeks went over to the Persians, Mentor was taken into the service of Darius. He rose rapidly in the favor of Darius, and eventually received a satrapy, including all the western coast of Asia Minor. His influence with Darius enabled him to procure the pardon of his brother Memnon. He died in possession of his satrapy, and was succeeded by his brother Memnon. Vid. MEMNON.—4. The most celebrated after chaser among the Greeks, who must have perished before B.C. 356. His works were vases and cups, which were most highly prized by the Romans.

(ΜΕΝΤΟΡΙΔΕΣ (Μέντορες), a people on the coast of Liburnia, in the district Mentoreice (Μεντοριχία); they also possessed the islands situated on this coast in the Adriatic called "Insulæ Mentoridae" (Μεντοριπίδες), now probably Veglia, Ark. Cherso, &c.] (ΜΕΝΤΙΛΛΟΣ (Μένυλλος). 1. A Macedonian, appointed to command the Macedonian garrison at Molychia after the Lamiac war, B.C. 322. He was a just man, and on friendly terms with Phocion. He was replaced by Nicanor, B.C. 319, on the death of Antipater.—2. Of Albanian, ambassador to Rome in B.C. 162, from Ptolemy VI. Philometor, to plead his cause against his younger brother Physcon: his mission, however, was unsuccessful. While at Rome, he, with Polybius, aided in effecting the escape of the Syrian prince Demetrius.]

MERCURII PROMOTORIUM. Vid. HERMÆUM. MERCURIALIS, a Roman divinity of commerce and gain. The character of the god is clear from his name, which is connected with merc and mercari. A temple was built to him as early as B.C. 496, near the Circus Maximus; an altar of the god existed near the Porta Capena, by the side of a well; and in later times a temple seems to have been built on the same spot. Under the name of the ill-willed (malevolus), he had a statue in what was called the strada sobria, or the sober street, in which no shops were allowed to be kept, and milk was offered to him there instead of wine. This statue had a purse in its hand, to indicate his functions. His festival was celebrated on the twenty-fifth of May, and chiefly by merchants, who also visited the well near the Porta Capena, in which magic powers were ascribed; and with water from that well they used to sprinkle themselves and their merchandise, that they might be purified, and yield a large profit. The Romans of later times identified Mercurius, the patron of merchants and tradespeople, with the Greek Hermes, and transferred all the attributes and myths of the latter to the former. The Fœtiales, however, never recognized the identity, and, instead of the caduceus, used a zucchero branch as the emblem of peace. The resemblance between Mercurius and Hermes is indeed very slight, and their identification is a proof of the thoughtless manner in which the Romans acted in this respect. Vid. HERMES.

MERCURIUS ΤΑΙΝΕΙΟΙΣΤΟΣ Vid. HERMES ΤΑΙΝΕΙΟΙΣΤΟΣ.

ΜΕΛΙΘΩΝΙΑ (Μηλιόνης), a Cretan hero, son of Molus, who, conjointly with Idomeneus, led the Cretans in eighty ships against Troy. He was one of the bravest heroes in the Trojan war, and usually acted together with his friend Idomeneus. Later traditions relate that on his way homeward he was thrown on the coast of Sicily, where he was received by the Cretans who had settled there; whereas, according to others, he returned safely to Crete, and was buried and worshipped as a hero, together with Idomeneus, at Cnosus.

ΜΕΜΗΕΥΣ (Μέμμερος). 1. Son of Jason and Medea, also called Macareus or Mormorus, was murdered, together with his brother Pheres, by his mother at Corinth.—2. Son of Pheres, and grandson of Jason and Medea.—[3. A Trojan, slain by Antilochus.—4. A Centaur, slain at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

ΜΕΜΝΗΣΣΟΣ or ΜΥΜΝΗΣΣΟΣ (Μερμησσοός, Μυμνησσοός), also written ΜΑΜΝΗΣΣΟΣ and ΜΑΜΦΗΣΣΟΣ, a town of Mysia, in the territory of Iampisacus, not far from Polichna, the native place of a sibyl.

(ΜΕΜΝΗΔΑΙ (Μερμνάδαι), a Lydian family, which, on the murder of Candaules by Gyges, succeeded the Heraclids on the throne of Lydia, and held it for five generations, about 716-546 B.C. The sovereigns of this family were Gyges, Ardys, Sadyattes, Alyattes, and Croesus.]

MEROBAUDES, FLAVIUS, a general and a poet, whose merits are recorded in an inscription on the base of a statue dug up in the Ulpian forum at Rome in the year 1812 or 1813. We learn from the inscription that the statue was erected in A.D. 435. Some fragments of the poems of Merobaudes were discovered by Niebuhr upon a palimpsest belonging to the monastery of St. Gall, and were published by him at Bonn, 1823, [and again in 1824; they are also printed in a volume of the Corpus Script. Byzant., with Corippus, edited by Bekker, Bonn, 1836.]

ΜΕΡΩΗ (Μερόη: now ports of Nubia and Senar), the island, so called, and almost an island in reality, formed by the rivers Astapus (now Blue Nile) and Astaboras (now Atbara), and the portion of the Nile between their mouths, was a district of Æthiopia. Its capital, also called Meroë, stood near the northern point of the island, on the eastern bank of the Nile, below the modern Shendy, where the plain, near the village of Assour, is covered with ruins of temples, pyramids, and other works in a style closely resembling the Egyptian. Standing in a fertile district, rich in timber and minerals, at the foot of the highlands of Abyssinia, and at the junction of two great rivers, Meroë became, at a very early period, a chief emporium for the trade between Egypt, Northern Africa, Æthiopia, Arabia, and India, and the capital of a powerful state. The government was a hierarchical monarchy, entirely in the hands of a ruing caste of priests, who chose a king from among themselves, bound him to govern according to their laws, and put him to death when they chose; until King Ergamenes (about B.C. 300) threw off the yoke of the priests, whom he massacred, and converted his kingdom into an absolute monarchy. The priests of Meroë were closely connected in origin and customs with those of Egypt; and, according to some traditions, the latter sprang from the former, and they from India; but the settlement of this point involves an important ethnical question, which lies beyond the limits of this book. For further details respecting the kingdom of Meroë, vid. Æthiopia. Meroë had a celebrated oracle of Ammon.

MĒRŌPĒ (Μερόπη). 1. One of the Heliades or sisters of Phæthōn.—2. Daughter of Atlas, one of the Pleiades, and wife of Sisyphus of Corinth, by whom she became the mother of Glaucus. In the constellation of the Pleiades she is the seventh and the least visible star, because she is ashamed of having had intercourse with a mortal man.—3. Daughter of Cypselus, wife of Crespheutes, and mother of Æpytus. For details, vid. Æpytus.

MĒRŌPĒ (Μερόπη). 1. King of the island of Cos, husband of the nymph Ethemea, and father of Eumelus. His wife was killed by Diana (Artemis) because she had neglected to worship that goddess. Merops, in order to rejoin his wife, wished to make away with himself, but Juno (Hera) changed him into an eagle, whom she placed among the stars.—2. King of the Æthiopians, by whose wife, Clymene, Helios became the father of Phæthōn.—3. King of Rhynchus, on the Hellespont, also called Mazor or Macareus, was a celebrated soothsayer, and father of Clite, Arisbe, Amphius, and Adrastus.—[4. A Trojan, companion of Æneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

MĒRŪLA, L. CORNELIUS, was flamen dialis, and, on the deposition of L. Cinna in B.C. 87, was elected consul in his place. On the capture of Rome by Marius and Cinna at the close of the same year, Merula put an end to his own life in order to escape the hands of the executioner.

MESAMBRIA (Μεσαμβρία; now Bushehr), a peninsula on the coast of Persia, near the River Padargus.

MESCHĒLA (Μεσχέλα; probably near Bonah), a large city on the coast of Northern Africa, said to have been founded by Greeks returning from the Trojan war. It was taken by Eumachus, the lieutenant of Agathocles.

MESSEMBRIA (Μεσημβρία, Herod. Μεσαυβρία; Μεσημβριανός). 1. (Now Missiria or Messuri), a celebrated town of Thrace on the Pontus Euxinus, and at the foot of Mount Hæmus, founded by the inhabitants of Chalcedon and Byzantium in the time of Darius Hytaspis, and hence called a colony of Megara, since those two towns were founded by the Megarians.—2. A town in Thrace, but of much less importance, on the coast of the Ægean Sea, and in the territory of the Cicones, near the mouth of the Lissus, and the most westerly of the Samothracian settlements on the main land.

MĒSANĒ (Μεσάνη, i. e., Midland), a name given to that part of Babylonia which consisted of the great island formed by the Euphrates, the Tigris, and the Royal Canal, and contained, therefore, the greater part of Babylonia.

MĒSŌA or MESSŌA. Vid. SPARTA.

MĒSŌGĒĒS (Μεσσηγιός), a lyric and epigrammatic poet under Hadrian and the Antonines was a native of Crete, and a freedman of Hadrian, whose favorite Antinous he celebrated in a poem. A salary, which he had received from Hadrian, was diminished by Antoninus Pius. Three poems of his are preserved in the Greek Anthology.

MĒSŌDŌRĒMĒIA (Μεσοδορία, Μίση τὴν ποταμῶν; in the Old Testament, Aram Nabaram, i. e., Syria between the Rivers: LXX., Μεσοδορία Συρίας; now Al-Jesra, i. e., The Island), a district of Western Asia, named from its position between the Euphrates and the Tigris, of which rivers the former divided it from Syria and Arabia on the west, the latter from Assyria on the east: on the north it was separated from Armenia by a branch of the Taurus, called Mesius, and on the south from Babylonia by the Median Wall. The name was first used by the Greeks in the time of the Seleucids. In earlier times the country was reckoned a part, sometimes of Syria, and sometimes of Assyria. Now in the division of the Persian empire was it recognized as a distinct country, but it belonged to the satrapy of Babylonia. Excepting the mountainous region on the north and north-east, formed by the chain of Masrus, and its prolongation parallel to the Tigris, the country formed a vast plain, broken by few hills, well watered by rivers and canals, and very fertile, except in the southern part, which was most like the Arabian Desert on the opposite side of the Euphrates. Besides corn, and fruits, and spices (e. g., the amomum), it produced fine timber and supported large herds of cattle; in the southern, or desert part, there were numerous wild animals, such as wild asses, gazelles, antelopes, and lions. Its chief mineral products were naphtha and jet. The northern part of Mesopotamia was divided into the districts of MYADONIA and OSROZENA. It belonged successively to the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, Syro-Grecian, Parthian, and later Persian empires. In a wider sense, the name is sometimes applied to the whole country between the Euphrates and the Tigris.

MESPĒLA (ἡ Μεσπύλα; ruins at Konyasak, opposite to Mosul, Layard: others give different sites for it), a city of Assyria, on the eastern side of the Tigris, which Xenophon (Anab. iii., 4) mentions as having been formerly a great city, inhabited by Medes, but in his time fallen to decay. It had a wall six parasangs in circuit, composed of two parts, namely, a battlement feet thick and fifty high, of polished stone, full of shells (the limestone of the country), upon which was built a brick wall fifty feet thick and one hundred high. It had served, according to tradition, as the refuge for the Median queen when the Persians overthrew the empire of the Medes, and it resisted all the efforts of the Persian king to take it, until a thunder storm frightened the inhabitants into surrender.

SAÏTENE OF -ICÆ (Μεσσαβιτηνή, Messan-Messabitas), a small district on the western margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley on the borders of Media, Persia, Babylonia, reckoned sometimes to Persia and sometimes to Susiana. The name seems to be derived from the mountain passes in the district of MESSALLA, the name of a distinguished family of the Valeria gens at Rome. It appears for the first time on the consular list B.C. 263, and for the last in A.D. 506. VALERIUS MAXIMUS CORVINUS MESSALA, consul B.C. 263, and, in conjunction with Lucius M. Otacilius, carried on the war commenced against the Carthaginians in Sicily; the two consuls concluded a peace with

In consequence of his relieving Messala obtained the cognomen of Messala. Messala was distinguished by two remarkable achievements of his victory—by a pictorial representation of a battle with the Sicilian armies, which he placed in the Curia, and by a sun-dial (horologium), from the temple of Catana, which was set up on a column in the rostra in the forum. Messala is mentioned in 252.—2. M. VALERIUS MESSALA, 26.—3. M. VALERIUS MESSALA, prætor 184, and consul 189, when he had the province of Liguria.—4. M. VALERIUS MESSALA, consul 161, and censor 164.—5. M. VALERIUS MESSALA NIGER, prætor 63, consul 61, or 55. He belonged to the aristocratic party. He married a sister of the orator Quintus, by whom he had at least one son, VALERIUS MESSALA, son of the preceding consul 53; belonged, like his father, to the aristocratic party; but in consequence of his enmity to Pompey, he joined the civil war, and served under him. He was in high repute for his skill in oratory, on which science he wrote.—7. M. VALERIUS MESSALA, son of the prætor, partly educated at Athens, where he began his intimacy with Horace and Virgil. After Cæsar's death (44) he joined the republican party, and attached himself especially to Cassius, whom, long after, when he had become the friend of Augustus, he was accustomed to call "my general." Messala was distinguished; but since his kinsmen proved his loyalty to Rome at the time of Cæsar's assassination, the triumvirs erased his name from the public records and offered him security for his person. Messala, however, rejected their offer, and fled to Cassius into Asia, and at Philippi, on the first day's battle, turned Augustus's army against his camp, and narrowly missed being taken prisoner. After the death of Brutus and Cassius, Messala, with a numerous body of followers, took refuge in the island of Thasos, where, though defeated, were not killed, and offered him the command. He refused them to accept honorable terms, and to whom he attached himself unreservedly. His influence made his ruin certain, and he was foreseen. Messala then again fled to his party, and served Augustus effectively in Sicily, 36; against the Salasians, a mountain tribe lying between the Graia and the Pennine Alps, 34; and at Actium, 31. A decree of the senate had abrogated Antony's consulship for 31, and Messala was appointed to the vacant place. He was proconsul of Aquitania in 28–27, and obtained a triumph for his reduction of that province. Shortly before or immediately after his administration of Aquitania, Messala held a prefecture in Asia Minor. He was deputed by the senate, probably in 30, to greet Augustus with the title of "Pater Patriæ;" and the opening of his address on that occasion is preserved by Suetonius. During the disturbances at the comitia in 27, Augustus nominated Messala to the revived office of warden of the city; but he resigned it in a few days. Messala soon afterward withdrew from all public employments except his magistracy, to which Augustus had specially appointed him, although, at the time of his admission, there was no vacancy in the augural college. About two years before his death, which happened about the middle of Augustus's reign, B.C. 3 to A.D. 3, Messala's memory failed him, and he often could not recall his own name. His tomb was of remarkable splendor. Messala was as much distinguished in the literary as in the political world of Rome. He was a patron of learning and the arts, and was himself an historian, a poet, a grammarian, and an orator. He wrote commentaries on the civil wars after Cæsar's death, and a genealogical work, De Romanis Familiis. The treatise, however, De Progenie Augusti, which sometimes accompanies Eutropius and the minor Roman historians, is the forgery of a much later age. Messala's poems were of a satirical or even licentious character. His writings as a grammarian were numerous and minute, comprising treatises on collocation and lexicography, and on the powers and uses of single letters. His eloquence reflected the character of his age. More smooth and correct than vigorous or original, he persuaded rather than convinced, and conciliated rather than persuaded. His health was feeble, and the proemia of his speeches generally pleaded indisposition and solicited indulgence. He mostly took the defendant's side, and was frequently associated in causes with C. Asinius Pollio. He recommended and practiced translation from the Greek orators; and his version of the Parys of Hyperides was thought to exhibit remarkable skill in either language. His political eminence, the wealth he inherited or acquired in the civil wars, and the favor of Antony and Augustus, rendered Messala one of the principal persons of his age, and an effective patron of its literature. His friendship for Horace and his intimacy with Tibullus are well known. In the elegies of the latter poet, the name of Messala is continually introduced. The dedication of the Ciris, a doubtful work, is not sufficient proof of his friendship with Virgil; but the companion of "Plotius and Varius, of Mæcenas and Octavius" (Hor., Sat., i., 10, 81), can not well have been unknown to the author of the Eclogues and Georgics. He directed Ovid's early studies (ex Pont., iv., 16), and Tiberius sought his acquaintance in early manhood, and took him for his model in eloquence.—6. M. VALERIUS MESSALA BARBATUS APPIANUS, was consul B.C. 12, and died in his year of office. He was the father (or grandfather) of the Empress Messalina.—9. L. VALERIUS MESSALA VOLESUS, consul A.D. 5, and afterward proconsul of Asia, where his cruelties drew on him the anger of Augustus and a condemnatory decree from the senate.—10. L. VESPASIANUS MESSALA, legionary tribune in Vespasian's army, A.D. 70, was brother of Aquilius Regulus, the notorious delator in Domitian's reign. He is one of Tacitus's authorities for the history of the civil war after Galba's death, and a principal interlocutor in the dialogue De Oratoribus ascribed to Tacitus.

MESSALINA. 1. STATILIA, grand-daughter of T. Statilius Taurus, consul A.D. 11, was the third wife of the Emperor Nero, who married her in A.D. 66. She had previously espoused Atticus Vestinus, whom Nero put to death without accusation or trial, merely that he might marry Messalina.—2. VALERIA, daughter of M. Valerius Messala Barbatus and of Domitia Lepida, was the third wife of the Emperor Claudius. She married Claudius, to whom she was previously related, before his accession to the empire. Her profligacy and licentiousness were notorious; and the absence of virtue was not concealed by a lingering sense of shame or even by a specious veil of decorum. She was as cruel as she was profligate; and many members of the most illustrious families of Rome were sacrificed to her fears or her hatred. She long exercised an unbounded empire over her weak husband who alone was ignorant of her infidelities. For some time she was supported in her career of crime by the freedmen of Claudius; but when Narcissus, the most powerful of the emperor's freedmen, perceived that he should probably fall a victim to Messalina's intrigues, he determined to get rid of her. The insane folly of Messalina furnished the means of her own destruction. Having conceived a violent passion for a handsome Roman youth, C. Silius, she publicly married him, with all the rites of a legal connubium, during the absence of Claudius at Ostia, A.D. 48. Narcissus persuaded the emperor that Silius and Messalina would not have dared such an outrage had they not determined also to deprive him of empire and life. Claudius wavered long, and at length Narcissus himself issued Messalina's death-warrant. She was put to death by a tribune of the guards in the gardens of Lucullus.

MESSANA (Μεσάνα Dor., Μεσσηνή: Μεσσηνίος: now Messina), a celebrated town on the north-eastern coast of Sicily, on the strait separating Italy from this island, which are here about four miles broad. The Romans called the town Messana, according to its Doric pronunciation, but Messene was its more usual name among the Greeks. It was originally a town of the Siceli, and was called ZANOLE (Ζάγκλη), or a sickle, on account of the shape of its harbor, which is formed by a singular curve of sand and shells. The first Greek colonists were,

according to Thucydides, pirates from the Chalcidian town of Cumæ in Italy, who were joined by Chalcidians from Eubœa, and, according to Strabo, by Naxians; but these two accounts are not contradictory, for since Naxos in Sicily was also a colony from Chalcia, we may easily suppose that the Naxians joined the other Chalcidians in the foundation of the town. Zancle soon became so powerful that it founded the town of Himera, about B.C. 648. After the capture of Miletus by the Persians, the inhabitants of Zancle invited the Ionians, who had been expelled from their native country, to settle on their "beautiful coast" (καλὴ ἀκτὴ, Herod., vi., 23), and a number of Samians and other Ionic Greeks accepted their offer. On landing in the south of Italy, they were persuaded by Anaxilas, tyrant of Rhegium, to take possession of Zancle during the absence of Scythæ, the tyrant of the city, who was engaged in the siege of some other Sicilian town. But their treachery was soon punished; for Anaxilas himself shortly afterward drove the Samians out of Zancle, and made himself master of the town, the name of which he changed into Messana or Messene, both because he was himself a Messenian, and because he transferred to the place a body of Messenians from Rhegium. Anaxilas died 476; and, about ten years afterward (466), his sons were driven out of Messana and Rhegium, and republican governments established in these cities. Messana now enjoyed great prosperity for several years, and, in consequence of its excellent harbor and advantageous position, it became a place of great commercial importance. But in 394 it was taken by the Carthaginians, who destroyed the town because they saw that they should be unable to maintain so distant a possession against the power of Dionysius of Syracuse. Dionysius began to rebuild it in the same year, and, besides collecting the remains of the former population, he added a number of Locrians, Messenians, and others, so that its inhabitants were of a very mixed kind. After the banishment of the younger Dionysius, Messana was for a short time free, but it fell into the power of Agathocles about 312. Among the mercenaries of this tyrant were a number of Mamertini, an Oscan people from Campania, who had been sent from home under the protection of the god Mamers or Mars to seek their fortune in other lands. These Mamertini were quartered in Messana; and, after the death of Agathocles (282), they made themselves masters of the town, killed the male inhabitants and took possession of their wives, their children, and their property. The town was now called MAMERTINA, and the inhabitants MAMERTINI; but its ancient name of Messana continued to be in more general use. The new inhabitants could not lay aside their old predator habits, and, in consequence, became involved in a war with Hieron of Syracuse, who defeated them in several battles, and would probably have conquered the town had not the Carthaginians come in to the aid of the Mamertini and, under the pretext of assisting them, take possession of their citadel. The Mamertini had, at the same time, applied to the Romans for help, who gladly availed themselves of it may to obtain a footing in Sicily. Thus it was the immediate cause of the first war, 264. The Mamertini expelled the ginnian garrison, and received the Roman whose power Messana remained till late times. There are scarcely any remains of the ancient city at Messina.

Messene (Μεσσηνή), daughter of Triopas, and Polycaon, whom she induced to take possession of the country which was called after her. She is also said to have introduced the worship of Jupiter (Zeus) and the worship of the great goddess of Eleusis.

Messene (Μεσσηνή : Μεσσηνός). 1. (Now Messina), the later capital of Messenia, was founded by Epaminondas B.C. 369, and was fortified within the space of eighty days.

It was situated at the foot of the mountain of Ithome, which was so celebrated in the history of the Messenian war, which now formed the acropolis of the city. Messene was one of the most fortified cities of Greece. It was surrounded by massive walls built entirely of stone, and with numerous towers. There are considerable remains of some of these, as well as the foundations of the walls, several public buildings. They are described by a modern traveller as "built of the same kind of masonry, and formed of stones fitted together with great accuracy." The northern gate of the city is also expanded into a circular court, sixty-two feet in diameter. The city was supplied with water by a fountain called Clepsydra, which gave rise to a spring, from which the modern Messina derives its name, meaning black eye, or, literally, Black Eye.—2. Vid.

Messenia (Μεσσηνία : Μεσσηνός), a country in the Peloponnese, bounded on the east by Laconia, north by Elis and Arcadia, and on the west by the sea. It was separated from Laconia by Mount Taygetus; but the western slope of Taygetus belonged to Laconia; and it is difficult to determine the boundaries between the two countries, as they were different at different periods. In the earliest times the River Nedon formed the boundary between Messenia and Laconia to the west; but Pausanias places the frontier to the east, at a woody hollow called Chæriatada south of Abia. The River Nedon was the northern boundary between Messenia and Elis. The area of Messenia is about one hundred and sixty-two square miles. It was for the most part a mountainous country, and contained only two plains of any extent, in the north the plain of Stenyclerus, and in the south a still larger plain, through which the Pamisus flowed, and which was called Mecaris or the Blessed, on account of its great fertility. There were, however, many smaller valleys among the mountains; and the country was much less rugged and far more productive than the neighboring Laconia. Hence Messenia is described by Pausanias as the most fertile country in Peloponnesus; and it is praised by Euripides on account of its climate, which was neither too cold in winter nor too hot in summer. The most ancient inhabitants of Messenia were Leleges, intermingled with Argives. According to tradition, Polycaon, the younger son of Lelex, married the Argive Messene, a daughter of Triopas, and named the country Messene in honor of his wife. This is the name by which it is called in Homer, who does not use the form Messenia. Five generations afterwards Æolians settled in the country, under the guidance of Perieres, a son of Æolus. His son Aphareus gave a home to Neleus, who had been driven out of Thessaly, and who founded the town of Pylos, which became the capital of an independent sovereignty. For a long time there was properly no Messenian kingdom. The western part of the land belonged to the dominions of the Eleid princes of Pylos, of whom Nestor was the most celebrated, and the eastern to the Lacedæmonian monarchy. Thus it appears to have remained till the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Dorians, when Messenia fell to the share of Cresphontes, who destroyed the kingdom of Pylos, and united the whole country under his sway. The ruling class were now Dorians, and they continued to speak the purest Doric down to the latest times. The Spartans soon coveted the more fertile territory of their brother Dorians; and after many disputes between the two nations, and various incursions into each other's territories, open war at length broke out. This war, called the first Messenian war, lasted twenty years, B.C. 743-723; and notwithstanding the gallant resistance of the Messenian king, Aristodemus, the Messenians were obliged to submit to the Spartans after the capture of their fortress Ithome, and to become their subjects. Vid. ARISTODEMUS. After bearing the yoke thirty-eight years, the Messenians again took up arms under their heroic leader Aristomenes. Vid. ARISTOMENES. The second Messenian war lasted seventeen years, B.C. 685-668, and terminated with the conquest of Ithome and the complete subjugation of the country. Most of the Messenians emigrated to foreign countries, and those who remained behind were reduced to the condition of Helots or serfs. In this state they remained till 464, when the Messenians and other Helots took advantage of the devastation occasioned by the great earthquake at Sparta, to rise against their oppressors. This third Messenian war lasted ten years, 464-455, and ended by the Messenians surrendering Ithome to the Spartans on condition of their being allowed a free departure from Peloponnesus. They settled at Naupactus on the Corinthian Gulf opposite Peloponnesus, which town the Athenians had taken ty taken from the Locri Ozolæ, and gladly granted to such deadly enemies of Sparta. At the conclusion of the Peloponnesian war (404), the unfortunate Messenians were obliged to leave Naupactus and take refuge in Italy, Sicily, and other countries; but when the supremacy of Sparta was overthrown by the battle of Leuctra, Epaminondas resolved to restore the independence of Messenia. He accordingly gathered together the Messenian exiles from the various lands in which they were scattered; and in the summer of 369 he founded the town of Messene at the foot of Mount Ithome. Vid. MESSENE. Messenia was never again subdued by the Spartans, and it maintained its independence till the conquest of the Achæans and the rest of Greece by the Romans, 146.

There were various traditions respecting its foundation, all of which point to its high antiquity, but from which we can not gather any certain information on the subject. It is said to have been afterward destroyed by the Samnites, and to have been repopulated by a colony of Achæans, who had been invited for that purpose by the inhabitants of Sybaris. Hence it is called by Livy an Achæan town, and is regarded by some writers as a colony from Sybaris. It fell into the hands of the Romans with the other Greek cities in the south of Italy in the war against Pyrrhus, but it revolted to Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ. Metellus, a distinguished plebeian family, the gens at Rome. 1. L. Cæcilius Metellus, consul B.C. 251, carried on the war against the Carthaginians. In the following year he gained a great victory over Hannibal the Carthaginian general. The elephants which he took in this battle were exhibited in his triumph at Rome. Metellus was second time in 249, and was elected consul in 243, and held this dignity for two years. He must, therefore, have died shortly before the commencement of the second Punic war. In 241 he rescued the temple of Vesta which was on fire when the temple of Vesta was on fire, and he was in consequence. He was in 224, for the purpose of holding the founded with Metellus Dalmaticus, (No. 9). Metellus Diadematus received the surname from his wearing for a bandage round his forehead, in consequence of an ulcer. He was consul 117.

Metellus Metellus, third son of No.

3, was consul 115, the year in which he died. In 114 he was sent into Sardinia as pro-consul, and suppressed an insurrection in the island, in consequence of which he obtained a triumph in 113 on the same day as his brother Caprarius.—8. C. Cæcilius Metellus Caprarius, fourth son of No. 3. The origin of his surname is quite uncertain. He was consul 113, and carried on war in Macedonia against the Thracians, whom he subdued. He obtained a triumph, in consequence, in the same year and on the same day with his brother Marcus. He was censor 102 with his cousin Metellus Numidicus.—9. L. Cæcilius Metellus Dalmaticus, elder son of No. 4, and frequently confounded, as has been already remarked, with Diadematus (No. 6), was consul 119, when he subdued the Dalmatians, and obtained, in consequence, the surname Dalmaticus. He was censor with Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus in 116, and he was also pontifex maximus. He was alive in 100, when he is mentioned as one of the senators of high rank who took up arms against Saturninus.—10 Q. Cæcilius Metellus Numidicus, younger son of No. 4, was one of the most distinguished members of his family. The character of Metellus stood very high among his contemporaries; in an age of growing corruption his personal integrity remained unsullied; and he was distinguished for his abilities in war and peace. He was one of the chief leaders of the aristocratical party at Rome. He was consul 109, and carried on the war against Jugurtha in Numidia with great success. Vid. Jugurtha. He remained in Numidia during the following year as proconsul; but, as he was unable to bring the war to a conclusion, his legate C. Marius industriously circulated reports in the camp and the city that Metellus designedly protracted the war for the purpose of continuing in the command. These rumors had the desired effect. Marius was raised to the consulship, Numidia was assigned to him as his province, and Metellus saw the honor of finishing the war snatched from his grasp. Vid. Marius. On his return to Rome in 107 he was received with the greatest honor.

He celebrated a splendid triumph, and received the surname of Numidicus. In 102 he was censor with his cousin Metellus Caprarius. In 100 the tribune Saturninus and Marius resolved to ruin Metellus. Saturninus proposed an agrarian law, to which he added the clause that the senate should swear obedience to it within five days after its enactment, and that whosoever should refuse to do so should be expelled the senate, and pay a heavy fine. Metellus refused to take the oath, and was therefore expelled the senate; but Saturninus, not content with this, brought forward a bill to punish him with exile. The friends of Metellus were ready to take up arms in his defence; but Metellus quitted the city, and retired to Rhodes, where he bore his misfortune with great calmness. He was, however, recalled to Rome in the following year (99) on the proposition of the tribune Q. Calpurnius. The orations of Metellus are spoken of with praise by Cicero, and they continued to be read with admiration in the time of Frontinus.

—11. Q. Cæcilius Metellus Nepos, son of Balcaricus (No. 6), and grandson of Metellus

us (No. 3), appears to have received the surname of Nepos because he was the eldest grandson of the latter. Metellus Nepos exerted himself in obtaining the recall of his kinsman Metellus Numidicus from banishment in 99, and was consul in 98 with T. Didius. In this year the two consuls carried the lex Cæcilia Didia.—12 Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS PIUS, son of Numidicus (No. 10), received the surname of Pius on account of the love which he displayed for his father when he besought the people to recall him from banishment in 99. He was prætor 89, and was one of the commanders in the Marsic or Social war. He was still in arms in 87, prosecuting the war against the Samnites, when Marius landed in Italy and joined the consul Cinna. The senate, in alarm, summoned Metellus to Rome; but, as he was unable to defend the city against Marius and Cinna, he crossed over to Africa. After remaining in Africa three years, he returned to Italy and joined Sulla, who also returned to Italy in 83. In the war which followed against the Marian party, Metellus was one of the most successful of Sulla's generals, and gained several important victories both in Umbria and in Cisalpine Gaul. In 80, Metellus was consul with Sulla himself; and in the following year (79) he went as proconsul into Spain, in order to prosecute the war against Sertorius, who adhered to the Marian party. Here he remained for the next eight years, and found it so difficult to obtain any advantages over Sertorius, that the senate sent Pompey to his assistance with proconsular power and another army. Sertorius, however, was a match for them both, and would probably have continued to defy all the efforts of Metellus and Pompey, if he had not been murdered by Perperna and his friends in 73. Vid. SERTORIUS. Metellus was pontifex maximus, and, as he was succeeded in this dignity by Julius Cæsar in 63, he must have died either in this year or at the end of the preceding.—13 Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS CILUS, elder son of Nepos (No. 11). In 56 he served as legate in the army of Pompey in Asia, and was prætor in 63, the year in which Cicero was consul. During his year of office he afforded warm and efficient support to the aristocratical party. He prevented the condemnation of C. Rabirius by removing the military flag from the Janiculum. He co-operated with Cicero in opposing the schemes of Catiline; and, when the latter left the city to make war upon the republic, Metellus had the charge of the Picentine and Samnitan districts. By blocking up the passes he prevented Catiline from crossing the Apennines and penetrating into Gaul, and thus compelled him to turn round and face Antonius, who was marching against him from Etruria. In the following year, 62, Metellus went with the title of proconsul into the province of Cisalpine Gaul, which Cicero had relinquished because he was unwilling to leave the city. In 60 Metellus was consul with L. Afranius, and opposed all the efforts of his colleague to obtain the ratification of Pompey's acts in Asia, and an assignment of lands for his soldiers. He died in 59, and it was suspected that he had been poisoned by his wife Clodia, with whom he lived on the most unhappy terms and who was a woman of the most profligacy.—14 Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS NEPOS, younger son of the elder Nepos (No. 11). He served as legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates and in Asia from 67 to 64. He returned to Rome in 63 in order to become a candidate for the tribunate, that he might therein favor the views of Pompey. His election was opposed by the aristocracy, but without success. His year of office was a stormy one. One of his first acts in entering upon his office on the tenth of December, 63, was a violent attack upon Cicero. He maintained that the man who had condemned Roman citizens without a hearing ought not to be heard himself, and accordingly prevented Cicero from addressing the people on the last day of his consulship, and only allowed him to take the usual oath, whereupon Cicero swore that he had saved the state. In the following year (62) Metellus brought forward a bill to summon Pompey, with his army, to Rome, in order to restore peace, but, on the day on which the bill was to be read, the two parties came to open blows, and Metellus was obliged to take to flight. He repaired to Pompey, with whom he returned to Rome in 61. He was prætor in 60, and consul in 57 with P. Lentulus Spinther. Notwithstanding his previous enmity with Cicero, he did not oppose his recall from exile. In 56 Metellus administered the province of Nearer Spain, where he carried on war against the Vaccæi. He died in 55. Metellus did not adhere strictly to the political principles of his family. He did not support the aristocracy like his brother; nor, on the other hand, can he be said to have been a leader of the democracy. He was, in fact, but more than a servant of Pompey, and, according to his bidding, at one time opposed and at another supported Cicero.—15 Q. CÆCILIUS METELLUS PIUS SCIPIO, the adopted son of Metellus Pius (No. 12). He was the son of P. Scipio Nasica, prætor 94. Hence his name is given in various forms. Sometimes he is called P. Scipio Nasica, sometimes Q. Metellus Scipio, and sometimes simply Scipio or Metellus. He was tribune of the plebs in 59, and was a candidate for the consulship along with P. Clodius Hypæus and Milo in 53. He was supported by the Clodian mob, since he was opposed by Milo, but, in consequence of the disturbances in the city, the comitia could not be held for the election of consuls. After the murder of Clodius at the beginning of 52, Pompey was elected sole consul. In the course of the same year Pompey married Cornelia, the daughter of Scipio, and on the first of August he made his father-in-law his colleague in the consulship. Scipio showed his gratitude by using every effort to destroy the power of Cæsar and strengthen that of Pompey. He took an active part in all the proceedings which led to the breaking out of the civil war in 49, and, in the division of the provinces, made among the Pompeian party, he obtained Syria, to which he hastened without delay. After plundering the province in the most unmerciful manner, he crossed over into Greece in 48 to join Pompey. He commanded the centre of the Pompeian army at the battle of Pharsalia. After the loss of the battle he fled, first to Corycæ and then to Adria, where he received the chief command of the

as troops. He was defeated by Cneius Octavius at the battle of Thapsus in 46. He attempted to escape by sea, but his squadron having been overpowered by P. Sittius, he put an end to his own life. Metellus Scipio never enjoyed proofs of striking abilities either in war or in peace. In public he showed himself moderate, and oppressive; in private he was in, avaricious, and licentious, even better than his contemporaries.—16. Q. C. METELLUS CRETICUS, was consul 69, and a war against Crete, which he subdued in the course of three years. He returned to Rome in 66, but was unable to obtain a triumph on account of the opposition of Pompey, to whom he had refused to surrender his command in Crete, which Pompey had claimed in the Gabinian law, which had given him the command in the whole of the Mediterranean. Metellus, however, would not relinquish his claim to a triumph, and accordingly he waited in the neighborhood of the more favorable circumstances. He was in the city in 63, when the conspiracy of Catiline broke out. He was sent into Apulia to prevent an apprehended rising of the Germans in the following year, 62, after the fall of Catiline, he was at length permitted to triumph on his entrance into Rome, and he took the surname of Creticus. Metellus, as expected, joined the aristocracy in opposition to Pompey, and succeeded in the latter from obtaining the ratification of his acts in Asia.—17. L. C. METELLUS, brother of the last, was prætor 71, prætor succeeded Verres in the government of Sicily in 70. He defeated the pirates, compelled them to leave the island. His administration is praised by Cicero; but he is also attacked, in conjunction with his shield Verres from justice. He died in 68 with Q. Marcius Rex, but died during the year.—18. M. C. METELLUS, brother of the two last, was prætor the same year that his eldest brother was he lost gave him the presidency in pecuniis repetundis, and Verres was in that his trial should come on before him.—19. L. C. METELLUS METELLUS was tribune of the plebs 49, and a member of the aristocracy. He did not meet with Pompey and the rest of his he attempted to prevent Caesar from the seizure of the sacred treasury, and lay upon being threatened with death.

METRONE (Μετρώνη), surname Pataraensis, was EUGENIUS or EUGENIUS, successor of Olympus and Patara in Lycia, a Phoenicia, lived in the third, and beginning of the fourth century. He of great learning and exemplary piety wrote several works, most of which were published collectively by Paris, 1644, folio.]
METRONE, a kinsman of Orpheus, from the Thracian town of Methone was believed derived its name.]

(Μετρώνη : Μετρώνη). 1. Or Me-

trone (Μετρώνη : now Modon), a town at the southwest corner of Messenia, with an excellent harbor, protected from the sea by a reef of rocks, of which the largest was called Mothon. The ancients regarded Methone as the Pedasus of Homer. After the conquest of Messenia it became one of the Lacedæmonian harbors, and is mentioned as such in the Peloponnesian war. The Emperor Trajan conferred several privileges upon the city.—2. (Ελευθεροκρήνη), a Greek town in Macedonia, on the Thermaic Gulf, forty stadia northeast of Pydna, was founded by the Eretrians, and is celebrated from Philip having lost an eye at the siege of the place. After its capture by Philip it was destroyed, but was subsequently rebuilt, and is mentioned by Strabo as one of the towns of Macedonia.—3. A town in Thessaly mentioned by Homer, but does not occur in historical times. The ancients placed it in Magnesia.—4. Or METHANA (Μέθανα : now Methana or Mitona), an ancient town in Argolis, situated on a peninsula of the same name, opposite the island of Ægina. The peninsula runs a considerable way into the sea, and is connected with the main land by a narrow isthmus, lying between the towns of Træzen and Epidaurus. The town of Methana lay at the foot of a mountain of volcanic origin.

METHANA (Μέθοπα, Μόδοπα ή των Θεών : now Matra, the sacred city of Krishna), a city of India intra Gangem, on the River Jomana (now Jumna), in the territory of the Surasena, a tribe subject to the Prasii. It was a great seat of the worship of the Indian god whom the Greeks identified with Heracles.

(Μετρώνη (Μετρώνη), a small town of Arcadia, on the road from Olympia to Orchomenus, deriving its name from the circumstance of its being built on a steep cliff between the waters of Malætas and Mylaon.]

METHYNA (ή Μήθυνα, Μέθυνα, the former generally in the best writers; also on coins the Æolic form Μάθυνα : Μήθυναίος, Μέθυναίος : now Maiino), the second city of Lesbos, stood at the northern extremity of the island, and had a good harbor. It was the birthplace of the musician and dithyrambic poet Arion, and of the historian Hellanicus. The celebrated Lesbian wine grew in its neighborhood. In the Peloponnesian war it remained faithful to Athens, even during the great Lesbian revolt (vid. MYRINÆ) : afterward it was sacked by the Spartans (B.C. 406), and never quite recovered its prosperity.

[Μετρώνη (Μήτιος). 1. Son of Miltiades, captured by the Phœnicians, and taken to the Persian court. Darius did him no injury, but conferred many favors on him, and gave him a Persian lady in marriage, by whom he had children, who were held in estimation among the Persians.—2. An Athenian orator, a contemporary and friend of Pericles, for whom he often spoke in the assembly at Athens.]

METION (Μήτιον), son of Erechtheus and Praxithea, and husband of Alcippe. His sons, the Metionides, expelled their cousin Pandion from his kingdom of Athens, but were themselves afterward expelled by the sons of Pandion.

METIS (Μήτις), the personification of prudence, is described as a daughter of Oceanus and Tethys, and the first wife of Jupiter (Zeus). Afraid lest she should give birth to a child wiser and more powerful than himself, Jupiter (Zeus) devoured her in the first month of her pregnancy. Afterward he gave birth to Minerva (Athena), who sprang from his head. Vid. p. 120, b.

[METISCUS, charioteer of Turnus, ejected from his place by Juturna, who guided the chariot herself, when Turnus was about to engage in single combat with Æneas.]

METIUS. Vid. METTIUS.

METON (Μέτων), an astronomer of Athens, who, in conjunction with EUCLEMON, introduced the cycle of nineteen years, by which he adjusted the course of the sun and moon, since he had observed that two hundred and thirty-five lunar months correspond very nearly to nineteen solar years. The commencement of this cycle has been placed B.C. 432. We have no details of Meton's life, with the exception that his father's name was Pausanias, and that he feigned insanity to avoid sailing for Sicily in the ill-fated expedition of which he is stated to have had an evil presentiment.

[METOPÆ (Μετώπη). 1. A daughter of the Arcadian river-god Ladon, was married to Asopus, and became the mother of Thebe.—2. Wife of the river-god Sangarius, and mother of Hecuba, the wife of Priam.]

[METOPUS (Μέτωπος), a Pythagorean of Metapontum; author of a work on virtue, some extracts from which have been preserved by Stobæus, and are given among the Pythagorean fragments in Gale's Opuscula Mythologica.]

METRODORUS (Μητρόδορος). 1. Of Cos, son of Epicharmus, and grandson of Thyreus. Like several of that family, he addicted himself partly to the study of the Pythagorean philosophy, partly to the science of medicine. He wrote a treatise upon the works of Epicharmus. He flourished about B.C. 460.—2. Of Lampæacus, a contemporary and friend of Anaxagoras. He wrote on Homer, the leading feature of his system of interpretation being that the deities and stories in Homer were to be understood as allegorical modes of representing physical powers and phenomena. He died 464.—3. Of Chios, a disciple of Democritus, or, according to other accounts, of Nessus of Chios, flourished about 330. He was a philosopher of considerable reputation, and professed the doctrines of the skeptics in their fullest sense. He also studied, if he did not practice, medicine, on which he wrote a good deal. He was the instructor of Hippocrates and Anaxarchus.—4. A native of Lampæacus or Athens, was the most distinguished of the disciples of Epicurus, with whom he lived on terms of the closest friendship. He died 277, in the fifty-third year of his age, seven years before Epicurus, who would have appointed him his successor had he survived him. The philosophy of Metrodorus appears to have been of a more grossly sensual kind than that of Epicurus. Perfect happiness, according to Cicero's account, he made to consist in having a well-constituted body. He found fault with his brother Timocrates for not admitting that the belly was the test and measure of every thing that pertained to a happy life. He was the author of several works quoted by the ancient writers.—5. Of Scepsis, a philosopher, who was raised to a position of great influence and trust by Mithradates Eupator, being appointed supreme judge without appeal even to the king. Subsequently he was led to desert his allegiance, when sent by Mithradates on an embassy to Tigranes, king of Armenia. Tigranes sent him back to Mithradates, but he died on the road. According to some accounts, he was patched by order of the king; according to others, he died of disease. He is frequently mentioned by Cicero; he seems to have been particularly celebrated for his powers of memory. In consequence of his hostility to the Romans, he was surnamed the Roman-hater.—6. Of Stratonice in Caria, was at first a disciple of the school of Epicurus, but afterward attached himself to Carneades. He flourished about 110.

[METROPHANES (Μητροφάνης), a general of Mithradates the Great, who sent him with an army into Greece to support Archelaus, B.C. 87. He reduced Eubœa and some other places, but was defeated by the Roman general Brutus Sura.]

METROPOLIS (Μητρόπολις). 1. The most ancient capital of Phrygia, but in historical times an inconsiderable place. Its position is doubtful. Some identify it with Afioum-Kara-Hissar near the centre of Great Phrygia, which agrees well enough with the position of the Campus Metropolitanus of Livy (xxviii., 15), while others find it in the ruins at Pirmesh-Kaleh in the north of Phrygia, and suppose a second Metropolis in the south as that to which the Campus Metropolitanus belonged.—2. In Lycaonia (ruins at Turballi), a city in the plain of the Cayster, between Ephesus and Smyrna, about hundred and twenty stadia from the former, and two hundred from the latter. There were other cities of Asia so called, but they are either unimportant, or better known by other names, such as Ancyra, Bostra, Cæsarea in Palestine, Edessa, and others.—3. (Now Kastri), a town of Thessaly in Histiæotis, near the Penæus, between Gomphi and Pharsalus, formed by the union of several small towns, to which Ilion also belonged.—4. A town of Acarnania in the district Amphilochia, between the Ambracian Gulf and the River Achelous.

METRODUM, afterward AVLIA (Μητρόδωρον, or Μητρος, Αύλια, Αύλα), a city of Bithynia.

METTIUS or METIUS. 1. CURTIUS. Vid. CURTIVS.—2. FORRETIUS, dictator of Alba in the reign of Tullius Hostilius, third king of Rome. After the combat between the Horatii and Curiatii had determined the supremacy of the Romans, Mettius was summoned to aid them in a war with Fidenæ and the Veientes. On the field of battle Mettius drew off his Albans to the hills, and awaited the issue of the battle. On the following day the Albans were all deprived of their arms, and Mettius himself, as the punisher of his treachery, was torn under by chariots driven in opposite directions.

METJLUM, the chief town of the Lepidæ in Illyricum, was near the frontiers of Liburnia, and was situated on two peaks of a steep mountain. Augustus nearly lost his life in robbing place, the inhabitants of which fought even with the most desperate courage. Mevania (Mevanas, ἄλῆς: ἡνὸς Δεσπότης), an city in the interior of Umbria, on the Tinea, was situated on the road from Ancona, in a very fertile country, and celebrated for its breed of beautiful white horses. It was a strongly-fortified place, though the walls were built only of brick. According to ancient accounts, Propertius was a native of Mezentius (Μενέντιος), king of the Tyrrhenians, at Cere or Argylla, was ex-his subjects on account of his cruelty, sought refuge with Turnus, king of the Rutuli, whom he assisted in the war against the Trojans. Mezentius and his sons were slain in battle by Aeneas, as related by Virgil. Livy and Dionysius, however, say nothing about the expulsion of Mezentius from Cere, but represent him as a foe of Turnus, and relate that Aeneas during the battle against the Rutuli, the Tyrrhenians at Lanuvium. Dionysius Ascanius was besieged by Mezentius; that the besieged in a sally by Lausus, and then concluded a peace with Mezentius, who from henceforth continued their ally.

Mexenus (Μιξένιος), a painter, mentioned by Pausanias as a disciple of Zeuxis.]

Micipsa (Μικίππας), king of Numidia, the eldest son of Masinissa. After the death of Jugurtha (B.C. 148), the sovereign power was divided by Scipio between Micipsa and his sons, Gulussa and Mastanabal, in such a way that the possession of Cirta, the capital of Numidia, together with the financial administration of the kingdom, fell to the share of Micipsa. It was not long, however, before the death of both his brothers left him in possession of the undivided sovereignty of Numidia, which he held from that time without interruption till his death. He died in 118, leaving the kingdom to his two sons, Adherbal and Jugurtha, and their adopted brother Jugurtha. Micipsa (Μικίππας), of Athens, son of Phanocobus, a distinguished painter and statuarius, contemporary with Polygnotus, about B.C. 460. Micips (Μικίππος), son of Chereus, was at first in the service of Anaxilas, tyrant of Croton, but gradually rose to so high a confidence of his master, that the death of Anaxilas (B.C. 476), left him guardian of the throne, and regent until they attained majority. He discharged his duty, and at last resigned the sovereignty into the hands of the young princes, set out for Sicily, and settled at Tegea, where he resided till the end of his life.]

Micips (Μικίππος), a city of Phrygia Epictetia, between Dorylaeum and Pessinus; the place was captured by the emperor Augustus, B.C. 35.

Midas (Μίδας), son of Gordius and Cybele, is represented as a wealthy but effeminate king, a pupil of Orpheus, and a great devotee to the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus). He is alluded to in a story connected with the Argonauts, for it is said that while he was carrying grain of wheat into his mouth, to indicate that one day he should be the richest of all mortals. Midas was introduced into the Satyric drama of the Greeks, and was represented with the ears of a satyr, which were afterward lengthened into the ears of an ass. He is said to have built the town of Ancyra, and as king of Phrygia he is called Berecynthius heros (Ov., Met., xi., 106). There are several stories connected with Midas, of which the following are the most celebrated.

1. Silenus, the companion and teacher of Bacchus (Dionysus), had gone astray in a state of intoxication, and was caught by country people in the rose gardens of Midas. He was bound with wreaths of flowers and led before the king. These gardens were in Macedonia, near Mount Bermion or Bromion, where Midas was king of the Briges, with whom he afterward emigrated to Asia, where their name was changed into Phryges. Midas received Silenus kindly; and, after treating him with hospitality, he led him back to Bacchus (Dionysus), who allowed Midas to ask a favor of him. Midas, in his folly, desired that all things which he touched should be changed into gold. The request was granted; but as even the food which he touched became gold, he implored the god to take his favor back. Bacchus (Dionysus) accordingly ordered him to bathe in the source of Pactolus, near Mount Tmolus. This bath saved Midas, but the river from that time had an abundance of gold in its sand.—2. Midas, who was himself related to the race of Satyrs, once had a visit from a Satyr, who indulged in all kinds of jokes at the king's expense. Thereupon Midas mixed wine in a well; and when the Satyr had drunk of it, he fell asleep and was caught. The well of Midas was at different times assigned to different localities. Xenophon (Anab., i., 2, § 13) places it in the neighborhood of Thymbrium and Tyreum, and Pausanias at Ancyra.—3. Once, when Pan and Apollo were engaged in a musical contest on the flute and lyre, Midas was chosen to decide between them. The king decided in favor of Pan, whereupon Apollo changed his ears into those of an ass. Midas contrived to conceal them under his Phrygian cap, but the servant who used to cut his hair discovered them. The secret so much harassed this man, that, as he could not betray it to a human being, he dug a hole in the earth, and whispered into it, "King Midas has ass's ears." He then filled the hole up again, and his heart was relieved. But on the same spot a reed grew up, which in its whispers betrayed the secret. Midas is said to have killed himself by drinking the blood of an ox.

Midea or Midea (Μίδα, Μίδα: Μιδεάρις), a town in Argolis, of uncertain site, is said to have been originally called Persepolis, because it had been fortified by Perseus. It was destroyed by the Argives.

Midianites. Vid. Madiantites.

Midas (Μίδας), an Athenian of wealth and influence, was a violent enemy of Demosthenes the orator. In B.C. 354 Midas assaulted Demosthenes when he was discharging the duties of Choregus, during the celebration of the great Dionysia. Demosthenes brought an accusation against Midas; but the speech which he wrote for the occasion, and which is extant, was never delivered, since Demosthenes dropped the accusation in consequence of his receiving the sum of thirty minæ.

MIEZA (Μιζα: Μιζεύς), a town of Macedonia in Emathia, southwest of Pella, and not far from the frontiers of Thessaly.

[MISŌNIUM (Μισώνιον), a place in or near the island Cranæ in Laconia, where Venus (Aphrodite), hence called Migonitis (Μιγωνίτις), had a temple.]

MILANIUM (Μελανίον), son of Amphidamas, and husband of Atalanta. For details, vid. ATALANTA.

MILĒTĒRŌLIS (Μιλτήρολις: now Mihalich or Hamamlı? ruins), a city of Mysia, in Asia Minor, at the confluence of the River Rhyndacus and Mæcistus, and somewhat east of the lake which was named after it, Lacus MILETROPOLITIS (Μιληροπολιτικὴ λίμνη: now Lake of Maniyas). This lake, which was also called Artynia, lies some miles west of the larger lake of Apollonia (now Abullionte).

MILETROPOLIS. Vid. BORYSTHENES.

MILETUS (Μίλητος), son of Apollo and Aria of Crete. Being beloved by Minos and Sarpedon, he attached himself to the latter, and fled from Minos to Asia, where he built the city of Miletus. Ovid (Met., ix., 442) calls him a son of Apollo and Delone, and hence Delonides.

MILETUS (Μίλητος, Dor. Μίλαρος: Μιλήσιος, and on inscriptions, Μελήσιος: Milesius). 1. One of the greatest cities of Asia Minor, belonged territorially to Caria and politically to Ionia, being the southernmost of the twelve cities of the Ionian confederacy. It is mentioned by Homer as a Carian city; and one of its early names, Lelegeis, is a sign that the Leleges also formed a part of its population. Its first Greek colonists were said to have been Cretans who were expelled by Minos; the next were led to it by Neleus at the time of the so-called Ionic migration. Its name was derived from the mythical leader of the Cretan colonists, Miletus: it was also called PIRYUSA (Πιρυσοῦσα) and ANACTORIA (Ἀνακτορία). The city stood upon the southern headland of the Sinus Latmicus, opposite to the mouth of the Mæander, and possessed four distinct harbors, protected by a group of islets, called Lade, Dromiscus, and Perne. The city wall inclosed two distinct towns, called the outer and the inner; the latter, which was also called Old Miletus, stood upon an eminence overhanging the sea, and was of great strength. Its territory extended on both sides of the Mæander, as far apparently as the promontories of Mycale on the north and Posidium on the south. It was rich in flocks; and the city was celebrated for its woollen fabrics, the Mileria vellera. At a very early period it became a great maritime state, extending its commerce throughout the Mediterranean, and even beyond the Pillars of Hercules, but more especially in the direction of the Euxine, along the shore of which the Milesians planted several important colonies, such as Cyzicus, Sinope, Abydos, Istropolis, Tomi, Olbia or Borysthenes, Apollonia, Odessus, and Panticapæum. Naucratia in Egypt was also a colony of Miletus. It also occupies a high place in the early history of Greek literature, as the birth-place of the philosophers Thales, Anaximander, and Anaximenes, and of the historians Cadmus and Hecataeus. After the rise of the Lydian monarchy, Miletus, by its naval strength, resisted the attacks of Alyattes and Sadyattes for eleven years, but fell before Croesus, whose success may perhaps be ascribed to the intestine factions which for a long time weakened the city. With the rest of Ionia, it was conquered by Harpagus, the general of Cyrus, in B.C. 547, and under the dominion of the Persians it still retained its prosperity till the great Ionian revolt, of which Miletus was the centre (see ARISTAGORAS, HISTIAEUS), and after the suppression of which it was destroyed by the Persians (B.C. 494). It recovered sufficient importance to oppose a vain resistance to Alexander the Great, which brought upon it a second ruin. Under the Roman empire it still appears as a place of some consequence, until its final destruction by the Turks. Its ruins are difficult to discover, on account of the great change made in the coast by the River Mæander. Vid. MÆANDER. They are usually supposed to be those at the wretched village of Palatia, on the southern bank of the Menderes, a little above its present mouth; but Forbiger has shown that these are more probably the ruins of Miletus, and that those of Miletus are buried in a lake formed by the Menderes at the foot of Mount Latmus.—2. A city of Crete, not far from Ierapetra, whence the first settlers of the Ionian Islands are said to have come.]

MILICUS, a Phœnician god, represented the son of a satyr and of the nymph Myrica, with horns on his head. (Sil. Ital., iii., 103.)

MILICUS (Μελίχρος), a small river in Acchæa which flowed by the town of Patræ, and was to have been originally called Amilichus (Ἀμιλίχρος) on account of the human victims sacrificed on its banks to Diana (Artemis).

[MILICUS, a freedman of Flavius Scaurus gave Nero the first information of Piso's conspiracy in A.D. 66. Milichus was liberally rewarded by the emperor, and assumed the name of Soter or the Preserver.]

MILŌ or MILON (Μίλων). 1. Of Crotone, of Diotimus, an athlete, famous for his extraordinary bodily strength. He was six times victor in wrestling at the Olympic games, and often at the Pythian; but, having entered lists at Olympia a seventh time, he was won by the superior agility of his adversary. These successes he obtained great distinction among his countrymen, so that he was even pointed to command the army which defeated the Sybarites, B.C. 511. Many stories are related by ancient writers of Milo's extraordinary feats of strength; such as his carrying a bull of four years old on his shoulders through a stadium at Olympia, and afterward eating the whole of it in a single day. The mode of death is thus related: as he was passing through a forest when enfeebled by age, he saw the trunk of a tree which had been partially opened by woodcutters, and attempted to step further, but the wood closed upon his hands, and thus held him fast, in which state he was killed and devoured by wolves.—2. A general in the service of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who sent him forward with a body of troops to garrison the citadel of Tarentum previous to his own

He is mentioned again as holding important command under Persens, just before the battle of Pydna, B.C. 166. He afterwards proved a traitor, and surrendered the fortress of Berœa into the hands of the Roman general Paullus Æmilius.]—4. T. ANNIVS MILO ANNIANUS, was the son of C. Papius Celsus ANNIVS, and was adopted by his maternal grandfather T. Annivs Luscius. He was born Lanuvium, of which place he was in B.C. 53 tutor or chief magistrate. Milo was a man of daring and unscrupulous character; and as he was deeply in debt, he resolved to obtain a shabby province. For this purpose he connected himself with the aristocracy. As tribune of the plebs, B.C. 57, he took an active part in aiding Cicero's recall from exile, and from that time, he carried on a fierce and memorable contest with P. Clodius. In 53 Milo was candidate for the consulship, and Clodius for the governorship of the ensuing year. Each of the candidates kept a gang of gladiators, and there were frequent combats between the rival ruffians in the streets of Rome. At length, on the fourth of January, 52, Milo and Clodius met violently by accident at Bovillæ on the Appian road. An affray ensued between their followers, in which Clodius was slain. At Rome such riots followed upon the burial of Clodius, that they were appointed sole consul in order to restore order to the state. Pompey immediately brought forward various laws in connection with the late disturbances. As soon as these were passed, Milo was formally accused. All Pompey's influence was directed against him; Milo was not without hope, since the higher aristocracy, from jealousy of Pompey, supported him, and Cicero undertook his defence. His trial opened on the fourth of April, 52. He was attacked on three counts—de Vi, de Ambitu, de Libery, and de Sodalitiis, or illegal interference with the freedom of elections. L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, a consular, was appointed prosecutor by a special law of Pompey's, and all the nobles and thousands of spectators from Italy besieged the forum and its avenues. But Milo's chances of acquittal were wholly marred by the presence of his adversaries, who insulted and obstructed the witnesses, the process, and the directors of the defence. Pompey availed himself of these disorders to line the forum and the encompassing hills with soldiers. Cicero was intimidated, and Milo was condemned. He was even been acquitted on the first count, de Vi, the two other charges of bribery and conspiracy awaited him. He therefore went into exile. Cicero, who could not deliver, re-wrote and expanded the defence of Milo—the extant defence—and sent it to him at Marseilles. Milo remarked, "I am glad this was not spoken, since I must have been acquitted, and then had never known the delicate flavor of these Marseilles malleets." Cæsar refused to recall Milo from exile in 49, when he permitted many of the other exiles to return. In the following year (48), M. Cælius, the prætor, had, during Cæsar's absence, promulgated a bill for the adjustment of debts. Needing desperate allies, Cælius accordingly invited Milo to Italy, as the fittest tool for his purposes. At the head of a band of criminals and run-away slaves, Milo appeared in the south of Italy, but was opposed by the prætor Q. Pedius, and slain under the walls of an obscure fort in the district of Thurii. Milo, in 57, married Fausta, a daughter of the dictator Sulla. She proved a faithless wife, and Salust, the historian, was soundly scourged by Milo for an intrigue with her.

MILTIADES (MILTIADES). 1. Son of Cypselus, was a man of considerable distinction in Athens in the time of Pisistratus. The Dolonians, a Thracian tribe dwelling in the Chersonesus, being hard pressed in war by the Absinthians, applied to the Delphic oracle for advice, and were directed to admit a colony led by the man who should be the first to entertain them after they left the temple. This was Miltiades, who, eager to escape from the rule of Pisistratus, gladly took the lead of a colony under the sanction of the oracle, and became tyrant of the Chersonesus, which he fortified by a wall built across its isthmus. In a war with the people of Lampascus he was taken prisoner, but was set at liberty on the demand of Cræsus. He died without leaving any children, and his sovereignty passed into the hands of Stesagoras, the son of his half-brother Cimon. Sacrifices and games were instituted in his honor, in which no Lampascene was suffered to take part.—2. Son of Cimon and brother of Stesagoras, became tyrant of the Chersonesus on the death of the latter, being sent out by Pisistratus from Athens to take possession of the vacant inheritance. By a stratagem he got the chief men of the Chersonesus into his power and threw them into prison, and took a force of mercenaries into his pay. In order to strengthen his position still more, he married Hegesipyla, the daughter of a Thracian prince named Olorus. He joined Darius Hytaspas on his expedition against the Scythians, and was left with the other Greeks in charge of the bridge over the Danube. When the appointed time had expired, and Darius had not returned, Miltiades recommended the Greeks to destroy the bridge and leave Darius to his fate. Some time after the expedition of Darius, an inroad of the Scythians drove Miltiades from his possessions; but after the enemy had retired, the Dolonians brought him back. It appears to have been between this period and his withdrawal to Athens that Miltiades conquered and expelled the Pelasgian inhabitants of Lemnos and Imbros, and subjected the islands to the dominion of Attica. Lemnos and Imbros belonged to the Persian dominions; and it is probable that this encroachment on the Persian possessions was the cause which drew upon Miltiades the hostility of Darius, and led him to fly from the Chersonesus when the Phœnician fleet approached after the subjugation of Ionia

Miltiades reached Athens in safety, but his eldest son Metiochus fell into the hands of the Persians. At Athens Miltiades was arraigned, as being amenable to the penalties enacted against tyranny, but was acquitted. When Attica was threatened with invasion by the Persians under Datis and Artaphernes, Miltiades was chosen one of the ten generals. Miltiades, by his arguments, induced the polemarch Callimachus to give the casting vote in favor of risking a battle with the enemy, the opinions of the ten generals being equally divided. Miltiades waited till his turn came, and then drew his army up in battle array on the ever-memorable field of Marathon. VID. MARATHON. After the defeat of the Persians Miltiades endeavored to urge the Athenians to measures of retaliation, and induced them to intrust to him an armament of seventy ships, without knowing the purpose for which they were designed. He proceeded to attack the island of Paros, for the purpose of gratifying a private enmity. His attacks, however, were unsuccessful; and after receiving a dangerous hurt in the leg while penetrating into a sacred inclosure on some superstitious errand, he was compelled to raise the siege and return to Athens, where he was impeached by Xanthippus for having deceived the people. His wound had turned into a gangrene, and being unable to plead his cause in person, he was brought into court on a couch, his brother Tisagoras conducting his defence for him. He was condemned; but on the ground of his services to the state, the penalty was commuted to a fine of fifty talents, the cost of the equipment of the armament. Being unable to pay this, he was thrown into prison, where he not long after died of his wound. The fine was subsequently paid by his son Cimon.

MILYAS (ἡ Μιλήτος; Μιλήτις, Milyas), was originally the name of all Lycia; but it was afterward applied to the high table-land in the north of Lycia, between the Cadmus and the Taurus, and extending considerably into Pisidia. Its people seem to have been the descendants of the original inhabitants of Lycia. It contained a city of the same name. After the defeat of Antiochus the Great, the Romans gave it to Eumenes, king of Pergamus, but its real government seems to have been in the hands of Pisidian princes.

MINNERMUS (Μίνερμος), a celebrated elegiac poet, was generally called a Colophonian, but was properly a native of Smyrna, and was descended from those Colophonians who recovered Smyrna from the Æolians. He flourished from about B.C. 634 to 600. He was a contemporary of Solon, who, in an extant fragment of one of his poems, addresses him as still living. Only a few fragments of the compositions of Minnermus have come down to us. They belong chiefly to a poem entitled Nanno, and are addressed to the flute-player of that name. His compositions of Minnermus form an epoch in the history of elegiac poetry. Before his time the elegy had been devoted chiefly either to warlike or national, or to convivial and joyous subjects. Archilochus had, indeed, occasionally employed the elegy for strains of lamentation, but Minnermus was the first who systematically made it the vehicle for plaintive, mournful, and erotic strains. The instability of human happiness, the helplessness of man, the care and miseries to which life is exposed, the brief season that man has to enjoy himself in, the wretchedness of old age, are plaintively set upon by him, while love is held up as the consolation that men possess, life not being worth having when it can no longer be enjoyed. The latter topic was most frequently dwelt upon, and as an erotic poet he was held in high estimation in antiquity. (Hor., Epist., l. 100.) The fragments are published separately by Bach, Lipsa, 1828.

MINERVA, called ATHENA by the Greeks. The Greek goddess is spoken of in a separate article. VID. ATHENA. Minerva was one of the great Roman divinities. Her name is considered of the same root as mens; and she is accordingly the thinking, calculating, and inventing power personified. Jupiter was the first, the second, and Minerva the third in the of the Capitoline divinities. Tarquin, the Demaratus, was believed to have united these divinities in one common temple, and, when repasts were prepared for the gods, three always went together. She was the sister of Jupiter, and is said to have sometimes wielded the thunderbolts of her father. Minerva was a virgin divinity, and her father supreme god, the Romans easily identified her with the Greek Athena, and accorded all the attributes of Athena were gradually transferred to the Roman Minerva. But we find ourselves at present to those which were proper to the Roman goddess. Being a maiden, her sacrifices consisted of calves which had not borne the yoke. She is said to have invented numbers; and it is added as a law respecting the driving in of the nail was for this reason attached to the temple of Minerva. She was worshipped as the patroness of all the arts and trades, and festival she was particularly invoked by those who desired to distinguish themselves in any craft, such as painting, poetry, the art of medicine, dyeing, spinning, weaving, &c. This character of the goddess was perceived also from the proverb "to do as pingui Minerva," i. e., to do a thing in a hard or clumsy manner; and rus Minerva a stupid person who presumed to set himself up as an intelligent one. Minerva, however, patroness, not only of females, on whom she conferred skill in sewing, spinning, &c., but she also guided men in the art of war, where victory is gained by prudence, courage, and perseverance. She was represented with a helmet, and a coat of mail; and the booty made was frequently dedicated to her. Minerva was further believed to be the inventor of instruments, especially wind instruments, the use of which was very important in war, and which were accordingly dedicated to a sort of purification every year on the day of the festival of Minerva. This festival lasted five days, from the nineteenth to the twenty-third of March, and was called Ides, because it began on the fifth day of the month. This number of days was not accidental, for we are told that the festival was sacred to Minerva. The temple of Minerva at Rome was situated on the Capitol; another existed at Veii, and she had a chapel at the Caelian Hill, where she bore the surname Capitula.

Æ ARX OF MINERVÆ (now Castro), a town on the coast of Calabria, where Æneas is said to have landed.

Æ PROMONTORIUM (now Punta della Minerva), a rocky promontory, running out a long way into the sea, about six miles southeast of Sorrentum, on which was a temple of Minerva, which is said to have been built by Ulysses, and is still standing in the time of Seneca. The Sirens are reported to have dwelt here, and were regarded it as the northwestern point of Ænotria.

Minos (Μίνως). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Europa, brother of Rhadamanthys, was the king and legislator of Crete. After his death he became one of the judges of the shades in Hades. He was the father of Deucalion and Ariadne; and, according to Apollodorus, the brother of Sarpedon. Some traditions relate that Minos married Itone, daughter of Lyctus, by whom he had a son, Lycastus, and that the latter became, by Ida, the daughter of Corybas, the father of another Minos. But it should be observed that Homer and Hesiod know only of one Minos, the ruler of Cnosus, and the son and friend of Jupiter (Zeus), and that they relate nearly the same things about him which later traditions assign to a second Minos, the grandson of the former. In this case, as in many other mythical traditions, a rationalistic criticism attempted to solve contradictions and difficulties in the stories about a person by assuming that the contradictory accounts must refer to two different personages.—2. Grandson of the former, and a son of Lycastus and Ida, was likewise a king and lawgiver of Crete. He is described as the husband of Pasiphaë, a daughter of Helios; and as the father of Caliteus, Deucalion, Glaucus, Androgeus, Acallus, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phædra. After the death of Asterius, Minos aimed at the supremacy of Crete, and declared that it was destined to him by the gods; in proof of which, he asserted that the gods always answered his prayers. Accordingly, as he was offering up a sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon), he prayed that a bull might come forth from the sea, and promised to sacrifice the animal. The bull appeared, and Minos became king of Crete. (Others say that Minos disputed the government with his brother Sarpedon, and conquered.) But Minos, who admired the beauty of the bull, did not sacrifice him, and substituted another in his place. Neptune (Poseidon) therefore rendered the bull furious, and made Pasiphaë conceive a passion for the animal. Dedalus enabled Pasiphaë to gratify her passion, and she became by the bull the mother of the Minotaurus, a monster with a human body and a bull's head, or, according to others, with a bull's body and a human head. The monster was kept in the labyrinth at Cnossus, constructed by Dædalus. Dædalus fled from Crete to escape the wrath of Minos, and took refuge in Sicily. Minos followed him to Sicily, and was there slain by Cocalus and his daughters. Minos is further said to have divided Crete into three parts, and to have ruled nine years. The Cretans traced their legal and political institutions to Minos. He is said to have been instructed in the art of law-giving by Jupiter (Zeus) himself; and the Spartan Lycurgus was believed to have taken the legislation of Minos as his model. In his time Crete was a powerful maritime state; and Minos not only checked the piratical pursuits of his contemporaries, but made himself master of the Greek islands of the Ægean. The most ancient legends describe Minos as a just and wise law-giver, whereas the later accounts represent him as an unjust and cruel tyrant. In order to avenge the wrong done to his son (vid. ANDROGEGOS) at Athens, he made war against the Athenians and Megarians. He subdued Megara, and compelled the Athenians either every year or every nine years to send him as a tribute seven youths and seven maidens, who were devoured in the labyrinth by the Minotaurus. The monster was slain by Theseus.

MINTHA (Μίνθη), a daughter of Cocytus, beloved by Hades, was metamorphosed by Ceres (Demeter) or Proserpina (Persephone) into a plant called after her mintha, or mint. In the neighborhood of Pylos there was a hill called after her, and at its foot there was a temple of Pluto (Hades), and a grove of Ceres (Demeter).

MINTHE (Μίνθη; now Vunuka), a mountain of Elis in Triphylia, near Pylos.

MINTURNÆ (Minturnensis; now Trajetta), an important town in Latium, on the frontiers of Campania, was situated on the Appia Via, and on both banks of the Liris, and near the mouth of this river. It was an ancient town of the Ausones or Aurunci, but surrendered to the Romans of its own accord, and received a Roman colony B.C. 296. It was subsequently recolonized by Julius Cæsar. In its neighborhood was a grove sacred to the nymph Marica, and also extensive marshes (Paludes Minturnenses), formed by the overflowing of the River Liris, in which Marica was taken prisoner. Vid. p. 460, a. The neighborhood of Minturnæ produced good wine. There are the ruins of an amphitheatre and of an aqueduct at the modern Trajetta.

MINUCIUS (Μινυκιανός). 1. A Greek rhetorician, was a contemporary of the celebrated rhetorician Hermogenes of Tarsus (flourished A.D. 170), with whom he was at variance.—2. An Athenian, the son of Nicagoras, was also a Greek rhetorician, and lived in the reign of Gallienus (A.D. 260–268). He was the author of several rhetorical works, and a portion of his MINUCIUS RUFUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 221, when he carried on war against the Istrians. In 217 he was magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus. The cautious policy of Fabius displeased Minucius; and accordingly, when Fabius was called away to Rome, Minucius disobeyed the positive commands of the dictator, and risked a battle with a portion of Hannibal's troops. He was fortunate enough to gain a victory; in consequence of which, he became so popular at Rome that a bill was passed giving him equal military power with the dictator. The Roman army was now divided, and each portion encamped separately under its own general. Anxious for distinction, Minucius eagerly accepted a battle which was offered him by Hannibal, but was defeated, and his troops were only saved from total destruction by the timely arrival of Fabius with all his forces. Thereupon Minucius generously acknowledged his error, gave up his separate command, and placed himself again under the authority of the dictator. He fell at the battle of Cannæ in the following year.—2. Q., plebeian ædile 201, prætor 200, and consul 197, when he carried on war against the Boii with success. In 199 he was one of the ten commissioners sent into Asia after the conquest of Antiochus the Great, and in 183 he was one of the three ambassadors sent into Gaul.—3. M., prætor 197.—4. M., one of the plebs 121, brought forward a bill to repeal the laws of C. Gracchus. This Marcus Minucius and his brother Quintus are mentioned as arbiters between the inhabitants of Corinthus and the Viterii, in a very interesting inscription which was discovered in the year 1810, about ten miles from the modern city of Genoa.—5. Q., consul 110, obtained Macedonia as his province, carried on war with success against the barbarians in Thrace, and triumphed on his return to Rome. He perpetuated the memory of his triumph by building the Porticus Minucia, near the Circus Flaminius.

MINUCIUS FELIX. Vid. FELIX.

MINYÆ (Μινυαί), an ancient Greek race, originally dwelt in Thessaly. Iolcos, in Thessaly, was one of their most ancient seats. The ancestral hero, Minyas, is said to have migrated from Thessaly into the north of Boeotia, where to have established the empire of Minyæ, with the capital of Orchomenos. The Argonauts were descended from the Minyæ, and are themselves called Minyæ. The descendants of the Argonauts founded a colony in Locris called Minyæ. Thence they proceeded to Elis Triphylia, and to the island of Thera.

MINYAS (Μινυας), son of Chryseas, and the ancestral hero of the race of the Minyæ. The accounts of his genealogy vary very much in the different traditions, for some call him a son of Orchomenos or Eteocles, others of Neptunus (Poseidon), Aleus, Mars (Ares), Sisyphus, or Halmus. He is further called the husband of Tritogenia, Clytadora, or Phanoessa. Orchomenus, Prodon, Athamas, Diocleides, Eteocles, and Perilymne, Leucippe, Arand, and of Alcibios, are mentioned as his. His tomb was shown at Orchomenos in a daughter of Minyas was called As(-idus) or Mineis(-idus). Vid. Ov., Met., 33.

uzia. 1. A town of the Celtici in Lusitania, on the coast of the ocean.—2. A Roman municipium in the territory of the Turduli, in Bætica, on the road from Emerita Augusta.

Misenus (now Punta di Miseno), a promontory in Campania, south of Cumæ, said to have taken its name from Misenus, the companion and friend of Æneas, who was drowned and buried here. The bay formed by this promontory was converted by Augustus into an excellent harbor, and was made the principal station of the Roman fleet on the Tyrrhene Sea. A strong wall was built up around the harbor, and here the fleet usually resided. The inhabitants were called Misenates and Misenenses. The Roman nobles had previously built villas on the coast. Here was the villa of C. Cæcilius, which was purchased by Lucullus, and afterward passed into the hands of the emperor Tiberius, who died at this place.

Myndus (Μυνδός). 1. A companion of Ulysses, pilot of the fleet of Æneas; according to some, at first a companion and trumpeter of Æneas, afterward followed Æneas to Italy. Vid. Virg.

Mithridates, the father-in-law of the Emperor Augustus, who married his daughter Sabinilla in A.D. 241. Mithridates was a man of great courage, virtue, and ability. He was appointed by his son-in-law præfect of the prætorium, and effected many important reforms in the household. He accompanied Gordian on his expedition against the Persians, whom he defeated; but in the course of this war he was stricken by disease or by the treachery of his son Philippus, 243.

ADATES or MITHRADATES (Μιθραδάτης or Μιθράτης), a common name among the Medes and Persians, derived from Mitra or Mithra, the name for the sun, and the root da, signifying "to give." Mithradates would therefore mean, "given by the sun." [The form Adates, which is found on coins, is more common than Mithradates, though the latter is the one in Greek writers.] I. I. King of Pontus, properly, satrap of Pontus, was son of Ariobarzanes I., and was succeeded by Ariobarzanes II. about B.C. 363. The kings of Pontus were all lineally descended from one of the Persians who had conspired against Darius and who was subsequently established by Hystaspis in the government of the tribes bordering on the Euxine Sea. He is known of their history until after the Persian empire.—2. II. King of Pontus (37–302), succeeded his father Ariobarzanes and was the founder of the independence of Pontus. After the death of Alexander the Great, he was for a time subject to the Seleucids; but during the war between the Seleucids and Alexander, he succeeded in establishing his independence. He died at the age of 70.—3. III. King of Pontus (302–266), successor of the preceding. He extended his paternal dominions by the acquisition of great part of Cappadocia and Paphlagonia. He was succeeded by his son Ariobarzanes III.—4. IV. King of Pontus (about 249–190), son and successor of Ariobarzanes III. He gave his daughter Laodice in marriage to Antiochus III. He was succeeded by his son Pharnaces I.—5. V. King of Pontus (about 156–130), surnamed Euergetes, son and successor of Pharnaces I. He was the first of the kings of Pontus who made an alliance with the Romans, whom he assisted in the third Punic war and in the war against Aristonicus (131–129). He was assassinated at Sinope by a conspiracy among his own immediate attendants.—6. VI. King of Pontus (120–63), surnamed Eupator, also Dionysus, but more commonly THE GREAT, was the son and successor of the preceding, and was only eleven years old at the period of his accession. We have very imperfect information concerning the earlier years of his reign, and much of what has been transmitted to us wears a very suspicious aspect. We are told that immediately on ascending the throne he found himself assailed by the designs of his guardians, but that he succeeded in eluding all their machinations, partly by displaying a courage and address in warlike exercises beyond his years, partly by the use of antidotes against poison, to which he began thus early to accustom himself. In order to evade the designs against his life, he also devoted much of his time to hunting, and took refuge in the remotest and most unfrequented regions, under pretence of pursuing the pleasures of the chase. Whatever truth there may be in these accounts, it is certain that when he attained to manhood he was not only endowed with consummate skill in all martial exercises, and possessed of a bodily frame insoured to all hardships, as well as a spirit to brave every danger, but his naturally vigorous intellect had been improved by careful culture. As a boy, he had been brought up at Sinope, where he had probably received the elements of a Greek education; and so powerful was his memory, that he is said to have learned not less than twenty-five languages, and to have been able, in the days of his greatest power, to transact business with the deputies of every tribe subject to his rule in their own peculiar dialect. The first steps of his career were marked by blood. He is said to have murdered his mother, to whom a share in the royal authority had been left by Mithradates Euergetes; and this was followed by the assassination of his brother. In the early part of his reign he subdued the barbarian tribes between the Euxine and the confines of Armenia, including the whole of Colchis and the province called Lesser Armenia, and even extended his conquests beyond the Caucasus. He assisted Parissades, king of the Bosphorus, against the Sarmatians and Roxolani, and rendered the whole of the Tauric Chersonese tributary to his kingdom. After the death of Parissades, the kingdom of Bosphorus itself was incorporated with his dominions. He was now in possession of such great power that he began to deem himself equal to a contest with Rome itself. Many causes of dissension had already arisen between them, but Mithradates had hitherto submitted to the mandates of Rome. Ever after expelling Ariobarzanes from Cappadocia, and Nicomedes from Bithynia in 90, he offered no resistance to the Romans when they restored these monarchs to their kingdom. But when Nicomedes, urged by the Roman legates, invaded the territories of Mithradates, the latter made preparations for immediate hostilities. His success was rapid and striking. In 88 he drove Ariobarzanes out of Cappadocia, and Nicomedes out of Bithynia, defeated the Roman generals who had supported the latter, made himself master of Phrygia and Galatia, and at last of the Roman province of Asia. During the winter he issued the sanguinary order to all the cities of Asia to put to death, on the same day, all the Roman and Italian citizens who were to be found within their walls. So hateful had the Romans rendered themselves, that these commands were obeyed with alacrity by almost all the cities of Asia, and eighty thousand Romans and Italians are said to have perished in this fearful massacre. Meantime Sulla had received the command of the war against Mithradates, and crossed over into Greece in 87. Mithradates, however, had resolved not to await the Romans in Asia, but had already sent his general Archelaus into Greece at the head of a powerful army. The war proved unfavorable to the king. Archelaus was twice defeated by Sulla with immense loss near Chæronea, and Orchomenos in Boeotia (86). About the same time Mithradates was himself defeated in Asia by Fimbria. Vid. Fimbria. These disasters led him to sue for peace, which Sulla was willing to grant, because he was anxious to return to Italy, which was entirely in the hands of his enemies. Mithradates consented to abandon all his conquests in Asia, to pay a sum of two thousand talents, and to surrender to the Romans a fleet of seventy ships. Thus terminated the first Mithradatic war (84). Shortly afterward Murena, who had been left in command of Asia by Sulla, invaded the dominions of Mithradates (83), under the flimsy pretext that the king had not yet evacuated the whole of Cappadocia. In the following year (82) Murena renewed his hostile incursions, but was defeated by Mithradates on the banks of the River Halys. But shortly afterward Murena received peremptory orders from Sulla to desist from hostilities: in consequence of which, peace was again restored. This is usually called the second Mithradatic war. Mithradates, however, was well aware that the peace between him and Rome was in fact a mere suspension of hostilities, and that the republic would never suffer the massacre of her citizens in Asia to remain ultimately unpunished. No formal treaty was ever concluded between Mithradates and the Roman senate; and the king had in vain endeavored to obtain the ratification of the terms agreed on between him and Sulla. The death of Nicomedes III., king of Bithynia, at the beginning of 74, brought matters to a crisis. That monarch left his dominions by will to the Roman people; and Bithynia was accordingly declared a Roman province; but Mithradates asserted that the late king had left a legitimate son by his wife Nyssa, whose pretensions he immediately prepared to support by his arms. He had employed the last few years in forming a powerful army, armed and disciplined in the Roman manner; and he now took the field with one hundred and twenty thousand foot soldiers, sixteen thousand horse, and a vast number of barbarian auxiliaries. This was the commencement of the third Mithradatic war. The two Roman consuls, Lucullus and Cotta, were unable to oppose his first irruption. He traversed Bithynia without encountering any resistance, and when at length Cotta ventured to give him battle under the walls of Chalcedon, the consul was totally defeated both by sea and land. Mithradates then proceeded to lay siege to Cyzicus both by sea and land. Lucullus marched to the relief of the city, cut off the king's supplies, and eventually compelled him to raise the siege early in 73. On his retreat Mithradates suffered great loss, and eventually took refuge in Pontus. Thither Lucullus followed him in the next year. The new army which the king had collected was entirely defeated by the Roman general, and Mithradates, despairing of opposing the further progress of Lucullus, took refuge in the dominions of his son-in-law Tigranes, the king of Armenia. Tigranes at first showed no disposition to attempt the restoration of his father-in-law; but being offended at the haughty conduct of Appius Claudius, whom Lucullus had sent to demand the surrender of Mithradates, the Armenian king not only refused the request, but determined to prepare for war with the Romans. Accordingly, in 69, Lucullus marched into Armenia, defeated Tigranes and Mithradates near Tigranocerta, and in the next year (68) again defeated the allied monarchs near Artaxata. The Roman general then turned aside into Mesopotamia, and laid siege to Mithibis. Here the Roman soldiers broke out into open mutiny, and demanded to be led home; and Lucullus was obliged to raise the siege, and return to Asia Minor. Meanwhile Mithradates had taken advantage of the absence of Lucullus to invade Pontus at the head of a large army. He defeated Fabius and Triarius, whom the defence of Pontus had been committed to; and when Lucullus returned to Pontus he was unable to resume the offensive in consequence of the mutinous spirit of his own soldiers. Mithradates was thus able, before the close of 67, to regain possession of the greater part of his hereditary dominions. In the following year (66) the conduct of the war was entrusted to Pompey. Hostilities were renewed with greater vigor than ever. Mithradates was obliged to retire before the Romans, but was surprised and defeated by Pompey; and as Tigranes now refused to admit him into his own dominions, he resolved to plunge with his army into the heart of Colchis, and thence make his way to the Palus Mæotis and the Cimmerian Bosporus. Arduous as this enterprise appeared, it was successfully accomplished; and he at length established himself without opposition at Panticapæum, the capital of Bosporus. He had now nothing to fear from the powerful Pompey, who turned his arms first against Tigranes, and afterward against Syria. Unable to obtain peace from Pompey, except he would come in person to make his submission, Mithradates conceived the daring project of marching round the northern and western coasts of line, through the wild tribes of the Sarmæ and Getæ, and having gathered round around all these barbarous nations, to penetrate into Italy itself. But meanwhile disaster had made rapid progress among his followers. His son Pharnaces at length openly re-against him. He was joined both by the army and the citizens of Panticapæum, unanimously proclaimed him king; and states who had taken refuge in a strong saw that no choice remained to him but or captivity. Hereupon he took poison, he constantly carried with him; but his action had been so long insured to antidotes did not produce the desired effect, and he was compelled to call in the assistance of one of the vilest mercenaries to dispatch him with sword. He died in 63. His body was sent to Rome by Pompey at Amisus, as a token of submission; but the conqueror caused it to be interred with regal honors in the sepulchre of his forefathers at Sinope. He was sixty-six or sixty-nine years old at the time of his death and had reigned fifty-seven years, of which twenty-five had been occupied, with only brief intervals, in one continued struggle with the Roman power. The estimation in which he was held by his adversaries is the best testimony to his great abilities: Cicero him the greatest of all kings after Alexander in another passage says that he was a more formidable opponent than any other whom the Roman arms had yet encountered.—7. Kings of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, 13.—8. Of Pergamus, son of Menodotus, his mother having had an amour with Alexander the Great, he was generally looked upon in reality the son of that monarch. He himself bestowed great care on his education; and he appears as early as 64 to have seized the chief control over the affairs of the active city. At a subsequent period he ordered Julius Cæsar in the Alexandrian; and after the defeat of Pharnaces in the wing year (47), Cæsar bestowed upon him the kingdom of the Bosphorus, and tetrarchy of the Galatians. But the son of the Bosphorus still remained to be Alexander, who had revolted against him, was, in fact, master of the whole and Mithradates having attempted to resist, was defeated and slain.

ARABIA DESERTA (Μηδωδωρος χώρα), a desert in Asia, on the western side of the Euxine (now Volga), so called because the place of refuge of the last king, in the reign of Claudius.

ARIEL (Μιδράς), the god of the sun among the Romans. About the time of the Roman Empire his worship was introduced at Rome, and spread over all parts of the empire. He is commonly represented as a handsome youth, wearing the Phrygian cap and standing on a bull which is thrown on and, and whose throat he is cutting. He is at the same time attacked by a dog, a scorpion. This group appears among ancient works of art, and a statue is preserved in the British Museum.

MNASÆAS (Μνασῆας), of Patara in Lycia, son of Patro in Achaia, was a pupil of Eratosthenes, and a grammarian of considerable celebrity. He wrote two works, one of a chorographical description, entitled Periplus (Περὶ πλοῦς), and the other a collection of oracles given at Delphi.

[MNASIPPUS (Μνάσιππος), a Spartan naval commander; led the Spartan fleet of sixty ships against Corcyra, B.C. 373. He was at first successful, but, having relaxed his vigilance, he was defeated and slain by the Corcyreans.]

MNEMO (Μνήμη), i. e., memory, one of the three Muses who were in early times worshipped at Asara in Boeotia. There seems to have been also a tradition that Mneme was the mother of the Muses, for Ovid (Met., v. 268) calls them Mnemonides; unless this be only an abridged form for the daughters of Mnemosyne. Vid. MUSEÆ.

MNEMONOTIS (Μνημοσύνη), i. e., memory, daughter of Uranus, and one of the Titanides, became by Jupiter (Zeus) the mother of the Muses.

MNEMONOTIS (Μνημοσύνη). 1. Son of Enphron or Enthphron, and father of Pythagoras. He was generally believed not to have been of purely Greek origin. According to some accounts, he belonged to the Tyrrhenians of Lemnos and Imbros, and is said to have been an engraver of rings. According to other accounts, the name of the father of Pythagoras was Mnemonotus, whose father Hippasus came from Phlius.—3. Grandson of the preceding, and son of Pythagoras and Themis. According to some accounts he succeeded Aristæus as president of the Pythagorean school.—8. A Stoic philosopher, a disciple of Panætius, flourished about B.C. 110, and taught at Athens. Among his pupils was Antiochus of Ascalon.

MNESICLES (Μνησικλῆς), one of the great Athenian artists of the age of Pericles, was the architect of the Propylææ of the Acropolis, the building of which occupied five years, B.C. 437-433. It is said that, during the progress of the work, he fell from the summit of the building, and was supposed to be mortally injured, but was cured by a herb which Minerva (Athena) showed to Pericles in a dream.

[MNESICHRUS (Μνησικλῆς). 1. One of the thirty tyrants at Athens.—2. Son of Euripides by Chærele, whose father was also called Mnesticus, is said to have been an actor; he is as a aid to have aided Euripides in the composition of his tragedies.]

[MNESIMACHUS (Μνησιμαχος), a comic poet of the middle comedy, some fragments of whose plays are still extant, and are given by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 787-793, edit. minor.]

[MNESITHIDES (Μνησιθίδης), one of the thirty tyrants at Athens.]

MNESITHÉUS (Μνησιθέος), a physician, was a native of Athens, and lived probably in the fourth century B.C., as he is quoted by the comic poet Alexis. He enjoyed a great reputation, and is frequently mentioned by Galen and others.

MNESTER (Μνίστηρ), a celebrated pantomime actor in the reigns of Caligula and Claudius, was also one of the lovers of the Empress Messalina, and was put to death upon the ruin of the latter.

MNESTHEUS, a Trojan, who accompanied Æneas to Italy, and is said to have been the ancestral hero of the Memmii.

MOABITES (Μωαβίταις, Môba: Mwabirai, Moabites: in the Old Testament, Moab, for both country and people), a district of Arabia Petraea, east of the Dead Sea, from the River Arnon (now Wady-el-Mojib, the boundary between Palestine and Arabia) on the north, to Zoar, near the south end of the Dead Sea, on the south, between the Amorites on the north, the Midianites on the east, and the Edomites on the south, that is, before the Israelitish conquest of Canaan. At an earlier period, the country of Moab had extended northward, beyond the northern end of the Dead Sea, and along the eastern bank of the Jordan, as far as the River Jabbok, but it had been wrested from them by the Amorites. The plains east of the Jordan were, however, still called the plains of Moab. The Moabites were left undisturbed by the Israelites on their march to Canaan; but Balak, king of Moab, through fear of the Israelites, did what he could to harm them, first by his vain attempt to induce the prophet Balaam to curse the people whom a divine impulse forced him to bless, and then by seducing them to worship Baal-Peor. Hence the hereditary enmity between the Israelites and Moabites, and the threatenings denounced against Moab by the Hebrew prophets. In the time of the Judges they subdued the southern part of the Jewish territory, with the assistance of the Ammonites and Amalekites, and held it for eighteen years (Judges, iii., 13, foll.). They were conquered by David, after the partition of whose kingdom they belonged to the kingdom of Israel. They revolted after the death of Ahab (B.C. 896), and appear to have become virtually independent; and after the ten tribes had been carried into captivity, the Moabites seem to have recovered the northern part of their original territory. They were subdued by Nebuchadnezzar, with other nations bordering on Palestine, very soon after the Babylonian conquest of Judæa, after which they scarcely appear as a distinct nation, but, after a few references to them, they disappear in the general name of the Arabians. The name Moabitis, however, was still applied to the district of Arabia, between the Arnon (the southern frontier of Peræa, or Palestine east of the Jordan), and the Nabathæi, in the mountains of Seir. The Moabites were a kindred race with the Hebrews, being descended from Moab, the son of Lot. They worshipped Baal-Peor and Chemosh with most licentious rites, and they sometimes offered human sacrifices. Their government was monarchical. They were originally a pastoral people; but the excessive fertility of their country, which is a mountainous tract intersected with rich valleys and numerous streams, led them to diligence and success in agriculture. The frequent ruins of towns and traces of paved roads, which still cover the face of the country, show how populous and prosperous it was. The chief city, Am or RABBATH-MOAB, afterward ARROPOLIS (now ruins at Rabba), was about twenty-five miles south of the Arnon.

[MOABITES, tyrant of the Cibyrate, in Upper Phrygia, made himself conspicuous by his eagerness to Rome during the war with Antiochus the Great, for which he was condemned by the consul Manlius Valso to pay a heavy fine.]

[MOCA (Môka, now Mocha), a city of Arabia Petraea, which, under the Roman supremacy, was regarded as a holy city, and had its own laws; coins of this city of the time of the Antonines and Septimius Severus are still extant.]

MODESTINUS, HEMERNIVS, a Roman jurist, and a pupil of Ulpian, flourished in the reigns of Alexander Severus, Maximinus, and the Gordians, A.D. 223-244. He taught law to the younger Maximinus. Though Modestinus is the least of the great Roman jurists, he ranks among the most distinguished. There are three hundred and forty-five excerpts in the Digest from his writings, the titles of which show the extent and variety of his labors.

MODERUS, a military writer, the author of the Libellus de Vocabulis Rei Militaris, addressed to the Emperor Tacitus, A.D. 275. It is very brief and presents no features of interest. Printed in all the chief collections of Scriptores de Re Militari.

MONTELA (now Monza), a town in Gallia Transpadana, on the River Lambrus, north of Mediolanum (now Milan), where Theodoric built a palace, and Theodolinda, queen of the Longobards, a splendid church, which still contains many of the precious gifts of this queen.

MÖRIN (Modetv, -relv, or leiv), a little village on a mountain north of Lydda or Diospolis, at the extreme northwest of Judæa, celebrated as the native place of the Maccabean family. Its exact site is uncertain.

MORVUS, MOENIS, MANVUS, or MENVUS (now Main), a river in Germany, which rises in the Sudeti Montes, flows through the territory of the Hermunduri and the Agri decumates of the Romans, and falls into the Rhine opposite Mogontiacum.

MORÆA (Μοίραι), called PARCÆ by the Romans, the Fates. Mora properly signifies "share," and as a personification "the deity who assigns to every man his fate or his share." Homer usually speaks of one Mora, and only once mentions the Moræ in the plural (Il. xxiv. 29). In his poems Mora is fate personified.

bich. at the birth of man, spins out the thread of his future life, follows his steps, and directs the consequences of his actions according to the counsel of the gods. But the personification of his Mœra is not complete; for he mentions no particular appearance of the goddess, attributes, and no parentage. His Mœra is therefore quite synonymous with Æra (Ala).

Hesiod the personification of the Mœræ is complete. He calls them daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Themis, and makes them three in number, viz., Cloto, or the spinning fate; Lachesis, or the one who assigns to man his lot; and Atropos, or the fate that can not be avoided. Later writers differ in their genealogy of the Mœræ from that of Hesiod; thus they are called children of Erebus and Night, of Saturn (Cronos) and Night, of Terra (Ge) and Oceanus, or lastly of Ananke or Necessity. The character and nature of the Mœræ are differently described at different times and by different authors. Sometimes they appear as divinities of fate in the strict sense of the term, and sometimes only as allegorical divinities of the duration of human life. In the former character they take care that the fate assigned to every being by eternal laws may take its course without obstruction; and Jupiter (Zeus), as well as the other gods and men, must submit to them. They assign to the Erinyes, who inflict the punishment for evil deeds, their proper functions; and with them they direct fate according to the laws of necessity, whence they are sometimes called the sisters of the Erinyes. These grave and mighty goddesses were represented by the earliest artists with staffs or sceptres, the symbol of dominion. The Mœræ, as the divinities of the duration of human life, which is determined by the two points of birth and of death, are conceived either as goddesses of birth or as goddesses of death, and hence their number was two, as at Delphi, and was subsequently increased to three. The distribution of the functions among the three was not strictly observed, for we sometimes find all three described as spinning, although this should be the function of Clotho alone, who is, moreover, often mentioned alone as the representative of all. As goddesses of birth, who spin the thread of the beginning of life, and even prophecy the fate of the newly born, they are mentioned along with Ilithyia, who is called their companion. The symbol with which they, or rather Clotho alone, are represented to indicate this function, is a spindle, and the idea supplied in it was carried out so far, that sometimes we read of their breaking or cutting off the thread when life is to end. Being goddesses of fate, they must necessarily know the future, which at times they reveal, and thus become prophetic divinities. As goddesses of death, they appear together with the Keres and the infernal Erinyes, with whom they are even confounded. For the same reason they, along with the Charites, lead Persephone out of the lower world into the regions of light. The various epithets which poets apply to the Mœræ generally refer to the severity, inflexibility, and sternness of fate. They had sanctuaries in many parts of Greece. The poets sometimes describe them as aged and hideous women, and even as lame, to indicate the slow march of fate; but in works of art they are represented as grave maidens, with different attributes, viz., Clotho with a spindle or a roll (the book of fate); Lachesis pointing with a staff to the globe; and Atropos with a pair of scales, or a sun-dial, or a cutting instrument.

Mœris or Myris (Μοῖρις, Μύρις), a king of Egypt, who, Herodotus tells us, reigned some nine hundred years before his own visit to that country, which seems to have been about B.C. 450. We hear of Mœris that he formed the lake known by his name, and joined it by a canal to the Nile, in order to receive the waters of the river when they were superabundant, and to supply the defect when they did not rise sufficiently. In the lake he built two pyramids, on each of which was a stone statue, seated on a throne, and intended to represent himself and his wife.

Mœris (Μοῖρις), commonly called Mœris Atticista, a distinguished grammarian, the author of a work still extant, entitled Δέσεις Ἀττικαί, though the title varies somewhat in different manuscripts. Of the personal history of the author nothing is known. He is conjectured to have lived about the end of the second century after Christ. His treatise is a sort of comparison of the Attic with other Greek dialects, consisting of a list of Attic words and expressions, which are illustrated by those of other dialects, especially the common Greek. Edited by Pierson, Lugd. Bat., 1759; [reprinted with some additions by Koch, Lips., 1831: and by Bekker with Harpocration, Berlin, 1833.]

Mœris Lacus (Μοῖρις or Μοῖριδος λίμνη; now Birket-el-Keroan), a great lake on the western side of the Nile, in Middle Egypt, used for the reception and subsequent distribution of a part of the overflow of the Nile. It was believed by the ancients to have been dug by King Mœris; but it is really a natural, and not an artificial lake.

Mæro (Μαῖρῶ) or Myro (Μυρώ), a poetess of Byzantium, wife of Andromachus, surnamed Philologus, and mother of the grammarian and tragic poet Homerus, lived about B.C. 300. She wrote epic, elegiac, and lyric poems.

Mærocles (Μαιρονάκης), an Athenian orator, a native of Salamis, was a contemporary of Demosthenes, and, like him, an opponent of Philip and Alexander.

Mæsia, called by the Greeks Μαῖα (Μαῖα), also Μ. ἡ ἐν Εὐρώπῃ, to distinguish it from Mysia in Asia), a country of Europe, was bounded on the south by Mount Hæmus, which separated it from Thrace, and by Mount Orbelus and Scordus, which separated it from Macedonia, on the west by Mount Scordus and the river Drinus and Savus, which separated it from Illyricum and Pannonia, on the north by the Danube, which separated it from Dacia, and on the east by the Pontus Euxinus, thus corresponding to the present Servia and Bulgaria. This country was subdued in the reign of Augustus, but does not appear to have been formally constituted a Roman province till the commencement of the reign of Tiberius. It was originally only one province, but was afterward formed into two provinces (probably after the conquest of Dacia by Trajan), called Mæsa Superior and Mæsa

the former being the western, and the latter the eastern half of the country, and separated from each other by the River Ceburus or Ciabrus, a tributary of the Danube. When Aurelianus surrendered Dacia to the barbarians, and removed the inhabitants of that province to the south of the Danube, the middle part of Mœsia was called Dacia Aureliani; and this new province was divided into Dacia Ripensis, the district along the Danube, and Dacia Interior, the district south of the latter as far as the frontiers of Macedonia. In the reign of Valens, some of the Goths crossed the Danube and settled in Mœsia. These Goths are sometimes called Mœso-Goths, and it was for their use that Uiphilas translated the Scriptures into Gothic about the middle of the fourth century. The original inhabitants of the country, called Mœsi by the Romans, and Μυσι (Μυσοί) by the Greeks, were a Thracian race, and were divided into several tribes, such as the TRIBALLI, PEUCINI, &c.

MACONTIACUM, ΜΟΟΝΤΙΛΙΟΝ, or ΜΑΟΝΤΙΛΙΟΝ (now Mainz or Mayence), a town on the left bank of the Rhine, opposite the mouth of the River Mœnus (now Main), was situated in the territory of the Vangiones, and was subsequently the capital of the province of Germania Prima. It was a Roman municipium, and was founded, or at least enlarged and fortified, by Drusus. It was always occupied by a strong Roman garrison, and continued to the downfall of the empire to be one of the chief Roman fortresses on the Rhine.

MOLIONES. Vid. MOLIONES.

MOLIONES or MOLIONIDÆ (Μολίονες, Μολίωνες, Μολιονίδαι), that is, Eurytus and Cteatus, so called after their mother Molione. They are also called Actoridæ or Actorione (Ἀκτορίδων), after their reputed father Actor, the husband of Molione, though they were generally regarded as the sons of Neptune (Poseidon). According to a late tradition, they were born out of an egg; and it is further stated that their bodies grew together, so that they had only one body, but two heads, four arms, and four legs. Homer mentions none of these extraordinary circumstances; and, according to him, the Moliones, when yet boys, took part in an expedition of the Epeans against Neleus and the Pylians. They are represented as nephews of Augeas, king of the Epeans. When Hercules marched against Augeas, the latter intrusted the conduct of the war to the Moliones, but, as Hercules was taken ill, he concluded peace with Augeas, whereupon his army was attacked and defeated by the Molionidæ. In order to take vengeance, he afterward slew them near Cleonæ, on the frontiers of Argolis, when they had been sent from Elis to sacrifice at the Isthmian games on behalf of the town. The Moliones are mentioned as conquerors of Nestor in the chariot race, and as having taken part in the Calydonian hunt. Cteatus was the father of Amphimachus by Theronice, and Eurytus of Thalpius by Theraphone. Their sons, Amphimachus and Thalpius, led the Epeans to Troy.

MOLOSSI (Μολοσσοί), a people in Epirus, who inhabited a narrow slip of country, called after them MOLOSSIA (Μολοσσία) or MOLOSSIA, which extended from the Aous, along the western bank of the Aracanthus, as far as the Ambracian Gulf. The Molossi were a Greek people, who claimed descent from Molossus, the son of Pyrrhus (Neoptolemus) and Andromache, and are said to have emigrated from Thessaly into Epirus, under the guidance of Pyrrhus himself. In their new abodes they intermingled with the original inhabitants of the land and with the neighboring Illyrian tribes, in consequence of which they were regarded by the other Greeks as half barbarians. They were, however, by far the most powerful people in Epirus, and their kings gradually extended their dominion over the whole of the country. The first of their kings, who took the title of King of Epirus, was Alexander, who perished in Italy B.C. 323. Vid. EPIRUS. The ancient capital of the Molossi was PASSARON, but AMBRACIA afterward became their chief town, and the residence of their kings. The Molossian bounds were celebrated in antiquity, and were much prized for hunting.

MOLYCRUM (Μολύκρειον, also Μολύκρεια, Μολυκρία: Μολύκριος, Μολυκρείος, Μολυκραιός), a town in the most southerly part of Ætolia, at the entrance of the Corinthian Gulf, gave the name of Rhium Molyorum ('Ρήιον Μολυόρων) to the neighboring promontory of Antirrhium. It was founded by the Corinthians, but was afterward taken possession of by the Ætolians.

MOMENPHIS (Μόμεμφις: now Panous-el-Khet, or Manous-el-Seffi, i. e., Lower Memphis), the capital of the Nomos Momemphites in Lower Egypt, stood on the eastern side of the Lake Mareotis.

MOMUS (Μῶμος), the god of mockery and censure, is not mentioned by Homer, but is called in Hesiod the son of Night. Thus he is said to have censured in the man formed by Vulcan (Hephestus), that a little door had not been left in his breast, so as to enable one to look into his secret thoughts.

MONA (now Anglesey), an island off the coast of the Ordovices in Britain, was one of the chief seats of the Druids. It was invaded by Suetonius Paulinus A.D. 61, and was conquered by Agricola, 78. Cæsar (B. G., v. 13) erroneously describes this island as half way between Britannia and Hibernia. Hence it has been supposed by some critics that the MONA of Cæsar is the Isle of Man; but it is more probable that he received a false report respecting the real position of MONA, especially since ancient writers give the name of Mons e Isle of Anglesey, and the name of the island is likely to have been mentioned on account of its celebrity in connection with the Druids.

MONETA. 1. A Parthian general, mentioned in Carm., iii., 6, 9), is probably the as Surenas, the general of Orodes, who defeated Crassus.—2. A Parthian noble, who fled to Antony and urged him to invade Asia, but soon afterward returned to the Parthian king Phraates.—3. A general of the Parthian king, Vologeses I., in the reign of MONETA OF MONARINA (now Isle of Man), an island between Britannia and Hibernia.

MONDA or MUNDA (now Monteago), a river on the eastern coast of Spain, which flows into the sea between the Tagus and Durus.

MONETA, a surname of Juno among the Romans by which she was characterized as the goddess of money. Under this name she had a temple on the Capitoline, in which there was the same time the mint, just as the treasury was in the temple of Saturn. The temple had been vowed by the dictator L. Furius Camillus against the Aurunci, and was erected on the spot where the house of M. Manlius had stood. Moneta signifies the goddess of money, but some writers found such a meaning in the name.

Thus Livius Andronicus used Moneta as a translation of Memorabilia (Μνημοσύνη), and made her the mother of the Muses or Cato. Cicero relates that, during an earthquake, a voice was heard issuing from the temple on the Capitol, and admonishing the Romans that a pregnant sow should be sacrificed, somewhat more probable reason for the name is given by Suidas, though he assigns a late time. In the war with Pyrrhus of Tarentum, he says, the Romans, being in need of money, prayed to Juno, and were told that the goddess that money would not be to them so long as they would fight for arms of justice. As the Romans by the time found the truth of the words of Juno, they called her Juno Moneta. Her festival was celebrated on the first of June.

MONETA (Μονήτις), a Greek woman, either of Thebes, in Ionia, or of Miletus, was the wife of Alcibiades, but was put to death by this monarch when he fled into Armenia.

MONACI or PORTUS, also HERCULIS MONACI (now Monaco), a port-town on the coast of Liguria, between Nizza and Albium Intemelium, was founded by the Massilians, was situated on a rocky promontory (hence the arx Monaci of Virg., 801), and possessed a temple of Hercules, from whom the place derived its name. The harbor, though small and exposed to the southeastern wind, was of importance, and was the only one on this part of the Ligurian coast.

MONTE, CURTUS, was exiled by Nero A. D. 68, and soon afterward recalled at his invitation. On the accession of Vespasian, he was sent to the senate the notor-ious Aquilinus Regulus. If the same man, the Curtius Montanus satirized by Juvenal (iv., 107, 131; xi., 84), Montanus in later life sullied the fair reputation he enjoyed in youth; for Juvenal describes him as a corrupt, epicure, a parasite of Domitian, and a hackneyed declaimer.

[MONETUS, JULIUS, a versifier of some reputation in the reign of Tiberius, and one of the emperor's private friends.]

MONETUS, VOLTRIVUS, an orator and declaimer in the reign of Tiberius. From his propensity to refine upon thought and diction, he was named the "Ovid" of the rhetorical schools. He was convicted on a charge of majestas, and died an exile in the Balearic islands, A. D. 25.

MORPUS or MORPUSIA, an ancient name of Pamphylia, derived from Mopsus, the mythical leader of certain Greeks who were supposed to have settled in Pamphylia, as also in Cilicia and Syria, after the Trojan war, and whose name appears more than once in the geographical names in Cilicia. (Vid. e. g. MORPUSIA, MORPUSIA.)

MORPUSIA (Μόρπιον; Μόρπιος), a town of Thessaly in Pelagiotis, situated on a hill of the same name, between Tempe and Larissa.

MORPUSIA (Μόρπος κρήνη or κρήνη, i. e., the Spring of Mopsus), a city of Cilicia Campestris, on the southern slope of the Taurus, and twelve Roman miles from Tarsus, was the place where the Emperor Constantius died, A. D. 361.

MORPUSIA (Μόρπος κρήνη, Μορπυσία, i. e., the Heart of Mopsus, also Μορπύς πόλις and Μόρπος; Μορπύς; Μορπύς; Μορπύς, in the Middle Ages: now Messia), an important city of Cilicia Campestris, on both banks of the River Pyramus, twelve Roman miles from its mouth, or the road from Tarsus to Issus, in the beautiful plain called τὸ Ἀλφειὸν πεδίων, was a ciuitas libera under the Romans. The two parts of the city were connected by a handsome bridge built by Constantius over the Pyramus. In ecclesiastical history, it is notable as the birth-place of Theodore of Mopsuestia.

MORPUS (Μόρπος). 1. Son of Ampyx or Ampyxus by the nymph Chloris. Being a seer, he was also called a son of Apollo by Himantia. He was one of the Lapthas of (Echalia or Tithraon (Thessaly), and took part in the combat at the wedding of Pirithoos. He was one of the Calydonian hunters, and also one of the Argonauts, and was a famous prophet among the Argonauts. He died in Libya of the bite of a snake, and was buried there by the Argonauts. He was afterward worshipped as an oracular hero.—2. Son of Apollo and Manto, the daughter of Tiresias, and also a celebrated seer. He contended in prophecy with Calchas at Colophon, and showed himself superior to the latter in prophetic power. Vid. CALCHAS. He was believed to have founded Mallos in Cilicia, in conjunction with the seer Amphilochous. A dispute arose between the two seers respecting the possession of the town, and both fell in combat by each other's hand. Mopsus had an oracle at Mallos, which existed as late as the time of Strabo.

MORGANTIUM, MORGANTINA, MURGANTIA, MURGANTIA (Μοργάντιον, Μοργαντίον; Μοργαντίος; Murgentinus), a town in Sicily founded by the Morgetes, after they had been driven out of Italy by the CEnotrians. According to Livy (xxiv., 37) this city was situated on the coast the coast, probably at the mouth of the Symæthus; but, according to other writers, it was situated in the interior of the island, southeast of Agyrium, and near the Symæthus. The neighboring country produced good wine.

MORGETES (Μόργητες), an ancient people in the south of Italy. According to Strabo they dwelt in the neighborhood of Rhegium, but, being driven out of Italy by the Ænotrians, crossed over to Sicily, and there founded the town of Morgantium. According to Dionysius of Halicarnassus, Morges was the successor of the Ænotrian king Italus, and hospitably received Siculus, who had been driven out of Latium by the Aborigines, in consequence of which the earlier Ænotrians were called Italietes, Morgetes, and Siculi. According to this account, the Morgetes ought to be regarded as a branch of the Ænotrians.

MORIA or MORIJA (Μόριον ὄρος), a mountain of Judea, within the city of Jerusalem, on the summit of which the temple was built. Vid. JERUSALEM.

MORICAMBE ESTUARIUM (Μορικάμβη εἰςχυσίς), now Morcumbe Bay, an estuary or bay on the western coast of Britannia.]

MORIMENE (Μοριμενή), the northwestern district of Cappadocia, on the banks of the Halys, assigned under the Romans to Galatia. Its meadows were entirely devoted to the feeding of cattle.

MORINI, a people in Gallia Belgica, west of the Nervii and Menapii, and the most northerly people in all Gaul, whence Virgil calls them extremi hominum (Æn., viii., 727). They dwelt on the coast, opposite Britain, and at the narrowest part of the channel between Gaul and Britain, which is hence sometimes called Fretum Morinorum or Morinum. They were a brave and warlike people. Their country was covered with woods and marshes. Their principal town was Gessoriacum.

MORIUS (Μόριος), a small river in Boeotia, a southern tributary of the Cephissus, at the foot of Mount Thurion, near Chæronæa.

MORMO (Μορμού, also Μορμολύκη, Μορμολυκείον), a female spectre, with which the Greeks used to frighten children.

MORPHEUS (Μορφεύς), the son of Sleep, and the god of dreams. The name signifies the fashioner or moulder, because he shaped or formed the dreams which appeared to the sleeper.

MORS, called ΘΑΝΑΤΟΣ (Θάνατος) by the Greeks, the god of death. In the Homeric poems Death does not appear as a distinct divinity, though he is described as the brother of Sleep, together with whom he carries the body of Sarpedon from the field of battle to the country of the Lycians. In Hesiod he is a son of Night and a brother of Ker and Sleep, and Death and Sleep reside in the lower world. In the Alcestis of Euripides, where Death comes upon the stage, he appears as an austere priest of Iliades in a dark robe and with the sacrificial sword, with which he cuts off a lock of a dying person, and devotes it to the lower world. On the whole, later poets describe Death as a sad or terrific being (Horat., Carm. i. 4, 13; Sat., ii., 1, 57); but the best artists of the Greeks avoiding any thing that might be displeasing abandoned the idea suggested to them by the poets, and represented Death under a more pleasing aspect. On the chest of Cypselus Night was represented with two boys, one black and the other white; and at Sparta there were statues of both Death and Sleep. Both were usually represented as slumbering youths, or as genii with torches turned upside down. There are traces of sacrifices having been offered to Death, but no temples are mentioned anywhere.

[MORTEMUS (Μόρτιμος), son of Philocles, and brother of Melanthius, a tragic poet, who, as well as his brother, was made the object of the bitterest attacks of Aristophanes, on account of both his dull and lifeless poetry and his debased character.]

MORTECHUS (Μόρτεχος), a tragic poet, a contemporary of Aristophanes, noted especially for his gluttony and effeminacy.

[MORVS (Μόρως), son of Hippotion, a Phrygian, slain by Meriones at the siege of Troy.]

MOSA (now Maas or Meuse), a river in Gallia Belgica, rises in Mount Vogesus, in the territory of the Lingones, flows first northeast and then northwest, and falls into the Vahalis or western branch of the Rhine.

MOSCHA (Μόσχος: now Muscæ), an important seaport on the northeastern coast of Arabia Felix, northwest of Syagrus, the easternmost promontory of the peninsula (now Ras el-Hak), a chief emporium for the trade between India and Arabia.

MOSCHII (Μόσχοι), a people of Asia, whose territory (ἡ Μοσκή, Moschorum Tractus) formed originally the southern part of Colchis, but, at the time of Augustus, was divided between Colchis, Iberia, and Armenia.

MOSCOLI MONTES or ICUS MONS (τὰ Μόσκολα ὄρη: now Merjidi), a range of mountains extending south and southwest from the main chain of the Caucasus to that of the Anti-Taurus, and forming the boundary between Colchis and Iberia: named after the Moschi, who dwelt among them. Though lofty, they were well wooded to the summit, and their lower slopes were planted with vines.

MOSCHION (Μοσχίων), a Greek physician, the author of a short Greek treatise "On Febrile Diseases," is supposed to have lived in the beginning of the second century after Christ. His work is edited by Dewez, Vienna., 1793.

MOSCUS (Μόσχος), of Syracuse, a grammarian and bucolic poet, lived about B.C. 100. Suidas says that he was acquainted with Antipater. According to this statement, his death ought to be placed later; but he calls himself pupil of Bion in the idyl in which he bewails the death of the latter. Vid. Bion. He wrote four of his idyls extant. He writes with elegance and liveliness; but he is inferior to Theocritus and comes still further behind Theocritus in style labors under an excess of polish and ornament. For editions, vid. Bion, [and Antipater], Hermann, Leipzig, 1849.]

MOSELLA (now Mosel or Moselle), a river in Gallia Belgica; rises in Mount Vogesus, flows northeast through the territories of the Treveri and falls into the Rhine at Conducatum (now re poem by Ausonius.

the Vitellians were entirely defeated by Antonius Primus (vid. PRIMUS), before Mucianus entered Italy. Antonius, however, had to surrender all power into the hands of Mucianus, upon the arrival of the latter at Rome. Mucia-nus was an orator and a historian. His powers of oratory are greatly praised by Tacitus.
He made a collection of the speeches of the republican period, which he published in eleven books of Acta and three of Epistole. The subject of his history is not mentioned, but it appears to have treated chiefly of the East.

MUMMIUS. 1. L., tribune of the plebs B.C.
187, and prætor 177.—2. L., surnamed Achacus, son of the last, was prætor 154, when he carried on the war successfully in further Spain against the Lusitanians. He was consul in 146, when he won for himself the surname of Achaicus by the conquest of Greece and the establishment of the Roman province of Achaia.
After defeating the army of the Achæan league at the Isthmus of Corinth, he entered Corinth without opposition. The city was burned, razed and abandoned to pillage; the native Corinthians were sold for slaves, and the rarest specimens of Grecian art were given up to the rapacity of an ignorant conqueror. Polybius the historian saw Roman soldiers playing at draughts upon the far-famed picture of Bacchus (Dionysus) by Aristides; and Mummio himself was so unconscious of the real value of his prize, that he sold the rarer works of painting, sculpture, and carving to the King of Per-gamus, and exacted securities from the masters of vessels who conveyed the remainder to Italy to replace by equivalents any picture or statulost or injured in the passage. He remained in Greece during the greater part of 146 with the title of præconsul. He arranged the fiscal and municipal constitution of the newly-acquired province, and won the confidence and esteem of the provincials by his integrity, justice, and equanimity. He triumphed in 145. He was ensor in 142 with Scipio Africanus the younger. The political opinions of Mammilius inclined to the popular side.—S. Sr., brother of the preceding, and his legatus at Corinth in 146–145, was an intimate friend of the younger Scipio Africanus. In political opinions S. Prætor was opposed to his brother Lucius, and was a high aristocrat. He composed ethical and satirical epistles, which were extant in Cicero's age, and were probably in the style which Horace the word cultivated so successfully.

MUNATIUS PLANCUS. Vid. PLANCUS.

MUNDA. 1. A Roman colony and an important town in Hispania Bætica, situated on a small river, and celebrated on account of two battles fought in its neighborhood, the victory of Cn. Scipio over the Carthaginians in B.C. 216, and the important victory of Julius Cæsar over the sons of Pompey in 45. The town had fallen into decay as early as the time of Pliny. The site of the ancient town is usually supposed to be the modern village of Monda, southwest of Malaga; but Munda was more probably in the neighborhood of Cordova, and there are ruins of ancient walls and towers between Martos, Alcantete, Espejo, and Bæna which are conjectured to be the remains of Munda.—2. A river. Vid. MONDA.

MUNYCHIA (Μουνυχία), a hill in the peninsula of Piræus, which formed the citadel of the ports of Athens. It was strongly fortified, and is frequently mentioned in Athenian history. At its foot lay the harbor of Munychia, one of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus, fortified by Themistocles. The names of these three harbors were Piræus, Zea, and Munychia. The last was the smallest and the most easterly of the three, and is called at the present day Phanari: Zea was situated between Piræus and Munychia. Most topographers have erroneously supposed Phanari to be Phaleron, and Zea to be Munychia. The entrance to the harbor of Munychia was very narrow, and could be closed by a chain. The hill of Munychia contained several public buildings. Of these the most important were, (1.) A temple of Diana (Artemis) Munychia, in which persons accused of crimes against the state took refuge: (2.) The Bendideum, the sanctuary of the Thracian Artemis Bendis, in whose honor the festival of the Bendideia was celebrated: (3.) The theatre on the northwestern slope of the hill, in which the assemblies of the people were sometimes held.

MURÆA, MURÆA, or MURÆA, a surname of Venus at Rome, where she had a chapel in the circus, with a statue. This surname, which is said to be the same as Myrtos (from myrtus, a myrtle), was believed to indicate the fondness of the goddess for the myrtle tree. In ancient times there is said to have been a myrtle grove in the front of her chapel at the foot of the Aventine.

MURORA, L. STATIUS, was Cæsar's legatus B.C. 48, and prætor 45. He went into Syria after his year of office expired; and after Cæsar's death became an active supporter of the republican party. Cassius appointed him prefect of the fleet. After the ruin of the republican party at Philippi in 42, Murora went over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily. Here he was assassinated by Potapey's order at the instigation of his freedman Menas, to whom M. was but borne himself loftily.

MURÆNA, LICINIUS. The name Murena, which is the proper way of writing the word, not Murena, is said to have been given in consequence of one of the family having a great liking for the lamprey (murena), and building tanks (vivaria) for them. 1. P., a man of some literary knowledge, lost his life in the wars of Marius and Sulla, B.C. 82.—2. L., brother of the preceding, served under Sulla in Greece, in the Mithradatic war. After Sulla had made peace with Mithradates (84), Murena was left as prætor in Asia. Anxious for distinction, Murena sought a quarrel with Mithradates; and after carrying on the war for two years, was at length compelled by the strict orders of Sulla to stop hostilities. Vid. p. 590, a. Murena returned to Rome, and had a triumph in 81. He probably died soon after.—3. L., son of the last, served under his father in the second Mithradatic war, and also under Lucullus in the third Mithradatic war. In 65 he was prætor, and prætor of Gallia Cisalpina, and in 63 was elected consul with D. Junius Silanus. Servius Sulpicius, an unsuccessful candidate, instigated a prosecution against Murena for bribery (ambitus), and he was supported in the matter by M. Porcius Cato, Cn. Postumius, and Servius Sulpicius the younger. Murena was defended by Q. Hortensius, M. Tullius Cicero, who was then consul, and M. Licinius Crassus. The speech of Cicero, which is extant, was delivered in the latter part of November. The orator handled his subject skillfully, by making use of the formulae and the practice of the lawyers, to which class Sulpicius belonged, and with the paradoxes of the Stoics, to which Cato had attached himself. Murena was acquitted, and was consul in the following year. 62.—4. A. TERENTIUS VARRO MURÆNA, probably the son of the preceding, was adopted by A. Terentius Varro, whose name he took, according to the custom in such cases. In the civil war he is said to have lost his property, and Proculeius, a Roman equester, is said to have given him a share of his own property. This Proculeius is called the brother of Varro, but, if we take the words of Horace literally (Carmin. 2), Proculeius had more than one brother. It is conjectured that this Proculeius was a son of the brother of No. 3, who had been adopted by one Proculeius. This would make Proculeius the cousin of Varro. It was common enough among the Romans to call cousins the name of brothers (frater patruelis), and so on. In 25 Murena subdued the Salasæ in their territory, and founded the town of Augusta (nunc Andria) in their territory. He was consul afflictus in 23 he was involved in the conspiracy of Marcus Cæpio, and was condemned to death, executed, notwithstanding the intercession of Proculeius and Terentia, the sister of Murena. Horace (Carmin. ii., 10) addressed Murena by name of Licinius, and probably intended to give him some advice as to being more moderate in his speech and conduct.

MUSA, ANTŌNIUS, a celebrated physician at Rome about the beginning of the Christian era.
He was brother to Euphorbus, the physician to King Juba, and was himself the physician to the Emperor Augustus. He had been originally a slave. When the emperor was seriously ill, and had been made worse by a hot regimen and restraint, B.C. 23, Antonius Musa succeeded in restoring him to health by means of cold bathing and cooling drinks, for which service he received from Augustus and the senate a large sum of money and the permission to wear a gold ring, and also had a statue erected in his honor near that of Æsculapius by public subscription. He seems to have been attached to this mode of treatment, to which Horace alludes (Epist. i, 15, 3), but failed when he applied it to the case of M. Marcellus, who died under his care a few months after the recovery of Augustus, 23. He wrote several pharmaceutical works, which are frequently quoted by Galen, but of which nothing except a few fragments remain. There are, however, two short Latin medical works ascribed to Antonius Musa, but these are universally considered to be spurious.

MUSA or MŪZA (Муза, Муза: now probably Muskid, north of Mokha), a celebrated port of Arabia Felix, on the western coast, near its southern extremity, or, in other words, on the eastern shore of the Red Sea, near the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb.

MUSÆ (Μοῦσαι), the Muses, were, according to the earliest writers, the inspiring goddesses of song, and, according to later notions, divinities presiding over the different kinds of poetry, and over the arts and sciences. They were originally regarded as the nymphs of inspiring wells, near which they were worshipped, and they bore different names in different places, until the Thracæ-Bœotian worship of the nine Muses spread from Bœotia over other parts of Greece, and ultimately became generally established.

1. Genealogy of the Muses. The most common notion was that they were the daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Mnemosyne, and born in Paros, at the foot of Mount Olympus. Some call them the daughters of Coelus (Uranus) and Terra (Gæa), and others daughters of Pierus and Antiope, or of Apollo, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Pnusa, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Moneta, probably a mere translation of Mnemosyne or Mneme, whence they are called Mnemoides, or of Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva, or, lastly, of Æther and Terra (Gæa).—2 Number of the Mu- ses. Originally there were three Muses worshipped on Mount Helicon in Bœotia, namely Melete (meditation), Mneme (memory), and Aoida (song). Three Muses also were recognized at Sicyon and at Delphi. As daughters of Jupiter (Zeus) and Plusia we find mention of four Mu-ses, viz., Thelxinoe (the heart delighting), Aoida (song), Arche (beginning), and Melete. Some accounts, in which they are called daughters of Pierus, mention seven Muses, viz., Nilo, Tri- tone, Asopo, Heptapora, Achelous, Tipoplo, and Rhodia; and others, lastly, mention eight, which is also said to have been the number recognized at Athens. At length, however, the number nine became established throughout all Greece.

Homer sometimes mentions Musa only in the singular, and sometimes Musæ in the plural, and once only he speaks of nine Muses, though without mentioning any of their names. Hesiod is the first who states the names of all the nine, and these nine names became the usual ones.
They are Clio, Euterpe, Thalia, Melpomene, Terpsichore, Erato, Polyhymnia or Polyhymnia, Urania, and Calliope.—3. Nature and character of the Muses. In Homer's poems, they are the goddesses of song and poetry, and live in Olym-pus. There they sing the festive songs at the repart of the immortals. They bring before the mind of the mortal poet the events which he has to relate, and confer upon him the gift of song. The earliest poets in their invocation of the Muse or Muses were perfectly sincere, and actually believed in their being inspired by the goddesses; but in later times the invocation of the Muses was a mere formal imitation of the early poets. Thamyris, who presumed to excel the Muses, was deprived by them of the gift they had bestowed on him, and punished with blindness. The Sirens, who likewise ventured upon a contest with them, were deprived of the feathers of their wings, and the Muses put them on their own persons as ornaments. The nine daughters of Pierus, who presumed to rival the Muses, were metamorphosed into birds. Since poets and bards derived their power from the Muses, they are frequently called either their disciples or sons. Thus Linus is called a son of Amphimarus and Urania, or of Apollo and Calliope, or Terpsichore; Hyacinthus a son of Pierus and Clio; Orpheus a son of Calliope or Clio, and Thamyris a son of Erato. These and a few others are the cases in which the Muses are described as mothers; but the more general idea was, that, like other nymphs, they were virgin divinities. Being goddesses of song, they were naturally connected with Apollo, the god of the lyre, who, like them, instructs the bards, and is mentioned along with them even by Homer. In later times Apollo is placed in very close connection with the Muses, for he is described as the leader of the choir of the Muses by the surname Musagetes (Μουσᾱγέτης).
A further feature in the character of the Muses is their prophetic power, which belongs to them, partly because they were regarded as inspiring nymphs, and partly because of their connection with the prophetic god of Delphi. Hence they constructed for example, Aristæus in the art of prophecy. As the Muses loved to dwell on Mount Helicon, they were naturally associated with Bacchus (Dionysus) and dramatic poetry, and hence they are described as the companions, playmates, or nurses of Bacchus (Dionysus). The worship of the Muses points originally to Thrace and Pieria about Mount Olympus, whence it was introduced into Boeotia; and the names of mountains, grottoes, and wells, connected with their worship in the north, were likewise transferred to the south. Near Mount Helicon, Ephialtes and Otus are said to have offered the first sacrifices to them. In the same place there was a sanctuary with their statues, the sacred wells Aganippe and Hippocrene, and on Mount Libethron, which is connected with Helicon, there was a sacred grotto of the Muses. Pierus, a Macedonian, is said to have been the first who introduced the worship of the nine Muses, from Thrace to Thespie, at the foot of Mount Helicon. There they had a temple and statues, and the Thespians celebrated a solemn festival of the Muses on Mount Helicon, called Musæa. Mount Parnassus was likewise sacred to them, with the Castalian spring, near which they had a temple. The sacrifices offered to the Muses consisted of libations of water or milk, and of honey. The various surnames by which they are designated by the poets are for the most part derived from the places which were sacred to them or in which they were worshipped, while some are descriptive of the sweetness of their songs.—4. Representations of the Muses in works of art. In the most ancient works of art we find only three Muses, and their attributes are musical instruments, such as the flute, the lyre, or the barbiton. Later artists gave to each of the nine sisters different attributes as well as different attitudes. 1. Calliope, the Muse of epic poetry, appears with a tablet and stylus, and sometimes with a roll of paper; 2. Clio, the Muse of history, appears in a sitting attitude, with an open roll of paper, or an open chest of books; 3. Euterpe, the Muse of lyric poetry, with a flute; 4. Melpomene, the Muse of tragedy, with a tragic mask, the club of Hercules, or a sword; her head is surrounded with vine leaves, and she wears the cothurnus; 5. Terpsichore, the Muse of choral dance and song, appears with the lyre and the plectrum; 6. Erato, the Muse of erotic poetry and mimic imitation, sometimes also has the lyre; 7. Polymnia or Polyhymnia, the Muse of the sublime hymn, usually appears without any tribute, in a pensive or meditating attitude; 8. Urania, the Muse of astronomy, with a staff pointing to a globe; 9. Thalia, the Muse of comedy and of merry or idyllic poetry, appears with a comic mask, a shepherd's staff, or a wreath of ivy. Sometimes the Muses are seen with feathers on their heads, alluding to their contest with the Sirens.

MUSEUS (Mouſaios). 1. A semi-mythological personage, to be classed with Olen, Orpheus, and Pamphus. He was regarded as the author of various poetical compositions, especially as connected with the mystic rites of Ceres (Demeter) at Eleusis, over which the legend represented him as presiding in the time of Hercules. He was reputed to belong to the family of the Eumœnides, being the son of Eumolpus and Selene.

In other variations of the myth he was indefinitely called a Thracian. According to other legends, he was the son of Orpheus, of whom he was generally considered as the imitator and disciple. Some accounts gave him a wife Deioce as a son Eumolpus. There was a tradition that the Museum in Piræus bore that name from having been the place where Mæneus was buried. Among the numerous compositions attributed to him by the ancients, the most celebrated were his Oracles. Onomacritus, in the time of the Pisistratidæ, made it his business to collect and arrange the oracles that passed under the name of Museus, and was banished by Hipparchus for interpolating in the collection oracles of his own making.—2. A grammarian, the author of the celebrated poem on the loves of Hero and Leander. Nothing is known of the personal history of the writer; but it is certain that the poem is a late production. Some critics suppose that the author did not live earlier than the fifth century of our era. Edited by Passow, Lips., 1810; and by Schæfer, Lips., 1825.

MUSAGETES. Vid. MUSE.

MUSONIUS RUFUS, C., a celebrated Stoic philosopher, was the son of a Roman equestrian, and was banished by Nero to the island of Ogys in A.D. 66, under the pretext of his having been privy to the conspiracy of Piso. He returned from exile on the accession of Galba, and seems to have been held in high estimation by Vespasian, as he was allowed to remain at Rome when the other philosophers were banished from the city. Musonius wrote various philosophical works, all of which have perished.

MUSTI (Motory), a town in the Carthaginian territory (Zeugitana), near the River Bagrada, on the road from Carthage to Sicca Veneria. Here Regulus killed an enormous serpent.

MORNU, a river of Nubidia, the boundary between the kingdoms of Jugurtha and Admetus. It is probably the same as the Russin.

MUTILUM, a fortified place in Gallia Cispadana, between the rivers Gabellus and Sontenna, answering probably to the modern Modena.

MUTILUS, C. PAPIUS, one of the principal Sentine generals in the Marsic war, B.C. 90–88.

MUTINA (Mutinensis; now Modena), an important town in Gallia Cispadana, on the road from Mediolanum to the south of Rome, was originally a Celtic town, and was the place which the Romans took away from the Boii. It is mentioned at the beginning of the second Punic war (B.C. 218) under the name of Motina, as a fortified place inhabited by the Romans; but it was not till 183 that it was made a Roman colony. Mutina is celebrated in the history of the civil war after Caesar's death. Decimus Brutus was besieged here by M. Antonius from December, 44, to April, 43, and under its walls the battles were fought in which the consuls Hirtius and Pansa perished. Hence this war was called the Bellum Mutinense. The best wool in all Italy came from the neighborhood of Mutina.

[MUTINES (Mutinas, or Mutinas, Polybius), a Libyio-Phœnician, an active and able officer of Hannibal, selected by him to take command of

after the death of Hippocrates. He provoked of great annoyance to the Romans, and all their efforts to capture or subdue him, but at length, having been superseded by the jealousy of Hanno, he betrayed himself into the hands of the Romans, who put him with the rights of citizenship, bestowed other honors on him.]

MUTUNUS or MUTINUS, was among the Romans the same as the phallus, or Priapus, among the Greeks, and was believed to be the most fruitful avenger of demons, and of all evil that proceeded from pride, boastfulness, and the like.

TYICA. Vid. MOTUCA.]

MIRAZIA (Μουζαρία or Μουζουρία: now Mirdia) a port of the district Limyrica, on the coast of India intra Gangem, five hundred (fifty geographical miles) east of Tyndia, vessels usually landed.]

MICA (Μυκάλη: now Samos), a mountain south of Ionia in Asia Minor, north of the mouth of the Mæander. It forms the western extremity of Mount Messogis, and runs far into the sea, opposite to Samos, forming a promontory, which was called Mycale or Mica (Τρυγίλιον, Τρυγύλιον: now Cape S.)

This cape and the southeast promontory of Samos (Posidonium) overlap one another, and the two tongues of land are separated by a strait only seven stadia (little more than four miles) in width, which is remarkable in Greek history as the scene of the battle gained over the Persian fleet by Leotides and Xanthippus, B.C. 479. There has been here a city of the same name near the promontory. On the northern side of the promontory, near Priene, was the temple of Neptune (Poseidon), which was the place of meeting for the Panionic festival phictyon.

MICALA (Μυκαλήσσις: Μυκαλήσσις), an ancient and important city in Boeotia, mentioned by Pausanias, was situated on the road from Thebes. In B.C. 419 some Thracian pirates in the pay of Athens surprised and captured the town, and butchered the inhabitants. It was never recovered, and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. It possessed a temple of Ceres (Demeter), who was worshipped there.

MICA, sometimes MYCÆNE (Μυκήναι, Μυκεναῖος: now Karyata), an ancient Argolis, about six miles northeast of Argos, situated on a hill at the head of a narrow bay, and is hence described by Homer as the recess (μυχῶ) of the Argive land: the etymology of the name. Mycenæ was founded by Perseus, and was originally the favorite residence of the Peloponnesians.

During the reign of Agamemnon it was ordered as the first city in all Greece, after the conquest of Peloponnesus by the Achæans, to be a place of importance. However, it continued an independent town till 468, when it was attacked by the Argives, who hated the Mycenæans as said to have been aided by the part they took in the Persian war in favor of the Greek cause. The walls of Mycenæ resisted all the attacks of the Argives: but the inhabitants were compelled by famine to abandon their town. They effected their escape without a surrender, and took refuge, some at Cleonæ, some in Achaia, and others in Macedonia. Mycenæ was now destroyed by the Argives and was never rebuilt; but there are still numerous remains of the ancient city, which, on account of their antiquity and grandeur, are some of the most interesting in all Greece. Of these the most remarkable are the subterranean vault commonly called the "Treasury of Atreus," but which was more probably a sepulchre, and the Gate of Lions, so called from two lions sculptured over the gate.

MYCÆNE (Μυκήνη), daughter of Inachus and wife of Arestor, from whom the town of Mycenæ was believed to have derived its name: the true etymology of the name is given above.

MYCÆNIUS or MECHÆRIUS (Μυκεναῖος, Μεχερῖος), son of Cheops, king of Egypt, succeeded his uncle Chephren on the throne. His conduct formed a strong contrast to that of his father and uncle, being as mild and just as theirs had been tyrannical. On the death of his daughter, he placed her corpse within the hollow body of a wooden cow, which was covered with gold. Herodotus tells us that it was still to be seen at Sais in his time. We further hear of Mycerinus that, being warned by an oracle that he should die at the end of six years, because he had been a gentle ruler and had not wreaked the vengeance of the gods on Egypt, he gave himself up to revelry, and strove to double his allotted time by turning night into day. He began to build a pyramid, but died before it was finished. It was smaller than those of Cheops and Chephren, and, according to Herodotus, was wrongly ascribed by some to the Greek hestera Rhodopis.

MYCÆNE (Μυχός), a harbor in the east of Phocis, on the Crissæan Gulf, probably the modern Zalusa.

MYCÆ (Μυκά), a people of Asia, belonging to the fourteenth satrapy of the Persian empire.]

MYCÆNA (Μύκονος: Μυκόνιος: now Mycono), a small island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, southeast of Tenos and east of Delos, never attained any importance in history, but is celebrated in mythology as one of the places where the giants were defeated by Hercules. The island was poor and unproductive, and its inhabitants were rapacious. It contained two towns, a promontory called Phorbia, and a mountain named Dimaetus. The large number of bald persons in this island was considered worthy of record by several ancient writers.

MYGDON (Μύδων). 1. Son of Atymnius, charioteer of Pylæmenes, a Trojan warrior, slain by Antilochus.—2. Another Trojan warrior, slain by Achilles.]

MYCOPHORIA NOMOS (Μυκοφορίας νόμος), a tract of Lower Egypt, opposite the city of Bubastis, on an island, and probably so called from a city Mycophoria.]

MYGDON (Μύδων). 1. Son of Acmon, a Phrygian king, who fought with Otreus and Pylæmenes against the Amazons, and from whom some of the Phrygians are said to have been called Mygdonians. He had a son Corebus, who is hence called Mygdonides.—[2. King of the Bebrycians, brother of Amycus, slain by Hercules with his his expedition after the girdle of the Amazon Hippolyte.]

MYGDONIA (Mygdonia: Mýgdones). 1. A district in the east of Macedonia, bordering on the Thermaic Gulf and the Chalcidic peninsula. Its people were of Thracian origin.—2. A district in the north of Asia Minor, between Mount Olympus and the coast, in the east of Mysia and the west of Bithynia, named after the Thracian people Mygdones, who formed a settlement here, but were afterward subdued by the Bithyni.—3. The northeastern district of Mesopotamia, between Mount Masius and the Chaboras, which divided it from Osroene. From its great fertility, it was also called Anthemusia (Ἀνθεμουσία). The name of Mygdonia was first introduced after the Macedonian conquests: in the passage of Xenophon (Anab., iv., 3), sometimes cited to prove the contrary, the true reading is Μαγδώνιοι, not Μυγδώνιοι.

[ΜΥΓΔΟΝΙΟΣ (Μυγδόνιος): now probably Jakhakhal, an eastern tributary of the Chaboras, flowing by the walls of Nisibis. Vid. ABORRHAS.]

ΜΥΙΑ (Μυία), daughter of Pythagoras and Theano, and wife of Milo of Crotona. A letter, addressed to a certain Phyllia, is extant under her name.

ΜΥΛΑ (Μυλά: Μυλάιος, Μυλαίτης). 1. (Now Melazzo), a town on the eastern part of the northern coast of Sicily, situated on a promontory running out far into the sea, with a harbor and a citadel. It was founded by Zancle (Messani), and continued subject to the latter city. It was off Mylae that Agrippa defeated the fleet of Sextus Pompeius, B.C. 36.—2. A town of Thessaly, in Magnesia, of uncertain site.

ΜΥΛΑΣΑ or ΜΥΛΑΣΣΑ (τὰ Μύλασσα, Μύλασσα: Μυλασσεύς; now Melasso, ruins), a very ancient and flourishing inland city of Caria, lay eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) from the coast at the Gulf of Iassus, in a fertile plain, on and at the foot of an isolated rock of beautiful white marble, which furnished the material for the splendid temples and other public buildings of the city. The most important of these buildings was the great national temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Carius or Osagon. Vid. CARIA. Mylasa was the birth-place and capital of HECATOMNUS. Under the Romans it was made a free city. In the civil wars it was taken and partly destroyed by Labienus. Its remains are very extensive, and the ruins of the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) are supposed to have been found on the rock which formed the Acropolis of the ancient city.

ΜΥΝΔΟΣ (Μύνδος: Μύνδιος; now probably Port Gumishlu, ruins), a Dorian colony on the coast of Caria, in Asia Minor, founded by settlers from Troezen, probably on the site of an old town of the Leleges, which continued to exist under the name of Palæmyndus. Mynus stood at the western extremity of the same peninsula on which Halicarnassus stood. It was not one of the cities of the Dorian Hexapolis, but never became a place of much importance.

[ΜΥΝΕΣ (Μύνες), son of Euenus of Lyrnessus, husband of Briseis, slain by Achilles, who carried off captive his beautiful widow, the occasion of the quarrel between him and Agamemnon.]

ΜΥΩΝ or ΜΥΩΝΙΑ (Μύων, Μυωνία: Μουωνεύς) a town of the Locri Ozoæ, situated on a considerable height thirty stadia from Amphissa, and in one of the passes which led from Ἐχολοι into Phocia.

ΜΥΩΝΚΑΪΟΣ (Μυώνησος; now Cape Hypso), a promontory of Ionia, with a town and a small island of the same name, south of Teos and west of Iseodus, and forming the northern headland of the Gulf of Epheus. Here the Romans, under the prætor L. Emilius, gained a great naval victory over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190.

ΜΥΩΣ ΗΟΡΜΟΣ (ὁ Μυὸς ὄρμος, i.e., Mouset-port; or, as others render it, Muscle-port, for μῦς is also the Greek for muscle, and this shell-fish is very common on the western coast of the Red Sea), afterward VENERIS PORTUS (Ἀποκίτης ὄρμος), an important sea-port town of Upper Egypt, built by Ptolemy II. Philadelphus on a promontory of the same name, six or seven days' journey from Coptos. Some of the best modern geographers identify the port with Kosseir (latitude 26° 10'), which is still an important port of the Red Sea, and the place of embarkation for the caravan to Mecca. Kosseir lies due east of Coptos, and is connected with it by a valley, which contains traces of an ancient road, and which still forms the route of the Mecca caravan. At the village of Abd-Shaar, near Kosseir, are extensive ruins, which are supposed to be the remains of the town of Myos Hormos. Others, however, place it a degree further north, in latitude 27° 10', opposite the Jaffatine islands.

ΜΥΡΑ or ΜΥΡΩΝ (τὰ and ἡ Μύρα, ἡ Μύρω: Μυρεύς; now Myra, Grk., Dembre, Trk., ruins), one of the chief cities of Lycia, and, under the later Roman empire, the capital of the province, was built on a rock twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from the sea, and had a port called Andriaca (Ἀνδριακή). St. Paul touched here on his voyage as a prisoner to Rome, and the passage where this is mentioned (Acts, xxvii., 5, 6) affords incidental proof that the place was then an important sea-port. There are still magnificent ruins of the city, in great part hewn out of the rock.

[ΜΥΡΕΙΝΟΣ (Μύρεινος), a small city and fortress of Thrace, on the Strymon, founded by the Milesian Histæus, with the consent of Ilarius, as the capital of a small principality in these regions: it fell, however, into the hands of the Edoni, who made it their capital and the residence of their princes.]

ΜΥΡΙΑΝΔΡΟΣ (Μυριανδρός), a Phœnician colony in Syria, on the eastern side of the Gulf of Issus, a day's journey from the Cilician Gates. It probably stood a little south of Alexandria, at a spot where there are ruins. Herodotus calls the Gulf of Issus ὁ Μαρμαρικός κόλπος, a name evidently derived from this place, with a slight variation of form.

ΜΥΡΙΚΥΣ (Μυρικυός), a city on the coast of Troas, opposite to Tenedos.

ΜΥΡΙΝΑ (ἡ Μυρίνα, or Μύρινα, Μύρινα, Μυρίνη: Μυριναιός). 1. (Now Sandarakt?), a very ancient and strongly fortified city on the western coast of Mysia, founded, according to mythical tradition, by Myrinus or by the Amazon Myrina, and colonized by the Æolians, of whom confederacy it formed a member. It was also called Smyrna, and, under the Roman empire, Sebastopolis: it was made by the Romans a colonia libera. It was destroyed by earthquakes under Tiberius and Trajan, but each time rebuilt. It was the birth-place of the epigrammatic poet Agathias.—2. Vid. LEMNOS.

ΜΥΡΙΝΑ (Mýrina), an Amazon, said to have given name to the city MYRINA, No. 1: she is mentioned in the Iliad (il., 814).]

ΜΥΡΙΛΕΑ (Mýrleia: Μυρλεῶνός): ruins at Amaziti, a little distance inland from Mudanieh, a city of Bithynia, not far from Prusa, founded by the Colophonians, and almost rebuilt by Prusias I., who called it ΑΡΑΜΕΑ after his wife. The Romans colonized it under Julius Cæsar and Augustus.

ΜΥΡΙΚΕΙΔΗΣ (Μυρικήδης), a sculptor and engraver, of Miletus or Athens, is generally mentioned in connection with Callistrates, like whom he was celebrated for the minuteness of his works. Vid. CALLISTRATES. His works in ivory are so small that they could scarcely be seen without placing them on black hair.

ΜΥΡΙΚΕΙΟΝ (Μυρικήιον), a Scythian or Cimmerian town of the Chersonesus Taurica, situated on a promontory of the same name at the narrowest part of the Bosphorus, opposite the Achilleum in Asia.

ΜΥΡΙΔΩΝ (Μυριδών), son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Eurymedusa, daughter of Cleitos, whom Jupiter (Zeus) deceived in the disguise of an ant. Her son was for this reason called Myrmidon (from μύρμηξ, an ant), and was regarded as the ancestor of the Myrmidons in Thessaly. He was married to Pisidice, by whom he became the father of Antiphys and Actor.

ΜΥΡΙΔΩΝΑΣ (Μυριδώνες), an Achaean race in Puthotis in Thessaly, whom Achilles ruled over, and who accompanied this hero to Troy. They are said to have inhabited originally the island of Egina, and to have emigrated with Pelus into Thessaly; but modern critics, on the contrary, suppose that a colony of them emigrated from Thessaly into Egina. The Myrmidones disappear from history at a later period. The ancients derived their name either from a mythical ancestor MYRMIDON, or from the ants (μύρμηκες) in Egina, which were fabled to have been metamorphosed into men in the time of Æacus. Vid. ÆACUS.

ΜΥΡΟ (Μύρος). Vid. MÆRO.
ΜΥΡΟΝ (Μύρων). 1. Tyrant of Sicyon, the father of Aristonymus, and grandfather of Cleithenes. He gained the victory at Olympia in the chariot-race in B.C. 648.—2. One of the most celebrated of the Greek statuaries, and also a sculptor and engraver, was born at Eleuthera, in Bœotia, about 480. He is also called an Athenian, because Eleuthera had been admitted to the Athenian franchise. He was the disciple of Ageladas, the fellow-disciple of Polyctetus, and a younger contemporary of Phidias. He flourished about 431, the time of the beginning of the Peloponnesian war. The chief characteristic of Myron seems to have been his power of expressing a great variety of forms. Not content with the human figure in its most difficult and momentary attitudes, he directed his art toward various other animals, and he seems to have been the first great artist who did so. His great works were nearly all in bronze. The most celebrated of his statues were his Discobolus and his Cow. Of his Discobolus there are several marble copies in existence. It is true that we can not prove by testimony that any of these alleged copies were really taken from Myron's work, or from imitations of it; but the resemblance between them, the same of the original, and the well-known frequency of the practice of making such marble copies of celebrated bronzes, all concur to put the question beyond reasonable doubt. Of these copies we possess one in the Townley Gallery of the British Museum, which was found in the grounds of Hadrian's Tiburtine Villa in 1791. The Cow of Myron appears to have been a perfect work of its kind. It was celebrated in many popular verses, and the Greek Anthology still contains no less than thirty-six epigrams upon it. The Cow was represented as lowing, and the statue was placed on a marble base, in the centre of the largest open place in Athens, where it still stood in the time of Cicero. In the time of Pausanias it was no longer there; it must have been removed to Rome, where it was still to be seen in the temple of Peace in the time of Procopius.—3. Of Priene, the author of an historical account of the first Messenian war, probably lived not earlier than the third century B.C.

ΜΥΡΩΙΔΗΣ (Μυρωνίδης), a skillful and successful Athenian general. In B.C. 457 he defeated the Corinthians who had invaded Megaris, and in 456 he defeated the Bœotians at Enophyta.

ΜΥΡΡΗΑ (Μύρρη) or ΣΥΡΡΗΑ, daughter of Cinyras and mother of Adonis. For details, vid. ADONIS.

ΜΥΡΡΙΝΩΣ (Μυρρινώς: Μυρρινόβοιος), a demus on the eastern coast of Attica, belonging to the tribe Pandionis, a little south of the promontory Cynosura. It is said to have been built by a hero Colæmus, and it contained a temple of Diana (Artemis) Colænia.

ΜΥΡΙΛΛΟΣ (Μύριλλος). 1. Vid. CANDAULES.—2. A Greek historical writer of uncertain date, a native of Lesbos, from whom Dionysius of Halicarnassus borrowed a part of his account of the Pelasgians.

ΜΥΡΙΝΟΣ. Vid. MYRTUNION.

ΜΥΡΙΤΙΣ, a town of the Turdetani, on the Anas in Lusitania, possessing the Jus Latii.

ΜΥΡΙΤΙΛΟΣ (Μυριτιάς), son of Mercury (Hermes) by Cleobule, Clytia, Phaethusa, or Myrto. He was the charioteer of Cœnoaus, king of Elis, whom he betrayed when Pelops contended with his master in the chariot-race. He was afterward thrown into the sea by Pelops near Geræstus in Eubœa; and that part of the Ægean is said to have thenceforth been called after him the Myrtoan Sea. Vid. CœNOAUS, PELOPS. At the moment he expired he pronounced a curse upon the house of Pelops which was henceforward tormented by the Erianyes. His father placed him among the stars as auriga.

ΜΥΡΤΙΣ (Μύρτις), a lyric poetess, a native of Anthedon in Bœotia. She was reported to have been the instructress of Pindar, and to have contended with him for the palm of superiority. This is alluded to in an extant fragment of Cræon.

anna There were statues in honor of her in various parts of Greece.

(MYRTO (ΜΥΡΤΩ). 1. Daughter of Aristides, the grandson of Aristides the Just, married, according to one account, by Socrates while Xanthippe was living. Boeckh thinks she was his first wife.—2. Vid. MYRTUUM MARE.]

MYRTUUM MARE (τὸ Μυρτώων πέλαγος), the rt of the Aegean Sea south of Eubœa, Attica, and Argolis, which derived its name from the small island Myrtus, though others suppose it to come from Myrtilus, whom Pelops threw into this sea, or from the maiden Myrto.

MYRTUONTIUM (Μυρτούντιον: Μυρτούσιος), called MYRTEIUS (Μύρτειος) in Homer, a town of the Epeans in Elis, on the road from Elis to Dyme.

MYRTUS. Vid. MYRTUUM MARE.

MYR (Μῦρ), an artist in the toreutic department, engraved the battle of the Lapithæ and the Centaurs and other figures on the shield of Phidias's colossal bronze statue of Minerva (Athena) Promachos in the Acropolis of Athens. He is mentioned as one of the most distinguished engravers by several ancient writers.

MYSCÆLUS (Μύσκελος or Μύσκελλος), a native of Achaia, and, according to Ovid (Métam., xv., 1), an Heraclid, and the son of an Argive named Alemon. He founded Croton in Italy, B.C. 710, in accordance with the Delphic oracle. The oracle had commanded him to build a city where he should find rain with fine weather. For a long time he thought it impossible to fulfill the command of the oracle, till at length he found in Italy a beautiful woman in tears; whereupon he perceived that the oracle was accomplished, and straightway founded Croton on the spot.

MYSI (Μῦσοι), one of the Thracian tribes who seem to have crossed over from Europe into Asia Minor before recorded history begins. They appear to be the same people as the Mœsi (in Greek also Μῦσοι), on the banks of the Danube. Vid. MYSIA. They stand in close connection with the Teucri. These two communities appear to have moved from the banks of the Strymon to the southeast of Thrace, forcing the Bithyni over the Thracian Bosphorus into Asia, and then to have crossed over into Asia themselves, by way of the Thracian Bosphorus, and to have settled on the southeastern shore of the Propontis, as far west as the River Rhyndacus (the rest of the Asiatic coast of the Propontis and the Hellespont being occupied by Phrygians), and also in the eastern and southern parts of the district afterward called MYSIA, in the mountains called Olympus and Temnus, and on the southern side of Ida. The Teucrians obtained a permanent footing also on the northern side of Ida, in the Troad. Being afterward driven westward over the Rhyndacus by the Bithynians, and hemmed in on the west and north by the Æolian colonies, the Mysians may be regarded as about shut up within the ranges of Ida and Olympus on the north and northeast, and Temnus on the south. They were a simple pastoral people, low in the scale of civilization. Their language and religion bore a strong resemblance to those of their neighbors, the Phrygians and Lydians, who were of the same Thracian origin as themselves, and hence arose the error, which is found in Herodotus, of deriving them directly from the Lydians.

MYSIA (ἡ Μυσία, poet. Μυσία αἰα: Μῦσοι, Mysus and Mysius: now Chan Kerasi, the north-western district of Anadolî), a district of Asia Minor, called, also, the Asiatic Mysia (Μῦσια Ἀσιακή), in contradistinction to Mœsia on the banks of the Danube. Originally it meant of course the territory of the Mysi, but in the usual division of Asia Minor, as settled under Augustus, it occupied the whole of the north-western corner of the peninsula, between the Hellespont on the northwest; the Propontis on the north; the River Rhyndacus and Mount Olympus on the east, which divided it from Bithynia and Phrygia; Mount Temnus, and an imaginary line drawn from Temnus to the southern side of the Ælætic Gulf on the south, where it bordered upon Lydia, and the Ægean Sea on the west. It was subdivided into five parts: (1.) MYSIA MINOR (Μ. ἡ μικρά), along the northern coast. (2.) MYSIA MAJOR (Μ. ἡ μεγάλη), the southeastern inland region, with a small portion of the coast between the Troad and the Æolic settlements about the Ælætic Gulf. (3.) ΤΡΩΑΣ (ἡ Τρωάς), the northwestern angle, between the Ægean and Hellespont, and the southern coast along the foot of Ida. (4.) ÆOLIS or ÆOLIA (ἡ Ἀιολίς or Αἰολία), the southern part of the western coast, around the Ælætic Gulf, where the chief cities of the Æolian confederacy were planted, but applied in a wider sense to the western coast in general. And (5.) TEUTHRANIA (ἡ Τευθραλία), the southwestern angle between Temnus and the borders of Lydia, where, in very early times, Teuthras was said to have established a Mysian kingdom, which was early subdued by the kings of Lydia; this part was also called Pergamene, from the celebrated city of PERGAMUS, which stood in it. This account applies to the time of the early Roman empire; the extent of Mysia, and its subdivisions, varied greatly at other times. In the heroic ages we find the great Teucrian monarchy of Troy in the northwest of the country, and the Phrygians along the Hellespont; as to the Mysians, who appear as allies of the Trojans, it is not clear whether they are Europeans or Asiatics. The Mysia of the legends respecting Telephus is the Teuthranian kingdom in the south, only with a wider extent than the later Teuthrania. Under the Persian empire, the northwestern portion, which was still occupied in part by Phrygians, but chiefly by Æolian settlements, was called Phrygia Minor, and by the Greeks HELLESΠONTUS. Mysia was the region south of the chain of Ida, and both formed with Lydia, the second satrapy. In the division of the empire of Alexander the Great, Mysia fell, with Thrace, to the share of Lysimachus, B.C. 311, after whose defeat and death, in 281, it became a part of the Greco-Syrian kingdom, with the exception of the southwestern portion, where Philæterus founded the kingdom of PERGAMUS (280), to which kingdom the whole of Mysia was assigned, together with Lydia, Phrygia, Caria, Lycia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia, after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in 190. With the rest of the kingdom of Pergamus, Mysia fell to the Romans in 133 by the bequest of Attalus III., and formed part of the province of Asia. Under the later empire Mysia formed a separate præconsular province.

der the name of Hellespontus. The country as for the most part mountainous, its chief mians being those of IDA, OLYMPUS, and TEMNIS, which are terminal branches of the north-eastern part of the Taurus chain, and the union which forms the elevated land of southeastern Asia. Their prolongations into the sea form several important bays and capes; namely, among the former, the great Gulf of Adramyttium (now Adramytti), which cuts off Lesbos from the continent, and the Sinus Elaiticus (now Gulf of Chandelis); and, among the latter, Igeum (now Cape Yenicheri) and Lectum (now ape Baba), at the northwestern and southwestern extremities of the Troad, and Cane (now ape Coloni) and Hydria (now Fokia), the northern and southern headlands of the Elaitic Gulf. Its rivers are numerous; some of them considerable, in proportion to the size of the country, and one of first-rate importance in history and poetry: the chief of them, beginning on the east, were RHYNDACUS and MACESTUS, TARSIVS, ÆSACUS, GRANICUS, RHODIVS, SIMOIS, and SCAMANDER, SATNIOS, EVENUS, and CAICUS. The tribes of the country, besides the general appellations mentioned above, were known by the following distinctive names: the Olympiēni or Olympēni (Ὀλυμπιῆνοι, Ὀλυμπηνοί), in the district of Olympē, at the foot of Mount Olympus; next to them, on the south and west, and occupying the greater part of Mysia Proper, the Abrettēni, who had a native divinity called by the Greeks Ζεὺς Ἀβρεττινός; the Trimenthuritæ, the Pentadēmæ, and the Mysomacedonæ, all in the region of Mount Temnus.

Mtēnus (now Bergama), a tributary of the River Calvus in Mysia, or rather the upper part of the Calvus itself, had its source in Mount Temnus.

MYSON (Μύσων), of Cheneæ, a village either in Læssaia or on Mount Ceta, is enumerated by Plato as one of the seven sages, in place of Periander.

MYRIA, a town in the southeast of Brutium, a little above the Promontorium Cocinium.

MYTILENE or MITYLENE (Μυτιλήνη, Μιτυλήνη): the former is the ancient form, and the one usually found on coins and inscriptions; the latter is sometimes found on inscriptions, and is the commoner form in MSS.: Μυτιληναῖος, Mityleneus: Mytilene or Metelin), the chief city of Læssa, stood on the eastern side of the island opposite the coast of Lesbos, upon a promontory which was once an island, and both sides of which formed excellent harbors. Its first foundation is ascribed to Carians and Pelasgians. It was early colonized by the Æolians. Vid. Læssa. Important hints respecting its political history are furnished by the fragments of the poetry of Alcæus, whence (and from other sources) it seems that, after the rule and overthrow of a series of tyrants, the city was nearly ruined by the bitter hatred and conflicts of the factions of the nobles and the people, till Pittacus was appointed to a sort of dictatorship, and the nobles were expelled. Vid. ALCÆUS, PITTACUS. Meanwhile, the city had grown to great importance as a naval power, and had founded colonies on the coasts of Mysia and Thrace. At the beginning of the seventh century B.C., the evacuation of one of these colonies, Sigeum at the mouth of the Hellespont, was disputed in war between the Mytilenæans and Athenians, and assigned to the latter by the award of Periander, tyrant of Corinth. Among the other colonies of Mytilene were Achilleum, Assos, Antandrus, &c. Mytilene submitted to the Persians after the conquest of Ionia and Æolia, and furnished contingents to the expeditions of Cambyses against Egypt and of Darius against Scythia. It was active in the Ionian revolt, after the failure of which it again became subject to Persia, and took part in the expedition of Xerxes against Greece. After the Persian war it formed an alliance with Athens, and remained one of the most important members of the Athenian confederacy, retaining its independence till the fourth year of the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 428, when it headed a revolt of the greater part of Lesbos, the progress and suppression of which forms one of the most interesting episodes in the history of the Peloponnesian war. (Vid. the Histories of Greece.) This event destroyed the power of Mytilene. Its subsequent fortunes can not be related in detail here. It fell under the power of the Romans after the Mithradatic war. Respecting its important position in Greek literary history, vid. LÆSSOS.

MYTISTÆTUM. Vid. AMESTRATUS.

MYUS (Μυῦς; Μυσῖνος; ruins at Palatna), the least city of the Ionian confederacy, stood in Caria, on the southern side of the Mæander, thirty stadia from its mouth, and very near Miletus. Its original site was probably at the mouth of the river; but its site gradually became an unhealthy marsh; and by the time of Augustus it was so deserted by its inhabitants that the few who remained were reckoned as citizens of Miletus.

N.

NAARDA (Ναάρδα), a town of Babytonia, chiefly inhabited by Jews, and with a Jewish academy.

NAARMALCHA or NAARMALCHA (Νααρμάλχος, Ναρμάλχος, i. e., the King's Canal: ὁ βασιλεὺς ποταμός, ἡ βασιλικὴ διώρυξ, flumen regium: Nahr-al-Malk or Ne Gruel Melek), the greatest of the canals connecting the Euphrates and the Tigris, was situated near the northern limit of Babytonia, a little south of the Median Wall, in latitude 33° 5' about. Its formation was ascribed to a governor named Gobares. It was repaired upon the building of Seleucia at its junction with the Tigris by Seleucus Nicator, and again under the Roman emperors Trajan, Severus, and Julian.

NABALIA. Vid. NAVALIA.

NABARZANES (Ναβαρζάνης), a Persian, conspired along with Beassus, against Darius, the last king of Persia. He was pardoned by Alexander.

NABATÆI, NIBATÆI (Ναβαταῖοι, Nabatæi: in the Old Testament, Nebaioth), an Arabian people, descended from the eldest son of Ishmael, had their original abodes in the northwestern part of the Arabian peninsula, east and southeast of the Moabites and Edomites, who dwell on the east of the Dead Sea and in the mountains reaching from it to the Persian Gulf. In the changes effected among the tribes of these regions by the Babylonian conquest of Judæa, the Nabathæans extended west into the Sinaitic peninsula and the territory of the Edomites, while the latter took possession of the south of Judæa (vid. Idumæi); and hence the Nabathæans of Greek and Roman history occupied nearly the whole of Arabia Petrea, along the north-eastern coast of the Red Sea, on both sides of the Ælanitic Gulf, and in the Idumæan Mountains (Mountains of Seir), where they had their celebrated rock-hewn capital, PETRÆA. At first they were a roving pastoral people; but, as their position gave them the command of the trade between Arabia and the west, they prosecuted that trade with great energy, establishing regular caravans between Lence Come, a port of the Red Sea, in the north-western part of Arabia, and the port of Rhinocolura (now El-Arish) on the Mediterranean, upon the frontiers of Palestine and Egypt. Sustained by this traffic, a powerful monarchy grew up, which resisted all the attacks of the Greek kings of Syria, and which, sometimes at least, extended its power as far north as Syria. Thus, in the reign of Caligula, even after the Nabathæans had nominally submitted to Rome, we find even Damasus in possession of an ethnarch of "Aretas the king," i. e., of the Nabathæan Arabs: the usual names of these kings were Aretas and Obodas. Under Augustus the Nabathæans are found, as nominal subjects of the Roman empire, assisting Ælius Gallus in his expedition into Arabia Felix, through which, and through the journey of Athenodorus to Petra, Strabo derived important information. Under Trajan the Nabathæans were conquered by A. Cornelius Palma, and Arabia Petrea became a Roman province, A.D. 105-107. In the fourth century it was considered a part of Palestine, and formed the diocese of a metropolitan, whose see was at Petra. The Mohammedan conquest finally overthrew the power of the Nabathæans, which had been long declining: their country soon became a haunt of the wandering Arabs of the Desert, and their very name disappeared.

NABIS (Nabis), succeeded in making himself tyrant of Lacedæmon on the death of Machinidas, B.C. 207. He carried the licence of tyranny to the furthest possible extent. All persons possessed of property were subjected to incessant exactions, and the most cruel tortures if they did not succeed in satisfying his rapacity. One of his engines of torture resembled the maiden of more recent times; it was a figure resembling his wife Apega, so constructed as to clasp the victim and pierce him to death with the nails with which the arms and bosom of the figure were studded. The money which he got by these means and by the plunder of the temples enabled him to raise a large body of mercenaries, whom he selected from among the most abandoned and reckless villains. With these forces he was able to extend his sway over a considerable part of Peloponnesus; but his further progress was checked by Flamininus, who, after a short campaign, compelled him to sue for peace (195). The tyrant, however, was allowed to retain the sovereignty of Sparta, and soon after the departure of Flamininus from Greece he resumed hostilities. He was opposed by Philopœmen, the general of the Achæans league; and though Nabis met at first with some success, he was eventually defeated by Philopœmen, and was soon afterward assassinated by some Ætolians who had been sent to his assistance (193).

NABONASSAR (Nabonassar), king of Babylon whose accession to the throne was fixed upon by the Babylonian astronomers as the era from which they began their calculations. This era is called the Era of Nabonassar. It commenced on the twenty-sixth of February, B.C. 747.

NABRISGA or NABRISGA (now Lebrja), so named Veneria, a town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, near the mouth of the Bætis.

NACOLIA (Nakoleia or -ia, or Nakoleia: now Sidighani), a town of Phrygia Epictetus, on the western bank of the River Thymbria, between Dorylæum and Cotyæum, was the place where the Emperor Valens defeated his rival Procopius, A.D. 366.

[NABIS or NABIS (Nabis, now Nayna), a river on the western coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, between the Durus and the Minus.]

NABIA, i. e., a dirge or lamentation, chanted at funerals, was personified at Rome and worshipped as a goddess. She had a chapel outside the walls of the city, near the porta Viminalis.

NÆVIUS, Cn., an ancient Roman poet, of whose life few particulars have been recorded. He was probably a native of Campania, and was born somewhere between B.C. 274 and 264. He appears to have come to Rome early, and he produced his first play in 235. He was attached to the plebeian party; and, with the licence of the old Attic comedy, he made the stage a vehicle for his attacks upon the aristocracy. He attacked Scipio and the Metelli; but he was indicted by Q. Metellus and thrown into prison, to which circumstance Plautus alludes in his Miles Gloriosus (ii., 2, 56). While in prison he composed two plays, the Harvatus and Leon, in which he recanted his previous imputations, and thereby obtained his release through the tribunes of the people. His repentance, however, did not last long, and he was soon compelled to expiate a new offence by exile. He retired to Utica; and it was here, probably, that he wrote his poem on the first Punic war; and here it is certain that he died, either in 204 or 202. Nævius was both an epic and a dramatic poet. Of his epic poem on the first Punic war a few fragments are still extant. It was written in the old Saturnian metre; for Ennius, who introduced the hexameter among the Romans, was not brought to Rome till after the banishment of Nævius. The poem appears to have opened with the story of Æneas's flight from Troy, his visit to Carthage and amour with Dido, together with other legends connected with the early history both of Carthage and of Rome. It was extensively copied both by Ennius and Virgil. The latter author took many passages from it, particularly the description of the storm in the first Æneid, the speech with which Æneas consoles his companions, and the address of Venus to Jupiter. His dramatic writings comprised both tragedies and comedies, most of which were taken from the Greek. Even in the Augustan age Nævius was still a favorite with the admirers of the genuine old school of Roman poetry, and the lines of Hor

Ep., ii., 1, 53) show that his works, if not much read as formerly, were still fresh in memories of men. The best edition of the works of Nævius is by Klussman, 8vo, Jena, NEVIUS SERTORIUS MACRO. Vid. MACRO.

NAGARA (Nayapa), a city of the district of Nagara in India intra Gangem, near the confluence of the Copen and Choaspes; the same, probably, as Nysa. Vid. Nysa, No. 1.]

NARVAL, a tribe of the Lygii in Germany, who dwelt on the banks of the Vistula. In their country was a grove sacred to the worship of two divinities called Alces, whom Tacitus compares with Castor and Pollux.

NARMALCHA. Vid. NARMALCHA.

NAIN. Vid. NYMPHÆ.

NAIN (Nain: now Nain), a city of Galilee, of Mount Tabor. (Luke, vii., 11.)

NAINUS, or NÆNUS (Naiōs, Naiōsōs, now Nissa), an important town of Mesia, situated on an eastern tributary of the Danube, and celebrated as the birth-place of the Great. It was enlarged and fortified by Constantine, was destroyed by him, but was rebuilt and fortified by Justinian.

NARADA (Nāpadoṣ or Napādōs, now the Nar), a considerable river of India intra Gangem, in Mons Vindius, and emptying into the Bay of Bengal.

NARCISSUS or NARCISSUS, a people on the west coast of Gallia Lugdunensis, on the north of the Liger, which separated them from the Aquitani. Their chief town was Nardus, afterward Nardetes (now Nantes).

NARCISSUS, a Roman jurist, one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius.

NARCISSUS or NARCISSUS, a people in the north of Gallia Belgica, between the Rhodanus, the Rhenus, and at the eastern extremity of the Lacus Lemanus.

NARCISSUS. Vid. NYMPHÆ.

NARCISSUS, a northern tributary of the Danube; its name is uncertain.

NARCISSUS (Nāpata: probably ruins at El-Kab, the head of the Nile to the southwest, at the fourth and fifth cataracts), the capital of the Ethiopian kingdom north of that of the southernmost point reached by the Nile, under Augustus. Its sovereigns bore the title of Candace; such a minister of one of them, Christianus, was introduced into Ethiopia in the reign of Augustus (Acts, viii., 27). This custom of government has been continued to our times in the neighboring kingdom of Shoa. In the reign of Nero, Napata was only a village.

NARCISSUS or NARCISSUS (Napocensis or Napacenoman colony in Dacia, on the high road through the country between Patavina and Atina).

NARCISSUS, a river in central Italy, rises at Focellus, on the frontiers of Umbria, and flows in a southwesterly direction, forming the boundary between Umbria and the Sabine, and after receiving the Velino and Tolenus (now Turano), falling by Interamna and Narnia, falls into the sea not far from Coriculum. It was celebrated for its sulphureous waters and white color (sulphurea Nar albus aqua, Virg., Æn., vii., 517).

NARCISSUS (Nāpata: ruins at the modern Kassir Jebir), one of the most important inland cities of Numidia, between Thagura and Sica Veneria, was the scene of Scipio's celebrated interview with Hannibal before the battle of Zama.

NARCISSUS, at a later time NARBONENSIS (Narbonensis: now Narbonne), a town in the south of Gaul, and the capital of the Roman province of Gallia Narbonensis, was situated on the River Atax (now Aude), also called Narbo, and at the head of the Lake Rubresus or Rubrensis (also called Narbonitis), which was connected with the sea by a canal. By this means the town, which was twelve miles from the coast, was made a sea-port. It was a very ancient place, and is supposed to have been originally called Atax. It was made a Roman colony by the consul Q. Marcius or Martius B.C. 118, and hence received the surname Martius; and it was the first colony founded by the Romans in Gaul. Julius Cæsar also settled here the veterans of the tenth legion, whence it received the name of Colonia Decumanorum. It was a handsome and populous town, the residence of the Roman governor of the province and a place of great commercial importance. The coast was celebrated for its excellent oysters. There are scarcely any vestiges of the ancient town, but there are still remains of the canal.

NARBONENSIS GALLIA. Vid. GALLIA.

NARCISSUS (Nāpissos). 1. A beautiful youth, son of the river-god Cephissus and the nymph Liriope of Theopis. He was wholly inaccessible to the feeling of love; and the nymph Echo, who was enamored of him, died of grief. Vid. Echo. One of his rejected lovers, however, prayed to Nemesis to punish him for his unfeeling heart. Nemesis accordingly caused Narcissus to see his own image reflected in a fountain, and to become enamored of it. But, as he could not approach this object, he gradually pined away, and his corpse was metamorphosed into the flower which bears his name.—2. A freedman and secretary of the Emperor Claudius, over whom he possessed unbounded influence. He long connived at the irregularities of Messalina; but, fearing that the empress meditated his death, he betrayed to Claudius her marriage with G. Silus, and obtained the order for her execution, A.D. 48. After the murder of Claudius, Narcissus was put to death by command of Agrippina, 54. He had amassed an enormous fortune, amounting, it is said, to 400,000,000 sesterces, a little over $13,500,000 of our money.—3. A celebrated athlete, who strangled the Emperor Commodus, 192. He was afterward exposed to the lions by the Emperor Severus.

NARCISSUS, a small but brave people in the south of Germany, of the Suevic race, dwelt west of the Marcomanni and east of the Hermandari, and extended from the Sudeti Montes on the north to the Danube on the south, thus inhabiting part of the Upper Palatinate and the country of the Fichtelgebirge.

NARMALCHA. Vid. NARMALCHA.

NARNIA (Narniensis: now Narni) a town in Umbria, situated on a lofty hill on the southern bank of the River Nar, originally called Narqum, was made a Roman colony B.C. 292, when the name was changed into Narnia, after the river. This town was strongly fortified by nature, being accessible only on the eastern and western sides. On the western side it could only be approached by a very lofty bridge which Augustus built over the river.

NARO, sometimes NAR (now Narenta), a river in Dalmatia, which rises in Mount Albius, and falls into the Adriatic Sea.

NARONA, a Roman colony in Dalmatia, situated on the River Naro, some miles from the sea, and on the road to Dyrrhachium.

NARSES, king of Persia. Vid. SASSANIDÆ.

NARSES (Ναρσής), a celebrated general and statesman in the reign of Justinian, was a eunuch. He put an end to the Gothic dominion in Italy by two brilliant campaigns, A.D. 552, 553, and annexed Italy again to the Byzantine empire. He was rewarded by Justinian, whereupon he invited the Langobards to invade Italy. His invitation was eagerly accepted by their king Alboin; but it is said that Narses soon after repented of his conduct, and died of grief at Rome shortly after the Langobards had crossed the Alps (568). Narses was ninety-five years of age at the time of his death.

NARTHACIUM (Ναρθήκιον), a town in Thessaly, on Mount Narthacius, southwest of Pharsalus.

ΝΑΥΥΧ, also ΝΑΥΪΟΥΣ or ΝΑΥΪΪΟΥΜ (Νάυφ, Νάυ-σορ, Ναυήκιον: Ναυήκιος, Ναυήκατορ: now Talanta or Talanti), a town of the Locri Opuntii on the Eubæan Sea, the reputed birth-place of Ajax, son of Oileus, who is hence called Narycius heros. Since Locri Epizephyrii, in the south of Italy, claimed to be a colony from Naux in Greece, we find the town of Locri called Narycia by the poets, and the pitch of Bruttium also named Narycia.

ΝΑΣΑΜΟΝΕΣ (Νασαμόνες), a powerful but savage Libyan people, who dwelt originally on the shores of the Great Syrtis, but were driven inland by the Greek settlers of Cyrenaica, and afterward by the Romans. An interesting account of their manners and customs is given by Herodotus (iv., 172), who also tells (ii., 32) a curious story respecting an expedition beyond the Libyan Desert, undertaken by five Nasamonian youths, the result of which was certain important information concerning the interior of Africa. Vid. NOBILIA.

NASICA, SCIPIO. Vid. SCIPIO.

NASIDIVUS, a wealthy (beatus) Roman, who gave a supper to Mæcenas, which Horace ridicules in the eighth satire of his second book. It appears from v. 58 that Rufus was the cognomen of Nasidivus.

NASIDIVS, Q. or L. was sent by Pompey, in B.C. 49, with a fleet of sixteen ships to relieve Massilia when it was besieged by D. Brutus. He was defeated by Brutus, and fled to Africa, where he had the command of the Pompeian fleet. He served in Sicily under Sextus Pompey, whom he defeated in 35. He joined Antony, and commanded part of his fleet in the war with Octavianus, &c.

NASO, OVIDIVS. Vid. OVIDIVS.

[NASTES (Νάστης), son of Nomios, leader of the Carians before Troy.]

[NASO], one of the leaders of the Suevi at their irruption into Gaul about the time of Caesar's arrival in that country.]

NASOS or NESTOS. Vid. CEPHIAIDÆ.

[NATHO (Νάθω), a nomos of Lower Egypt probably the same as the one called Νεοθήβη, Ptolemy, between the Busiritic and Bubastus mouths of the Nile.]

NATISO (now Natisone), a small river in Venetia, in the north of Italy, which flows by Aquileia, and falls into the Sinus Tergestinus.

NATTA or NACCA, "a fuller," the name of an ancient family of the Pinaria gens. The Natta satirized by Horace (Sat., i., 6, 124) for his dirty meanness was probably a member of the noble Pinarian family, and therefore attacked by the poet for such conduct.

[ΝΑΥΒΟΛΟΣ (Ναυβόλος), king of Tanagra, one of the Argonauts, father of Iphitus, who is hence called Ναυβολίδης in Homer.]

[ΝΑΥΚΛΙΔΗΣ (Ναυκλίδης, Dor. -κλίδης), 1. A Platæan, the leader of the faction who invaded and opened the gates for the Thebans who came upon Platæa B.C. 431.—2. One of the two Spartan ephors sent with the king Pausanias into Attica, B.C. 403, at the time when the Athenians were hard pressed by Lysander; he cordially co-operated with Pausanias for defeating the designs of Lysander.]

ΝΑΥΚΛΙΤΗΣ (Ναυκλίδης), of Erythræ, a Greek rhetorician, and a disciple of Isocrates, is mentioned among the orators who competed (B.C. 352) for the prize offered by Artemisia for the best funeral oration delivered over Mausolus.

ΝΑΥΚΡΑΤΙΣ (Ναυκραρίς; Ναυκρατίτης; now at the modern Sa-el-Hadjar), a city in the Delta of Egypt, in the Nomus of Sals, on the eastern bank of the Canopic branch of the Nile, which was hence called also Naucraticum Outium. It was a colony of the Milesians, founded probably in the reign of Amasis, about B.C. 556, and remained a pure Greek city. It was the only place in Egypt where Greeks were permitted to settle and trade. After the Greek and Roman conquests it continued a place of great prosperity and luxury, and was celebrated for its worship of Aphrodite. It was the birth-place of Athenæus, Lyceas, Phylarchus, Polycharmus, and Julius Pollux.

ΝΑΥΚΡΕΣ (Ναυκρές), an Argive statue, son of Mothion, and brother and teacher of Polyclethus II. of Argos, flourished B.C. 430.

ΝΑΥΚΛΕΟΥΣ (Ναυκλέως), that is, a place where ships can anchor. 1. A naval station on the eastern part of the northern coast of Sicily, between Mylæ and the promontory Pelorus: [It was between Mylæ and Nauclœus that Scipio Pompey was defeated by the fleet of Octavianus under Agrippa.]—2. A small island off Greece, near the promontory Sammonium.—3. A naval station belonging to Mesembria in Thrace.

ΝΑΥΜΑΧΙΔΗΣ (Ναυμάχιος), a Gnomie poet, of uncertain age, some of whose verses are preserved by Stobæus.

ΝΑΥΠΑΚΤΟΣ (Ναυπακτορ; Ναυπάκτος; now Lepanto), an ancient and strongly fortified town

Locri Ozolæ, near the promontory Antirrhæum, possessing the largest and best harbor on the whole of the northern coast of the Cæcæan Gulf. It is said to have derived its name from the Heracleidæ having here built the vessel with which they crossed over to the Peloponnese. After the Persian war it fell into the power of the Athenians, who settled here the Messenians who had been compelled to leave their country at the end of the third Messenian war, B.C. 455; and during the Peloponnesian war it was the head-quarters of the Athenians in all their operations against the Peloponnese. At the end of the Peloponnesian war the Messenians were obliged to leave the Peloponnese, which passed into the hands first of the Spartans and afterward of the Achæans. It was given by Philip, with the greater part of the Thracian territory, to Ætolia, but it was again added to Locris by the Romans.

Nauplia (Ναυπλία: Ναυπλιεύς: now Nauplia) the port of Argos, situated on the Saronic Gulf, has never a place of importance in antiquity and was in ruins in the time of Pausanias. The inhabitants had been expelled by the Argives as early as the second Messenian war, on suspicion of favoring the Spartans, who, in consequence, settled them at Methone in Laconia. At the present day Nauplia is one of the most important cities in Greece.

Nauplius (Ναυπλίου). 1. Of Argos, son of Poseidon and Amymon, a famous warrior, and the founder of the town of Nauplia. Son of Clytæneus, was one of the Argives and a descendant of the preceding.—3. A son of Euboea, and father of Palamedes, slain by Menelaus, by Clymene. Clymene had a daughter Clymene and her sister Aërope, Nauplius to be carried to a foreign land; but he married Clymene, and gave Aërope a son, who became by her the father of Menelaus and Menelaus. His son Palamedes was condemned to death by the Greeks during the siege of Troy; and as Nauplius considered his condemnation to be an act of injustice, he watched for the return of the Greeks, and when they approached the coast of Euboea he offered them on the dangerous promontory of Nauplia. The sailors, thus misguided, suffered shipwreck, and perished in the waves or by the word of Nauplius.

Nauplius (now Ober or Upper Laibach), an important commercial town of the Carinthians, situated on the River Nauportus (now Nauport), a tributary of the Sava, in Pannonia.

The town fell into decay after the foundation of Emona (now Laibach), which was only a few miles from it. The name of Nauplius is said to have been derived from the fact of having sailed up the Danube and then descended to this place, and here built the town; added that they afterward carried their goods to the Alps to the Adriatic Sea, where they embarked. This legend, like many others, probably owes its origin to a piece of etymology.

Nauplia (Ναυπλία), daughter of Alcioneus, the Phæacians, and Arete, who conspired to the court of her father when he was shipwrecked on the coast.

Nauplius (Ναυπλιεύς), one of the more important popular leaders of Athens in the time of Philip, leader of an army sent to the Athenians to aid the Phocians; at first on friendly terms with Æschines, but afterward battling on the side of the patriots, and after the disaster of Chæronea, stepping into the place of Demosthenes.]

Naupliades (Ναυπλιεύς), son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Peribœa, the daughter of Euryamon, was the father of Alcioneus and Rheia, and king of the Phæacians, whom he led from Hyperia in Thrinacia to the island of Scyria, in order to escape from the Cyclopes.

[Naustathmus (Ναυσταθμός). 1. A port town on the eastern coast of Sicily, north of Pachynum. 2. A port-town on the coast of the Pontus Euxinus, or, rather, on a salt lake joined to the sea (now Hamamli Ghiaul). 3. A port in Cyrenaica, between Erythrum and Apollonia.]

Nautica (Ναυτικά: now Nakshab or Kash), a city of Sogdiana, near the Oxus, toward the eastern part of its course.

Nautes. Vid. NAUTIA GENS.

NAUTIA GENS, an ancient patrician gens, claimed to be descended from Nautes, one of the companions of Æneas, who was said to have brought with him the Palladium from Troy, which was placed under the care of the Nautii at Rome. The Nautii, all of whom were surnamed Rutuli, frequently held the highest offices of state in the early times of the republic, but, like many of the other ancient gentes, they disappear from history about the time of the Samnite wars.

NAVA (now Nahc), a western tributary of the Rhine in Gaul, which falls into the Rhine at the modern Bingen.

NAVALIA or NABALIA, a river on the northern coast of Germany, mentioned by Tacitus, probably the eastern arm of the Rhine.

NAVIVS, ATTIVS, a renowned augur in the time of Tarquinius Priscus. This king proposed to double the number of the equestrian centuries, and to name the three new ones after himself and two of his friends, but was opposed by Navivus because Romulus had originally arranged the equites under the sanction of the auspices, and consequently no alteration could be made in them without the same sanction. The tale then goes on to say that Tarquinius thereupon commanded him to divine whether what he was thinking of in his mind could be done, and that when Navivus, after consulting the heavens, declared that it could, the king held out a whetstone and a razor to cut it with. Navivus immediately cut it. His statue was placed in the comitium, on the steps of the senate-house, the place where the miracle had been wrought, and beside the statue the whetstone was preserved. Attus Navivus seems to be the best orthography, making Attus an old prænomen, though we frequently find the name written Attius.

Naxos (Νάξος: Náxos). 1. (Now Naxia), an island in the Ægean Sea, and the largest of the Cyclades, is situated nearly half way between the coasts of Greece and Asia Minor. It is about eighteen miles in length and twelve in breadth. It was very fertile in antiquity, as it is in the present day, producing an abundance of corn, wine, oil, and fruit. It was especially celebrated for its wine, and hence plays a prominent part in the legends about Bacchus (Dionysus). Here the god is said to have found Ariadne after she had been deserted by Theseus. The marble of the island was also much prized, and was considered equal to the Parian. Naxos is frequently called Dia (Δία) by the poets, which was one of its ancient names. It was likewise called Strongyle (Στρογγύλη) on account of its round shape, and Dionysias (Διονυσιάς) from its connection with the worship of Dionysus (Bacchus). It is said to have been originally inhabited by Thracians and then by Carians, and to have derived its name from a Carian chief, Naxos. In the historical age it was inhabited by Ionians, who had emigrated from Athens. Naxos was conquered by Pisistratus, who established Lygdamis as tyrant of the island about B.C. 540. The Persians in 501 attempted, at the suggestion of Aristagoras, to subdue Naxos; and upon the failure of their attempt, Aristagoras, fearing punishment, induced the Ionian cities to revolt from Persia. In 490 the Persians, under Datis and Artaphernes, conquered Naxos, and reduced the inhabitants to slavery. The Naxians recovered their independence after the battle of Salamis (480). They were the first of the allied states whom the Athenians reduced to subjection (471), after which time they are rarely mentioned in history. The chief town of the island was also called Naxos; and we also have mention of the small towns of Tragea and Lastade. — 3. A Greek city on the eastern coast of Sicily, south of Mount Taurus, was founded B.C. 735 by the Chalcidians of Euboea, and was the first Greek colony established in the island. It grew so rapidly in power that in only five or six years after its foundation it sent colonies to Catana and Leontini. It was for a time subject to Hieronymus, tyrant of Gela; but it soon recovered its independence, carried on a successful war against Messina, and was subsequently an ally of the Athenians against Syracuse. In 403 the town was taken by Dionysius of Syracuse and destroyed. Nearly fifty years afterward (358) the remains of the Naxians scattered over Sicily were collected by Andromachus, and a new city was founded on Mount Taurus, to which the name of Tauromenium was given. Vid. TAUROMENIUM.

NAXUANA (Ναξουάνα: now Nakshivan), a city of Armenia Major, on the Araxes, near the confines of Media.

NAZARETH, NAZARA (Ναζαρέθ, or -θρ, or -ά: Nazapatoz, Naṣaratoz, Nazarānus, Nazarānus: now en-Nasirah), a city of Palestine, in Galilee, south of Cana, on a hill in the midst of the range of mountains north of the plain of Esdraelon.

[NAZARIUS, a Latin rhetorician, who taught eloquence at Bordeaux in the first half of the fourth century A.D. He was author of a paenegyric on Constantine, delivered before the Cæsars Crispus and Constantine, which is published in the Panegyrici Veteres.]

NAZIANZUS (Ναζιανζός: Nazianzōnōs), a city of Cappadocia, on the road from Archelaus to Tyana, celebrated as the diocese of the Father of the Church, Gregory Nazianzen. Its site is doubtful.

Νέαιρα (Néaira), the name of several nymphs, and also of several maidens mentioned by the poets.

Νέαιρος (Néairos: now Nieto), a river of Bruttium, in the south of Italy, falling into the Tarentine Gulf a little north of Croton. Here the captive Trojan women are said to have burned the ships of the Greeks.

[NEALCES, a friend of Turnus, slew Salustius in the wars between Turnus and Æneas in Italy.]

NEALCES (Νεάλκης), a painter who flourished in the time of Aratus, B.C. 245.

NEAΠΟΛΙΑ (Νεαπόλια: Neapóleis, pl.), a town of the Troad, upon the Hellespont, probably an Æolian colony. By the time of Augustus it had disappeared.

ΝΕΑΝΘΗΣ (Νεάνθης), of Cyzicus, lived about B.C. 241, and was a disciple of the Milesian Philiscus, who himself had been a disciple of Isonates. He was a voluminous writer, principal of history.

Νεάπολις (Νεάπολις: Neapólis, Neapólis). 1. In Europe. 1. (Now Napoli or Naples) a city in Campania in Italy, on the western slope of Mount Vesuvius and on the River Sebethus, was founded by the Chalcidians of Cumæ, on the site of an ancient place called Παρθενία (Παρθενόνη), after the Siren of the name. Hence we find the town called Parthenope by Virgil and Ovid. The year of the foundation of Neapolis is not recorded. It was called the "New City," because it was regarded simply as a new quarter of the neighboring city of Cumæ. When the town is first mentioned in Roman history, it consisted of two parts, divided from each other by a wall, and called respectively Paleopolis and Neapolis. This division probably arose after the capture of Cumæ by the Samnites, when a large number of Cumæans took refuge in the city they founded; whereupon the old quarter was called Paleopolis, and the new quarter, built to accommodate the new inhabitants, was named Neapolis. There has been a dispute respecting the site of these two quarters; but it is probable that Paleopolis was situated on the western side, near the harbor, and Neapolis on the eastern side, near the River Sebethus. In 327 the town was taken by the Samnites, and 290 it passed into the hands of the Romans, who allowed it, however, to retain its old constitution. At a later period it became a municipium, and finally a Roman colony. Under the Romans the two quarters of the city were united, and the name of Paleopolis disappeared. It continued to be a prosperous and flourishing place till the time of the empire; and its beautiful scenery, and the luxurious life of its Greek population, made it a favorite residence of many of the Romans. In the reign of AD 430 the city was destroyed by an earthquake, and was rebuilt by this emperor in the Roman style. The modern city of Naples does not stand exactly the same site as Neapolis. The ancient city extended further east than the modern one, since the former was situated on the Sebethus, whereas the latter does not reach so far as the Fiume della Madonna; but the modern city, on the other hand, extends further north and west than the ancient one, since the island of Megar-

in which the Castel del Ovo now stands, situated in ancient times between Paustilly and Neapolis. In the neighborhood of this there were warm baths, the celebrated of Lucullus, and the villa Paustilly or Paum, bequeathed by Vedius Pullo to Augustus, and which has given its name to the great grotto of Posilippo between Naples and Pozzuoli, at the entrance of which the tomb of Lucullus is still shown.—2. A part of Syracuse, Sicily.—3. (Now Napoli), a town on the eastern coast of the island of Sardinia, noted for its warm baths.—4. (Now Kassan) a sea-port town in Thrace, subsequently called Adriaca, on the Strymonic Gulf, between the Strymon and Nessus.—II. In Asia Minor. 1. (Now Scala Nuova, or near it), an Ionian city on the coast of Lydia, northward and southwest of Ephesus. The city, to whom it at first belonged, extended with the Samians for MARATHONIA. Two towns of Caria, the one near Harpe on the coast, perhaps the new Myndus.—4. (Ruins at Tutnek?), in the south of Antioch; afterward reckoned Asia.—5. In Palestine, the SYCHEN or of Scripture (Συχη, Συχώ, Συχια, now Nablus), one of the most ancient of Samaria, stood in the narrow valley between Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, and was the capital of the Samaritans, whose temple built upon Mount Gerizim. This temple destroyed by John Hyrcanus, B.C. 129. The name, under the Romans, was Flavia. 6. It was the birth-place of Justin Martyr. A small town of Babylonia, on the bank of the Euphrates, opposite to the mouth of the King's Canal.—7. In Egypt. Vid. 8. In Northern Africa, on the western coast of the Great Syrtis, by some identified with Magna, by others with the modern Nubia.—9. (Now Nabal), a very ancient Phoenician colony, on the eastern coast of Zeugitana, at the northern extremity of the great gulf was called after it Sinus Neapolitanus Gulf of Hammamet). Under the Romans a libera civitas, and, according to the laws, a colony.

NEARCHUS (Νεάρχος). 1. A distinguished friend of Alexander, was a native of Crete, and at Amphipolis. He appears to have held a prominent position at the court of Philip, from whom he was banished for participating in the intrigues of Alexander. After the death of Philip he was recalled, and treated with utmost distinction by Alexander. He accompanied the king to Asia; and in B.C. 335, entrusted by Alexander with the command of the fleet which he had caused to be assembled on the Hydaspes. Upon reaching the mouth of the Indus, Alexander resolved to send his ships by sea from thence to the Persian Gulf, and he gladly accepted the offer of Alexander to undertake the command of the fleet on this long and perilous navigation. He set out on the twenty-first of September, and arrived at Suva in safety in 325. He was rewarded with a crown for his distinguished services, and, at the same time, obtained in marriage a daughter of the Median Mentor and of Barsine, to whom

Alexander himself had been previously married. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander, he received the government of Lycia and Pamphylia, which he held as subordinate to Antigonus. In 317 he accompanied Antigonus in his march against Eumenes, and in 314 he is mentioned again as one of the generals of Antigonus. Nearchus left a history of the voyage, the substance of which has been preserved to us by Arrian, who has derived from it the whole of the latter part of his "Indica."—[2. A Pythagorean philosopher of Tarentum; he adhered to the Roman cause in the second Punic war, notwithstanding the defection of his countrymen, and was on friendly terms with Cato the censor, who lived in his house after the recapture of Tarentum by Fabius Maximus, B.C. 209.]

NEBO, a mountain of Palestine, on the eastern side of the Jordan, opposite to Jericho, was in the southern part of the range called Abarim. It was on a summit of this mountain, called Pisgah, that Moses died.

NEBËDES MOUNTS, the principal chain of mountains in Sicily, running through the whole of the island, and a continuation of the Apennines.

NECHO or NECHUS (Νεχός, Νέχως, Νεχός, Νεχός, Νεχός), son of Psammetichus, whom he succeeded on the throne of Egypt in B.C. 617. His reign was marked by considerable energy and enterprise. He began to dig the canal intended to connect the Nile with the Arabian Gulf; but he desisted from the work, according to Herodotus, on being warned by an oracle that he was constructing it only for the use of the barbarian invader. But the greatest and most interesting enterprise with which his name is connected is the circumnavigation of Africa by the Phoenicians in his service, who set sail from the Arabian Gulf, and, accomplishing the voyage in somewhat more than two years, entered the Mediterranean, and returned to Egypt through the Straits of Gibraltar. His military expeditions were distinguished at first by brilliant success, which was followed, however, by the most rapid and signal reverses. On his march against the Babylonians and Medes, whose joint forces had recently destroyed Nineveh, he was met at Magdolis (Megiddo) by Josiah, king of Judah, who was a vassal of Babylon. In the battle which ensued, Josiah was defeated and mortally wounded, and Necho advanced to the Euphrates, where he conquered the Babylonians, and took Carchemish or Circesium, where he appears to have established a garrison. After the battle at Megiddo he took the town of Cadizis, probably Jerusalem. In 606 Nebuchadnezzar attacked Carchemish, defeated Necho, and would appear also to have invaded Egypt itself. In 601 Necho died, after a reign of sixteen years, and was succeeded by his son Psammetichus or Psammathis.

NECTANABIS, NECTANEBUS, or NECTANEBUS (Νεκτάναβις, Νεκτανεβός, Νεκτανεβός). 1. King of Egypt, the first of the three sovereigns of the Sebennite dynasty, succeeded Nephertites on the throne about B.C. 544, and in the following year successfully resisted the invasion of the Persian force under Pharnabazus and Ibicerates. He died after a reign of ten years, and was succeeded by Tachos.—2. The nephew of Tachos, deprived the latter of the sovereignty in 361, with the assistance of Agesilaus. For some time he defeated all the attempts of Artaxerxes III. (Ochus) to recover Egypt, but he was at length defeated himself, and, despairing of making any further resistance, he fled to Æthiopia, 359. Nectanabis was the third king of the Sebennite dynasty, and the last native sovereign who ever ruled in Egypt.

NEIDA (Néda: now Buzi), a river in Peloponnesus, rises in Arcadia in Mount Ceraunus, a branch of Mount Lycæus, and falls into the Ionian Sea after forming the boundary between Arcadia and Messenia, and between Messenia and Elis.

NEORA OR NEGRANA (τῷ Νέγρῳ: now El-Nokra, north of Mareb), a city of Arabia Felix, destroyed by Ælius Gallus.

[NEION (Νήϊον) Vid. ITHACA.]

NÉLEUS (Νηλεὺς). 1. Son of Tyro, the daughter of Salmoncus. Neptune (Poseidon) once visited Tyro in the form of the river-god Enipeus, and she became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame, she exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learned their parentage; and after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married their mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, excluding Æson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro; but Pelias soon afterward expelled his brother, and thus became sole king: thereupon Neleus went with Melampus and Bias to Pylos, which his uncle Aphareus gave to him, and of which he thus became king. Several towns of this name claimed the honor of being the city of Neleus or of his son Nestor, such as Pylos in Messenia, Pylos in Elis, and Pylos in Triphylia; the last of which is probably the one mentioned by Homer in connection with Neleus and Nestor. Neleus was married to Chloris, a daughter of Amphion of Orchomenos, according to Homer, and a Theban woman according to others. By her he became the father of Nestor, Chromius, Periclymenus, and Pero, though he had in all twelve sons. When Hercules had killed Iphitus, he went to Neleus to be purified; but Neleus, who was a friend of Eurytus, the father of Iphitus, refused to grant the request of Hercules. In order to take vengeance, Hercules afterward marched against Pylos, and slew all the sons of Neleus, with the exception of Nestor: some later writers add that Neleus himself was also killed. Neleus was now attacked, and his dominions plundered by Augeas, king of the Epeans; but the attacks of the latter were repelled by Nestor. The descendants of Neleus, the Nelidae, were eventually expelled from their kingdom by the Horacidae, and migrated for the most part to Athens.—2. The younger son of Codrus, disputed the right of his elder brother Medon to the crown on account of his lameness, and when the Delphic oracle declared in favor of Medon, he placed himself at the head of the colonists who migrated to Ionia, and himself founded Miletus. His son Ægyptus headed the colonists who settled in Priene. Another son headed a body of settlers who re-enforced the inhabitants of Ionia, after they had lost a great number of their citizens in a war with the Carians.—3. In history, the son of Coriscus, was a disciple of Aristotle and Theophrastus, the latter of whom bequeathed to him his library, and appointed him one of his executors. The history of the writings of Aristotle, as connected with Neleus and his heirs, is related elsewhere (p. 103. b).

NÉLIDÆ, NÉLÉIDÆ, and NÉLIDÆ (Νηλεΐδης, Νηλεΐδης), patronymics of Neleus, in which either Nestor, the son of Neleus, or Antilochus, his grandson, is designated.

NEMAUSUS (Nemausensis: now Nîmes), one of the most important towns of Gallia Narbonensis, was the capital of the Ærecomici, a Roman colony. It was situated inland east of the Rhone, on the high road from Italy to Spain, and on the southern slope of Mons Cevenas. It was celebrated as the place from which the family of the Antonines came. Though rarely mentioned by ancient writers, the Roman remains at Nîmes, which are some of the most perfect north of the Alps, prove that the ancient Nemausus was a large and flourishing city. Of these remains the most important are the amphitheatre, the Maison Carrée, a name given to a beautiful Corinthian temple, and the magnificent aqueduct, now called Pont du Gard, consisting of three rows of arches, raised one above the other, and one hundred and eighty feet in height.

NĒMĒA (Nēma, Ion. Νημεΐα), a valley in Attica, between Cleonæ and Palius, celebrated in mythical story as the place where Hercules slew the Nemean lion. Vid. p. 356, b. In this valley there was a splendid temple of Jupiter (Zeus Nemæus) surrounded by a sacred grove, in which the Nemean games were celebrated every other year. Vid. Diet. of Antiqu. art. NEMEA.

NEMESIUS, M. AURELIUS OLYMPIUS, a Roman poet, probably a native of Africa, flourished at the court of the Emperor Carus (A.D. 283), carried off the prize in all the poetical contests of the day, and was esteemed second to the youthful prince Numerianus alone, who honored him so far as to permit him to dispute, and to yield to him the palm of verse. We are told that Nemesianus was the author of poems upon fishing, hunting, and aquatics, all of which have perished with the exception of a fragment of the Cynagetica, extending to three hundred and twenty-five hexameter lines, which, in so far as neatness and purity of expression are concerned, in some degree justifies the admiration of his contemporaries. The best edition of this fragment is by Stern, published along with Optatus Faliscus, Hal. Sax., 1832.

NĒMĒSIS (Nēmeusis), a Greek goddess, is most commonly described as a daughter of Night, though some call her a daughter of Erichonius of Oceanus. She is a personification of the moral reverence for law, of the natural fear of committing a culpable action, and hence of conscience. In later writers, as Herodotus and Pindar, Nemesis measures out happiness and unhappiness to mortals; and he who is blessed with too many or too frequent gifts of fortune, is visited by her with losses and sufferings, in order that he may become humble. This notion arose from a belief that the gods were envious of excessive human happiness. Nemesis was thus a check upon extravagant favors conferred upon man by Tyche or Fortune; and from this ally arose that of her being an avenging anishing fate, who, like Justice (Dike) and mynes, sooner or later overtakes the reckless. She is frequently mentioned under names of Adrastia (vid. ADRASTIA, No. 2), Rhamausia or Rhamnusis, the latter of she derived from the town of Rhamnus-na, where she had a celebrated sanctuahe was usually represented in works of a virgin divinity: in the more ancient she seems to have resembled Aphrodite ), whereas in the later ones she was more and serious. But there is an allegorical in that Zeus (Jupiter) begot by Nemesis an egg, which Leda found, and from Helena and the Dioscuri sprang, whence herself is called Rhamnusis.

istis (Νεμίσσιος), the author of a Greek On the Nature of Man, is called bishop sa, in Syria, and probably lived at the end fourth or beginning of the fifth century al work, which has generally been highly by all who have read it. Edited by Matisia Minor, stood on the River Lycus, ee Roman miles east of Amasia. It splendid city, and is famous in ecclesi-story for the council held there in A.D.

νήπυς (Νεο-πόλεμος). 1. Also called

PRANUS, son of Achilles and Deidamia, the daughter of Lycomedes; according to some, he was a son of Achilles and Iphigenia, and after the sacrifice of his mother was carried by his father to the island of Scyros. The name of Pyrrhus is said to have been given to him by Lycomedes because he had fair (πυρρόν) hair, or because Achilles, while disguised as a girl, had borne the name of Pyrrha. He was called Ne-optolemus, that is, young or late warrior, either because he had fought in early youth, or because he had come late to Troy. From his father he is sometimes called Achillides, and from his grandfather or great-grandfather, Pelides and Æacides. Neoptolemus was brought up in Sey-ros in the palace of Lycomedes, and was fettered from thence by Ulysses to join the Greeks in the war against Troy, because it had been prophesied by Helenus that Neoptolemus and Philo-tetes were necessary for the capture of Troy.
 At Troy Neoptolemus showed himself worthy of his great father. He was one of the heroes concealed in the wooden horse. At the capture of the city he killed Priam at the sacred hearth of Jupiter (Zeus), and sacrificed Polyxena to the spirit of his father. When the Trojan captives were distributed among the conquerors, Andromache, the widow of Hector, was given to Neoptolemus, and by her he became the father of Molossus, Pielus, Pergamus, and Amphialus.
 Respecting his return from Troy and the subsequent events of his life, the traditions differ.
 It is related that Neoptolemus returned home by land, because he had been forewarned by Helenus of the dangers which the Greeks would have to encounter at sea. According to Homer, Ne-optolemus lived in Phthia, the kingdom of his father, and here he married Hermione, whom her father Menelaus sent to him from Sparta.
 According to others, Neoptolemus himself went to Sparta to receive Hermione, because he had heard a report that she was betrothed to Orestes. Most writers relate that he abandoned his native kingdom of Phthia, and settled in Epirus, where he became the ancestor of the Molossian kings. Shortly after his marriage with Hermi-one, Neoptolemus went to Delphi, where he was murdered; but the reason of his visiting Delphi, as well as the person by whom he was slain, are differently related. Some say he went to plunder the temple of Apollo, others to present part of the Trojan booty as an offering to the god, and others, again, to consult the god about the means of obtaining children by Hermione.
 Some relate that he was slain at the instigation of Orestes, who was angry at being deprived of Hermione, and others, by the priest of the temple, or by Machareus, the son of Dædas. His body was buried at Delphi, and he was worshipped there as a hero.—3. I. King of Epirus, was son of Alcetas I., and father of Alexander
 I., and of Olympias, the mother of Alexander the Great. Neoptolemus reigned in conjunction with his brother Arymbas or Arrybas till his death, about B.C. 340.—3. II. King of Epirus, son of Alexander I., and grandson of the preceding. At his father's death in 326 he was probably a mere infant, and his pretensions to the throne were passed over in favor of Æacides.
 It was not till 302 that the Epirots, taking advantage of the absence of Pyrrhus, the son of Facides rose in insurrection against him, and set up Neoptolemus in his stead. The latter reigned for the space of six years, but was obliged to share the throne with Pyrrhus in 296. He was shortly afterward assassinated by Pyrrhus.—4. A Macedonian officer of Alexander the Great, after whose death he obtained the government of Armenia. In 321 he revolted from Ptolemy, and joined Craterus, but he was defeated by Eumenes, and was slain in battle by the hands of the latter.—5. A general of Mithradates, and brother of Archelaus.—6. An Athenian tragedian, who performed at the games at which Philip of Macedon was slain, 336.—7. Of Paros, a Greek grammarian of uncertain date, wrote several works quoted by Athenæus and the scholiasts.

NĒPĒTE, NEPE or NEPET (Nepesius: now Nepi), an ancient town of Etruria, but not one of the twelve cities, was situated near the saltus Ciminus, and was regarded as one of the keys and gates of Etruria (claustra portaque Etruria, Liv., vi., 9). It appears as an ally of the Romans at an early period, soon after the capture of Rome by the Gauls, and was subsequently made a Roman colony. There are still remains at Nepi of the walls of the ancient city.

NĒPĒLĒ (Nepēlē), wife of Athamas, and mother of Phrixus and Helle. Hence Helle is called Nepheleis by Ovid. For details, vid. ATHAMAS.

NĒPĒLĒS (Nepēlēs), a small town and promontory on the coast of Cilicia Aspera, between Anemurium and Antiochia.

NĒPĒRĒS (Nēpēris), a fortified town in the immediate neighborhood of Carthage, on a rock near the coast.

NEPOS, CORNĒLIUS, the contemporary and friend of Cicero, Atticus, and Catullus, was probably a native of Verona, or of some neighboring village, and died during the reign of Augustus. No other particulars with regard to his personal history have been transmitted to us. He is known to have written the following pieces, all of which are now lost: 1. Chronica, an Epitome of Universal History, probably in three books, to which Catullus appears to allude in dedicating his poems to Cornelius Nepos. 2. Exemplorum Libri, probably a collection of remarkable sayings and doings. 3. De Viris Illustribus, perhaps the same work as the preceding, quoted under a different title. 4. Vita Ciceronis. 5. Epistola ad Ciceronem. 6. De Historicis. There is still extant a work entitled Vite Excellentium Imperatorum, containing biographies of several distinguished commanders, which is supposed by many critics to have been the production of Cornelius Nepos. In all MSS., however, this work is ascribed to an unknown Æmilius Probus, living under Theodosius at the end of the fourth century of the Christian era, with the exception, however, of the life of Atticus, and the fragment of a life of Cato the Censor, which are expressly attributed to Cornelius Nepos. These two lives may safely be assigned to Cornelius Nepos; but the Latinity of the other biographies is such that we can not suppose them to have been written by a learned contemporary of Cicero. At the same time, their style presents a striking contrast to the meretricious finery of the later empire; and hence it may be conjectured that Probus ab id-

ed the work of Nepos, and that the biographies as they now exist, are in reality epitomes of lives actually written by Nepos. The most useful editions of these lives are by Van Stræven 8vo, Lugd. Bat., 1773; by Tzschacke, 8vo, Götting., 1804; by Bremi, 8vo, Zurich, 1830; and by Roth, Basil., 8vo, 1841.

NEPOS, JULIUS, last emperor but one of the West, A.D. 474-476, was raised to the throne by Leo, the emperor of the East. Nepos easily deposed Glycerius, who was regarded at Constantinople as a usurper (vid. GLYCERIUS); but he was in his turn deposed in the next year by Orestes, who proclaimed his son Romulus. Nepos fled into Dalmatia, where he was killed in 480.

NEPOTIĀNUS, FLAVIUS POPILII, son of Eutrophia, the half-sister of Constantine the Great, was proclaimed emperor at Rome in A.D. 296 but was slain by Marcellinus, the general of the usurper Magnentius, after a reign of twenty-eight days.

NEPTŪNUS, called POSEIDON by the Greeks. The Greek god is spoken of in a separate article. VID. POSEIDON. Neptunus was the marine divinity of the Romans. As the early Romans were not a maritime people, the marine divinities are rarely mentioned, and we scarcely know with certainty what day in the year was set apart as the festival of Neptunus, though it seems to have been the twenty-third of July (X. Kal. Sext.). His temple stood in the Campus Martius, not far from the septa. At his festival the people formed tents (umbræ) of the branches of trees, in which they enjoyed themselves in feasting and drinking. VID. DEI ANT., art. NEPTUNALIA. When a Roman commander set sail with a fleet, he first offered up a sacrifice to Neptunus, which was thrown into the sea. In the Roman poets Neptunus is completely identified with the Greek Poseidon, and accordingly, all the attributes of the latter are transferred by them to the former.

[NEQUINUS, earlier name of NARNIA. VID. NARNIA.]

NERATIUS PRISCUS, a Roman jurist, who lived under Trajan and Hadrian. It is said that Trajan sometimes had the design of making Neratius his successor in place of Hadrian. He enjoyed a high reputation under Hadrian, and was one of his consiliarii. His works are cited in the Digest.

NERĒIS or NĒRĒIS (Nepēis, in Hom. Nepēis), a daughter of Nereus and Doris, and used especially in the plural, NERĒIDES (Nepēides, Nepēides), to indicate the fifty daughters of Nereus and Doris. The Nereides were the marine nymphs of the Mediterranean, in contradistinction from the Neiades, or the nymphs of fresh water, and the Oceanides, or the nymphs of the great ocean. Their names are not the same in all writers; one of the most celebrated was Thetis, the mother of Achilles. They are described as lovely divinities, dwelling with their father at the bottom of the sea, and were believed to be propitious to all sailors, and especially to the Argonauts. They were worshipped in several parts of Greece, but more especially in sea-port towns. The epithets given them by the poets refer partly to their beauty and partly to their place of abode. They are frequently sculpted in works of art, and commonly as nail, beautiful, and naked maidens; and are often grouped with Tritons and other sea beings. Sometimes they appear on as half maidens and half fishes.

CLAUDIUS. Nero is said to have signified "in the Sabine tongue." 1. TIB., the four sons of Appius Claudius Cæcus,
C. 312, from whom all the Claudii Ne-re descended.—2. C., a celebrated general in the second Punic war. He was prætor and sent into Spain to oppose Hasdrubal his attack, and he was succeeded by Africanus. Nero was consul in M. Livius Salinator. Nero marched north of Italy against Hannibal, whom he defeated. He then marched into the north and effected a junction with his colleague in Picenum, and proceeded to crush Hannibal before his brother Hannibal could ask assistance. Hasdrubal was defeated on the River Metaurus. This great victory probably saved Rome, gave a ma-je to the name of Nero, and consecrated it among the recollections of the Romans.

Nero was censor 204, with M. Livius.—3. TIB., prætor 204, with Sardinia for his province; and consul 202, when he obtained Africa as his province, but his fleet suffered so much at sea that he was unable to join Scipio in Africa.—4. TIB., served under Pompey in the war against the pirates, B.C. 67. He is probably the Tiberius Nero who recommended that the members of the conspiracy of Catiline, who had been seized, should be kept confined till Catiline was put down.—5. TIB., father of the Emperor Tiberius, was probably the son of the last. He served as questor under Cæsar (48) in the Alexandrine war. He sided with L. Antonius in the war of Perusia (41); and when this town surrendered, he passed over to Sextus Pompey in Sicily, and subsequently to M. Antony in Achæa. On a reconciliation being effected between Antony and Octavianus at the close of the year (40), he returned with his wife to Rome. Livina, who possessed great beauty, excited the passion of Octavianus, to whom she was surrendered by her husband, being then six months gone with child of her second son Drusus. Nero died shortly after, and left Octavianus the tutor of his two sons.

NERO. 1. Roman emperor A.D. 54–68, was the son of Cn. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and of Agrippina, daughter of Germanicus Cæsar, and sister of Caligula. Nero's original name was L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, but after the marriage of his mother with her uncle, the Emperor Claudius, he was adopted by Claudius (A.D. 50), and was called Nero Claudius Cæsar Drusus Germanicus. Nero was born at Antium on the fifteenth of December, A.D. 37. Shortly after his adoption by Claudius, Nero, being then sixteen years of age, married Octavia, the daughter of Claudius and Messalina (53). Among his early instructors was Seneca. Nero had some talent and taste. He was fond of the arts, and made verses; but he was indolent and given to pleasure, and had no inclination for laborious studies. On the death of Claudius (54), Agrippina secured the succession for her son, to the exclusion of Britannicus, the son of Claudius.
His mother wished to govern in the name of her son, and her ambition was the cause of Nero's first crime. Jealousy thus arose between Nero and his mother, which soon broke out into a quarrel, and Agrippina threatened to join Britannicus and raise him to his father's place; whereupon Nero caused Britannicus to be poisoned, at an entertainment where Agrippina and Octavia were present (55). During the early part of Nero's reign, the government of Rome was in the hands of Seneca, and of Burrhus, the præfect of the prætorians, who opposed the ambitious designs of Agrippina.
Meantime the young emperor indulged his licentious inclinations without restraint. He neglected his wife for the beautiful but dissolute Poppæa Sabina, the wife of Otho. This abandoned woman aspired to become the emperor's wife; but since she had no hopes of succeeding in her design while Agrippina lived, she used at last to urge Nero to put his mother to death. Accordingly, in 59, Agrippina was assassinated by Nero's order, with the approbation at least of Seneca and Burrhus, who saw that the time was come for the destruction either of the mother or the son. Though Nero had no longer any one to oppose him, he felt the punishment of his guilty conscience, and said that he was haunted by his mother's spectre. He attempted to drown his reflections in a rash riot, in which he was encouraged by a band of flatterers. He did not, however, immediately marry Poppæa, being probably restrained by fear of Burrhus and Seneca. But the death of Burrhus in 62, and the retirement of Seneca from public affairs, which immediately followed, left Nero more at liberty. Accordingly, he divorced his wife Octavia, and in eighteen days married Poppæa. Not satisfied with putting away his wife, he falsely charged her with adultery, and banished her to the island of Pandataria, where she was shortly after put to death. In 64 the great fire at Rome happened. Its origin is uncertain, for it is hardly credible that the city was fired by Nero's order, as some ancient writers assert. Out of the fourteen regiones into which Rome was divided, three were totally destroyed, and in seven others only a few half-burned houses remained. The emperor set about rebuilding the city on an improved plan, with wider streets. He found money for his purposes by acts of oppression and violence, and even temples were robbed of their wealth. With these means he began to erect his sumptuous golden palace, on a scale of magnitude and splendor which almost surpasses belief. The vestibule contained a colossal statue of himself one hundred and twenty feet high. The odium of the conflagration, which the emperor could not remove from himself, he tried to throw on the Christians, who were then numerous in Rome, and many of them were put to a cruel death. The tyranny of Nero at last (65) led to the organization of a formidable conspiracy against him, usually called Piso's conspiracy, from the name of one of the principal accomplices. The plot was discovered, and many distinguished persons were put to death, among whom was Piso himself, the poet Lucan, and the philosopher Seneca, though the latter appears to have taken no part in the plot. In the same year, Poppæa died of a kick which her brutal husband gave her in a fit of passion when she was with child. Nero now married Statilia Messalina. The history of the remainder of Nero's reign is a catalogue of his crimes. Virtue in any form was the object of his fear; and almost every month was marked by the execution or banishment of some distinguished man. Among his other victims were Thrasea Pætus and Barea Soranus, both men of high rank, but of spotless integrity. In 67 Nero paid a visit to Greece, and took part in the contests of both the Olympic and Pythian games. He commenced a canal across the Isthmus of Corinth, but the works were afterward suspended by his own orders. While in Greece he sent orders to put to death his faithful general Domitius Corbulo, which the old soldier anticipated by stabbing himself. The Roman world had long been tired of its oppressor; and the storm at length broke out in Gaul, where Julius Vindex, the governor, openly raised the standard of revolt. His example was followed by Galba, who was governor of Hispania Tarraconensis. Galba was proclaimed emperor by his troops, but he only assumed the title of legatus of the senate and the Roman people. Soon after these news reached Rome, Sejanus who was prefectus pretorio along with Tigellinus, persuaded the troops to proclaim Galba. Nero was immediately deserted. He escaped from the palace at night with a few freedmen, and made his way to a house about four miles from Rome, which belonged to his freedman Phalaris. Here he gave himself a mortal wound when he heard the trampling of the horses on which his pursuers were mounted. The centurion, on entering, attempted to stop the flow of blood, but Nero saying, "It is too late. Is this your duty?" expired with a horrid stare. Nero's progress in crime is easily traced, and the lesson is worth reading. Without a good education, and with no talent for his high station, he was placed in a position of danger from the first. He was sensual, and fond of idle display, and then he became greedy of money to satisfy his expenses; he was timid, and, by consequence, he became cruel when he anticipated danger; still like other murderers, his first crime, the poisoning of Britannicus, made him capable of all other. But, contemptible and cruel as he was, there are many persons who, in the same situation, might run the same guilty career. He was only in his thirty-first year when he died, and he had held the supreme power for eighteen years and eight months. He was the last of the descendants of Julia, the sister of the dictator Cæsar. The most important external events in the reign of Nero were the conquest of Armenia by Domitius Corbulo (vid. Corbulo), and the insurrection of the Britons under Boadicea, which was quelled by Suetonius Paulinus. VID. PAULINUS.—3. Eldest son of Octavianus and Agrippina, fell a victim to the ambition of Sejanus, who resolved to get rid of the sons of Germanicus in order to obtain the imperial throne for himself. Drusus, the brother of Nero, was persuaded to second the designs of Sejanus, in hopes that the death of his brother would secure him the succession to the throne. There was no difficulty in exciting the jealousy of Tiberius; and, accordingly, in A.D. 29, Nero was declared an enemy of the state, was removed to the island of Pontia, and there either starved to death or perished by his own hands.

NEPESINÆ. 1. (Now Valera la Vieja), a town in Hispania Bætica, with the conventus Concordia Julia, probably the same place which Polybius calls (XXXV., 3) Ercobrica (Ἐρκοβρίκα).—2. (Now Almuna), a town of the Celtici in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Emerita to Caesar Augusta.

NERVA, COCCÆUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 9, brought about the reconciliation between Antonius and Octavius, 40, and in B.C. 10 the Cocceius mentioned by Horace (Sat., l., 7).—2. M., probably the son of the preceding grandfather of the Emperor Nerva. was consul A.D. 23. In 33 he resolutely set himself to death, notwithstanding the entreaties of Tiberius, whose constant companion he was. He was a celebrated jurist, and is mentioned in the Digest.—3. M., the father of the last, and probably father of the emperor, was also a celebrated jurist, and is often mentioned in the Digest under the name of Nerva.—4. M., Roman emperor A.D. 96–98, born at Narnia, in Umbria, A.D. 32. He was consul with Vespasian 71, and with Domitian 96. Nerva, who had probably been to the conspiracy, was declared emperor by the people and the soldiers, and his restoration at once restored tranquillity to the empire. He stopped proceedings against those who had been accused of treason (majestas), and pardoned many exiled persons to return to the empire.

The class of informers were suppressed, and some were put to death. Commencement of his reign, Nerva that he would put no senator to death; kept his word, even when a conspiracy was formed against his life by Calpurnius. Though Nerva was virtuous and humane, he did not possess much energy and vigour, his feebleness was shown by a mutiny of the Praetorian soldiers. The soldiers demanded the punishment of the assassins of Domitian, which the emperor refused. Though Nerva was feeble, his will was strong, and he saved himself his own neck, and declared his intention to die. However, it appears that he effected their purpose, and Nerva was to put Petronius Secundus and Parthenius to death, or to permit them to be massacred by the soldiers. Nerva felt his weakness, bowed his noble character and his good appointing as his successor a man who had both vigor and ability to direct public affairs. He adopted as his son and successor any regard to his own kin, M. Ulpius, who was then at the head of an army in Germany. Nerva died suddenly on the seventh of January, A.D. 98, at the age of five years.

Nestus, a powerful and warlike people in Thessaly, whose territory extended from the Gulf of Pagasæ to the ocean, and which was covered by the wood Arduus. They were divided into several smaller tribes, Centrones, Grudii, Levaci, Plendridi, &c. In B.C. 68 they were defeated by Julius Caesar with such slaughter that out of a hundred men capable of bearing arms only ten were left.

Nessus (Νησός), a lake in Thessaly, a little south of the River Peneus, and northeast of Larissa, is in summer merely a swamp, but in winter is not only full of water, but even overflows its banks. Nessonia and the neighboring Lake Boebris were regarded by the ancients as remains of the vast lake which was supposed to have covered the whole of Thessaly till an outlet was made for its waters through the rocks of Tempe.

Nestor (Νέστωρ), king of Pylos, son of Neleus and Chloris, husband of Eurydice, and father of Pisidice, Polycaste, Perseus, Stratius, Aretus, Echepphon, Pisistratus, Antilochus, and Thrasymedes. Some relate that, after the death of Eurydice, Nestor married Anaxibia, the daughter of Atreus, and sister of Agamemnon; but this Anaxibia is elsewhere described as the wife of Strophius and the mother of Pyrrhus. When Hercules invaded the country of Neleus and slew his sons, Nestor alone was spared, either because he was absent from Pylos, or because he had taken no part in carrying off from Hercules the oxen of Geryoneus. In his youth and early manhood Nestor was a distinguished warrior. He defeated both the Arcadians and Eleans. He took part in the fight of the Lapithæ against the Centaurs, and he is mentioned among the Calydonian hunters and the Argonauts. Although far advanced in age, he sailed with the other Greek heroes against Troy. Having ruled over three generations of men, his advice and authority were deemed equal to that of the immortal gods, and he was renowned for his wisdom, his justice, and his knowledge of war. After the fall of Troy he returned home, and arrived safely in Pylos, where Jupiter (Zeus) granted to him the full enjoyment of old age, surrounded by intelligent and brave sons. Various towns in Peloponnesus, of the name of Pylos, laid claim to being the city of Nestor. On this point, vid. p. 642, a.

Nestorius, a celebrated Heresiarch, was appointed patriarch of Constantinople A.D. 428, but, in consequence of his heresy, was deposed at the council of Ephesus, 431. His great opponent was Cyril. Nestorius was subsequently banished to one of the oases in Egypt, and he died in exile probably before 450. Nestorius carefully distinguished between the divine and human nature attributed to Christ, and refused to give to the Virgin Mary the title of Theotokos (Θεοτόκος), or "Mother of God." The opinions of Nestorius are still maintained by the Nestorian Christians.

Nessus, sometimes Nessus (Νέστωρ; now called Nesto by the Greeks, Karasu by the Turks), a river in Thrace, which rises in Mount Rhodope, flows southeast, and falls into the Ægean Sea west of Abdera and opposite the

NICÆA (Νίκαια: Νικαῖα, Νικαίον, Nicæensis, Nicensis). 1. (Ruins at Iznik), one of the most celebrated cities of Asia, stood on the eastern side of the Lake Ascania (now Iznik) in Bithynia. Its site appears to have been occupied in very ancient times by a town called Αἰτῶνα, and afterward by a settlement of the Bottians, called Ancore or Helicore, which was destroyed by the Mysians. Not long after the death of Alexander the Great, Antigonus built on the same spot a city which he named after himself, Antigonia; but Lysimachus soon after changed the name into Nicæa, in honor of his wife. Under the kings of Bithynia it was often the royal residence, and it long disputed with Nicomedia the rank of capital of Bithynia. The Roman emperors bestowed upon it numerous honors and benefits, which are recorded on its coins. Its position at the junction of several of the chief roads leading through Asia Minor to Constantinople made it the centre of a large traffic. It is very famous in ecclesiastical history as the seat of the great oecumenical council which Constantine convoked in A.D. 325, chiefly for the decision of the Arian controversy, and which drew up the Nicene Creed; that is to say, the first part of the well-known creed so called, the latter part of which was added by the Council of Constantinople in the year 381. The Council of Nice (as we commonly call it) also settled the time of keeping Easter. A second council, held here in 787, decided in favor of the worship of images. In the very year of the great council, Nicæa was overthrown by an earthquake, but it was restored by the Emperor Valens in 368. Under the later emperors of the East, Nicæa long served as the bulwark of Constantinople against the Arabs and Turks: it was taken by the Seljuks in 1078, and became the capital of the Sultan Soliman; it was retaken by the First Crusaders in 1097. After the taking of Constantinople by the Venetians and the Franks, and the foundation of the Latin empire there in 1204, the Greek emperor, Theodorus Lascaris, made Nicæa the capital of a separate kingdom, in which his followers maintained themselves with various success against the Latins of Constantinople on the one side, and the Seljuks of Iconium on the other, and in 1261 regained Constantinople. At length, in 1330, Nicæa was finally taken by Orchan, the son of the founder of the Ottoman empire, Othman. Iznik, the modern Nicæa, is a poor village of about one hundred houses; but the double walls of the ancient city still remain almost entire, exhibiting four large and two small gates. There are also the remains of the two moles which formed the harbor on the lake, of an apse of the theatre, and of the gymnasium: in the last edifice, we are told, there was a point from which all the four gates were visible, so that was the regularity with which the city was built.—2. (Now Nilab), a city of India, on the borders of the Paropamisadæ, on the west of the River Cophen.—3. (Now probably ruined), a city of India, on the River Hypanes (now Jelum), built by Alexander to commemorate his victory over Porus.—4. A fortress of the Epicnemidian Locrians on the near the Pass of Thermopylae, which is often mentioned in the wars of Greece with Macedonia and with the Romans. In the latter, its betrayal to Philip by the Thracian king Phalaecus led to the termination of the war, B.C. 346; and after various changes it is found, at the time of the wars with Rome, in the hands of the Ætolians.—5. In Italy. Vid. NICIA.—6. An ancient name of Marone, Coraica.—7. (Now Nizza, Nice), a city on the coast of Liguria, a little east of the River Var, a colony of Massilia, and subject to that city; hence it was considered as belonging to Greece, though it was just beyond the frontier. It became important as a stronghold of the Christian religion, which was preached there by St. Irenæus at an early period.

NICANDER (Νικάνδρος). 1. King of Sparta, son of Charilaus, and father of Theopompus, reigned about B.C. 809–770.—2. A Greek grammarian, and physician, was a native of Claros, near Colophon in Ionia, whence he is frequently called a Colophonian. He succeeded his father as one of the hereditary priests of Apollo Clarius. He appears to have flourished about B.C. 165–135. Of the numerous works of Nicander only two poems are extant, one entitled Theriaca (Θηριακά), which consists of nearly one thousand hexameter lines, and treats of venomous animals and the wounds made by them, and another entitled Alexpharmaca (Ἀλεξίφάρμακα), which consists of more than six hundred hexameter lines, and treats of poisons and their antidotes. Among the ancients his authority in all matters relating to toxicology seems to have been considered high. His works are frequently quoted by Pliny, Galen, and other ancient writers. His style is harsh and obscure; and his works are now scarcely ever read as poems, and are only consulted by those who are interested in points of zoological and medical antiquities. The best edition is by Schneider, who published the Alexpharmaca in 1792, Halle, and the Theriaca in 1814, Lipsæ.

NICINOR (Νικάνωρ). 1. Son of Parmenio, a distinguished officer in the service of Alexander, died during the king's advance into Thrace, B.C. 330.—2. A Macedonian officer, who, in the division of the provinces after the death of Perdiccas (321), obtained the government of Cappadocia. He attached himself to the party of Antigonus, who made him governor of Media and the adjoining provinces, which he continued to hold until 312, when he was deprived of them by Seleucus.—3. A Macedonian officer er Cassander, by whom he was secretly dissatisfied, immediately on the death of Antipater to take the command of the Macedonian army at Munchia. Nicanor arrived at this before the news of Antipater's death, thus readily obtained possession of the city. Soon afterward he surprised the Pila-ria, and placed both fortresses in the hands of Cassander on the arrival of the latter in 318. Nicanor was afterward dissatisfied by Cassander with a fleet to the Hellespont, where he gained a victory over the admiral Polyperchon. On his return to Athens he incurred the suspicion of Cassander, and died by death.—(4) Surnamed the Elephant, died under Philip V. of Macedonia, who sent Attica with an army just before the beginning of the war between Philip and the Romans, B.C. 200: he also commanded the rearguard of Philip's army at the battle of Cynosema, B.C. 197.—(5) Son of Patroclus, sent to the regent of Syria during the absence of Antiochus IV., to reduce the revolted provinces.

He was completely defeated and slain by Maccabæus, B.C. 165.—(6) Aristotle's disciple, destined by the philosopher to be his son-in-law.—(7) A celebrated grammarian, flourishing during the reign of Hadrian, A.D. 137.
He was chiefly devoted to punctuation, and he was nicknamed Επιγραμματίας.

doned the Greeks, and went over to the Persians about twenty of his men.]—(2) The author of thirty-eight epigrams in the Greek antology, appears to have lived at Rome near the beginning of the second century of the Christian era.

ΝΙΚΗ, Nike. Νίκη. Nike. Nike.
[Nike], called Victoria by the Romans, goddess of victory, is described as a daughter of Styx, and as a sister of Zelus (strength), and Bia (force). When Zeus commenced fighting against the Titans and called upon the gods for assistance, and her two sisters were the first who ward, and Jupiter (Zeus) was so pleased with their readiness, that he caused them to live with him in Olympus. Nike celebrated temple on the acropolis of Athens, which is still extant and in excellent condition. She is often seen represented in works of art, especially with other disciples, such as Jupiter (Zeus) and Minerva , and with conquering heroes whose she guides. In her appearance she resembles Minerva (Athena), but has wings, and a palm or a wreath, and is engaged in triumph, or in inscribing the victory of her hero on a shield.

ΝΙΚΑΙΑ (Nikaia). 1. (Now Rakla), a town of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates near the mouth of the River Bilecha (Bilchah), and due south of Edessa, built by Alexander, and probably completed by Seleucus. It is doubtless the same place called Νικαία or Καλλινίκιον (Kallinikion) in the fortifications of which were repaired by him. Its name was again changed to Νικαία, when it was adorned with fresh buildings by the Emperor Leo.—2. A fortress on the Propontis, belonging to the territory of Pergamus.

ΝΙΚΗΦΟΡΟΣ (Nikephoros), a river of Armenia
Major, on which Tigranes built his residence Tigranocerta. It was a tributary of the Upper Tigris; probably identical with the Κανταίτης, or a small tributary of it.

ΝΙΚΗΦΟΡΟΣ (Nikephoros). 1. CALLISTUS XAN-THOPULUS, the author of the Ecclesiastical History, was born in the latter part of the thirteenth century, and died about 1450. His Ecclesiastical History was originally in twenty-three books, of which there are eighteen extant, extending from the birth of Christ down to the death of the tyrant Phocas in 610. Although Nicephorus compiled from the works of his predecessors, he entirely remodelled his materials, and his style is vastly superior to that of his contemporaries. Edited by Ducæus, Paris, 1630, 3 vols. folio.—2. GREGORAS. Vid.
Gregoras.—3. PATRIARCHA, originally the notary or chief secretary of state to the Emperor Constantine V. Copronymus, subsequently retired into a convent, and was raised to the patriarchate of Constantinople in 806. He was deposed in 815, and died in 828. Several of his works have come down to us, of which the most important is entitled Breviarium Histori-cum, a Byzantine history, extending from 602 to 770. This is one of the best works of the Byzantine period. Edited by Petavus, Paris 1616, [and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837].

ΝΙΚΕΑ (now Neckar), a river in Germany falling into the Rhine at the modern Mannheim.

ΝΙΚΕΡΑΤΟΣ (Nikeratos). 1. Father of Nicias, the celebrated Athenian general.—2. Son of Nicias, put to death by the thirty tyrants, to whom his great wealth was no doubt a temptation.—3. A Greek writer on plants, one of the followers of Asclepiades of Bithynia.

ΝΙΚΕΤΑΣ (Niketaz). 1. ACONINATUS, also called Choniates, because he was a native of Chonæ, formerly Colossæ, in Phrygia, one of the most important Byzantine historians, lived in the latter half of the twelfth and the former half of the thirteenth centuries. He held important public offices at Constantinople, and was present at the capture of the city by the Latins in 1204, of which he has given us a faithful description. He escaped to Nicæa, where he died about 1216. The history of Nicetas consists of ten distinct works, each of which contains one or more books, of which there are twenty-one, giving the history of the emperors from 1118 to 1206. The best edition is by Bekker, Bonn, 1835.—2. EGGEMIANUS, lived probably toward the end of the twelfth century, and wrote "The History of the Lives of Drusilla and Charicles," which is the worst of all the Greek romances that have come down to us. It was published for the first time by Boissonade, Paris, 1819, 3 vols.

ΝΙΚΙΑ (now Enza), a tributary of the Po in Gallia Cisalpina.

ΝΙΚΙΑ, a place on the borders of Macedonia and Illyria, between Lychnidus and Heraclea, the same as Nicæa, No. 5.]

ΝΙΚΙΑΣ (Nicias). 1. A celebrated Athenian general during the Peloponnesian war, was the son of Niceratus, from whom he inherited the large fortune. His property was valued at one hundred talents. From this cause, combined with his unambitious character, and his aversion to all dangerous innovations, he was naturally brought into connection with the aristocratical portion of his fellow-citizens. He was several times associated with Pericles as strategist, and his great prudence and high character gained for him considerable influence. On the death of Pericles he came forward more openly as the opponent of Cleon, and the other demagogues of Athens; but, from his military reputation, the mildness of his character, and the liberal use which he made of his great wealth, he was looked upon with respect by all classes of the citizens. His timidity led him to buy off the attacks of the sycophants. He was a man of strong religious feeling, and Aristophanes ridicules him in the Equites for his timidity and superstition. His characteristic caution was the distinguishing feature of his military career; and his military operations were almost always successful. He frequently commanded the Athenian armies during the earlier years of the Peloponnesian war. After the death of Cleon (B.C. 422) he exerted all his influence to bring about a peace, which was concluded in the following year (421). For the next few years Nicias used all his efforts to induce the Athenians to preserve the peace, and was constantly opposed by Alcibiades, who had now become the leader of the popular party. In 416 the Athenians resolved on sending their great expedition to Sicily, and appointed Nicias with Alcibiades and Lamachus to the command. Nicias disapproved of the expedition altogether, and did all that he could to divert the Athenians from this course. But his representations produced no effect, and he set sail for Sicily with his colleagues. Alcibiades was soon afterward recalled (vid. Alcibiades), and the sole command was thus virtually left in the hands of Nicias. His early operations were attended with success. He defeated the Syracusans in the autumn, and employed the winter in securing the co-operation of several of the Greek cities, and of the Sicilian tribes in the island. In the spring of next year he renewed his attacks upon Syracuse; he succeeded in seizing on Epipolæ, and commenced the circumvallation of Syracuse. About this time Lamachus was slain in a skirmish under the walls. All the attempts of the Syracusans to stop the circumvallation failed. The works were nearly completed, and the doom of Syracuse seemed sealed, when Gylippus, the Spartan, arrived in Sicily. VID. GYLIPPUS. The tide of success now turned, and Nicias found himself obliged to send to Athens for re-enforcements, and requested, at the same time, that another commander might be sent to supply his place, as his feeble health rendered him unequal to the discharge of his duties. The Athenians voted re-enforcements, which were placed under the command of Demosthenes and Eurymedon; but they would not allow Nicias to resign his command. Demosthenes, upon his arrival in Sicily (413), made a vigorous effort to recover Epipolæ, which the Athenians had lost. He was nearly successful, but was finally driven back with severe loss. Demosthenes now deemed any further attempts against the city hopeless, and therefore proposed to abandon the siege and return to Athens. To this Nicias would not consent. He professed to stand in dread of the Athenians at home; but he appears to have had reasons for believing that a party among the Syracusans themselves were likely in no long time, to facilitate the reduction of the city. But meantime fresh succors arrived for the Syracusans; sickness was making ravages among the Athenian troops, and at length Nicias himself saw the necessity of retreating. Secret orders were given that every thing should be in readiness for departure, when an eclipse of the moon happened. The credulous superstition of Nicias led to the total destruction of the Athenian armament. The seers interpreted the event as an injunction from the gods that they should not retreat before the next full moon, and Nicias resolutely determined to abide by their decision. The Syracusans resolved to bring the enemy to an engagement, and, in a decisive naval battle, defeated the Athenians. They were now masters of the harbor, and the Athenians were reduced to the necessity of making a desperate effort to escape. The Athenians were again decisively defeated; and having thus lost their fleet, they were obliged to retreat by land. They were pursued by the enemy, and were finally compelled to surrender. Both Nicias and Demosthenes were put to death by the Syracusans.—2. The physician of Pyrrhus, king of Epirus, who offered to the Roman consul to poison the king for a certain reward. Pyrrhus not only rejected his base offer with indignation, but immediately sent him back to Pyrrhus with notice of his treachery. He is sometimes, but erroneously, called Cineas.—3. A Ciceronian, who lived at Rome in the time of Cicero, with whom he was intimate.—4. A celebrated Athenian painter, flourished about B.C. 320. He was the most distinguished disciple of Euphranor. His works seem to have been all painted in encaustic. One of his greatest paintings was a representation of the infernal regions as described by Homer. He refused to sell this picture to Ptolemy, although the price offered for it was sixty talents.

[NICIPPUS (Νικίππος). 1. A native of Oenoe, who finally made himself tyrant of the island.—2. One of the ephors of the Messenians in B.C. 220.]

NICOCHILUS (Νικοχίλῆς), an Athenian poet of the Old Comedy, the son of Philonides, was contemporary with Aristophanes. [The fragments of his comedies are collected in Metab. Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 465-468, edit. minor.]

NICOCLES (Νικόκλης). 1. King of Salamis in Cyprus, son of Evagoras, whom he succeeded B.C. 374. Isocrates addressed him a long panegyric upon his father's virtues, for which Nicocles rewarded the orator with the magnificent present of twenty talents. Scarcely any particulars are known of the reign of Nicocles. He is said to have perished by a violent death.

neither the period nor circumstances of this are recorded.—3. Prince or ruler of Paphlagonia, during the period which followed the death of Alexander. He was at first of those who took part with Ptolemy against Ptolemy; but, having subsequently entered secret negotiations with Antigonus, he was obliged by Ptolemy to put an end to his own B.C. 310.—3. Tyrant of Sicily, was defeated by Aratus, after a reign of only four years, B.C. 251.—[4. Of Soli, an officer in the army of Alexander the Great.—5. An Athenian, who died with his friend Phocion, B.C. 318. He had always been a warm friend to him, and, at the death of Phocion, as a last favor, he refused to drink the poison before his illustrious friend, a request which Phocion unwillingly obeyed.]

NICOCRATES (Νικοκράτης). 1. A native of Salamis, collected an extensive library at a very early period.—2. Archon of Athens, B.C. 333.] NICOREON (Νικορέων), king of Salamis, in 333, at the time of Alexander's expedition into Asia. After the death of Alexander he entered into a treaty with Ptolemy against Antigonus, and was rewarded by Ptolemy with the chief command over the whole island. Nicoreon is said to have ordered the philosopher Anaxarchus to be put to death in a stone mortar, in revenge for an insult which the latter had offered him when he visited Alexander at Tyre.

NICOLAUS CHALCOCONDYLES. Vid. CHALCOCONDYLES.

NICOLAUS DAMASCENUS, a Greek historian, and a friend both of Herod the Great and Augustus. He was, as his name indicates, a native of Damascus, and a son of Antipater and Straton. He received an excellent education, and he carried on his philosophical studies in Athens with Herod, at whose court he resided.

In B.C. 13 he accompanied Herod on his journey to Augustus at Rome, on which occasion he made Nicolaus a present of the finest olive-tree, which the emperor called—a name by which it continued to be known down to the Middle Ages. Nicolaus rose to the rank of Augustus that he was more than one occasion of great service to him when the emperor was incensed against him. Nicolaus wrote a large number of works, of which the most important were, 1. A history, of which a considerable portion is extant. 2. A universal history, which consisted of one hundred and forty-four books, of which we have only a few fragments. 3. A life of Augustus, from which we have some extracts. He also wrote commentaries on Aristotle's other philosophical works, and was the author of several tragedies and comedies: of which we have preserved a fragment of one of his, extending to forty-four lines. The title of his fragments is by Orelli, Lipsius.

NICOMACHUS (Νικομαχος). 1. Father of Aristotle. Vid. p. 100, a.—3. Son of Aristotle by the philosopher. He was himself a philosopher, and wrote some philosophical works. A portion of his writings bears the name of Nicomachean Ethics, but why we can not tell; whether his father so named them, as a memorial of his affection for his young son, or whether they derived their title from being afterward edited and commented on by Nicomachus.—3. Called Gerasenus, from his native place, Gerasa in Arabia, was a Pythagorean, and the writer of a life of Pythagoras, now lost. His date is inferred from his mention of Thrasylus, who lived under Tiberius. He wrote on arithmetic and music; and two of his works on these subjects are still extant. The work on arithmetic was printed by Wechel, Paris, 1638; also, after the Theologumena Arithmetica, attributed to Iamblichus, Lipsius, 1817. The work on music was printed by Meursius, in his collection, Lugd. Bat., 1616, and in the collection of Meibomius, Amstel., 1652.—4. Of Thebes, a celebrated painter, was the elder brother and teacher of the great painter Aristides. He flourished B.C. 360, and onward. He was an elder contemporary of Apelles and Protogenes. He is frequently mentioned by the ancient writers in terms of the highest praise. Cicero says that in his works, as well as in those of Echion, Protogenes, and Apelles, every thing was already perfect. (Brutus, 18.)

NICOMEDES (Νικομηδης). 1. I. King of Bithynia, was the eldest son of Zipoetes, whom he succeeded, B.C. 279. With the assistance of the Gauls, whom he invited into Asia, he defeated and put to death his brother Zipoetes, who had for some time held the independent sovereignty of a considerable part of Bithynia. The rest of his reign appears to have been undisturbed, and under his sway Bithynia rose to a high degree of power and prosperity. He founded the city of Nicomedia, which he made the capital of his kingdom. The length of his reign is uncertain, but he probably died about 259. He was succeeded by his son ZIELAS.—3. II. Surnamed Επιφανης, king of Bithynia, reigned B.C. 149–91. He was the son and successor of Prusias II., and fourth in descent from the preceding. He was brought up at Rome, where he succeeded in gaining the favor of the senate. Prusias, in consequence, became jealous of his son, and sent secret instructions for his assassination. The plot was revealed to Nicomedes, who thereupon returned to Asia, and declared open war against his father. Prusias was deserted by his subjects, and was put to death by order of his son, 149. Of the long and tranquil reign of Nicomedes, few events have been transmitted to us. He courted the friendship of the Romans, whom he assisted in the war against Aristonicus, 131. He subsequently obtained possession of Paphlagonia, and attempted to gain Cappadocia, by marrying Laodice, the widow of Ariarathes VI. He was, however, expelled from Cappadocia by Mithradates; and he was also compelled by the Romans to abandon Paphlagonia, when they deprived Mithradates of Cappadocia.—3. III. Surnamed Φιλοπατρος, king of Bithynia (91–74), son and successor of Nicomedes II. Immediately after his accession he was expelled by Mithradates, who set up against him his brother Socrates; but he was restored by the Romans in the following year (90). At the instigation of the Romans, Nicomedes now proceeded to attack the dominions of Mithradates, who expelled him a second time from his kingdom (88). This was the immediate occasion of the first Mithradatic war; at the conclusion of which (84) Nicomides was again reinstated in his kingdom. He reigned nearly ten years after this second restoration. He died at the beginning of 74, and having no children, by his will bequeathed his kingdom to the Roman people.

Nicomēdia (Νικομήδεια: Νικομήδης, fem. Νικομήδισσα: now ruins at Izmid or Iznik), a celebrated city of Bithynia, in Asia Minor, built by King Nicomedes I. (B.C. 264), at the northeastern corner of the Sinus Astacenus (now Gulf of Izmid: compare Astacus). It was the chief residence of the kings of Bithynia, and it soon became one of the most splendid cities of the then known world. Under the Romans it was a colony, and a favorite residence of several of the later emperors, especially of Diocletian and Constantine the Great. Though repeatedly injured by earthquakes, it was always restored by the munificence of the emperors. Like its neighbor and rival, Nicaea, it occupies an important place in the wars against the Turks; but it is still more memorable in history as the scene of Hannibal's death. It was the birth-place of the historian Arrian.

Nicom (Νίκων). 1. A Tarentine, who betrayed his native city to Hannibal during the second Punic war, B.C. 212. The Romans having subsequently taken Tarentum by surprise, Nicom fell bravely fighting in defence of the city.—2. A leader of the Cilician pirates, who was taken prisoner by P. Servilius Isauricus.—3. A comic poet, probably of the new comedy: a fragment of one of his comedies is given by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. ii., p. 1176, edit. minor.—4. An architect and geometrist of Pergamus in Mysia, the father of the physician Galen: he was a learned and accomplished man, and superintended in person the education of his distinguished son.]

Nicōnia or Nicōnion, a town in Scythia, on the right bank of the Tyras (now Dniester).

Nicōrnon and Nicōrnonon (Νικωρῶν, Νικωρῶν), an Athenian comic poet, son of Theron, and a contemporary of Aristophanes at the close of his career. [The fragments of his comedies are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 468-472, edit. minor.]

Nicōdolis (Νικόπολις: Νικοπολίτης, Nicopolitānus). 1. (Ruins at Paleop翠nya), a city at the southwestern extremity of Epirus, on the point of land which forms the northern side of the entrance to the Gulf of Ambracia, opposite to Actium. It was built by Augustus in memory of the battle of Actium, and was peopled from Ambracia, Anactorium, and other neighboring cities, and also with settlers from Ætolia. Augustus also built a temple of Apollo on a neighboring hill, and founded games in honor of the god, which were held every fifth year. The city was received into the Amphictyonic league in place of the Dolopeæ. It is spoken of both as a libera civitas and as a colony. It had a considerable commerce and extensive fisheries. It was made the capital of Epirus by Constantine, and its buildings were restored both by Julian and by Justinian.—2. (Now Nicopolis), a city of Macedonia Inferior, on the Danube, built by Trajan in memory of a victory over the Dacians, and celebrated as the scene of the great defeat of the Hungarians and Franks by the Sultan Bajazet, on the 28th of September, 1394. 3. (Now Andres, or Devrigni?), a city of Attica Minor, on or near the Lycus, and not far from the sources of the Halye, founded by Pompey on the spot where he gained his first victory over Mithradates: a flourishing place in the time of Augustus: restored by Justinian.—4. A city in the northeastern corner of Cilicia, near the junction of the Taurus and Amanus.—5. Or Emesa, a city of Palestine. Vid. Emmaus.—6. (Now Kara, Kiassera, or Cesar's Castle, ruins), a city of Lower Egypt, about two or three miles east of Alexandria, on the canal between Alexandria and Canopus, was built by Augustus in memory of his last victory over Antonia. Here also, as at Nicopolis opposite to Actium, Augustus founded a temple of Apollo, with games every fifth year. Not being mentioned after the time of the first Cæsars, it would seem to have become a mere suburb of Alexandria.

[Nicostratus (Νικοστράτης). Vid. Canus.]
[Nicostratus (Νικόστρατος). 1. An Athenian general, son of Diitrephes, was a colleague of Nicias at the capture of Cythera; fell in battle against Agis near Mantinea.—2. An Argive, possessed extraordinary strength of body, and was distinguished also for prudence in council, was sent by the Argives with a body of three thousand men to aid the Persian king Darius Ochus against Egypt.]

Nicostratus (Νικόστρατος). 1. The youngest of the three sons of Aristophanes, was himself a comic poet. His plays belonged both to the middle and the new comedy. [The fragments of his comedies are collected by Meineke, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. i., p. 632-640, edit. minor.—2. A tragic actor, flourished before B.C. 430.]

[Nicotra, a city of Bruttium, on a mountain not far from the sea, on the road leading from Capua to the Fretum Siculum, between Vibo and Mallia.]

NIGER, NIGRIS, or NIGRIS (Νίγρις, Νίγρις, a compounded form of the word Gur or Gr, which seems to be a native African term for a river in general), changed, by a confusion which was the more easily made on account of the color of the people of the region, into the Latin word Niger, a great river of Æthiopia Interior, which modern usage has identified with the river called Joli-ba (i. e., Great River) and Quorra (or, rather, Kouara), in Western Africa. As early as the time of Herodotus, we find an authentic statement concerning a river of the interior of Libya, which is evidently identical both with the Niger of most of the ancient geographers, and with the Quorra. He tells us (ii., 32) that five young men of the Nasamoneæ, a Libyan people on the Great Syrtis, on the northern coast of Africa, started to explore the desert parts of Libya; that, after crossing the inhabited part, and the region of the wild beasts, they journeyed many days through the Desert toward the west, till they came to a plain where fruit-trees grow; and as they ate the fruit, they were seized by some little black men, whose language they could not understand, who led them through great marshes to a city, inhabited by the same sort of little black men, who were Æthiopes, and a great river flowed by the city from west to east, and in it there were crocodiles. Herodotus, like his informants, inferred from the ue of the river, and from the crocodiles in but it was the Nile; but it can hardly be river but the Quorra; and that the city was buctoo is far more probable than not. The noe that the Niger was a western branch a Nile prevailed very generally in ancient but no means universally. Pliny gives some account in a very confused manner, takes the Nigra (as he calls it) the bound-between Northern Africa and Æthiopia.

 my, however, who evidently had new es of information respecting the interior of 4, makes the Niger rise not far from its ource (allowing for the imperfect observaon which his numerical latitudes and longiare founded), and follow a direction not ifferent from what that of the Jeli-ha and a would be, if we suppose that the Zirni, and Yeo form an unbroken communication en the Quorra and the Lake Tchad. But y adds, what the most recent discoveries r a very remarkable statement, that a of the Niger communicates with the Libya (Libya), which he places in 16° 30' latitude, and 36° east longitude (i. e., from rtunate islands = 17° from Greenwich).
 almost exactly the position of Lake Tchad;
 the Tchadda really flows out of this lake, represent the branch of the Niger spoken tolemy, whose informants, however, seem inverted the direction of its stream. It er remarkable that Ptolemy places on the a city named Thamnoudana in the exact of Timbuctoo, and that the length of the computed from his position, agrees very with its real length. The error of con-
 ; the Niger and the Nile revived after e of Ptolemy, and has only been exby very recent discoveries.

 sents the River Niger as flowing. He places it

OLIS or NILES (Νεῖλος πόλις, Νεῖλος), a he Heptanomia, or Middle Egypt, in the Heracleopolites was built on an island in the Nile, twenty geographical miles northern of Heracleopolis. There was a temple here in which, as throughout Egypt, the River Nile was worshipped as a god.

NILUS (ὁ Νεῖλος, derived probably from a word which still exists in the old dialects of India, Nilas, i. e., Mack, and sometimes called Mélas
 by the Greeks: Νεῖλος occurs first in Hesiod; Homer calls the river Αἴγυρρος: now Nile, Arab. Bahr-Nil, or simply Bahr, i. e., the River;
 the modern names of its upper course, in Nubia and Abyssinia, are various). This river, one of the most important in the world, flows through a channel which forms a sort of cleft extending north and south through the high rocky and sandy land of Northeastern Africa. Its western or main branch has not yet been traced to its source, but it has been followed up to a point in 4° 42' north latitude, and 30° 58' east longitude, where it is a rapid mountain stream, running at the rate of six knots an hour over a rocky bed, free from alluvial soil. After a course in the general direction of north-northeast as far as a place called Khartum, in 15° 34' north latitude, and 82° 30' east longitude, this river, which is called the Bahr-el-Abiad, i. e., White River, receives another large river, the Bahr- el-Azrek, i. e., Blue River, the sources of which are in the highlands of Abyssinia, about 11° north latitude, and 37° east longitude: this is the middle branch of the Nile system, the As- tapus of the ancients. The third, or eastern branch, called Tacaze, the Astaboras of the ancients, rises also in the highlands of Aby- ssinia, in about 11° 40' north latitude, and 28° 40' east longitude, and joins the Nile (i. e., the main stream formed by the union of the Abiad and the Azrek), in 17° 45' north latitude, and about 84° 5' east longitude: the point of junction was the apex of the island of Mæros. Here the united river is about two miles broad.
 Hence it flows through Nubia, in a magnificent rocky valley, falling over six cataracts, the northernmost of which, called the First cataract
 (i. e., to a person going up the river), is and has always been the southern boundary of Egypt.
 Of its course from this point to its junction with the Mediterranean, a sufficient general description has been given under Ægyptus (p.
 17, a.). The branches into which it parted at the southern point of the Delta were, in ancient times, three in number, and these again parted into seven, of which, Herodotus tells us, five were natural and two artificial. These seven mouths were nearly all named from cities which stood upon them: they were called, proceeding from east to west, the Pelusiæ, the Tanitic or Saitic, the Mendesian, the Phatnitic, or Pathmetic, or Boeotic, the Sebennytic, the Bolbitic or Bolbitine, and the Canobic or Canopic. Through the alterations caused by the alluvial deposits of the river, they have now all shifted their positions, or dwindled into little channels, except two, and these are much diminished: namely, the Damiat mouth on the east, and the Rosetta mouth on the west. Of the canals connected with the Nile in the Delta, the most celebrated were the Canobic, which connected the Canobic mouth with the Lake Maroutis and with Alex- andria, and that of Ptolemy (afterward called that of Trajan), which connected the Nile at the beginning of the Delta with the Bay of Heropolis at the head of the Red Sea: the formation of the latter is ascribed to King Necho, and its repair and improvement is successively to Darius the son of Hystaspes, Ptolemy Philadelphus, and Trajan. "That the Delta, and, indeed, the whole alluvial soil of Egypt has been created by the Nile, can not be doubted; but the present small rate of deposit proves that the formation must have been made long before the historical period. The periodical rise of the river has been spoken of under Egyptus. It is caused by the tropical rains on the highlands in which it rises. The best ancient accounts, preserved by Ptolemy, place its source in a range of mountains in Central Africa, called the Mountains of the Moon; and the most recent information points to a range of mountains a little north of the equator, called Jebel-el-Kumri, or the Blue Mountain, as containing the probable sources of the Bahr Abiad. The ancient Egyptians deified the Nile, and took the utmost care to preserve its water from pollution.

[Nilus (Νεῖλος), the god of the River Nile in Egypt, said to have been a son of Oceanus and Tethys, and father of Memphis and Chione. Pindar calls him a son of Saturn (Cronus).]

Ninus, the reputed founder of the city of Ninus or Nineveh. An account of his exploits is given under Semiramis, his wife, whose name was more celebrated. Vid. SEMI-RAMIS.

Ninus, Ninive (Νίνος, less correctly Νίνος; in the Old Testament, Nineveh, LXX. Νινευή, Ninur; Νίνος, Ninivite, pl.), the capital of the great Assyrian monarchy, and one of the most ancient cities in the world, stood on the eastern side of the Tigris, at the upper part of its course, in the district of Aturia. The accounts of its foundation and history are as various as those respecting the Assyrian monarchy in general. Vid. ASSYRIA. The Greek and Roman writers ascribe its foundation to Ninus; but in the book of Genesis (x., 11) we are told, immediately after the mention of the kingdom of Nimrod and his foundation of Babel and other cities in Shinar (i. e., Babylon), that "out of that land went forth Aashur" (or otherwise, "he—i. e., Nimrod—went forth into Assyria"), "and builded Nineveh." There is no further mention of Nineveh in Scripture till the reign of Jeroboam II., about B.C. 825, when the prophet Jonah was commissioned to preach repentance to its inhabitants. It is then described as "an exceeding great city, of three days' journey," and as containing "more than one hundred and twenty thousand persons that can not discern between their right hand and their left hand," which, if this phrase refers to children, would represent a population of six hundred thousand souls. The other passages, in which the Hebrew prophets denounce ruin against it, bear witness to its size, wealth, and luxury, and the latest of them (Zeph., ii., 13) is dated only a few years before the final destruction of the city, which was effected by the Medes and Babylonians about B.C. 606. It is said by Strabo to have been larger than Babylon, and Diodorus describes it as an oblong quadrangle of one hundred and fifty stadia by ninety, making the circuit of the walls four hundred and eighty stadia (more than fifty five statute miles); if so, the city was twice as large as London together with its suburbs. In judging of these statements, not only must allowance be made for the immense space occupied by palaces and temples, but also for the Oriental mode of building a city, so as to include large gardens and other open spaces within the walls. The walls of Nineveh are described as one hundred feet high, and thick enough to allow three chariots to pass each other on them; with fifteen hundred red towers, two hundred feet in height. The city is said to have been entirely destroyed by fire when it was taken by the Medes and Babylonians, about B.C. 606; and frequent allusions occur to its desolate state. Under the Roman empire, however, we again meet with a city Nineve, in the district of Adiabene, mentioned by Tacitus, and again by Ammianus Marcellinus, and a medieval historian of the thirteenth century mentions a fort of the same name; but statements like these must refer to some later place built among or near the ruins of the ancient Nineveh. Thus, of all the great cities of the world, none was thought to have been more utterly lost than the capital of the most ancient of the great monarchies. Tradition pointed out a few shapeless mounds opposite Mosul, on the Upper Tigris, as all that remained of Nineveh; and a few fragments of masonry were occasionally dug up there, and elsewhere in Assyria, bearing inscriptions in an almost unknown character, called, from its shape, cuneiform or arrow-headed. Within the last ten years, however, those shapeless mounds have been shown to contain the remains of great palaces, on the walls of which the scenes of Assyrian life and the records of Assyrian conquests are sculptured; while the efforts which had long been made to decipher the cuneiform inscriptions found in Persia and Babylonia, as well as Assyria, have been so far successful as to make it probable that we may soon read the records of Assyrian history from her own monuments. It is as yet premature to form definite conclusions to any great extent. The results of Majors Rawlinson's study of the cuneiform inscriptions of Assyria are only in process of publication. The excavations conducted by Dr. Layard and M. Botta have brought to light the sculptured remains of immense palaces, not only at the traditional site of Nineveh, namely, Kouyunjik and Nebbi-Yunus, opposite to Mosul, and at Khorrasabad, about ten miles to the north-north-east, but also in a mound eighteen miles lower down the river, in the tongue of land between the Tigris and the Great Zab, which still bears the name of Nimroud; and it is clear that the remains belong to different periods, embracing the records of two distinct dynasties, extending over several generations, none of which can be later than B.C. 606, while some of them probably belong to a period at least as ancient as the thirteenth, and perhaps even the fifteenth century B.C. There are other mounds of ruins as yet unexplored. Which of these ruins correspond to the true site of Nineveh, or whether (as Dr. Layard suggests) that vast city may have extended all the way along the Tigris from Kouyunjik to Nimroud, and to a corresponding breadth northeast of the river, as far as Khor and the questions still under discussion. Meanwhile, the study of the monuments and inscriptions thus discovered must soon throw fresh light on the whole subject. Some splendid fragments of sculpture, obtained by Dr. Layard from Nimroud, are now to be seen in the British Museum.

NIRIAS (Nirōs), son of Ninus and Semiramis. Vid. SEMIRAMIS.

NIÖSS (Niōsē). 1. Daughter of Phoroneus, and by Zeus the mother of Argus and Pelasgus.

—2. Daughter of Tantalus by the Pleiad Taygete or the Hyad Dione. She was the sister of Pelops, and the wife of Amphion, king of Thebes, by whom she became the mother of six sons and six daughters. Being proud of the number of her children, she deemed herself superior to Latona (Leto), who had given birth to only two children. Apollo and Diana (Artemis), indignant at such presumption, slew all her children with their arrows. For nine days their bodies lay in their blood without any one burying them, for Jupiter (Zeus) had changed the people into stones; but on the tenth day the gods themselves buried them. Niobe herself, who had gone to Mount Sipylus, was metamorphosed into stone, and even thus continued to feel the misfortune with which the gods had visited her. This is the Homeric story, which later writers have greatly modified and enlarged. The number and names of the children of Niobe vary very much in the different accounts; for while Homer states that their number was twelve, Hesiod and others mentioned twenty, Alcman only six, Sappho eight, and Herodotus four; but the most commonly received number in later times appears to have been fourteen, namely, seven sons and seven daughters. According to Homer, all the children of Niobe fell by the arrows of Apollo and Diana (Artemis); but later writers state that one of her sons, Amphion or Amyclas, and one of her daughters, Meliboea, were saved, but that Meliboea, having turned pale with terror at the sight of her dying brothers and sisters, was afterward called Chloris. The time and place at which the children of Niobe were destroyed are likewise stated differently. According to Homer, they perished in their mother's house. According to Ovid, the sons were slain while they were engaged in gymnastic exercises in a plain near Thebes, and the daughters during the funeral of their brothers. Others, again, transfer the scene to Lydia, or make Niobe, after the death of her children, go from Thebes to Lydia, so her father Tantalus on Mount Sipylus, where Jupiter (Zeus), at her own request, metamorphosed her into a stone, which during the summer always shed tears. In the time of Pausanias people still fancied they could see the petrified figure of Niobe on Mount Sipylus. The tomb of the children of Niobe, however, was shown at Thebes. The story of Niobe and her children was frequently taken as a subject by ancient artists. One of the most celebrated of the ancient works of art still extant is the group of Niobe and her children, which filled the pediment of the temple of Apollo Sosianus at Rome, and which was discovered at Rome in the year 1583. This group is now at Florence, and contains of the mother, who holds her youngest daughter on her knees, and thirteen children of her sons and daughters, besides a figure usually called the pædagogus of the children. The Romans themselves were uncertain whether the group was the work of Scopas or Praxiteles.

NIPHATES (δ Νιφάτης, i. e., Snow-mountain now Balan), a mountain chain of Armenia, forming an eastern prolongation of the Taurus from where it is crossed by the Euphrates toward the Lake of Van, before reaching which it turns to the south, and approaches the Tigris below Tigranocerta; thus surrounding on the north and east the basin of the highest course of the Tigris (which is inclosed on the south and southwest by Mount Masius), and dividing it from the valley of the Arsanias (now Murad) or southern branch of the Euphrates. The continuation of Mount Niphates to the southeast, along the eastern margin of the Tigris valley, is formed by the mountains of the Carduchi (now Mountains of Kurdistan).

NIRXUS (Nirōs), son of Charopus and Aglaia, was, next to Achilles, the handsomest among the Greeks at Troy. He came from the island of Syme (between Rhodes and Cnidus). Later writers relate that he was slain by Eurypylos or Æneas.

[NISA or NISSA. Vid. NYSA.]

NISMA. Vid. MEGARA.

NISMA, NISMI, NISMIUS CAMPUS (Nisāia, Nisaior, τὸ Νισαίων κεδλὸν), these names are found in the Greek and Roman writers used for various places on the south and southeast of the Caspian; thus one writer mentions a city Nisma in Margiana, and another a people Nismi in the north of Aria; but most apply the term Nisæan Plain to a plain in the north of Great Media, near Rhagæ, the pasture ground of a great number of horses of the finest breed, which supplied the studs of the king and nobles of Persia. It seems not unlikely that this breed of horses was called Nisæan from their original home in Margiana (a district famous for its horses), and that the Nisæan plain received its name from the horses kept in it.

NISIBIS (Νισίβις; Nisibinōs). 1. Also ANTIOCHIA MYGDONIÆ (in the Old Testament, Aram Zoba; ruins near Nisibin), a celebrated city of Mesopotamia, and the capital of the district of Mygdonia, stood on the River Mygdonius (now Nahr-al-Huak), thirty-seven Roman miles southwest of Tigranocerta, in a very fertile district. It was the centre of a considerable trade, and was of great importance as a military post. In the successive wars between the Romans and Tigranes, the Parthians, and the Persians, it was several times taken and retaken, until at last it fell into the hands of the Persians in the reign of Jovian.—2. A city of Aria, at the foot of Mount Paropamisus.

NISUS (Nisōs). 1. King of Megara, was son of Pandion and Pylia, brother of Ægeus, Pallas, and Lycus, and husband of Abrote, by whom he became the father of Scylla. When Megara was besieged by Minos, Scylla, who had fallen in love with Minos, pulled out the purple or golden hair which grew on the top of her father's head, and on which his life depended.

Minos thereupon died, and Minos obtained possession of the city. Minos, however, was so horrified at the conduct of the unnatural daughter that he ordered Scylla to be fastened to the stern of his ship, and afterward drowned her in the Saronic Gulf. According to others, Minos left Megara in disgust; Scylla leaped into the sea, and swam after his ship; but her father, who had been changed into a sea-eagle (haliaetus), pounced down upon her, whereupon she was metamorphosed into either a fish or a bird called Ciris. Scylla, the daughter of Nisus, is sometimes confounded by the poets with Scylla, the daughter of Phorcus. Hence the latter is sometimes erroneously called Nisæa Virgo, and Nisæis. Vid. Scylla. Nisæa, the port town of Megara, is supposed to have derived its name from Nisus, and the promontory of Scyllæum from his daughter.—3. Son of Hyrtacus, and a friend of Euryalus. The two friends accompanied Aeneas to Italy, and perished in a night attack against the Rutulian camp.—[3. A noble Dulichian, son of Aretus, and one of the suitors of Penelope.]

Nisæus (Nisæos; now Nikero), a small island in the Carpathian Sea, a little distance off the promontory of Caria called Triopium, of a round form, eighty stadia (eight geographical miles) in circuit, and composed of lofty rocks, the highest being two hundred and twenty-seven feet high. Its volcanic nature gave rise to the fable respecting its origin, that Neptune (Poseidon) tore it off the neighboring island of Cos to hurl it upon the giant Polybotes. It was celebrated for its warm springs, wine, and mill-stones. Its capital, of the same name, stood on the northwest of the island, where considerable ruins of its Acropolis remain. Its first inhabitants are said to have been Carians; but already in the heroic age it had received a Dorian population, like other islands near it, with which it is mentioned by Homer as sending troops to the Greeks. It received other Dorian settlements in the historical age. At the time of the Persian war, it belonged to the Carian queen Artemisia; it next became a tributary ally of Athens; though transferred to the Spartan alliance by the issue of the Peloponnesian war, it was recovered for Athens by the victory at Cnidus, B.C. 394. After the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, it was assigned to Rhodes, and, with the rest of the Rhodian republic, was united to the Roman empire about B.C. 70.

Nisæus (Nisæus), a daughter of Apriea, the Egyptian king, who was driven from his throne by Amasis; Cambyses having demanded of Amasis his daughter in marriage, the latter sent to him Nitetia, having passed her off as his own daughter. Another account, referred to by Herodotus as incorrect, makes Cyrus to have sought Nitetis in marriage, and to have been by her the father of Cambyses.]

Nitobolians, a Celtic people in Gallia Aquitania, between the Garumna and the Liger, whose fighting force consisted of five thousand men. Their chief town was Aesumum (now Agen).

Nitocris (Nitocris). 1. A queen of Babylon, mentioned by Herodotus, who ascribes to her many important works at Babylon and its vicinity. It is supposed by most modern writers that she was the wife of Nebuchadnezzar, and the mother or grandmother of Labynetus or Belshazzar, the last king of Babylon.—2. A queen of Egypt, was elected to the sovereignty in place of her brother, whom the Egyptians had killed. In order to take revenge upon the murderers of her brother, she built a very long chamber under ground, and when it was finished invited to a banquet in it those of the Egyptians who had had a principal share in the murder. While they were engaged in the banquet, she let a upon them the waters of the Nile by means of a large concealed pipe, and drowned them all, and then, in order to escape punishment, threw herself into a chamber full of ashes. This is the account of Herodotus. We learn from other authorities that she was a celebrated personage in Egyptian legends. She is said to have built the third pyramid, by which we are to understand that she finished the third pyramid, which had been commenced by Mycerinus. Modern writers make her the last sovereign of the 26th dynasty, and state that she reigned six years in place of her murdered husband (not her brother, as Herodotus states), whose name was Mentheôphis. The latter is supposed to be the son of grandson of the Meris of the Greeks and Romans.

NITRUM, NITRABLE (Nitrum, Nitron, Nitrum; now Birket-el-Duara), the celebrated nitrate lakes in Lower Egypt, which lay in a valley on the southwestern margin of the Delta, and gave to the surrounding district the name of Nitria or the Nitric Nitria, and to the inhabitants whose chief occupation was the extraction of the nitron from the lakes, the name of Nitriani. This district was the chief seat of the worship of Serapis, and the only place in Egypt where sheep were sacrificed.

NIXI DI, a general term, applied by the Romans to those divinities who were believed to assist women in child-birth.

[NOBIS. Vid. Nobis.]

NOBILIOR, FULVIUS, plebeians. This family was originally called PATINUS, and the name of Nobilior was first assumed by No. 1, to indicate that he was more noble than any others of the name. 1. SEN., consul B.C. 266, with M. Emilius Paulus, about the middle of the first Punic war. The two consuls were sent to Africa, to bring off the survivors of the army of Regulus. On their way to Africa they gained a naval victory over the Carthaginians; but on their return to Italy they were wrecked off the coast of Sicily, and most of their ships were destroyed.—2. M., grandson of the preceding, consul 196, prætor 193, when he defeated M. Celiberi in Spain, and took the town of Tal-tum; and consul 189, when he received the conduct of the war against the Ætolians. He took the town of Ambracia, and compelled the Ætolians to sue for peace. On his return to Rome in 187, he celebrated a most splendid triumph. In 179 he was censor with M. Æmilius Lepidus the pontifex maximus. Fulvius Nobilior had taste for literature and art; he was a patron of the poet Ennius, who accompanied him in his Ætolian campaign; and he belonged to the party among the Roman nobles who were young into the city a taste for Greek literature and refinement. He was, therefore, attacked by Cato the censor, who made merry with his name, calling him mobilior instead of sobitior. Fulvius, in his censorship, erected a temple to Hercules and the Muses in the Circus Flaminius, as an indication that the state ought to cultivate the liberal arts; and he adorned it with the paintings and statues which he had brought from Greece upon his conquest of Ætolia.—A. M., son of No. 2, tribune of the plebs 171; consul adit 166, the year in which the Andria of Terence was performed; and consul 159.—A. Q., also son of No. 2, consul 153, when he had the conduct of the war against the Celtiberi in Spain, by whom he was defeated with great loss. He was censor in 136. He inherited his father's love for literature: he presented the poet Ennius with the Roman franchise when he was a triumvir for founding a colony.

[NOÏMON. 1. A Lycian warrior, slain by Ulysses before Troy.—2. Son of Phronius, an Ithacan, who gave his vessel to Telemachus for his intended voyage in search of Ulysses.—3. A Trojan warrior, companion of Æneas in Italy, slain by Turnus.]

[NOÏS (Nôys, Hdt.), or NOÏS (Val. Flacc.), a northern tributary of the Ister in Thrace.]

NOLA: Nolinus: now Nola, one of the most recent towns in Campania, twenty-one Roman miles southeast of Capua, on the road from that place to Nuceria, was founded by the Ausonians, but afterward fell into the hands of the Tyrrheni (Etruscans), whence some writers call it an Etruscan city. In B.C. 327, Nola was sufficiently powerful to send two thousand soldiers to the assistance of Neapolis. In 313 the town was taken by the Romans. It remained faithful to the Romans even after the battle of Cannæ, when the other Campanian towns revolted to Hannibal; and it was allowed, in consequence, to retain its own constitution as an ally of the Romans. In the Social war it fell into the hands of the confederates, and when taken by Sulla it was burned to the ground by the Samnite garrison. It was afterward rebuilt, and was made a Roman colony by Vespasian. The Emperor Augustus died at Nola. In the neighborhood of the town some of the most beautiful Campanian vases have been found in modern times. According to an ecclesiastical tradition, church bells were invented at Nola, and were hence called Campane.

[NOÏIDES. Vid. NUMIDIA.]

NOÏSTRINUS, mentioned by Horace as proverbially noted for extravagance and a riotous mode of living. The scholiasts tell us that his full name was L. Cassius Nomentanus.

NOÏENTUM (Nomentanus: now La Mentana), originally a Latin town founded by Alba, but subsequently a Sabine town, fourteen (Roman) miles from Rome, from which the Via Nomentana (more anciently Via Ficulensis) and the Porta Nomentana at Rome derived their name. The neighborhood of the town was celebrated for its wine.

NOLA (τὰ Νόλα), a mountain in Arcadia, on the frontiers of Laconia, is said to have derived its name from a nymph Nomia.

[NOÏMON (Νοΐμων), of Caria, father of Amphimachus and Nastes, who led the Carians to the Trojan war.]

NOÏMUS (Νόμιος), a surname of divinities protecting the pastures and shepherds, such as Apollo, Pan, Mercury (Hermes), and Aristæus.

NOÏACRIS (Νόνακρίς: Νονακρίτης, Νονακρίς), a town in the north of Arcadia, northwest of Pheneus, was surrounded by lofty mountains, in which the River Styx took its origin. The town is said to have derived its name from Nonacris, the wife of Lycaon. From this town Mercury (Hermes) is called Nonacriates, Evander Nonacrius, Atalanta Nonacria, and Calliste Nonacrina Virgo, in the general sense of Arcadian.

NONNUS (Νόννος). 1. A Greek poet, was a native of Panopolis in Egypt, and lived in the sixth century of the Christian era. Respecting his life nothing is known, except that he was a Christian. He is the author of an enormous epic poem, which has come down to us under the name of Dionysiaca or Bassarica (Διονυσιακά or Βασσαρικά), and which consists of forty-eight books. The work has no literary merit; the style is bombastic and inflated; and the incidents are patched together with little or no coherence. Edited by Græfe, Lips., 1819–1826, 2 vols. 8vo. Nonnus also made a paraphrase of the gospel of St. John in hexameter verse, which is likewise extant. Edited by Heinsius, Lugd. Bat., 1627; [and by Passow, Leipzig, 1834].—2. THEOPHANES NONNUS, a Greek medical writer who lived in the tenth century after Christ. His work is entitled a "Compendium of the whole Medical art," and is compiled from previous writers. Edited by Bernard, Gothæ & Amstel., 1794, 1795, 2 vols.

NÔRA (τὰ Νόρα: Νορᾶς, Norensis). 1. (Nov Torre Forcadizo), one of the oldest cities of Sardinia, founded by Iberian settlers under Norax, stood on the coast of the Sinus Caralitanus, thirty-two Roman miles southwest of Caralis.—2. A mountain fortress of Cappadocia, on the borders of Lycaonia, on the northern side of the Taurus, noted for the siege sustained in it by Eumenes against Antigonos for a whole winter. In the time of Strabo, who calls it Νηροασός, it was the treasury of Sisinas, a pretender to the throne of Cappadocia.

[NORAX (Νόραξ), son of Mercury (Hermes) and Eurythea. Vid. NORA.]

NORBA (Norbanensis, Noibanus). 1. (Nov Norma), a strongly fortified town in Latium, on the slope of the Volscian Mountains, and near the sources of the Nymphæus, originally belonged to the Latin and subsequently to the Volscian league. As early as B.C. 492 the Romans founded a colony at Norba. It espoused the cause of Marius in the civil war, and was destroyed by fire by its own inhabitants, when it was taken by one of Sulla's generals. There are still remains of polygonal walls, and a subterraneous passage at Norma.—3. Surnamed CAMARÆA (now Alcantara), a Roman colony in Lusitania, on the left bank of the Tagus, north-west of Augusta Emerita. The bridge built by order of Trajan over the Tagus at this place is still extant. It is six hundred feet long by twenty-eight wide, and contains six arches.

NORBANUS, C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 96, when he accused Q. Servilius Cæpio of majestas, but was himself accused of the same crime in the following year, on account of disturbances which took place at the trial of Cæpio. In 90 or 89, Norbanus was prætor in Sicily during the Marsic war; and in the civil wars he espoused the Marian party. He was consul in 83, when he was defeated by Sulla near Capua. In the following year, 82, he joined the consul Carbo in Cisalpine Gaul, but their united forces were entirely defeated by Metellus Pius. Norbanus escaped from Italy and fled to Rhodes, where he put an end to his life, when his person was demanded by Sulla.

NORBANUS FLACCUS. Vid. FLACCUS.

NORŒIA (NopŒia: now Neumarkt in Styria), the ancient capital of the Taurisci or Norici in Noricum, from which the whole country probably derived its name. It was situated in the centre of Noricum, a little south of the River Murus, and on the road from Virunum to Ovibab. It is celebrated as the place where Carbo was defeated by the Cimbræ, B.C. 113. It was besieged by the Boii in the time of Julius Cæsar. (Cæs., B. 6., i., 5.)

NORICUM, a Roman province south of the Danube, which probably derived its name from the town of NORŒIA, was bounded on the north by the Danube, on the west by Rætia and Vindelicia, on the east by Pannonia, and on the south by Pannonia and Italy. It was separated from Rætia and Vindelicia by the River Ænus (now Inn), from Pannonia on the east by Mons Cæsius, and from Pannonia and Italy on the south by the River Savus, the Alps Carnicæ, and Mons Oera. It thus corresponds to the greater part of Styria and Carinthia, and a part of Austria, Bavaria, and Salzburg. Noricum was a mountainous country, for it was not only surrounded on the south and east by mountains, but one of the main branches of the Alps, the Alps Noricæ (in the neighborhood of Salzburg), ran right through the province. In those mountains a large quantity of excellent iron was found; and the Noric swords were celebrated in antiquity. Gold also is said to have been found in the mountains in ancient times. The inhabitants of the country were Celts, divided into several tribes, of which the Taurisci, also called Norici, after their capital NorŒia, were the most important. They were conquered by the Romans toward the end of the reign of Augustus, after the subjugation of Rætia by Tiberius and Drusus, and their country was formed into a Roman province. In the later division of the Roman empire into smaller provinces, Noricum was formed into two provinces, Noricum R. pence, along the bank of the Danube, and Noricum Mediterraneum, separated from the former by the mountains which divide Austria and Styria: they both belonged to the diocese of Illyricum and the prefecture of Italy.

NORTIA or NUSTIA, an Etruscan divinity worshipped at Volturni, where a nail was driven every year into the wall of her temple, for the purpose of marking the number of years.

NOSSA, a Greek poetess, of Locri in Italy lived about B.C. 510, and is the author of twelve epigrams of considerable beauty in the Greek Anthology.

(NOTIUM (Nôrium). 1. The port of Colophon. Vid. COLOPHON.—2. A city in the island Calydna, which lay near Rhodes.—3. (Now Musa Head), a promontory of Hibernia, the southwest point of the island.)

NOVARIA (Novarenais: now Novara), a town in Gallia Transpadana, situated on a river of the same name (now Gogna), and on the road from Mediolanum to Vercellæ, subsequently a Roman municipium.

NOVATIANSUS, a heretic, who insisted upon the perpetual exclusion from the Church of all Christians who had fallen away from the faith under the terrors of persecution. On the election of Cornelius to the see of Rome, A.D. 251, Novatianus was consecrated bishop of a rival party, but was condemned by the council held in the autumn of the same year. After a vain struggle to maintain his position, he was obliged to give way, and became the founder of a new sect, who from him derived the name of Novatians. It should be observed that the individuals who first proclaimed these doctrines was no Novatianus, but an African presbyter under Cyprian, named Novatus. Hence much confusion has arisen between Novatus and Novatiansus, who ought, however, to be carefully distinguished. A few of the works of Novatianus are extant. The best edition of them is by Jackson, Lond., 1728.

NOVATUS. Vid. NOVATIANSUS.

NOVENALES or NOVENALIDES DII, Roman gods whose name is probably composed of novus and insides, and therefore signifies the new gods in opposition to the Indigetes, or old native divinities. It was customary among the Romans after the conquest of a neighboring town, to carry its gods to Rome, and there establish their worship.

Novesium (now Neuss), a fortified town of the Ubii on the Rhine, and on the road leading from Colonia Agrippina (now Cologne) to Castra Vetera (now Xanten). The fortifications at this place were restored by Julian in A.D. 350.

NOVIODUNUM, a name given to many Celtic places from their being situated on a hill (dun). 1. (Now Nouan), a town of the Bituriges Cui in Gallia Aquitania, east of their capital Avericum.—2. (Now Nevers), a town of the Edui in Gallia Lugdunensis, on the road from Augustodunum to Lutetia, and at the confluence of the Niveris and the Liger, whence it was subsequently called Nevirnum, and thus acquired its modern name.—3. A town of the Suessones in Gallia Belgica, probably the same as Augusta Suessanum. Vid. AVGUSTA. N. 6.—4. (Now Nion), a town of the Helvetii in Gallia Belgica, on the northern bank of the Lacus Lemanus, was made a Roman colony!

since Cæsar, B.C. 45, under the name of Cæsa Equestris.—5. (Now Iacasi), a fortress in Æsia Inferior, on the Danube, near which Vana built his bridge of boats across the Danube in his campaign against the Goths.

NOVIOMAGUS or NEOMAGUS. 1. (Now Castana de Medoc), a town of the Bituriges Viuci in Gallia Aquitania, northwest of Burdigala.—2. A town of the Tricastini in Gallia arboensis, probably the modern Nions, though some suppose it to be the same place as Auneta Tricastinorum (now Aoust).—3. (Now Nîmes), the capital of the Nemetes. Vid. NEMETES.—4. (Now Neumagen), a town of the Treveri in Gallia Belgica, on the Mosella.—5. (Now Nimwegen), a town of the Batavi.—6. (Ruins near Lancuz), a port of the Lexovii or Lexubii, small community belonging to the Arecomici in Gallia Lugdunensis, between the Liger (now Loire) and Sequana (now Seine).]

NOVUS, Q., a celebrated writer of Atellane plays, a contemporary of the dictator Sulla.

NOVUM COMUM. Vid. COMUM.

[Nox. Vid. NYX.]

NUBA PALUS (Νοῦβα λίμνη; now probably L. Firket, in Dar Zaleh), a lake in Central Africa, receiving the great river Gir, according to Ptolemy, who places it in 15° north latitude, and 40° east longitude (=23° from Greenwich).

NUBA, NUMMI (Νοῦβαι, Νοῦμμοι), an African people, who are found in two places, namely, about the Lake NUBA, and also on the banks of the Nile north of Meroë, that is, in the north central part of Nubia: the latter were governed by princes of their own, independent of Meroë. By the reign of Diocletian they had advanced northward as far as the frontier of Egypt.

NUCERIA (Nucerinus). 1. Surnamed ALFATERNA (now Nocera), a town in Campania, on the Sarnus (now Sarno), and on the Via Appia, southeast of Nola, and nine (Roman) miles from the coast, was taken by the Romans in the Samnite wars, and was again taken by Hannibal after the battle of Cannæ, when it was burned to the ground. It was subsequently rebuilt, and both Augustus and Nero planted here colonies of veterans. Pompeii was used as the harbor of Nuceria.—2. Surnamed CAMELLARIA (now Nocera), a town in the interior of Umbria, on the Via Flaminia.—3. (Now Luzzara), a small town in Gallia Cispadana, on the Po, northeast of Brixellum.—4. A town in Apulia, more correctly called LUCERIA.

NUMUM (Νοῦδιον), a settlement of the Minyes in Elia, early destroyed by the Eleans.]

NUERNUNES, a people of Germany, dwelling on the right bank of the Albis (now Elbe), southwest of the Saxones, and north of the Langoardi, in the southeastern part of the modern Mecklenburg.

NUMA MARCIUS. 1. An intimate friend of Numa Pompilius, whom he is said to have accompanied to Rome, where Numa made him the first pontifex maximus. Marcus aspired to the kingly dignity on the death of Pompilius, and he starved himself to death on the election of Tullus Hostilius.—2. Son of the preceding, said to have married Pompilia, the daughter of Numa Pompilius, and to have become by her the father of Ancus Marcius. Numa Marcius was appointed by Tullus Hostilius paterfamilias urbi.

NUMA POMPILIUS, the second king of Rome who belongs to legend and not to history. He was a native of Cures in the Sabine country, and was elected king one year after the death of Romulus, when the people became tired of the interregnum of the senate. He was renowned for his wisdom and his piety; and it was generally believed that he had derived his knowledge from Pythagoras. His reign was long and peaceful, and he devoted his chief care to the establishment of religion among his rude subjects. He was instructed by the Camena Egeria, who visited him in a grove near Rome, and who honored him with her love. He was revered by the Romans as the author of their whole religious worship. It was he who first appointed the pontiffs, the augurs, the flamines, the virgins of Vesta, and the Salii. He founded the temple of Janus, which remained always shut during his reign. The length of his reign is stated differently. Livy makes it forty-three years; Polybius and Cicero thirty-nine years. The sacred books of Numa, in which he prescribed all the religious rites and ceremonies, were said to have been buried near him in a separate tomb, and to have been discovered by accident five hundred years afterward, in B.C. 181. They were carried to the city prætor Petilius, and were found to consist of twelve or seven books in Latin on ecclesiastical law, and the same number of books in Greek on philosophy: the latter were burned on the command of the senate, but the former were carefully preserved. The story of the discovery of these books is evidently a forgery; and the books, which were ascribed to Numa, and which were extant at a later time, were evidently nothing more than works containing an account of the ceremonial of the Roman religion.

NUMANA (now Umana Distrutta), a town in Picenum, on the road leading from Ancona to Aternum, along the coast, was founded by the Siculi, and was subsequently a municipium.

NUMANTIA (Numantinus; ruins near Puentes de Don Guarray), the capital of the Arevaci or Arevaci in Hispania Tarraconensis, and the most important town in all Celtiberia, was situated near the sources of the Durius, on a small tributary of this river, and on the road leading from Asturica to Cæsaraugusta. It was strongly fortified by nature, being built on a steep and precipitous, though not lofty hill, and accessible by only one path, which was defended by ditches and palisades. It was twenty-four stadia in circumference, but was not surrounded by regular walls, which the natural strength of its position rendered unnecessary. It was long the head-quarters of the Celtiberians in their wars with the Romans; and its protracted siege and final destruction by Scipio Africanus the younger (B.C. 133) is one of the most memorable events in the early history of Spain.

[NUMANIUS REXULUS, a Rutulian warrior, brother-in-law of Turnus, slain by Ascanius.]

NUMANIUS (Νουμήνιος), of Apamea in Syria, a Pythagoreo-Platonic philosopher, who was highly esteemed by Plotinus and his school, as well as by Origen. He probably belongs to the age of the Antonines. His object was to trace the old times of Plato up to Pythagoras, and, at the same time, to show that they were not at variance with the dogmas and mysteries of the Brahmins, Jews, Magi, and Egyptians. Considerable fragments of his works have been preserved by Eusebius, in his Preparatio Evangelica.

NUMERIANUS, M. AURELIUS, the younger of the two sons of the Emperor Carus, who accompanied his father in the expedition against the Persians, A.D. 283. After the death of his father, which happened in the same year, Numerianus was acknowledged as joint emperor with his brother Carinus. The army, alarmed by the fate of Carus, who was struck dead by lightning, compelled Numerianus to retreat toward Europe. During the greater part of the march, which lasted for eight months, he was confined to his litter by an affection of the eyes; but the suspicions of the soldiers having become excited, they at length forced their way into the imperial tent, and discovered the dead body of their prince. Arrius Aper, prefect of the prætorians, and father-in-law of the deceased, was arraigned of the murder in a military council, held at Chalcedon, and, without being permitted to speak in his own defence, was stabbed to the heart by Diocletian, whom the troops had already proclaimed emperor. Vid. DIOCLETIANUS.

NUMICIUS or NOMICUS (now Numico), a small river in Latium, flowing into the Tyrrhene Sea near Ardea, on the banks of which was the tomb of Æneas, whom the inhabitants called Jupiter Indiges.

[NUMICIUS, Tit. 1. Tribune of the plebs B.C. 320, was, with his colleague Q. Mælius, given over to the Samnites when the Romans resolved not to adhere to the peace made at Caudium. His colleague of Mælius is called by Livy L. Julius, and not Numicius. — 2. A person to whom Horace addresses the sixth epistle of his first book: otherwise unknown.]

[NUMIDA PLOTIUS, a friend of Horace, who addresses to him one of his odes (bk. i., 36), to celebrate his safe arrival in Italy, after a campaign against the Cantabri in Spain.]

ΝΟΥΜΙΔΙΑ (Numidia, & Nouadiah or Nouadiah: Νουάδης, Nūmīda, pl. Νουάδες or Νουάδες Albæ, Nūmīdæ: now Algier), a country of Northern Africa, which, in its original extent, was divided from Mauretania on the west by the River Malva or Mulucha, and on the east from the territory of Carthage (afterward the Roman province of Africa) by the River Tusca: its northern boundary was the Mediterranean, and on the south it extended indefinitely toward the chain of the Great Atlas and the country of the Gætuli. Intersected by the chain of the Lesser Atlas, and watered by the streams running down from it, it abounded in fine pastures, which were early taken possession of by wandering tribes of Asiatic origin, who, from their occupation as herdsmen, were called by the Greeks, here as elsewhere, Nouáδες, and this name was perpetuated in that of the country. A sufficient account of these tribes, and of their connection with their neighbors on the west, is given under MAURETANIA. The fertility of the country, inviting to agriculture, gradually gave a somewhat more settled character to the people: and,

at their first appearance in the history we find the two great tribes, the Massyænes and the Massæsylians, forming two monarchies, which were united into one under Masinissa B.C. 201. For the historical details, vid. MASINISSA. On Masinissa's death in 148, his kingdom was divided, by his dying directions, between his three sons, Micipsa, Mastanabal, and Gulussa; but it was soon reunited under Micipsa, in consequence of the death of both his brothers. His death in 118 was speedily followed by the usurpation of Jugurtha, an account of which and of the ensuing war with the Romans is given under JUGURTHA. On the defeat of Jugurtha in 106, the country became virtually subject to the Romans, but they permitted the family of Masinissa to govern it with the royal title (vid. HIRPSAL, No. 2; JUBA, No. 1), until B.C. 46, when Juba, who had espoused the cause of Pompey in the civil wars, was defeated and dethroned by Julius Cæsar, and Numidia was made a Roman province. It seems to have been about the same time or a little later, under Augustus, that the western part of the country was taken from Numidia and added to MAURETANIA, as far east as Saldae. In B.C. 30 Augustus restored Juba II. to his father's kingdom of Numidia; but in B.C. 12 he exchanged it for Mauretania, and Numidia, that is, the country between Saldae on the west and the Tusca on the east, became a Roman province. It was again diminished by nearly half under Claudius (vid. MAURETANIA): and henceforth, until the Arab conquest, the name of the province of Numidia denotes the district between the River Ampsaga on the west and the Tusca on the east; its capital was Cirta (now Constantinople). The country, in its restricted limits, is often distinguished by the name of New Numidia or Numidia Proper. The Numidians are celebrated in military history for furnishing the best light cavalry to the army of Carthage, and afterward of Rome.

Tiro, is branded by Cicero as one of the cut-throats employed by M. Antonius in the civil war.]

NUMISTRO (Numistrinus), a town in Lucania near the frontiers of Apulia.

NUMITON. Vid. ROMULUS.

[NUMITOR, son of Phorcus, a warrior in the army of Turnus, wounded Achilles.]

NUMITORIUS, L. 1 One of the five tribunes elected in the comitia tributa, B.C. 472.—, the maternal uncle of Virginia, attempted to subvert the iniquitous sentence of the decemviri Claudius, and was elected tribune of the plebs upon the expulsion of the decemvir, 449.—3. Q. Numitorius Pullus, of Fregellæ, betrayed his native town to the Roman prætor, B.C. 125, when it rose in revolt against the Roman franchise.—4. C., was a distinguished man of the aristocratical party, was put to death by Marius and Cinna when they entered Rome at the close of B.C.

NURIA (Nursinus: now Norcia), a town in the land of the Sabines, situated near the sources of the Nar and amid the Apennines, as it is called by Virgil (Æn., vii., 716) Nursia. It was the birth-place of Servilius, the mother of Vespasian.

NYCTEUS (Νυκτεὺς), that is, Antiope, daughter of Asopos, and mother of Amphion and Zethus.

NYCTEUS (Νυκτεὺς), son of Hyrieus by the Clonia, and husband of Polyxo, by whom he was the father of Antiope; though, according to others, Antiope was the daughter of Ergod Asopos. Antiope was carried off by the king of Sicily; whereupon Nycteus, guardian of Thebes, as the guardian of Labdacus, invaded Sicily with a Theban army. He was defeated, and being severely wounded, he was carried back to Thebes, where, as to his death, he appointed his brother guardian of Labdacus, and at the same time required him to take vengeance on Epopeus.

NYMPHÆ, daughter of Epopeus, king of Leontini, according to others, of Nycteus. Proudly honored by her amorous father, she hid herself in the shade of forests, where she was metamorphosed by Minerva (Athena) into a nymph.

NYMPHÆ (Νύμφαι), the name of a numerous female divinities of a lower rank, though designated by the title of Olympian, are the meetings of the gods in Olympus, described as the daughters of Jupiter.

They may be divided into two great classes. The first class embraces those who are recognized in the worship of nature. The poets saw in all the phenomena of nature some manifestation of the deity: rivers, grottoes, trees, and mountains, added to them fraught with life, and all the visible embodiments of so many powers. The salutary and beneficent powers of nature were thus personified, and resembled so many divinities. The second class is that of personifications of tribes, races, and cities, such as Cyrene, and many others. The nymphs of the first class must again be divided into various species, according to the parts of nature of which they are the divinities. 1. Nymphs of the watery element these belong, first, the nymphs of the oceans (Ὠκεανίδαι, Ὠκεανίδες, νύμφαι who were regarded as the daughters of Oceanus; and, next, the nymphs of the Mediterranean sea, who were regarded as the daughters of Nereus, and hence were called Nereides (Νηρηίδες). The rivers were represented by the Potamides (Ποταμίδες), who, as local divinities, were named after their rivers as Acheloides, Anigrades, Ismenides, Amnisides, Pactolides. The nymphs of fresh water, whether of rivers, lakes, brooks, or springs, were also designated by the general name Naiades (Νηίδες), though they had, in addition, specific names (Κρηναίαι, Πηγαίαι, Ἑλεονόμοι, Λιμναρίδες, or Λιμναίδες). Even the rivers of the lower regions were described as having their nymphs; hence we read of Nymphæ infernæ paludis and Avernales. Many of these nymphs preside over waters or springs which were believed to inspire those who drank of them. The nymphs themselves were, therefore, thought to be endowed with prophetic power, and to inspire men with the same, and to confer upon them the gift of poetry. Hence all persons in a state of rapture, such as seers, poets, madmen, &c., were said to be caught by the nymphs (νυμφόληπτοι, in Lat. lymphati, lymphatici). As water is necessary to feed all vegetation as well as all living beings, the water-nymphs frequently appear in connection with higher divinities, as, for example, with Apollo, the prophetic god and the protector of herds and flocks; with Diana (Artemis), the huntress and the protectress of game, who was herself originally an Arcadian nymph; with Mercury (Hermes), the fructifying god of flocks; with Bacchus (Dionysus); and with Pan, the Sileni and Satyrs, whom they join in their Bacchic revels and dances.—2. Nymphs of mountains and grottoes, called Orsades (Ὀρειάδες, Ὀροδευναίδες), but sometimes also by names derived from the particular mountains they inhabited (e.g., Κιθαρινίδες, Πηλίδες, Κορύκτιαι).—3. Nymphs of forests, groves, and glens, were believed some times to appear to and frighten solitary travelers. They are designated by the names Ἀλσίδες, Τλήμωροι, Αὐλωνίδες, and Ναταίαι.—4. Nymphs of trees were believed to die together with the trees which had been their abode, and with which they had come into existence. They were called Dryades and Hamadryades (Δρυίδες, Ἀμαδρυάδες or Ἀδρυάδες), from δρῦς, which signifies not only an oak, but any wild-growing lofty tree; for the nymphs of fruit-trees were called Melides (Μηλίδες, also Μηλιίδες, Ἐπιμηλίδες, or Ἀμαμηλίδες). They seem to be of Arcadian origin, and never appear together with any of the great gods. II. The second class of nymphs, who were connected with certain races or localities (Νύμφαι χθόνιαι), usually have a name derived from the places with which they are associated, as Nysiades, Dodonides, Lemnians. The sacrifices offered to nymphs usually consisted of goats, lambs, milk, and oil, but never of wine. They were worshipped in many parts of Greece, especially near springs, groves, and grottoes. They are represented in works of art as beautiful maidens, either quite naked or only half covered. Later poets sometimes describe them as having sea-colored hair.

NYMPHÆUM (Νυμφαῖον, i. e., Nymph's abode). 1. A mountain, with perhaps a village, by the River Aous, near Apollonia, in Illyricum.—2. A port and promontory on the coast of Illyricum, three Roman miles from Lissus.—3. (Now Cape Giorgi), the southwestern promontory of actæ or Athos, in Chalcidice.—4. A sea-port town of the Chersonesus Taurica (now Crimea), on the Cimærian Bosphorus, twenty-five stadia (two and a half geographical miles) from Panticapæum.—5. A place on the coast of Bithynia, thirty stadia (three geographical miles) west of the mouth of the River Oxine.—6. A place in Cilicia, between Celerendis and Soloë.

NYMPHÆUS (Νύμφαιος). 1. (Now Ninfa or Nimpha), a small river of Latium, falling into the sea above Astura; of some note as contributing to the formation of the Pomptine Marshes. It now no longer reaches the sea, but falls into a little lake, called Lago di Monaci.—2. A harbor on the western side of the island of Sardinia, between the Promontorium Mercurii and the town of Tillium.—3. Also called NYMPHÆUS (now Basilimfa), a small river of Sophene in Armenia, a tributary of the Upper Tigris, flowing from north to south past Martyropolis, in the valley between Mons Niphates and Mons Masius.

NYMPHIDIVS SABINUS, commander of the prætorian troops, together with Tigellinus, toward the latter end of Nero's reign. On the death of Nero, A.D. 68, he attempted to seize the throne, but was murdered by the friends of Galba.

NYMPHIS (Νύμφης), son of Xenagoras, a native of the Pontic Heraclea, lived about B.C. 250. He was a person of distinction in his native land, as well as a historical writer of some note. He wrote a work on Alexander and his successors in twenty-four books, and also a history of Heraclea in thirteen books. [The fragments of Nymphis are collected by J. C. Orelli in his edition of Memnon, Leipzig, 1816, p. 96–102, and by C. Müller, Fragm. Græc. Hist., vol. iii., p. 12–16.]

NYMPHODORUS (Νυμφόδορος). 1. A Greek historian of Amphipolis, of uncertain date, the author of a work on the Laws or Customs of Asia (Νόμους Ἀσίας), vid. at end of No. 2.—2. Of Syracuse, likewise a historian, seems to have lived about the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He wrote a Periplus of Asia, and a work on Sicily. [The fragments of these works are given by Müller, Fragm. Græc. Hist., vol. ii., p. 375–381; Müller considers the existence of No. 1 doubtful, and adduces some arguments to show that these works are by one and the same author, viz., the Nymphodorus of Syracuse.]

[NYMPHODORUS (Νυμφόδορος), a citizen of Abdera, whose sister married Sitalces, king of Thrace. The Athenians, who had previously regarded Nymphodorus as their enemy, made him their proxenus in B.C. 431, and, through his mediation, obtained the alliance of Sitalces. He also subsequently testified his friendship for the Athenians by several other acts of kindness, and thus did them good service.]

NYSSA or NYSSA (Νύσσα or Νύσσα). 1. A queen of Bithynia, wife of Nicomedes II., and mother of Nicomedes III.—2. A sister of Mithradates the Great, who was taken prisoner by Lucullus at Cabira, and thus escaped the fate of the other sisters and wives of the king, who were put to death shortly after at Pharnacia.—3. A daughter of Mithradates the Great, who had been betrothed to the king of Cyprus, but accompanied her father in his flight to the kingdom of Bosphorus, where she ultimately shared his fate, putting an end to her life by poison, B.C. 63.]

NYSSA or NYSSA (Νύσσα, Νύσσα), was the legendary scene of the nurture of Bacchus (Dionysus), whence the name was applied to several places which were sacred to that god. 1. In India, in the district of Goryza, at the northwestern corner of the Punjab, near the confluence of the Rivers Cophen and Chosapa, probably the same place as Nagara or Dionysopolis (now Nagar or Naggar). Near it was a mountain of like name.—2. A city or mountain in Æthiopia.—3. (Now Sultan-Hissar, 12 miles N. W. of Nazdi), a city of Caria, on the southern slope of Mount Messogis, built on both sides of the ravine of the brook Eudon, which falls into the Mæander. It was said to have been named after the queen of one of the Antiochi, having been previously called Athymbra and Pythopolis.—4. A city of Cappadocia, near the Halys, on the road from Cæsarea to Ancyra, the bishopric of St. Gregory of Nyssa.—5. A town in Thrace, between the Rivers Neatos and Strymon.—6. A town in Boeotia, near Mount Helicon.

NYSSA, NYSSUS, NYSSUS, or NYSSITIS, a surname of Bacchus (Dionysus), derived from Nyssa, a mountain or city (see above), where the god was said to have been brought up by nymphs.

NYSSIDORS or NYSSIDORS, the nymphs of Nyssa, who are said to have reared Bacchus (Dionysus), and whose names are Cissels, Nyssa, Erato, Euphia, Bromia, and Polyhymna.

NYX (Νύξ), called Nox by the Romans, was a personification of Night. Homer calls her the subduer of gods and men, and relates that Jupiter (Zeus) himself stood in awe of her. In the ancient cosmogonies Night is one of the very first created beings, for she is described as the daughter of Chaos, and the sister of Erebus, to whom she became the mother of Æther and Hemera. She is further said to have given birth without a husband, to Moros, the Keres, Thanatos, Hypnos, Dreams, Momus, Oizys, the Harpers, Mæra, Nemesis, and similar beings. In later poets, with whom she is merely the personification of the darkness of night, she is sometimes described as a winged goddess, and sometimes as riding in a chariot, covered with a dark garment, and accompanied by the stars in her course. Her residence was in the darkness of Hades.

UINUS (Ὀῖνος: now Frascatori), a small river on the southern coast of Sicily, near Camarina. [Οἶακτα (Ὀῖακτα, Ὀοῖακτα, or Ὀτοῖακτα, now Dejane or Khiakne, also Brokta), a large and fertile island lying off the coast of Carmania, in the Persian Gulf; in it was found the tomb of Erythras, from whom the Erythraean Sea was fabled to have been named.]

Οἶακτα (Ὀῖακτα), a considerable river mentioned by Herodotus as rising in the country the Thyssagetae, and falling into the Palmæ Maris (now Sea of Azov) east of the Tanais (now Don). As there is no river which very well answers this description, Herodotus is supposed to refer to one of the eastern tributaries of the Don, such as the Sal or the Manyth.

Οἶακτα (Ὀῖακτα, Ἀῖακτα, and is later written Ὀῖακτα) is the Greek form of an Egyptian word.

(Coptic oua sé, an inhabited place), which was used to denote an island in the sea of sand of the Libyan Desert: the word has been adopted in our language. The Oases are depressions in the great table-land of Libya, preserved from invasion of the shifting sands by steep hills of sandstone round them, and watered by springs, which make them fertile and habitable. With substitution of these springs for the Nile, they closely resemble that greater depression in the Libyan table-land, the Valley of Egypt. The specific applications of the word by the ancient writers are to the two Oases on the east of Egypt, which were taken possession of by the Egyptians at an early period. 1. OASIS MAJOR, the Lesser or Second Oasis ('Oasis μικρὴ, or ἡ δευτέρα: now Wah-el-Bahryeh or el-Bahesia), lay west of Oxyrynchus, and a day's journey from the southwestern end of Lake Mæris. It was reckoned as belonging to the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, and had a separate Nomos.—2. OASIS MAJOR, the Greater, Upper, or First Oasis ('O. μεγάλη, ἡ πρώτη 'O., and, in Herodotus, πόλις Ὀασίς ἡμεῶν Μακάρων, now Wah-el-Khargeh), is described by Strabo as seven days' journey west of Syene, which applies to its northern end, as it extends over more than 1½° of latitude. It belonged to Upper Egypt, and, like the other, had a distinct nome: these two nomes are joined together as "duo Oasites" (οἱ δύο οἰῶται). When the ancient writers use the Oasis alone, the Greater Oasis must generally be understood. The Greater Oasis contains considerable ruins of the ancient Egyptian and Roman periods. Between and near were other Oases, about which we learn nothing from the ancient writers, but of which one of them, the Wah-el-Gharbee or el-Dakkeh, three days west of the Greater, there are the ruins of a Roman temple inscribed with the names of Nero and of Augustus.

The Greater Oasis is about level with the Nile, the Lesser is about two feet higher than the Nile, in nearly the same latitude.—3. A still more celebrated than either of these was that called AMMONIUM, AMMONIUM, AMMONIUM OASIS, from its being a chief seat of the worship of the god Ammon. It was called Arabe in the Middle Ages Santariah, and Siwah. It is about fifteen geographical miles long, and twelve wide: its chief town, is in 29° 12' north latitude, and 26° 17' longitude: its distance from Cairo is twelve miles and from the northern coast about one hundred and sixty statute miles: the ancients reckoned it twelve days from Memphis, and five from Parætonium on the northern coast. It was inhabited by various Libyan tribes, but the ruling people were a race kindred to the Libyans above Egypt, who, at a period of great antiquity, had introduced, probably from the east, the worship of Ammon: the government was monarchical. The Ammonians appear to have been subject to the old Egyptian monarchy. Cambyse, after conquering Egypt in B.C. 525, sent an army against which was overwhelmed by the sands of the desert. In B.C. 331, Alexander the Great visited the oracle which hailed him as the son of Jupiter (Zeus) Ammon. The oracle was also visited by Cato of Utica. Under the Ptolemies and the Romans it was subject to Egypt, and formed part of the Nomos Libya. The most remarkable objects in the Oasis, besides the temple of Ammon, were the palace of the ancient kings, abundant springs of salt water (as well as fresh) from which salt was made, and a well, called Pons Solis, the water of which was cold at noon, and warm in the morning and evening. Considerable ruins of the temple of Ammon are still standing at the town of Siwah. In ancient times the Oasis had no town, but the inhabitants dwelt in scattered villages.—4. In other parts of the Libyan Desert there were oases of which the ancients had some knowledge, but which they do not mention by the name of Oases, but by their specific names, such as AUGILA, PHAZANIA, and others.

OAXES. Vid. OAXUS.

OAXUS ('Oaxos: 'Ὀάσις'), called AXUS ('Axos'), by Herodotus, a town in the interior of Crete, on the River Oaxes, and near Eleutherna, is said to have derived its name from Oaxes or Oaxus, who was, according to some accounts, a son of Acacallis, the daughter of Minos, and, according to others, a son of Apollo by Anchiale.

OBILA (now Avila), a town of the Vettones, in Hispania Tarraconensis.

OBLIVIONIS FLUMEN. Vid. LIMMA.

OBRIAS (now Koja-Chai or Sandukli-Chai), an eastern tributary of the Mæander, in Phrygia.

OBRISEA (now Aer), a western tributary of the Rhine, forming the boundary between Germania Superior and Inferior.

OBSEQUENS, JULIUS, the name prefixed to a fragment entitled De Prodigis or Prodigiorum Libellus, containing a record of the phenomena classed by the Romans under the general designation of Prodigia or Omenta. The series extends in chronological order from the consulship of Scipio and Lælius, B.C. 190, to the consulship of Fabius and Ælius, B.C. 11. The materials are derived in a great measure from Livy, whose very words are frequently employed. With regard to the compiler we know nothing. The style is tolerably pure, but does not belong to the Augustan age. The best editions are by Scheffer, Amst., 1679; by Oudendorp, Lugd. Bat., 1720; [and by Kapp, Curisæ Regn., 1772.]

OBUCULA, OBUCULA, or OBULCULA (now Monclova), a town in Hispania Bætica, on the road from Hispalis to Emerita and Corduba.

OBULCO (now Porcuna), surnamed PONTIFICENSIS, a Roman municipium in Hispania Bætica, three hundred stadia from Corduba.

OCALIA ('Ὀκαλία, 'Ὀκαλίη, also 'Ὀκαλία, 'Ὀκαλία: 'Ὀκαλίη'), an ancient town in Bœotia, between Haliartus and Alalcomenæ, situated on a river of the same name falling into the Lake Copais, and at the foot of the mountain Tilphusion.

[OCALIA ('Ὀκαλία), daughter of Mantineus wife of Abas, and mother of Acrisius and Proetus.]

[OCCIA, a vestal virgin, who died in the reign of Tiberius, A.D. 19, after discharging the duties of her priesthood for the long period of fifty-seven years.]

CEANIDES. Vid. NYMPHÆ.

CEANIDES (Ὠκεανός), in the oldest Greek poets, is the god of the water which was believed to surround the whole earth, and which was supposed to be the source of all the rivers and other waters of the world. This water-god, in the Theogony of Hesiod, is the son of Heaven and Earth (Ὀὐρανός and Γαῖα), the husband of Tethys, and the father of all the river-gods and water-nymphs of the whole earth. He is introduced in person in the Prometheus of Æschylus. As to the physical idea attached by the early Greeks to the word, it seems that they regarded the earth as a flat circle, which was encompassed by a river perpetually flowing round it, and this river was Oceanus. (This notion is ridiculed by Herodotus.) Out of and into this river the sun and the stars were supposed to rise and set; and on its banks were the abodes of the dead. From this notion it naturally resulted that, as geographical knowledge advanced, the name was applied to the great outer waters of the earth, in contradistinction to the inner seas, and especially to the Atlantic, or the sea without the Pillars of Hercules (ἡ ἔξω θάλασσα, Mare Exterior), as distinguished from the Mediterranean, or the sea within that limit (ἡ ἐντὸς θάλασσα, Mare Internum); and thus the Atlantic is often called simply Oceanus. The epithet Atlantic (ἡ Ἀτλαντικὴ θάλασσα, Herod., δ' Ἀ. πόντος, Eurip.; Atlanticum Mare) was applied to it from the mythical position of ATLAS being on its shores. The other great waters which were denoted by the same term are described under their specific names.

OCÆLIS (Ὀκλήϊς; now Ghel), a celebrated harbor and emporium at the southwestern point of Arabia Felix, just at the entrance to the Red Sea.

OCELLUS LUCIANUS, a Pythagorean philosopher, was a native of some Greek city in Lucania, but we have no particulars of his work. We have still extant under his name a considerable fragment of a work, entitled, "On the Nature of the Whole" (περὶ τῆς τοῦ παντὸς φύσεως), written in the Ionic dialect; but it is much disputed whether it is a genuine work. In this work the author maintains that the whole (τὸ πᾶν, or δ' κόσμος) had no beginning, and will have no end. Edited by Rudolphi, Lips., 1801-8; [and by Mullach, in the volume entitled Aristotelis de Melisso, Xenophane et Gorgia Disputationes, &c., et Ocelli Lucani, qui fertur, de universa natura libello, Berlin, 1846.]

OCELLUM. 1. A town in the northeast of Lusitania, between the Tagus and the Durus, whose inhabitants, the Ocelenses, also bore the name of Lancienses.—2. (Now Ucello or Uzeau), a town in the Cottian Alps, was the last place in Cisalpine Gaul before entering the territories of King Cottius.

OCHA (Ὀχθ), the highest mountain in Eubœa, was in the south of the island, near Carystus, running out into the promontory Caphareus.

[OCHESIVS (Ὀχέσιος), an Ætolian prince, father of Periphas, who was slain in the Trojan war.]

OCHUS. Vid. ARTAXERXES III.

OCHUS (Ὀχος, Ὠχος), a great river of Central Asia, flowing from the northern side of the Par-opamis (now Hindoo Kosh), according to Strabo, through Hyrcania, into the Caspian according to Ptolemy and Ptolemy, through Bactria, into the Oxus. Some suppose it to be only another name for the Oxus. In the Pehlvi dialect the word denotes a river in general.

[OCNUS, a son of Tiberis and Mantua, and the reputed founder of Mantua, which he is said to have named after his mother.]

[OCRA (Ὀκρα), a branch of the Alps in Noricum; according to Strabo, the lowest part of the Carnic Alps, between Aquileia and Naupontia, over which a commercial road passed from Italy to the north.]

OCRICULUM (Ocriculānus: ruins near Otricoli), an important municipium in Umbria, situated on the Tiber, near its confluence with the Nar, and on the Via Flaminia, leading from Rome to Narnia, &c. There are ruins of an aqueduct, an amphitheatre and temples near the modern Otricoli.

[OCRINUM PROMONTORIUM (now Cape Lizard). Vid. DAMNONI.]

OCRISIA or OCLISIA, mother of Servius Tullius. For details, vid. TOLLIVS.

[OCTACILIUS. Vid. OTACILIUS.]

OCTAVIA. 1. Sister of the Emperor Augustus was married first to C. Marcellus, consul, B.C. 50, and subsequently, upon the death of the latter, to Antony, the triumvir, in 40. This marriage was regarded as the harbinger of a lasting peace. Augustus was warmly attached to his sister, and she possessed all the charms and virtues likely to secure a lasting influence over the mind of a husband. Her beauty was universally allowed to be superior to that of Cleopatra, and her virtue was such as to excite admiration in an age of growing licentiousness and corruption. For a time Antony seemed to forget Cleopatra; but he soon became tired of his virtuous wife, and upon his return to the East he forbade her to follow him. When at length the war broke out between Antony and Augustus, Octavia was divorced by her husband; but, instead of resenting the insult she had received from him, she brought up with care his children by Fulvia and Cleopatra. She died B.C. 11. Octavia had five children, three by Marcellus, a son and two daughters, and two by Antony, both daughters. Her son, M. Marcellus, was adopted by Augustus, and was destined to be his successor, but died in 23. Vid. MARCELLUS, No. 9. The descendants of her two daughters by Antonius successively ruled the Roman world. The elder of them married L. Domitius Ahenobarbus, and became the grandmother of the Emperor Nero; the younger of them married Drusus, the brother of the Emperor Tiberius, and became the mother of the Emperor Claudius, and the grandmother of the Emperor Caligula. Vid. ANTONIA.—2. The daughter of the Emperor Claudius, by his third wife, Valeria Messalina, was born about A.D. 42. She was at first betrothed by Claudius to L. Silanus, who put an end to his life, as Agrippina had destined Octavia to be the wife of her son, afterward the Emperor Nero. She was married to Nero in A.D. 53, but was soon deserted by her young and profligate husband for Poppæa Sabina. After living with the latter at his in stress for some time, he resolved to reseize her as his legal wife: and accordingly, he divorced Octavia on the alleged ground of sterility, and then married Poppæa, A.D. 62. Shortly afterward, Octavia was falsely accused of adultery, and was banished to the little island of Pandataria, where she was put to death. Her untimely end excited general commiseration. Octavia is the heroine of a tragedy found among the works of Seneca, but the author of which was more probably Curvatus Maternus.

OCTAVIANUS. Vid. AUGUSTUS.

OCTAVIUS. 1. CN., surnamed RUFUS, quaestor about B.C. 230, may be regarded as the founder of the family. The Octavii originally came from the Volscian town of Velitæ, where a street and an altar bore the name of Octavius. —2. CN., son of No. 1, plebeian ædile 206, and prætor 205, when he obtained Sardinia as his province. He was actively employed during the remainder of the second Punic war, and he was present at the battle of Zama. —3. CN., son of No. 2, was prætor 188, and had the command of the fleet in the war against Perseus. He was consul 165. In 163 he was one of three ambassadors sent into Syria, but was assassinated at Laodicea by a Greek of the name of Lepides, at the instigation, as was supposed, of Lysias, the guardian of the young king Antiochus V. A statue of Octavius was placed on the rostra at Rome, where it was in the time of Cicero. —4. CN., son of No. 3, consul 128. —5. M., perhaps younger son of No. 3, was the colleague of Tib. Gracchus in the tribunate of the plebs, 133, when he opposed his tribunitian veto to the passing of the agrarian law. He was, in consequence, deposed from his office by Tib. Gracchus. —6. CN., a supporter of the aristocratical party, was consul 87 with L. Cornelius Cinna. After Sulla's departure from Italy, in order to carry on the war against Mithridates, a vehement contest arose between the two consuls, which ended in the expulsion of Cinna from the city, and his being deprived of the consulship. Cinna soon afterward returned at the head of a powerful army, and accompanied by Marius. Rome was compelled to surrender, and Octavius was one of the first victims in the massacres that followed. His head was cut off and suspended on the rostra. —7. L., son of No. 6, consul 75, died in 74, as proconsul of Cilicia, and was succeeded in the command of the province by L. Lucullus. —8. CN., grandson of No. 4, consul 76. —9. M., son of No. 8, was curule ædile 56, along with M. Cælius. On the breaking out of the civil war in 49, Octavius espoused the aristocratical party, and served as legate to M. Bibulus, who had the supreme command of the Pompeian fleet. After the battle of Pharsalia, Octavius sailed to Illyria; but, having been driven out of this country (47) by Cæsar's legates, he fled to Africa. He was present at the battle of Actium (31), when he commanded part of Antony's fleet. —10. C., younger son of No. 1, and the ancestor of Augustus, remained a simple Roman equestris, without attempting to rise any higher in the state. —11. C., son of No. 10, and great-grandfather of Augustus, lived in the time of the second Punic war, in which he served as tribune of the soldiers. He was present at the battle of Cannæ (216), and was one of the few who survived the engagement. —12. C., son of No. 11, and grandfather of Augustus, lived quietly at his villa at Velitæ, without aspiring to the dignities of the Roman state. —13. C., son of No. 12, and father of Augustus, was prætor 61 and in the following year succeeded C. Antonius in the government of Macedonia, which he administered with equal integrity and energy. He returned to Italy in 59, died the following year, 58, at Nola, in Campania, in the very same room in which Augustus afterward breathed his last. By his second wife Atia, Octavius had a daughter and a son, the latter of whom was subsequently the Emperor Augustus. Vid. AUGUSTUS. —14. L., a legate of Pompey in the war against the pirates, 67, was sent by Pompey into Crete to supersede Q. Metellus in the command of the island; but Metellus refused to surrender the command to him. Vid. METELLUS, No. 16.

OCTAVIUS BALBUS. Vid. BALBUS.

OCTODURENSIS (Octodurensis: now Martigny), a town of the Veragri in the country of the Helvetii, is situated in a valley surrounded by lofty mountains, and on the River Dranca, near the spot where it flows into the Rhone. The ancient town, like the modern one, was divided by the Drance into two parts. The inhabitants had the Jus Latii.

OCTOÏÆA, a town of the Illygetes in Hispania Tarraconensis, near the Iberus, probably south of the Sicoris.

OCTOLITHUS, a place of uncertain site, in the north of Thessaly or the south of Macedonia.

OCTÏPÏTE. Vid. HAPPYIA.

OCTÏRÏE (Ὀκτυρία). 1. One of the daughters of Oceanus and Tethys. —2. Daughter of the centaur Chiron, possessed the gift of prophecy, and is said to have been changed into a mare.

ODENATHUS, the ruler of Palmyra, checked the victorious career of the Persians after the defeat and capture of Valerian, A.D. 260, and drove Sapor out of Syria. In return for these services, Gallienus bestowed upon Odenathus the title of Augustus. Odenathus was soon afterward murdered by some of his relations, not without the consent, it is said, of his wife Zenobia, 266. He was succeeded by ZENOBIA.

ODYSSEUS (Ὀδυσσεύς: Ὀδυσσεύτης, Ὀδυσσεύς). 1. (Now Varna), also called Odysseus and Odissus at a later time, a Greek town in Thracia (in the later Mæsia Inferior), on the Pontus Euxinus, nearly due east of Marcianopolis, was founded by the Milesians in the territory of the Crobryzi in the reign of Astyages, king of Media (B.C. 594–559). The town possessed a good harbor, and carried on an extensive commerce. —2. A sea-port in Sarmatia Europæa, on the north of the Pontus Euxinus and on the River Sangarius, west of Olbia and the mouth of the Borysthenes. It was some distance northeast of the modern Odessa.

[ODITES. 1. A centaur, slain by Mopsus. —2. An Æthiopian, slain by Clymenus at the nuptials of Perseus.]

[ODIUS (Ὀδῖος). 1. The leader of the Hætones, who were in alliance with the Trojans, was slain by Agamemnon before Troy. —2. A herald in the camp of the Greeks before Troy.]

ODOACEA, usually called king of the Illyrii was the leader of the barbarians who overthrew the Western Empire, A.D. 476. He took the title of king of Italy, and reigned till his power was overthrown by Theodoric, king of the Goths. Odoacer was defeated in three decisive battles by Theodoric (489-490), and then took refuge in Ravenna, where he was besieged for three years. He at last capitulated on condition that he and Theodoric should be joint kings of Italy; but Odoacer was soon afterward murdered by his rival.

ODOMANTICÆ (Ὀδομαντική), a district in the northeast of Macedonia, between the Strymon and the Nestus, inhabited by the Thracian tribe of the Odomanti or Odomantes.

ODRYÆ (Ὀδρύσαι), the most powerful people in Thrace, dwelt, according to Herodotus, on both sides of the River Artiscus, a tributary of the Hebrus, but also spread further west over the whole plain of the Hebrus. Soon after the Persian wars, Teres, king of the Odrysæ, obtained the sovereignty over several of the other Thracian tribes, and extended his dominions as far as the Black Sea. He was succeeded by his son Sitalces, who became the master of almost the whole of Thrace. His empire comprised all the territory from Abdera to the mouths of the Danube, and from Byzantium to the sources of the Strymon; and it is described by Thucydides as the greatest of all the kingdoms between the Ionian Gulf and the Euxine, both in revenue and opulence. Sitalces assisted the Athenians in the Peloponnesian war against Perdiccas, king of Macedonia. Vid. SITALCES. He died B.C. 424, and was succeeded by his nephew Seuthes I. On the death of the latter, about the end of the Peloponnesian war, the power of the Odrysæ declined. For the subsequent history of the Odrysæ, vid. THRACIA.

[ODRYSSÆ (Ὀδρύσαι), a tributary of the Rhodanus, in Mysia.]

ODYSSEA (Ὀδύσσεια), a town of Hispania Bætica, situated north of Abdera, amid the mountains of Turdetania, with a temple of Minerva (Athena), said to have been built by Odysseus (Ulysses). Its position is quite uncertain. Some of the ancients supposed it to be the same as OLISIPO.

ODYSSEUS. Vid. ULYSSES.

ŒA (Ἔα, Ptol. : Œensis : ruins at Tripoli ?), a city on the northern coast of Africa, in the Regio Syrtica (i. e., between the Syrtes), was one of the three cities of the African Tripolis, and, under the Romans, a colony by the name of Ælia Augusta Felix. It had a mixed population of Libyans and Sicilians.

ŒA (Ἔα), a town in the island of Ægina, twenty stadia from the capital.

ŒÆRUS or ŒÆRUS (Ōæργος), king of Thrace, was the father, by the muse Calliope, of Orpheus and Linus. Hence the sisters of Orpheus are called Œægrides, in the sense of the Muses. The adjective Œægrinus is also used by the poets as equivalent to Thracian. Hence Œægrinus Hamus, (Œægrinus Hebrus, &c.).

ŒANTER or ŒANTHIA (Ὀάνθη, Ὀάνθεια : Ὀανθεός : now Galaxidhi), a town of the Locri Ozolæ on the coast, near the entrance of the Crisaean Gulf.

ŒÆO or ŒÆBO (now Oyarzun), a town of the Vascones, on the northern coast of Hispania Tarraconensis, situated on a promontory of the same name, and on the River Magrada.

ŒÆA (Ōæς), son of Nauplius and Clymene and brother of Palamedes and Naumodes.

[ŒBALIDES, ŒBALIS. Vid. ŒBALUS.]

ŒBALUS (Ὀϊβαλος). 1. Son of Cynortas, husband of Gorgophone, and father of Tyndareus, Pirene, and Arene, was king of Sparta, where he was afterward honored with a heroön. According to others, he was son of Perieres and grandson of Cynortas, and was married to the nymph Batea, by whom he had several children. The patronymic (Œbalides) is not only applied to his descendants, but to the Spartans generally, as Hyacinthus, Castor, Pollux, &c. The feminine patronymic (Œbalis) and the adjective (Œbalus) are applied in the same way. Hence Heles is called by the poets Œbalis and Œbala peller; the city of Tarentum is termed Œbala arx, because it was founded by the Lacedæmonians; and since the Sabines were, according to one tradition, a Lacedæmonian colony, we find the Sabine king Titus Tatius named Œbalus Titi, and the Sabine women Œbalides matres. (Or. Fast., i., 280; iii., 230.)—2. Son of Telon, by a nymph of the stream Sebethus, near Naples, ruled in Campania.

[ŒBARES (Ὀϊβάρις). 1. A groom of Darius Hystaspis, who by a stratagem secured the Persian throne for his master, after the assassination of Smerdis.—2. Son of Megabarnus, was viceroy of Dascyleum, in Bithynia, in the reign of Darius Hystaspis.]

ŒCHALIA (Ὀϊχάλια : Ὀιχαλιεύς, Ὀιχαλιών). 1. A town in Thessaly, on the Peneus, now Tricca.—2. A town in Thessaly, belonging to the territory of Trachia.—3. A town in Macedonia, on the frontier of Arcadia, identified by Pausanias with Carnassium, by Strabo with Aedonia.—4. A town of Eubœa, in the district Eretria. The ancients were divided in opinion which of these places was the residence of Eurytus, whom Hercules defeated and slew. The original legend probably belonged to the Thessalian Œchalia, and was thence transferred to the other towns.

ŒCŒMŒNIUS (Ὀικομῆνιος), bishop of Tricca, in Thessaly, a Greek commentator on various parts of the New Testament, probably flourished about A.D. 950. He has the reputation of a judicious commentator, careful in compilation, modest in offering his own judgment, and not in expression. Most of his commentaries were published at Paris, 1631.

ŒDIPUS (Ὀιδίπους), son of Laius and Jocasta of Thebes. The tragic fate of this hero is more celebrated than that of any other legendary personage, on account of the frequent use which the tragic poets have made of it. In their hands it underwent various changes and embellishments, but the common story ran as follows. Laius, son of Labdacus, was king of Thebes, and husband of Jocaste, a daughter of Menæceus, and sister of Creon. An oracle had informed Laius that he was destined to perish by the hands of his own son. Accordingly, when Jocaste gave birth to a son, they pierced his feet, bound them together, and exposed the child on Mount Cithæron. There he was found by a shepherd of King Polybus of Corinth and scalled from his swollen feet Œdipus. Having been carried to the palace, the king and his wife Merope (or Peribœa) brought him up as their own child. Once, however, Œdipus was seized by a Corinthian with not being the king's son, whereupon he proceeded to Delphi to seek the oracle. The oracle replied that he was destined to slay his father and commit adultery with his mother. Thinking that Polybus his father, he resolved not to return to Corinth; but on his road between Delphi and Thebes he met his real father Laius. Polybus, the charioteer of Laius, bade Œdipus to go away from them, whereupon a scuffle ensued, in which Œdipus slew both Laius and his wife. In the mean time, the celebrated Sphinx had appeared in the neighborhood of Thebes. Seated on a rock, she put a riddle to the Thebans that passed by, and whoever was unable to solve it was killed by the monster. A calamity induced the Thebans to proclaim whoever should deliver the country of the Sphinx should be made king, and should receive Jocasta as his wife. Œdipus came forward, and when he approached the Sphinx she put the riddle as follows: "A being with four legs, two feet and three feet, and only one head; but its feet vary, and when it has most strength." Œdipus solved the riddle by saying that it was man, who in infancy crawls all fours, in manhood stands erect upon two feet, and in old age supports his tottering with a staff. The Sphinx, enraged at the solution of the riddle, thereupon threw herself from the rock. Œdipus now obtained the throne of Thebes, and married his mother, by which he became the father of Eteocles, Polyneices, Antigone, and Ismene. In consequence of this incestuous alliance, of which no one was aware, the country of Thebes was visited by a plague. The oracle, on being consulted, ordered that the murderer of Laius should be expelled. Œdipus accordingly pronounced a sentence upon the unknown murderer, and banished him an exile; but when he endeavored to cover him, he was informed by the seer that he himself was both the parricide and the husband of his mother. Jocasta now hanged herself, and Œdipus put out his own eyes. At this point traditions differ; for, according to some, Œdipus in his blindness was expelled from Thebes by his sons and brother-in-law, Creon; he undertook the government, and he was banished by Antigone in his exile to Attica; according to others, he was imprisoned by Creon at Thebes, in order that his disgrace might remain concealed from the eyes of the people. The father now cursed his sons, who refused to rule over Thebes alternately, but he was involved in a dispute, in consequence of which they fought in single combat, and slew each other. Hereupon Creon succeeded to the throne, and expelled Œdipus. After long wanderings, Œdipus arrived in the grove of the Eumenides, near Colonus, in Attica; he was there received by Theseus in his misfortune, and, according to an oracle, the Eumenides removed his bones to the earth, and no one was allowed to touch his tomb. According to Homer, Œdipus was tormented by the Erinnyes of his mother, and he died to reign at Thebes after her death;

he fell in battle, and was honored at Thebes with funeral solemnities.

[CENANÆ (Οἰνάνη), mother of Agathocles, the infamous minister of Ptolemy Philopator and of Agathocles, through whom she possessed great influence with the king. After the accession of Epiphanes, she, with her family, was given up to the multitude, and by them torn to pieces.]

CENŒON (Οἰνών: Οἰνωτρέας), a sea-port town of the Locri Ozolæ, east of Næpactus.

CENEUS (Οἰνέας), son of Portheus, husband of Althæa, by whom he became the father of Tydeus and Meleager, and was thus the grandfather of Diomedes. He was king of Pleuron and Calydon in Ætolia. This is Homer's account; but, according to later authorities, he was the son of Porthæon and Euryte, and the father of Toxæus, whom he himself killed, Thyreus (Pheareus), Clymenus, Periphaas, Agelaus, Meleager, Gorge, Eurymedes, Melanippe, Mothone, and Deianira. His second wife was Melanippe, the daughter of Hippocoon, by whom he had Tydeus, according to some accounts; though, according to others, Tydeus was his son by his own daughter Gorge. He is said to have been deprived of his kingdom by the sons of his brother Agrius, who imprisoned and ill used him. He was subsequently avenged by Diomedes, who slew Agrius and his sons, and restored the kingdom either to Ceneus himself, or to his son-in-law Adrammon, as Ceneus was too old. Diomedes took his grandfather with him to Peloponnesus, but some of the sons, who lay in ambush, slew the old man near the altar of Telephus in Argolis. Diomedes buried his body at Argos, and named the town of Ceneos after him. According to others, Ceneus lived to extreme old age with Diomedes at Argos, and died a natural death. Homer knows nothing of all this; he merely relates that Ceneus once neglected to sacrifice to Diana (Artemis), in consequence of which she sent a monstrous boar into the territory of Calydon, which was hunted by Meleager. The hero Bellerophon was hospitably entertained by Ceneus, and received from him a costly girdle as a present.

CENIADÆ (Οἰνιάδαι: now Trigardon or Trikhardo), an ancient town of Acarnania, situated on the Achelous, near its mouth, and surrounded by marshes caused by the overflowing of the river, which thus protected it from hostile attacks. It was called in ancient times ΕΥΡΥΣΙΧΑΝ (Εὐρύσιχον), and its inhabitants ΕΥΡΥΣΙΧΑΝΑΙ (Εὐρύσιχαιοι); and it probably derived its later name from the mythical Ceneus, the grandfather of Diomedes. Unlike the other cities of Acarnania, Ceniadæ espoused the cause of the Spartans in the Peloponnesian war. At the time of Alexander the Great, the town was taken by the Ætolians, who expelled the inhabitants; but the Aetolians were expelled in their turn by Philip V., king of Macedonia, who surrounded the place with strong fortifications. The Romans restored the town to the Acarnanians. The fortress Nesus or Nasus, belonging to the territory of Ceniadæ, was situated in a small lake near Ceniadæ.

CENIDÆ, a patronymic from Ceneus, and hence given to Meleager, the son of Ceneus, and Diomedes, the grandson of Ceneus.

(CENO (Οἶνός). Vid. AMUS.)

CENOANDA (CENEANDA, a town of As a minor, the northwest of Pisidia, or the district of Abasia, subject to Cibyra.

(CENOATIS (Οἰνωτίς), a surname of Diana (Artemis), who was worshipped in Argolic Cenne, where a temple was said to have been built to her by Proetus.)

CENOBARAS (Οἰνωβάρης), a tributary of the Orontes, flowing through the plain of Antioch, in Syria.

CENŌ (Οἰνός; Οἰνωτοί). 1. A demus of Attica, belonging to the tribe Hippothontis, near Eleutherae, on the frontiers of Boeotia, frequently mentioned in the Peloponnesian war.—2. A demus of Attica, near Marathon, belonging to the tribe Aiantis, and also to the Tetrapolis.—3. A fortress of the Corinthians, on the Corinthian Gulf, between the promontory Olmia and the frontier of Megaris.—4. A town in Argolis, on the Arcadian frontier, at the foot of Mount Artemisium.—5. A town in Elis, near the mouth of the Selleis.—6. A town in the island Icarus or Icaria.

CENŌMAUS (Οἰνώμαος). 1. King of Pisa in Elis, was son of Mars (Ares) and Harpinna, the daughter of Asopus, and husband of the Pleiad Sterope, by whom he became the father of Hippodamia. According to others, he was a son of Mars (Ares) and Sterope, or a son of Alxion. An oracle had declared that he should perish by the hands of his son-in-law; and as his horses were swifter than those of any other mortal, he declared that all who came forward as suitors for Hippodamia's hand should contend with him in the chariot-race; that whoever conquered should receive her; and that whoever was conquered should suffer death. The race-course extended from Pisa to the altar of Neptune (Poseidon), on the Corinthian Isthmus. The suitor started with Hippodamia in a chariot, and CENŌMAUS then hastened with his swift horses after the lovers. He had overtaken and slain many a suitor, when Pelops, the son of Tantalus, came to Pisa. Pelops bribed Mytilus, the charioteer of CENŌMAUS, to take out the linch-pins from the wheels of his master's chariot, and he received from Neptune (Poseidon) a golden chariot and most rapid horses. In the race which followed, the chariot of CENŌMAUS broke down, and he fell out and was killed. Thus Pelops obtained Hippodamia and the kingdom of Pisa. There are some variations in this story, such as that CENŌMAUS was himself in love with his daughter, and for this reason slew her lovers. Mytilus also is said to have loved Hippodamia, and, as she favored the suit of Pelops, she persuaded Mytilus to take the linch-pins out of the wheels of her father's chariot. As CENŌMAUS was breathing his last, he pronounced a curse upon Mytilus. This curse had its desired effect; for, as Pelops refused to give to Mytilus the reward he had promised, or as Mytilus had attempted to dishonor Hippodamia, Pelops thrust him down from Cape Geræstus. Mytilus, while dying, likewise pronounced a curse upon Pelops, which was the cause of all the calamities that afterward befell his house. The tomb of CENŌMAUS was shown on the River Cladeus in Elis. His house was destroyed by lightning, and only one pillar of it remained standing.—[2. A Trojan hero, slain by Idomeneus before Troy.—3. A Grecian hero slain by Hector.]—4. Of Gadara, a Cyrenian philosopher, who flourished in the reign of Hadrian or somewhat later, but before Porphyry. He wrote a work to expose the oracles, of which considerable fragments are preserved by Eusebius.—5. A tragic poet. Vid. DIODORUS, No. 1.

CENŌNE (Οἰνώνη), daughter of the river-god Cebren, and wife of Paris, before he carried off Helen. Vid. PARIS.

CENŌNE or CENŌPIA, the ancient name of EGINA.

CENŌPIŌTA (τὰ Οἰνωπία: now Ionia), a town in Boeotia, on the left bank of the Asopus, and on the road from Tanagra to Oropus, memorable for the victory gained here by the Athenians over the Boeotians, B. C. 456.

CENŌPIDES (Οἰνωπίδης), of Chios, a distinguished astronomer and mathematician, perhaps a contemporary of Anaxagoras. CENŌPIDES derived most of his astronomical knowledge from the priests and astronomers of Egypt, with whom he lived for some time. He obtained from this source his knowledge of the obliquity of the ecliptic, the discovery of which he is said to have claimed. The length of the solar year was fixed by CENŌPIDES at three hundred and sixty-five days, and somewhat less than nine hours. He is said to have discovered the twelfth and twenty-third propositions of the first book of Euclid, and the quadrature of the meniscus.

[CENŌPIA, ancient name of EGINA. Vid. EGINA.]

CENŌPIŌN (Οἰνωπίων), son of Bacchus (Dionysus) and husband of the nymph Helice, by whom he became the father of Thalius, Eumethes, Melas, Salagus, Athamas, and Merope, Aerope or Harro. Some writers call CENŌPIŌN a son of Rhadamanthys by Ariadne, and a brother of Staphylus. From Crete he migrated with his sons to Chios, which Rhadamanthys had assigned to him as his habitation. When king of Chios, the giant Orion sued for the hand of his daughter Merope. As CENŌPIŌN refused to give her to Orion, the latter violated Merope, whereupon CENŌPIŌN put out his eyes, and expelled him from the island. Orion went to Lemnos; he was afterward cured of his blindness, and returned to Chios to take vengeance on CENŌPIŌN. But the latter was not to be found in Chios, for his friends had concealed him in the earth, so that Orion, unable to discover him, went to Crete.

CENŌTRI, CENŌTRIA. Vid. ITALIA.

CENŌTRIDES, two small islands in the Tyrrhene Sea, off the coast of Lucania, and opposite the town of Elea or Velia and the mouth of the Helos.

CENŌTRŌPÆ. Vid. AMUS.

CENŌTRŌUS (Οἰνωτρος), youngest son of Iphæon, emigrated with a colony from Arcadia to Italy, and gave the name of CENŌtria to the district in which he settled.

CENŌUS (Οἶνός: now Kalestina), a river in Laconia, rising on the frontier of Arcadia, and flowing into the Eurotas north of Sparta. There was a town of the same name upon this river, celebrated for its wine.

CENUSÆ (Οἰνωσανα; Οἰνωσαί) 1. A great of islands lying off the southern point of Messenia, opposite to the port of Phoeniceus: the two largest of them are now called Sapienza and Cabrera.—2. (Now Spalmadori or Egonuses). a group of five islands between Chios and the coast of Asia Minor.

[CELESTAZUS (Οὐδελος). 1. A Persian, who, when Darius Hystaspis was on the point of marching from Susa on his Scythian expedition, besought him to leave him one of his three sons, all of whom were in the army. Darius ordered them all three to be put to death.—2. Father of Siromitres, who led the Paricanians in the Greek expedition of Xerxes.—3. A noble Persian, who, when the Greek fleet appeared in the Hellespont after the battle of Mycale, fled from Cardia to Sestus; he afterward fell into the hands of the Thracians, and was by them sacrificed to their god Pleistorus.]

[CELYCER (Οὐδελος), a son of Theras of Sparta, and brother of Ægeus, was honored at Sparta with a heroum.]

CELYCER (Οὐδελος), son of Licymnius of Midea in Argolis, first victor at Olympia in the foot-race. He is said to have been killed at Sparta by the sons of Hippocoon, but was avenged by Hercules, whose kinsman he was, and was honored with a monument near the temple of Hercules.

CELYCER (Οὐδελος), an island in Boeotia, formed by the River Asopus, and opposite Platææ.

[CELYCER, brother of Gala, king of the Numidian tribe of the Massylians, whom he succeeded on the throne, according to the Numidian law of inheritance.]

CELYCER (now Isker or Esker), called Oscus (Οὐδελος) by Thucydides, and Scius (Σκιος) by Herodotus, a river in Mœsia, which rises in Mount Scymus according to Thucydides, or in Mount Rhodope according to Pliny, but in reality on the western slope of Mount Hæmus, and flows into the Danube near a town of the same name (now Oreszovitz).

[CELYCERIDES INSULÆ, a group of islands rich in tin and copper, in the Sinus Cestrymniæ; probably the same with the Cassiterides (q. v.) on the coast of Britannia.]

CELYCER (Οὐδελος: Οὐδελος), called Ægæa (Αἴγιον) by Homer (Il. viii., 304), an ancient town in Thrace, between the Strymon and the Nestus, a colony of the Thasians.

CELYCER (Οὐδελος, τὰ Οὐδελων ὄρη: now Katastrata), a rugged pile of mountains in the south of Thessaly, an eastern branch of Mount Pindus, extended south of Mount Othrys along the southern bank of the Sperchius to the Malice Gulf at Thermopylæ, thus forming the northern barrier of Greece. Strabo and Livy give the name of Callidromus to the eastern part of Celæ, an appellation which does not occur in Herodotus and the earlier writers. Respecting the pass of Mount Celæ, vid. Thermopylæ. Celæ was celebrated in mythology as the mountain on which Hercules burned himself to death. From this mountain the south of Thessaly bordering on Phocia was called CELYCER (Οὐδελος), and its inhabitants CELYCER (Οὐδελος).

CELYCER (Οὐδελος: Οὐδελος: now Vitylo), also called Trilus (Τρύλος), an ancient town in Locris, on the Messenian Gulf, south of Thalama, called after an Argive hero of this name.

OPELLA, a man of sound sense and of a straightforward character, whom Horace contrasts with the Stoic quacks of his time.

OPELLA, Q. Lucæstius, originally belonged to the Marian party, but deserted to Sulla, who appointed him to the command of the army employed in the blockade of Præneste, B.C. 83. Opella became a candidate for the consulship in the following year, although he had not yet been either quæstor or prætor, thus acting in defiance of one of Sulla's laws. He was, in consequence, put to death by Sulla's orders.

OPILLIUS, a distinguished Roman jurist, was one of the pupils of Servius Sulpicius, and a friend of Cicero and Cæsar. His works are often cited in the Digest.

OPULISA (now Monte Christo), a small island off the coast of Etruria.

OPULIS, Q. and CN., two brothers, tribunes of the plebs B.C. 300, carried a law by which the number of the pontiffs was increased from four to eight, and that of the augurs from four to nine, and which enacted that four of the pontiffs and five of the augurs should be taken from the plebs. Besides these eight pontiffs there was the pontifex maximus, who is generally not included when the number of pontiffs is spoken of.

OPULIS (Οὐδελος). 1. The mythical island of Calypso is placed by Homer in the navel or central point of the sea, far away from all lands. Later writers pretended to find it in the Ionian Sea, near the promontory Lacinium, in Brutium.—[2. vid. Ogygia.]

OPULIS or OPULIS (Οὐδελος), sometimes called a Boeotian autochthon, and sometimes son of Boeotus, and king of the Hecenes, is said to have been the first ruler of the territory of Thebes, which was called after him Ogygia. In his reign the waters of Lake Copais rose above its banks, and inundated the whole valley of Boeotia. This flood is usually called after him the Ogygian. The name of Ogygis is also connected with Attic story, for in Attica an Ogygian flood is likewise mentioned, and he is described as the father of the Attic hero Eleusis, and as the father of Daira, the daughter of Oceanus. In the Boeotian tradition he was the father of Alalcomenia, Thelxinoe, and Aulis. Bacchus is called Ogygius deus because he is said to have been born at Thebes.

OPULIS (Οὐδελος), an island of the Erythrean Sea (now Indian Ocean), off the coast of Carmania, at a distance of two thousand stadia (two hundred geographical miles), noted as the alleged burial-place of the ancient king Erythras; but vid. OPULIS.

OCLES or OCLEUS (Ὀκλῆς, Ὀκλέως), son of Antiphates, grandson of Melampus, and father of Amphiparaus, of Argos. He is also called a son of Amphiparaus, or a son of Mantius, the brother of Antiphates. Ocles accompanied Hercules on his expedition against Laomedon of Troy, and was there slain in battle. According to other traditions, he returned home from the expedition, and dwelt in Arcadia, where he was visited by his grandson Alcomenon and where his tomb was shown.

OLEUS (Ὀϊλὺς), son of Hodædocus and Laonome, grandson of Cynus, and great-grandson of Opus, was a king of the Locrians, and married to Eriopis, by whom he became the father of Ajax, who is hence called Oïlides, Oïliades, and Ajax Oïlei. Oleus was also the father of Medon by Rhene. He is mentioned among the Argonauts.

[OLARION OF OLARIONENSIS INSULA (now Oléron), an island in the Sinus Aquitanicus, on the west coast of Gallia.]

OLBA or OLBE (Ὀλβή), an ancient inland city of Cilicia, in the mountains above Soloë, and between the Rivers Lamus and Cydnus. Its foundation was ascribed by mythical tradition to Ajax the son of Teucer, whose alleged descendants, the priests of the very ancient temple of Jupiter (Zeus), once ruled over all Cilicia Aspera. In later times it belonged to Isauria, and was the see of a bishop.

OLBASA (Ὀλβάσα). 1. A city of Cilicia Aspera, at the foot of the Taurus, north of Selinus, and northwest of Caystrus; not to be confounded with OLBA.—2. A city in the southeast of Lycaonia, southwest of Cybistra, in the district called Antiochiana.—3. A city in the north of Pisidia, between Pednelissus and Selge.

OLBE. Vid. OLBA.

OLBIA (Ὀλβία). 1. (Now probably Eoubea, near Hieres), a colony of Massilia, on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, on a hill called Olbianus, east of Telo Martius (now Toulon).—2. (Now probably Terra Nova), a very ancient city, near the northern end of the eastern side of the island of Sardinia, with the only good harbor on this coast, and therefore the usual landing-place for persons coming from Rome. A mythical tradition ascribed its foundation to the Thespiades.—3. In Bithynia. Vid. ASTACUS. The Gulf of Astacus was also called from it Sinus Olbianus.—4. A fortress on the western frontier of Pamphylia, on the coast, west of the River Catarrhactes; not improbably on the same site as the later ATTALIA.—5. Vid. BORYTHENES.

[OLBIUS (Ὀλβιος), a river in the north of Arcadia, near Pheneus, by the Arcadians also called AROANTUS.]

OLCIDÆ, an ancient people in Hispania Tarraconensis, north of Carthago Nova, near the sources of the Anas, in a part of the country afterward inhabited by the Oretani. They are mentioned only in the wars of the Carthaginians with the inhabitants of Spain. Hannibal transplanted some of the Olcades to Africa. Their chief towns were Althæa and Carteia, the site of both of which is uncertain; the latter place must not be confounded with the celebrated CARTEIA in Bætica.

OLCINTUM (Olciniatæ: now Dulcigno), an ancient town on the coast of Illyria, southwest of Scodra, belonging to the territory of Gentius.

OLCIUS. Vid. OLIAEUS.

OLIASTRUM. 1. A town of the Cosetani, in Hispania Tarraconensis, on the road from Derioma to Tarraco, probably the place from which the plumbum Oliastræ derived its name.—2. A town in Hispania Bætica, near Gades.

OLIM (Ὀλὶμ), a mythical personage, who is represented as the earliest Greek lyric poet, and the first author of sacred hymns in hex-ameter verse. He is closely connected with the worship of Apollo, of whom, in one legend he was made the prophet. His connection with Apollo is also marked by his being called Hyperborean, and one of the establishers of oracles, though the more common story made him a native of Lycia. He is said to have settled at Delos. His name seems to signify simply the flute-player. Of the ancient hymns which went under his name, Pausanias mentions those to Juno (Hera), to Achæia, and to Iluthia; the last was in celebration of the birth of Apollo and Diana (Artemis).

[OLENIA RUPES (Ὀλένια πέτρα), the Olesian rock mentioned in the Iliad (ii. 617); according to Strabo, the summit of Mount Scollis in Achæia, on the borders of Elis.]

[OLENNIUS, one of the chief centurions placed in command over the Frisii; by his harshness he caused an insurrection of the people, from whose fury flight alone preserved him, B.C. 28.]

OLENUS (Ὀλένωρ: Ὀλέντιος). 1. An ancient town in Ætolia, near New Pleuron, and at the foot of Mount Aracynthus, is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed by the Ætolians at an early period.—2. A town in Achæia, between Patræ and Dyme, refused to join the Achæan league on its restoration in B.C. 290. In the time of Strabo the town was deserted. The goat Amalthæa, which suckled the infant Jupiter (Zeus), is called Olenia capella by the poets, either because the goat was supposed to have been born near the town of Olenus, and to have been subsequently transferred to Creta, or because the nymph Amalthæa, to whom the goat belonged, was a daughter of Olenus.

OLGASSYS (Ὀλγασσός: now Al-Ges Dagh), a lofty, steep, and rugged mountain chain of Asia Minor, extending nearly west and east through the east of Bithynia, and the centre of Paphlagonia to the River Halys, nearly parallel to the chain of Olympus, of which it may be considered as a branch. Numerous temples were built upon it by the Paphlagonians.

OLIAIROS (Ὀλῖαιρος, Ὀλῆαιρος: Ὀλῖαιρος: now Antiparos), a small island in the Ægean Sea, one of the Cyclades, west of Paros, originally colonized by the Phœnicians, is celebrated in modern times for its stalactite grotto, which is not mentioned by ancient writers.

OLIGYRTUS (Ὀλῖγυρτος), a fortress in the northeast of Arcadia, on a mountain of the same name, between Stymphalus and Caphysæ.

[OLIMA (now probably Orma), a small river in the west of Gallia Lugdunensis, between the mouth of the Sequana and the promontory Gebæum, flowing through the territory of the Vi ducaesses.]

OLISIRO (now Lisbon), a town in Lusitania, on the right bank of the Tagus, near its mouth, and a Roman municipium with the surname Felicitas Julia. It was celebrated for its swift horses. Its name is sometimes written Ulysifiro, because it was supposed by some to have been the town which Ulysses was said to have founded in Spain; but the town to which this legend referred was situated in the mountains of Turdetania.

OLIZON (Ὀλίζων), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia and on the Pagasæan Gulf mentioned by Homer.

OLIVUS (now Oglio), a river in Gallia Transalpina, falls into the Po southwest of Mantua. OLLIVS, T., the father of Poppæa Sabina, a put to death toward the end of the reign of Tiberius.]

ΟΛΜΙΑ (Olmeia), a promontory in the territory of Corinth, which separated the Corinthian and Alcyonian Gulfs.

ΟΛΜΙΟΣ (Olmiós), a small river flowing from Ilion, which unites with the Permessus at Haliartus, and soon afterwards falls into Lake Pelas.]

ΟΛΟΟΣΣΩΝ (Oloussón; Oloussónios; now Assosa), a town of the Perrhæbi in Thessaly, the district of Hestiotis. Homer (Il. ii. 9) calls it "white," an epithet which it obtained, according to Strabo, from the whiteness of its soil.

ΟΛΟΡΥΤΧΟΣ (Olórutyos; Olóruytios), a town of Macedonia, on the peninsula of Mount Athos. ΟΛΟΥΣ or ΟΡΟΛΟΣ (Olóros or Órolos). 1. king of Thrace, whose daughter, Hegesipyla, was married to Miltiades.—2. Apparently grandson of the above, and son of Hegesipyla, was obviously the offspring of a second marriage contracted by her after the death of Miltiades. This Iolus was the father of Thucydides.]

ΟΛΥΞ or ΟΛΠΕ (Olúx, Ólupē; Ólpaioz). (Now Araps), a town of the Amphilochoi, in Carmania, on the Ambracian Gulf, northwest of Argos Amphilocheicum.—3. A town of the Locri nolæ.

ΟΛΥΠΟΣ (Ólupos; Óloupyos). 1. A town in Thracia, near Pellenæ, on the Scysonian frontier.—2. Also ΟΛΥΠΙΣ (Ólupis), called Δολιχον Δολύπον by Homer, a town in Messenia, south of the River Neda.

ΟΛΥΣ (Óluz; Ólouyntios), a town and harbor on the eastern coast of Crete, near the promontory of Zephyrium.

ΟΛΥΒΙΛΙΣ, Ανίκιος, Roman emperor A.D. 472, was raised to this dignity by Ricimer, who deposed Anthemius. He died in the course of the same year, after a reign of three months and thirteen days. His successor was GLYCESTIS.

ΟΛΥΜΠΕΙΑΣ, and ΟΛΥΜΠΕΙΟΝ or ΟΛΥΜΠΙΚΗΝ (Ólumpyias, Ólumpyiôn, Ólumpyikên), the names of the district about the Mysian Olympus, and of its inhabitants.

ΟΛΥΜΠΙΑ (Ólumpyia), the name of a small plain in Elis, in which the Olympic games were celebrated. It was surrounded on the north and northeast by the mountains Cronion and Olympus, on the south by the River Alpheus, and on the west by the River Cladeus. In this plain was the sacred grove of Jupiter (Zeus), called Álutz (Álutz, an old Elean form of ἄλσος, a grove), situated at the angle formed by the confluence of the rivers Alpheus and Cladeus, and three hundred stadia distant from the town of Pisa. The Altis and its immediate neighborhood were adorned with numerous temples, statues, and public buildings, to which the general appellation of Olympia was given; but there was no town of this name. The Altis was surrounded by a wall. It contained the following temples: 1. The Olympiæum, or temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Olympia, which was the most celebrated of all the buildings at Olympia, and which contained the master-piece of Greek art, the colossal statue of Jupiter (Zeus) by Phidias. The statue was made of ivory and gold, and the god was represented as seated on a throne of cedar wood, adorned with gold, ivory, ebony, and precious stones. Vid. PHIDIAS. 2. The Hērœum or temple of Hera (Juno), which contained the celebrated chest of Cypselus, and was situated north of the Olympiæum. 3. The Metróum, or temple of the Mother of the gods. The other public buildings in the Altis most worthy of notice were the Thesauri, or treasuries of the different states which had sent dedicatory offerings to the Olympian Jupiter (Zeus), situated at the foot of Mount Cronion; the Zanæ, or statues of Jupiter (Zeus), which had been erected from fines imposed upon those who had been guilty of fraud or other irregularities in the Olympic contests, and which were placed on a stone platform near the Thesauri; the Prytaneum, in which the Olympic victors dined after the contests had been brought to a close; the Bouleuterion, in which all the regulations relating to the games were made, and which contained a statue of Jupiter (Zeus) Horcius, before which the usual oaths were taken by the judges and the combatants; the Philippæum, a circular building of brick, surmounted with a dome, which was erected by Philip after the battle of Chæroneia, and which was situated near one of the gates of the Altis, close to the Prytaneum; the Hippodamium, a sacred inclosure, erected in honor of Hippodamia; the Pelopium, a sacred inclosure, erected in honor of Pelops. The two chief buildings outside the Altis were the Stadium, to the east of Mount Cronion, in which the gymnastic games were celebrated, and the Hippodromus, a little southeast of the Stadium, in which the chariot-races took place. At the place which formed the connection between the Stadium and Hippodromus, the Hellenodice, or judges of the Olympic games, had their seats. For details, vid. Dict. of Antiq., arts. HIPODROMUS and STADIUM. The Olympic games were celebrated from the earliest times in Greece, and their establishment was assigned to various mythical personages. There was an interval of four years between each celebration of the festival, which interval was called an Olympiad; but the Olympiads were not employed as a chronological era till the victory of Coræbus in the foot-race, B.C. 776. An account of the Olympic games and of the Olympiads is given in the Dict. of Antiq., arts. OLYMPIA and OLYMPIAS.

OLYMPIAS (Ólumpyias). 1. Wife of Philip II., king of Macedonia, and mother of Alexander the Great, was the daughter of Neoptolemus I., king of Epirus. She was married to Philip B.C. 359. The numerous amours of Philip, and the passionate and jealous character of Olympias, occasioned frequent disputes between them; and when Philip married Cleopatra, the niece of Attalus (337), Olympias withdrew from Macedonia, and took refuge at the court of her brother Alexander, king of Epirus. It was generally believed that she lent her support to the assassination of Philip 336; but it is hardly credible that she evinced her approbation of that deed in the open manner asserted by some writers. After the death of Philip she returned to Macedonia, where she enjoyed great influence through the affection of Alexander. On the death of the latter (323) she withdrew from Macedonia, where her enemy Antipater had the undisputed control of affairs, and took refuge in Epirus. Here she continued to live, as it were, in exile, until the death of Antipater (J. 9) presented a new opening to her ambition. She gave her support to the new regent Polyperchon, in opposition to Cassander, who had formed an alliance with Eurydice the wife of Philip Arrhidaeus, the nominal king of Macedonia. In 317, Olympias, resolving to obtain the supreme power in Macedonia, invaded that country along with Polyperchon, defeated Eurydice in battle, and put both her and her husband to death. Olympias followed up her vengeance by the execution of Nicanor, the brother of Cassander, as well as of one hundred of his leading partisans among the Macedonian nobles. Cassander, who was at that time in the Peloponnesus, hastened to turn his arms against Macedonia. Olympias, on his approach, threw herself (together with Roxana and the young Alexander) into Pydna, where she was closely blockaded by Cassander throughout the winter. At length, in the spring of 316, she was compelled to surrender to Cassander, who caused her to be put to death. Olympias was not without something of the grandeur and loftiness of spirit which distinguished her son, but her ungovernable passions led her to acts of sanguinary cruelty that must forever disgrace her name. —[2. Daughter of Pyrrhus I., king of Epirus, and wife of her brother Alexander II. After his death she assumed the regency of the kingdom on behalf of her two sons, Pyrrhus and Ptolemy; and, in order to strengthen herself against the Ætolians, gave her daughter Phthia in marriage to Demetrius II., king of Macedonia. When her sons had attained to manhood, she resigned the sovereignty into the hands of Pyrrhus, but he did not long retain it; for both he and his brother Ptolemy were soon removed by death, and Olympias was so deeply affected by this double loss that she soon after died of grief.]

OLYMPIODORUS (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. A native of Thebes in Egypt, who lived in the fifth century after Christ. He wrote a work in twenty-two books (entitled Ἱστορικοὶ λόγοι), which comprised the history of the Western empire under the reign of Honorius, from A.D. 407 to October, A.D. 425. Olympiodorus took up the history from about the point at which Eunapius had ended. Vid. EUNAPIUS. The original work of Olympiodorus is lost, but an abridgment of it has been preserved by Photius. After the death of Honorius, Olympiodorus removed to Byzantium, to the court of the Emperor Theodosius. Hierocles dedicated to this Olympiodorus his work on Providence and Fate. Vid. HIEROCLES. Olympiodorus was a heathen. [The fragments of his history are published in the Byzantine Historians, with Dexippus, &c., by Niebuhr, Bonn, 1829.] —2. A peripatetic philosopher, who taught at Alexandria, where Proclus was one of his pupils. —3. The last philosopher of celebrity in the Neo-Platonic school of Alexandria. He lived in the first half of the sixth century after Christ, in the reign of the Emperor Justinian. His life of Plato, and commentaries on several of Plato's dialogues, are still extant.

[Edited by Fr. Creuzer, Frankfurt, 1821-23.] —4. An Aristotelic philosopher, the author of a commentary on the Meteorologica of Aristotle, which is still extant, lived at Alexandria in the latter half of the sixth century after Christ. Like Simplicius, to whom, however, he is inferior, he endeavors to reconcile Plato and Aristotle.

OLYMPIODORUS (Ὀλυμπιόδωρος). 1. An Athenian general, commanded a body of three hundred picked men at the battle of Platæa, who were engaged in a service from which all the other Greeks shrank —2. An Athenian general, who, when Athens was attacked by Cassander, compelled the latter to withdraw his forces. He also subsequently rid the city of the Macedonian garrison which Demetrius had stationed there, and successfully defended Athens against Demetrius himself.]

OLYMPUS (Ὀλύμπιος), the Olympian, occurs as a surname of Jupiter (Zeus). Hercules, the Muses (Olympiades), and, in general, of all the gods who were believed to live in Olympus, a contradistinction from the gods of the lower world.

OLYMPUS NEMESIANS. Vid. NEMESIANS. OLYMPUS (Ὀλύμπιος), the name of two Greek musicians, of whom one is mythical and the other historical. 1. The elder Olympus belonged to the mythical genealogy of Mysian and Phrygian flute-players—Hyagnis, Marsyas, Olympus—to each of whom the invention of the flute was ascribed, under whose names we have the mythical representation of the contest between the Phrygian auletic and the Greek cithared music. Olympus was said to have been a native of Mysia, and to have lived before the Trojan war. Olympus not unfrequently appears on works of art as a boy, sometimes instructed by Marsyas, and sometimes as witnessing and lamenting his fate. —2. The true Olympus was a Phrygian, and perhaps belonged to a family of native musicians, since he was said to be descended from the first Olympus. He flourished about B.C. 660–620. Though a Phrygian in origin, Olympus must be reckoned among the Greek musicians, for all the accounts make Greece the scene of his artistic activity; and he may be considered as having naturalized in Greece the music of the flute, which had previously been almost peculiar to Phrygia.

[OLYMPUS (Ὀλύμπιος), the physician in ordinary to Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, aided her in committing suicide, B.C. 30, and afterward published an account of her death.]

OLYMPUS (Ὀλύμπιος). 1. In Europe. 1. (Olympus, Turk. Semavat-Evi, i. e., Abode of Celestials). The eastern part of the great chain of mountains which extends west and east from the Acrocerasian promontory on the Adriatic to the Theraic Gulf, and which formed the northern boundary of ancient Greece proper. In a wide sense, the name is sometimes applied to all that part of this great chain which is east of the central range of Pindus, and which is usually called the Cambanian Mountains, but the more specific and ordinary use of the name Olympus is to denote the extreme eastern part of the chain, which, striking off from the Cambanian Mountains to the southeast, skirts the southern end of the Asian coast.

and forms at its termination the north-wall of the Vale of Tempe. Its shape is of a blunt cone, with its outline pictorially broken by minor summits; its height not nine thousand seven hundred feet, and chief summit is covered with perpetual snow. In its position as the boundary between Thessaly and Macedonia, it is sometimes reckoned to the former, sometimes to the latter. In Greek mythology, Olympus was the chief of the third dynasty of gods, of which (Jupiter) was the head. It was a really conception with the early poets, to be understood literally, and not metaphorically, that the gods and, if Homer uses either of the terms Ὄλυμπος and οὐρανός metaphorically, it is the latter that is a metaphor for the former. Even if the idea of the giants scaling heaven must be understood in this sense; not that they placed Olympus and Ossa upon the top of Olympus to the still higher heaven, but that they piled Olympus on the top of Ossa, and both on the lower summit of Olympus, to scale the summit of Olympus itself, the abode of the gods. Homer describes the gods as having their several palaces on the summit of Olympus; as spending their time in the palace of Zeus (Jupiter), round which they sit in solemn conclave, while the other gods dance before them, and the Muses entertain them with the lyre and song. They look out from the view of men upon the earth, all of clouds, the gates of which are kept by the Hours. The same conceptions are found in Homer, and to a great extent in the later poets.

"On the snowy top
Of old Olympus ruled the middle of-

With whom, however, even as early as the Greek poets and the tragedians, the idea of Olympus as a material, and the real abode of the gods, gradually transferred from the summit of Olympus to the vault of heaven (i. e., the sky). This latter is also the conception of the Roman poets, so far, at least, as any definition can be framed out of their compound and poetical language with later notions.—2. A mountain in Laconia, near Sellasia, overhanging the Gulf of Enus.—3. Another name for Mount Lycabettus in Arcadia.—II. In Asia.

1. The Μύσιος Ὄλυμπος (now Keshik Ala Dagh, Isik Dagh, and Kush Dagh), a range of lofty mountains in the northwest of Asia Minor, forming, with Ida, the western part of the northernmost line of the mountain system of the peninsula. It extends from west to east, rough the northeast of Mysia and the north of Bithynia, and thence, inclining a little to the southward, it first passes through the central part of Bithynia, then forms the boundary between Bithynia and Galatia, and then extends to the south of Paphlagonia to the River Rhyndacus.

Beyond the Halys, the mountains in the north of Pontus form a continuation of the range.—2. (Now Yanar Dagh), a volcano on the coast of Lycia, above the city of Phaselis (now Yanar). The names of the mountains of the city are often interchanged. Vid. supra.

3. Ὀλύνθος (now Aio), a town of Macedonia in Chalcidice, at the head of the Toronaic Gulf, and at a distance from the coast, between the peninsula of Pallene and Sithonia. It was the most important of the Greek cities on the coast of Macedonia, though we have no record of its foundation. It afterward fell into the hands of the Thracian Bottiaei, when they were expelled from their own country by the Macedonians. Vid. supra.

It was taken by Artabazus, one of the generals of Xerxes, who peopled it with Chalcidians from Torone; but it owed its greatness to Perdiccas, who persuaded the inhabitants of many of the smaller towns in Chalcidice to abandon their own abodes and settle in Olynthus. This happened about the commencement of the Peloponnesian war; and from this time Olynthus appears as a prosperous and flourishing town, with a population of five thousand inhabitants capable of bearing arms. It became the head of a confederacy of all the Greek towns in this part of Macedonia, and long maintained its independence against the attacks of the Athenians, Spartans, and Macedonians; but in B.C. 379 it was compelled to submit to Sparta, after carrying on war with this state for four years. When the supremacy of Sparta was destroyed by the Thebans, Olynthus recovered its independence, and even received an accession of power from Philip, who was anxious to make Olynthus a counterpoise to the influence of Athens in the north of the Aegean. With this view Philip gave Olynthus the territory of Potidea, after he had wrested this town from the Athenians in 336. But when he had sufficiently consolidated his power to be able to set at defiance both Olynthus and Athens, he threw off the mask, and laid siege to the former city. The Olynthians earnestly besought Athens for assistance, and were warmly supported by Demosthenes in his Olynthian orations; but as the Athenians did not render the city any effectual assistance, it was taken and destroyed by Philip, and all its inhabitants sold as slaves (347). Olynthus was never restored, and the remnants of its inhabitants were at a later time transferred by Cassander to Cassandrea. At the time of its prosperity, Olynthus used the neighboring town of Mesembria as its sea-port.

[OLYNTHUS (Ὀλύνθος), a son of Hercules and Boibe, from whom the town of Olynthus was believed to have received its name.]

OMANA or OMANUM (Omāna, Omāvan). 1. A celebrated port on the northeastern coast of Arabia Felix, a little above the easternmost point of the peninsula, Promontorium Syagros (now Ras el Had), on a large gulf of the same name. The people of this part of Arabia were called OMANITES (Omānitai) or OMANI, and the name is still preserved in that of the district, Oman.—2. (Now probably Schairs), a sea-port town in the east of Carmania; the chief emporium on that coast for the trade between India, Persia, and Arabia.

OMANITES and OMANUM. Vid. OMANA.

OMBI (Ὀμβί: Ὀμβίται; ruins at Koum Ombo, i. e., Hill of Ombo), the last great city of Upper Egypt, except Syene, from which it was distant about thirty miles, stood on the eastern bank of the Nile, in the Ombite Nomos, and was celebrated as one of the chief seats of the worship of the crocodile. Juvenal's fifteenth satire is founded on a religious war between the people of Ombi and those of Tentyra, who hated the crocodile; but as Tentyra lies so much further down the Nile, with several intervening cities celebrated, as well as Ombi, for crocodile worship, critics have suspected an error in the names, and some have proposed to read Coptos or Copton for Ombos in v. 85. It seems, however, better to suppose that Juvenal used the name without reference to topographical precision. Opposite to Ombi, on the left bank, was the town of Contra-Ombos.

OMPHALE ('Ομφάλη), daughter of the Lydian king Iardanus, and wife of Tmolus, after whose death she undertook the government herself. When Hercules, in consequence of the murder of Iphitus, was afflicted with a serious disease, and was informed by the oracle that he could only be cured by serving some one for wages for the space of three years, Mercury (Hermes) sold Hercules to Omphale. The hero became enamored of his mistress, and, to please her, he is said to have spun wool and put on the garments of a woman, while Omphale wore his lion's skin. She bore Hercules several children.

[OMPHALION ('Ομφάλιον), a painter, was originally the slave, and afterward the disciple of Nicias, the son of Nicomedes. He painted the walls of the temple of Messene with figures of personages celebrated in the mythological legends of Messenia.]

OMPHALION ('Ομφάλιον: 'Ομφάλιτης), a town in Crete, in the neighborhood of Cnossus.

[ONĪRIS ('Ονῆρις), a priest of Bacchus (Dionysus) in Naxos, whom, according to one account, Ariadne married after she had been abandoned by Theseus.]

ONĪTAS ('Ονῆτας). 1. Of Ægina, the son of Micon, was a distinguished statuary and painter, contemporary with Polygnotus, Ageladas, and Hegias. He flourished down to about B.C. 460, that is, in the age immediately preceding that of Phidias.—[2. A Pythagorean philosopher of Croton, who wrote a work, Περὶ θεοῦ καὶ θεῶν, some extracts from which are preserved by Stobæus.]

ONCÆ ('Ογκæ), a village in Bœotia, near Thebes, from which one of the gates of Thebes derived its name ('Ογκæαι), and which contained a sanctuary of Minerva (Athena), who was hence called Minerva (Athena) Onca.

[ONCÆUM ('Ογκæιον), a place in Arcadia, on the banks of the Ladon, with a temple of Ceres (Demeter) Erinnyas, said to have derived its name from Oncus, son of Apollo, its founder.]

ONCHESMUS or ONCHISMUS ('Ογχησμος, 'Ογχισμος: now Orchido), a sea-port town of Epirus in Chaonia, opposite the western extremity of Corcyra. The ancients derived its name from Anchises, whence it is named by Dionysius the "Harbor of Anchises" ('Αγκίσσιον λιμὴν). From this place Cicero calls the wind blowing from Epirus toward Italy Onchesmitæ.

ONCHESTUS ('Ογχηστός: 'Ογχῆστιος). 1. An ancient town of Bœotia, said to have been founded by Onchestus, son of Neptune (Poseidon), was situated a little south of the Lake Copais, near Haliartus. It contained a celebrated temple and grove of Neptune (Poseidon), and was the place of meeting of the Bœotian Amphictyony. The ruins of this town are still to be seen on the southwestern slope of the mountain Faga.—2. A river in Thessaly, which rises in the neighborhood of Eretria, and flows by Cynoscephalæ, and falls into the Lake Boebæ. It is, perhaps, the same as the River Onochimus ('Ονόχωνος) mentioned by Herodotus.

ONESICRITUS ('Ονησίκριτος), a Greek historical writer, who accompanied Alexander on his campaigns in Asia, and wrote a history of them, which is frequently cited by later authors. He is called by some authorities a native of Asopæia, and by others of Ægina. When Alexander constructed his fleet on the Hydaspes, he appointed Onesicritus chief pilot of the fleet, a post which he held not only during the descent of the Indus, but throughout the voyage from the mouth of that river to the Persian Gulf, which was conducted under the command of Nearchus. Though an eye-witness of much that he described, it appears that he intermixed many fables and falsehoods with his narrative, so that he early fell into discredit as an authority.

[ONETOR ('Ονήτωρ). 1. Priest of the Idæan Jove in Troy.—2. Father of Phrontis, the helmsman of Menelaus.]

ONINOIS or ORINOIS. Vid. ORINOIS.

ONĪROS ('Ονῆρος), the Dream-God, was a personification of dreams. According to Homer Dreams dwell on the dark shores of the vast æther Oceanus, and the deceitful dreams can through an ivory gate, while the true ones pass from a gate made of horn. Hesiod calls dreams the children of night; and Ovid, who calls them children of Sleep, mentions three of them by name, viz., Morpheus, Icelus or Phobetus, and Phantasus. Euripides called them sons of Gaia (Terra), and conceived them as genii with black wings.

ONDIA, surnamed Ἰεστρία (now Hadria). 1. A sea-port town of the Turdetani in Hispania Bætica, between the mouths of the Baetis and Anas, on an estuary formed by the Rhæluxia. There are remains of a Roman aqueduct at Huelva.—[2. Another city of Bætica, the interior, near Corduba.]

[ONOMACLES ('Ονομακλής), an Athenian general, sent with Phrynichus and Scironides, B.C. 412, to besiege Miletus, but was driven off by the arrival of a Peloponnesian fleet: he was afterward sent to act against Chios. It is probably this same Onomacles who was one of the thirty tyrants, B.C. 404.]

ONOMACRITUS ('Ονομακρίτης), an Athenian poet, who occupies an interesting position in the history of the early Greek religious poetry. He lived about B.C. 520–485. He enjoyed the patronage of Hipparchus until he was detected by Lasus of Hermione (the dithyrambic poet) in making an interpolation in an oracle of Menestheus for which Hipparchus banished him. He is said to have gone into Persia, where the Persians, after their expulsion from Athens, took him again into favor, and employed him to persuade Xerxes to engage in his expedition against Greece, by reciting to him all the ancient ev-les which seemed to favor the attempt. It seems that Onomacritus had made a collection or arrangement of the oracles ascribed to Musaeus. It is further stated that he made interpolations in Homer as well as in Musaeus, and that he was the real author of some of the poems which went under the name of Orpheus. ONOMARCHUS ('Ονόμαρχος), general of the Achaean army in the Sacred war, succeeded his brother Philomelus in this command, B.C. 368. the following year he was defeated in Thessaly by Philip, and perished in attempting to escape by swimming the Athenian ships, which were lying off the shore. His body fell into the hands of Philip, who caused it to be crucified in punishment for his sacrilege.

ΟΝΟΜΑΣΤΗΣ ('Ονόμαστος), a confidential officer of Philip V. of Macedonia, for whom he held government of the sea-coast of Thrace, and by whose instrument he was in many acts of oppression and cruelty.]

ΟΝΟΜΟΚΡΑΤΗΣ ('Ονόμοκράτης), the author of a celebrated work on military tactics (entitled Στρατικός λόγος), which is still extant. All subsequent Greek and Roman writers on the same subject made this work their text-book, and it still held in considerable estimation. He is said to have lived about A.D. 50. In his work he imitated Xenophon with some success. Edited by Schweigel, Nürnberg, 1761; and by G. Paris, 1822.

ΟΝΟΜΑΤΙΝΟΣ ('Ονοματινός; now Elaphonisi), a small island and a promontory on the southern coast of Laconia, west of Cape Malea.

ΟΝΟΥΣ ('Ονούς), the capital of the Nomos of the Delta of Egypt. Its site is unknown, but it was probably near the middle of the Delta.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ, a companion of Aeneas, slain by Turnus in Italy.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης). 1. A Trojan warrior slain by Teucer.—2. A Pæonian warrior slain by Trojan ranks, slain by Achilles.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης), an Athenian comic poet, contemporary of the Middle Comedy, B.C. 380. [The fragments of his plays remaining are collected by Memekes, Fragm. Comic. Græc., vol. 687-8. edit. minor.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης), of Pella in Macedonia, one of the generals of Alexander the Great, whose death he followed the fortunes of. In B.C. 323 he conquered Cyrene, and was appointed governor of the city, of which city he held the government on behalf of the Egyptian king for some time.

But soon after 313 he threw off his allegiance to Ptolemy, and continued to govern as an independent state for nearly five years.

In 308 he formed an alliance with Agathocles and marched against Carthage; but he was eachersely attacked by Agathocles near Syracuse, and was slain.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης). 1. Also called Archæus. Vid. Archæus.—2. One of the Tyrrhenian pirates, who attempted to carry off Dionysus, and were therefore metamorphosed into dolphins.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης). 1. A Trojan warrior slain by Euryalus.—2. A Grecian warrior slain by Hector.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης), an island of the Arabian Sea, lying off Berenice, on the coast of Egypt, very rich in topaz, and therefore called by Pliny Topazæ; now Zamargat.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης). 1. One of the oldest of the Titans, was married to Euryome, with whom he ruled over Olympus, but, being conquered by Saturn (Cronos) and Rhea, he and Euryome were thrown into Oceanus or Tartarus.—2. A giant, who perished in the battle with Jupiter (Zeus).—3. Father of the centaur Amycus, who is hence called Opionides.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης), a people in the northeast of Etolia.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ (in the Old Testament, LXX., Σουφίρ, Σουφίρ, Σουφάρα), a place frequently referred to in the Old Testament as proverbial for its gold and to which Solomon, in conjunction with Hiram, king of Tyre, sent a fleet, which brought back gold, and sandal-wood, and precious stones. These ships were sent from Ezion-geber, at the head of the Red Sea, whence also King Jehoshaphat built ships to go to Ophir for gold; but this voyage was stopped by a shipwreck. It is clear, therefore, that Ophir was on the shores of the Erythraean Mare of the ancients, or our Indian Ocean. Among the most plausible conjectures as to its site are, (1.) That it was on the coast of India, or a name for India itself. (2.) That it was on the coast of Arabia, in which case it is not necessary to suppose that Arabia furnished all the articles of commerce which were brought from Ophir, for Ophir may have been a great emporium of the Indian and Arabian trade. (3.) That it is not the name of any specific place, but a general designation for the countries (or any of them) on the shores of the Indian Ocean, which supplied the chief articles of Indian and Arabian commerce.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης). 1. A river in Arcadia, which flowed by Mantinea.—[2. (Now Of?), a river of Pontus, which formed the boundary between the territory of the Tzani and Colchis.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης), a town of European Scythia, on the left bank of the Tyras (now Dniester).—3. A little island near Crete.—4. (Now Afsia or Rabbi), a small island in the Propontis (now Sea of Marmara), off the coast of Mysia, northwest of Cyzicus, and southwest of Proconnesus.—5. Vid. Rhodus.—6. Vid. Tzani.

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης): now Kemer Dag or Oktar Dag, a branch of Mount Paryadres, in Pontus Proper, which, in connection with Lithrus, northwest of Amasea, bounds the large and fertile district of Phanæcia.]

ΟΠΙΣΤΗΣ ('Οπείσσης): now probably Frenkevi, a small town of the Troad, near the Lake of Ptolema, between Dardanus and Rhætum, with a grove consecrated to Hector.

ΟΠΙΛΙΟΣ, AURELIUS, the freedman of an Epicurean, taught at Rome, first philosophy, then rhetoric, and finally grammar. He gave up his school upon the condemnation of Rutilius Rufus (B.C. 92), whom he accompanied to Smyrna, and there the two friends grew old together in the enjoyment of each other's society. He composed several learned works, one of which, named Musa, is referred to by A. Gellius.

Opimus. 1. Q., consul B.C. 154, when he subdued some of the Ligurian tribes north of the Alps, who had attacked Massilia. He was notorious in his youth for his riotous living.—2. L., son of the preceding, was prætor 125, in which year he took Fregellæ, which had revolted against the Romans. He belonged to the high aristocratical party, and was a violent opponent of C. Gracchus. He was consul in 121, and took the leading part in the proceedings which ended in the murder of Gracchus. Opimius and his party abused their victory most savagely, and are said to have killed more than three hundred persons. For details, vid. p. 334, a. In the following year (120) he was accused of having put Roman citizens to death without trial; but he was defended by the consul C. Papirius Carbo, and was acquitted. In 112 he was at the head of the commission which was sent into Africa in order to divide the dominions of Micipsa between Jugurtha and Adherbal, and was bribed by Jugurtha to assign to him the better part of the country. Three years after he was condemned under the law of the tribune C. Mamilius Limetanus, by which an inquiry was made into the conduct of all those who had received bribes from Jugurtha. Opimius went into exile to Dyrrhachium in Epirus, where he lived for some years, hated and insulted by the people, and where he eventually died in great poverty. He richly deserved his punishment, and met with a due recompense for his cruel and ferocious conduct toward C. Gracchus and his party. Cicero, on the contrary, who, after his consulship, had identified himself with the aristocratical party, frequently laments the fate of Opimius. The year in which Opimius was consul (121) was remarkable for the extraordinary heat of the autumn, and thus the vintage of this year was of an unprecedented quality. This wine long remained celebrated as the Vinum Opimianum, and was preserved for an almost incredible space of time.

Ois (Ὠς), an important commercial city of Assyria, in the district of Apolloniatis, at the confluence of the Phycus (now Odornak) with the Tigris; not mentioned later than the Christian era.

Opitergium (Opiterginus: now Oderzo), a Roman colony in Venetia, in the north of Italy, on the River Liguentia, near its source, and on the high road from Aquileia to Verona. In the Marcomannic war it was destroyed by the Quadi, but it was rebuilt, and afterward belonged to the Exarchate. From it the neighboring mountains were called Montes Opitergini.

[Opitres (Ὠπίτρεις), a Greek warrior, slain by Hector in the Trojan war.]

[Opimicus, name of three persons, two of whom play a prominent part in the oration of Cicero for Cluentius. 1. STATIUS ALBIUS OPP., accused by his step-son, A. Cluentius, of having attempted to procure his death by poisoning, B.C. 74; was condemned.—2. Son of the preceding, accused Cluentius in B.C. 66 of three distinct acts of poisoning.—3. C. OPPIANICUS, brother of No. 1, said to have been poisoned by him.]

Oppianus (Ὀππιανός), the author of two Greek hexameter poems still extant, one on fishing, entitled Halieutica (Ἀλιευτικά), and the other on hunting, entitled Cynegetica (Κυνηγετικά). Modern critics, however, have shown that these two poems were written by two different persons of this name. 1. The author of the Halieutica, was born either at Conyca or Anazarba, in Cilicia, and flourished about A.D. 180. The poem consists of about three thousand five hundred hexameter lines, divided into five books, of which the first two treat of the natural history of fishes, and the other three of the art of fishing.—2. The author of the Cynegetica, was a native of Apamea or Pella, in Syria, and flourished a little later than the other Oppianus, about A.D. 206. His poem, which is addressed to the Emperor Caracalla, consists of about two thousand one hundred hexameter lines, divided into four books. The best edition of the two poems is by Schneider, Argent., 1776, and second edition, Lips., 1813. There is also a prose paraphrase of a poem on hawking (Ἱπποτικά) attributed to Oppianus, but it is doubtful to which of the two authors of this name it belongs. Some critics think that the work was probably written by Dionysius.

Oppius. 1. C., tribune of the plebs B.C. 211, carried a law to curtail the expenses and luxuries of the Roman women. It enacted that a woman should have more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of different colors, nor ride in a carriage in the city, or in any town or within a mile of it, unless on account of public sacrifices. This law was repealed in 196 notwithstanding the vehement opposition of the elder Cato.—2. Q., a Roman general in the Macedonic war, B.C. 88, fell into the hands of Mithradates, but was subsequently surrendered by the latter to Sulla.—3. C., an intimate friend of C. Julius Cæsar, whose private affairs he managed in conjunction with Cornelius Balbus. Oppius was the author of several works, referred to by the ancient writers, but all of which have perished. The authorship of the histories of the Alexandrine, African, and Spanish wars was a disputed point as early as the time of Suetonius, some assigning them to Oppius, and others to Hirtius. But the similarity in style and diction between the work on the Alexandrine war and the last book of the Commentaries on the Gallic war leads to the conclusion that the former, at all events, was the work of Hirtius. The book on the African war was probably written by Oppius. He also wrote the lives of several distinguished Romans, such as Scipio Africanus the elder, Marius, Pompey and probably Cæsar.

Ope, a female Roman divinity of plenty and fertility, as is indicated by her name, which is connected with opimus, opulentus, inops, copia. She was regarded as the wife of Saturnus, and the protectress of every thing connected with agriculture. Her abode was in earth, and hence those who invoked her need not touch the ground. Her worship was intimately connected with that of her husband Saturnus for she had both temples and festivals in common with him; but she had likewise a separate sanctuary on the Capitol, and in the vicus Targius, not far from the temple of Saturnus, and had an altar in common with Ceres. The festivals of Ope are called Opelia and Opiconia from her surname Concina, connected with the verb serere, to sow.

OPRITUS. [1. A freedman of Tiberius Claudius, and præfectus classis, brought the scar (scarus) fish from the Carpathian Sea to the waters on the coast of Italy.]—2. Bishop of Milevi in Numidia, flourished under the emperors Valentinian and Valens. He wrote a work, still extant, against the errors of the Donatists, entitled De Schismate Donatistarum aduersus Parmenium. Edited by Dupin, Paris, fol., 1700.

OPRA (Ὀπρά, contraction of Ὀπείρα: Opieria). 1. (Now Talanda or Talanis?), the capital of the Opuntian Locrians, was situated, according to Strabo, fifteen stadia (not quite two miles) from the sea, and sixty stadia from its harbor Cynos; but, according to Livy, it was only one mile from the coast. It was the birthplace of Patroclus. The bay of the Eubæan Sea, earthen town, was called Opuntius Sinus. Vid. supra.—2. A small town in Elis.

[OPRA (Ὀπρός). 1. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Progenia, was king of the Epeans and father of Cambyse.—2. Son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Amphyse, step-son of Locrus, and grandson of Pro; said to have given name to the Opuntii (Oprii).]

OPRA. 1. (Ὀπα), a city of Carmania, near the borders of Gedrosia.—2. (Ὀπα), a city in the northwest of India, near the sources of the Indus.

OPRA. Vid. ORITÆ.

OPILLUS (Ὀπύλλος), a mountain in the northwest of Macedonia, on the borders of Thrace, extends from Mount Rhodope along the Strymon to Mount Pangæus.

OPILLUS POPILLUS, a Roman grammarian and schoolmaster, best known to us from his having been the teacher of Horace, who gives him the epithet of plagius from the severe castigations which his pupils received from him. (Hor., Ep., l., 1, 71.) He was a native of Beneventum, and after serving as an apparitor of the magistrates, and also as a soldier in the army, he settled at Rome in the fiftieth year of his age, in the consulship of Cicero, B.C. 63. He lived nearly one hundred years, but had lost his memory long before his death.

[OPRITANUM, a city of Samnium, northwest of Beneventum.]

OPRONA, a female Roman divinity, was invoked by parents who had been deprived of their children and desired to have others, and also in dangerous maladies of children.

OPRIONIA (Ὀπρίων) (now Orkney and Shetland Isles), a group of several small islands off the northern coast of Britain, with which the Romans first became acquainted when Agricola sailed round the north of Britain.

OPRIONIA (Ὀπρίων: Opriōn). 1. Now Scirpus, an ancient, wealthy, and powerful city of Boeotia, the capital of the Minyean empire in the ante-historical ages of Greece, and hence called by Homer the Minyean Orchomenus (Ὀρχ. Μινυεῖος). It was situated northwest of the Lake Copais, on the River Cephissus, and was built on the slope of a hill, on the summit of which stood the acropolis. It is said to have been originally called Andreis (Ἀνδρείς), from Andreus, the son of Peneus, who emigrated from the Peneus in Thessaly; to have been afterward called Phlegya (Φλεγία), from Phlegyas, a son of Mars (Ares) and Chryse, and to have finally obtained its later name from Orchomenus, son of Jupiter (Zeus) or Eteoclea and the Danaid Hesione, and father of Minyas. This Orchomenus was regarded as the real founder of the Minyean empire, which, before the time of the Trojan war, extended over the whole of the west of Boeotia. The cities of Coronea, Haliartus, Lebedea, and Chæronea were subject to it; and even Thebes at one time was compelled to pay it tribute. It lost, however, much of its power after its capture by Hercules, but in the time of the Trojan war it still appears as a powerful city. Sixty years after the Trojan war it was taken by the Boeotians, its empire was completely destroyed, and it became a member of the Boeotian league. All this belongs to the mythical period. In the historical age it continued to exist as an independent town till B.C. 367, when it was taken and destroyed by the Thebans, and its inhabitants murdered or sold as slaves. In order to weaken Thebes, it was rebuilt at the instigation of the Athenians, but was soon destroyed again by the Thebans; and although it was again restored by Philip in 338, it never recovered its former prosperity; and in the time of Strabo was in ruins. The most celebrated building in Orchomenus was the so-called treasury of Minyas, but which, like the similar monument at Mycenæ, was more probably a family vault of the ancient heroes of the place. It was a circular vault of massive masonry embedded in the hill, with an arched roof, and had a side door of entrance. The remains of this building are extant, and its form may still be traced, though the whole of the stone-work of the vault has disappeared. Orchomenus possessed a very ancient temple of the Charites or Graces, and here was celebrated in the most ancient times a musical festival, which was frequented by poets and singers from all parts of the Hellenic world. There was a temple of Hercules seven stadia north of the town, near the sources of the River Melas. Orchomenus is memorable on account of the great victory which Sulla gained in its neighborhood over Archelaus, the general of Mithradates, B.C. 80.—2. (Now Kalpak), an ancient town of Arcadia, mentioned by Homer with the epithet πολύμηλος, to distinguish it from the Minyean Orchomenus, is said to have been founded by Orchomenus son of Lycaon. It was situated on a hill northwest of Mantinea, and its territory included the towns of Methydrium, Theisao, Teuthis, and the Tripolis. In the Peloponnesian war Orchomenus sided with Sparta, and was taken by the Athenians. After the battle of Leuctra, the Orchomenians did not join the Arcadian confederacy in consequence of its hatred against Mantinea. In the contests between the Achæans and Ætolians, it was taken successively by Cleomenes and Antigonus Doson, but it eventually became a member of the Achæan league.—3. A town on the confines of Macedonia and Thessaly, and hence sometimes said to belong to the former, and sometimes to the latter country.

ΟΡΕΣΤΑΙ ('Ορέσται), a people in the north of Epirus, on the borders of Macedonia, inhabiting the district named after them, ΟΡΕΣΤΙΣ or ΟΡΕΣΤΙΑΣ. They were originally independent, but were afterward subject to the Macedonian monarchs. They were declared free by the Romans in their war with Philip. According to the legend, they derived their name from Orestes, who is said to have fled into this country after murdering his mother, and to have there founded the town of Argos Oresticum.

ΟΡΕΣΤΕΣ ('Ορέστες). 1. Son of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and brother of Chrysothemis, Laodice (Electra), and Iphianassa (Iphigenia). According to the Homeric account, Agamemnon, on his return from Troy, was murdered by Ægisthus and Clytemnestra before he had an opportunity of seeing him. In the eighth year after his father's murder Orestes came from Athens to Mycenae and slew the murderer of his father. This simple story of Orestes has been enlarged and embellished in various ways by the tragic poets. Thus it is said that at the murder of Agamemnon it was intended to dispatch Orestes also, but that by means of Electra he was secretly carried to Strophilus, king in Phocia, who was married to Anaxibia, the sister of Agamemnon. According to some, Orestes was saved by his nurse, who allowed Ægisthus to kill her own child, supposing it to be Orestes. In the house of Strophilus, Orestes grew up with the king's son Pylades, with whom he had formed that close and intimate friendship which has become proverbial. Being frequently reminded by messengers from Electra of the necessity of avenging his father's death, he consulted the oracle of Delphi, which strengthened him in his plan. He therefore repaired in secret to Argos. Here he pretended to be a messenger of Strophilus, who had come to announce the death of Orestes, and brought the ashes of the deceased. After visiting his father's tomb, and sacrificing upon it a lock of his hair, he made himself known to his sister Electra, and soon afterward slew both Ægisthus and Clytemnestra in the palace. Immediately after the murder of his mother he was seized with madness. He now fled from land to land, pursued by the Erinyes of his mother. At length, by Apollo's advice, he took refuge with Minerva (Athena) at Athens. The goddess afforded him protection, and appointed the court of the Areopagus to decide his fate. The Erinyes brought forward their accusation, and Orestes made the command of the Delphic oracle his excuse. When the court voted, and was equally divided, Orestes was acquitted by the command of Minerva (Athena). According to another modification of the legend, Orestes consulted Apollo how he could be delivered from his madness and incessant wandering. The god advised him to go to Tauris in Scythia, and to fetch from that country the image of Diana (Artemis), which was believed to have fallen there from heaven, and to carry it to Athens. Orestes and Pylades accordingly went to Tauris, where Thoas was king. On their arrival they were seized by the natives in order to be sacrificed to Diana (Artemis), according to the custom of the country. But Iphigenia, the priestess of Diana (Artemis), was the sister of Orestes, and, after recognizing each other, all three escaped with the statue of the goddess. After his return to Peloponnesus, Orestes lost possession of his father's kingdom at Mycenae, which had been usurped by Aletes or Menelaus. When Cylarabes of Argos died without leaving any heir, Orestes became king of Argos. The Lacedæmonians likewise made him their king of their own accord, because they preserved him, the grandson of Tyndareus, to Neostratus and Megapenthes, the sons of Menelaus by a slave. The Arcadians and Phocians increased his power by allying themselves with him. He married Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus, and became by her the father of Telemachus. The story of his marriage with Hermione, who had previously been married to Neoptolemus, is related elsewhere. Vid. ΗΕΡΜΙΟΝ, ΝΕΟΠΤΟΛΕΜΟΣ. He died of the bite of a snake in Arcadia, and his body, in accordance with an oracle, was afterward carried from Tegea to Sparta, and there buried; his bones are said to have been found, during a truce in the war between the Lacedæmonians and Tegeans, under a blacksmith's shop in Tegea. — 2. King of Italy during the short reign of his son Romulus Augustulus, A.D. 475–476. He was born in Pannonia, and served for many years under Attila; after whose death he rose to eminence at the Roman court. Having been intrusted with the command of an army by Julius Nepos, he deposed this emperor, and placed his son Romulus Augustulus on the throne, but in the following year he was defeated by Odoacer and put to death. Vid. ΟΔΟΑΚΡΟΣ. — 3. L. AURELIUS ORESTES, consul B.C. 136, received Sardinia as his province, where he remained upward of three years. C. Gracchus was quaestor to Orestes in Sardinia. — 4. Cn. AULIUS ORESTES, originally belonged to the Auligenae, whence his surname of Orestes, and was adopted by Cn. Aufidius, the historian, who the latter was an old man. Orestes was consul 71 B.C.

ΟΡΕΣΤΕΙΟΝ, ΟΡΕΣΤΗΝΕΟΝ, or ΟΡΕΣΤΗΑΔΕΙΟΝ (Ὀρεστειον, Ὀρεσθηνιον, Ὀρεσθηαδειον), a town in south of Arcadia, in the district Μομφαλιν, far from Megalopolis.

ΟΡΕΣΤΙΑΣ. 1. The country of the Orestians. Vid. ΟΡΕΣΤΑΙ. — 2. A name frequently given by the Byzantine writers to Hadrianopolis in Thracæ.

ΟΡΕΣΤΙΛΛΑ, ΑΥΡΕΛΙΑ. Vid. ΑΥΡΕΛΙΑ [ΟΡΕΣΤΙΣ. Vid. ΟΡΕΣΤΑΙ.]

ΟΡΕΤΑΝΙ, a powerful people in the south-west of Hispania Tarraconensis, bounded on the north by Bætica, on the north by the Carpetani, on the west by Lusitania, and on the east by the Oretani; their territory corresponded to the southern part of Granada, the whole of La Mancha, and the western part of Murcia. Their chief town was CASTULO.

town ('Ὀρεός: 'Ορεῖον), a town in the north Aegean, on the River Callias, at the foot of mountain Telethrium, and in the district Troas, was itself originally called Hestiaea. After the Persian wars, Oreus, with rest of Euboea, became subject to the Athenians; but on the revolt of the island in B.C. 427 Oreus was taken by Pericles, its inhabitants expelled, and their place supplied by two hundred Athenians. The site of Oreus made important place, and its name frequently in the Grecian wars down to the dissolution of the Achæan league.

OREUS, M., a Roman equester, of the municipium of Atella, was a tribune of the soldiers in the army, whom Cicero strongly recommended in B.C. 59 to his brother Quintus, who was one of Cæsar's legates.]

ORIGEN, the noblest and richest among the Greeks, formed a conspiracy to obtain the power B.C. 61, and persuaded his counsels to emigrate from their own country. They were devoted to making the necessary preparations; but the real designs of Origen having meantime transpired, and the conspirators attempting to bring him to trial, he died, probably, as was suspected, of his own hands.

ORIBASIOS ('Οριβάσιος or 'Οριβάσιος), an emigrant Greek medical writer, born about A.D. 220 at Sardis in Lydia, or at Pergamus in Asia. He early acquired a great professional reputation. He was an intimate friend of Emperor Julian, with whom he became attached several years before Julian's accession to the throne. He was almost the only one to whom Julian imparted the secret of his conversion to Christianity. He accompanied Julian in his expedition against Persia, and was with him at the time of his death, 363. Succeeding emperors, Valentinian and Valens, confiscated the property of Oribasius, and expelled him. He was afterward recalled from exile and was alive at least as late as 395. Of the personal character of Oribasius we know nothing, but it is clear that he was much opposed to paganism and to the heathen philosophy. He was an intimate friend of Eusebius, who praises him very highly, and wrote much of his life. We possess at present the works of Oribasius: 1. Collecta Medicorum peragrali ('Ιατρικαί), or sometimes Hebribasios ('Εβρίβασιος'), which was compiled at the command of Julian, when Oribasius still a young man. It contains but little original matter, but is very valuable on account of the numerous extracts from writers whose works are no longer extant. More than half his work is now lost, and what remains is in confusion. There is no complete edition of the work. 2. An abridgment (Σύνοψις) of his former work, in nine books. It was written thirty years after the former. 3. Eusebius De facile Peribibios ('Ευκρίβασια'), in ten books. Both this and the preceding work tended as manuals of the practice of medicine.

ORIGENES ('Ὀριγεν, 'Ὀριγος: 'Ὀρίγιος: 'Ὀρίγιος), an important Greek town on the Thracian frontier, near the Ceraonian Mountains, in the district of Epirus. According to tradition, it was founded by the Eubœans, who were cast here by a storm on their return from Troy; but according to another legend, it was a Colchian colony. The town was strongly fortified, but its harbor was not very secure. It was destroyed in the civil wars, but was rebuilt by Herodes Atticus. The turpentine tree (terebinthus) grew in the neighborhood of Origen.

ORIGENES ('Ὀριγένης), usually called ORIGEN, one of the most eminent of the early Christian writers, was born at Alexandria A.D. 186. He received a careful education from his father, Leonides, who was a devout Christian; and he subsequently became a pupil of Clement of Alexandria. His father having been put to death in the persecution of the Christians in the tenth year of Severus (202), Origen was reduced to destitution; whereupon he became a teacher of grammar, and soon acquired a great reputation. At the same time he gave instruction in Christianity to several of the heathen; and, though only in his eighteenth year, he was appointed to the office of catechist, which was vacant through the dispersion of the clergy consequent on the persecution. The young teacher showed a zeal and self-denial beyond his years. Deeming his profession as teacher of grammar inconsistent with his sacred work, he gave it up; and he lived on the merest pittance. His food and his periods of sleep were restricted within the narrowest limits; and he performed a strange act of self-mutilation, in obedience to what he regarded as the recommendation of Christ. (Matth., xix., 12.) At a later time, however, he repudiated this literal understanding of our Lord's words. About 211 or 212 Origen visited Rome, where he made, however, a very short stay. On his return to Alexandria he continued to discharge his duties as catechist, and to pursue his biblical studies. About 216 he paid a visit to Cæsarea in Palestine, and about 230 he travelled into Greece. Shortly after his return to Alexandria he had to encounter the open enmity of Demetrius, the bishop of the city. He was first deprived of his office of catechist, and was compelled to leave Alexandria; and Demetrius afterward procured his degradation from the priesthood and his excommunication. The charges brought against him are not specified; but his unpopularity appears to have arisen from the obnoxious character of some of his opinions, and was increased by the circumstance that even in his lifetime his writings were seriously corrupted. Origen withdrew to Cæsarea in Palestine, where he was received with the greatest kindness. Among his pupils at this place was Gregory Thaumaturgus, who afterward became his panegyrist. In 235 Origen fled from Cæsarea in Palestine, and took refuge at Cæsarea in Cappadocia, where he remained concealed two years. It was subsequent to this that he undertook a second journey into Greece, the date of which is doubtful. In the Decian persecution (249-251), Origen was put to the torture; but, though his life was spared, the sufferings which he underwent hastened his end. He died in 253 or 254, in his sixty-ninth year, at Tyre, in which city he was buried. The following are the most important of Origen's works: 1. The Hexapla, which consisted of six copies of the Old Testament, ranged in parallel columns. The first column contained the Hebrew text in Hebrew characters, the second the same text in Greek characters, the third the version of Aquila, the fourth that of Symmachus, the fifth the Septuagint, the sixth the version of Theodotion. Besides the compilation and arrangement of these versions, Origen added marginal notes, containing, among other things, an explanation of the Hebrew names. Only fragments of this valuable work are extant, the best edition of which is by Montfaucon, Paris, 1714. 2. Exegetical works, which comprehend three classes: (1.) Tomi, which Jerome renders Volumina, containing ample commentaries, in which he gave full scope to his intellect. (2.) Scholia, brief notes on detached passages. (3.) Homilia, popular expositions, chiefly delivered at Cæsarea. In his various expositions Origen sought to extract from the Sacred Writings their historical, mystical or prophetic, and moral significance. His desire of finding continually a mystical sense led him frequently into the neglect of the historical sense, and even into the denial of its truth. This capital fault has at all times furnished ground for depreciating his labors, and has no doubt materially diminished their value: it must not, however, be supposed that his denial of the historical truth of the Sacred Writings is more than occasional, or that it has been carried out to the full extent which some of his accusers have charged upon him. 3. De Principiis (Περὶ ἀρχῶν). This work was the great object of attack with Origen's enemies, and the source from which they derived their chief evidence of his various alleged heresies. It was divided into four books. Of this work some important fragments are extant; and the Latin version of Rufinus has come down to us entire; but Rufinus took great liberties with the original, and the unfaithfulness of his version is denounced in the strongest terms by Jerome. 4. Exhortatio ad Martyrium (Εἰς μαρτύριον προτρέψας λόγος), or De Martyrio (Περὶ μαρτυρίου), written during the persecution under the Emperor Maximin (235-238), and still extant. 5. Contra Celsum Libri VIII. (Κατὰ Κέλσου ῥήματα), still extant. In this important work Origen defends the truth of Christianity against the attacks of Celsus. Vid. Celsus. There is a valuable work entitled Philocalia (Φιλοκαλία), which is a compilation by Basil of Cæsarea and his friend Gregory of Nazianzus, made almost exclusively from the writings of Origen, of which many important fragments have been thus preserved. Few writers have exercised greater influence by the force of their intellect and the variety of their attainments than Origen, or have been the occasion of longer and more acrimonious disputes. Of his more distinctive tenets, several had reference to the doctrine of the Trinity, to the subject of the incarnation, and to the pre-existence of Christ's human soul, which, as well as the pre-existence of other human souls, he affirmed. He was charged, also, with holding the corporeity of angels, and with other errors as to angels and demons. He held the freedom of the human will, and ascribed to man a nature less corrupt and depraved than was consistent with orthodox views of the operation of divine grace. He held the doctrine of the universal restoration of the guilty, conceiving that the devil alone would suffer eternal punishment. The best edition of his works is by Delarue, Paris, 1733-1759, 4 vols. fol.; reprinted in 25 vols. 8vo, 1831-46, under the editorial care of Lommatsch.]

OMINOIS or OMINOIS, probably the same place as AURINX, a wealthy town in Hispania Bætica, with silver mines, near Munda.

ORION (Ὀρίων), son of Hyrieus, of Hyra, a Boeotia, a handsome giant and hunter, and he have been called by the Boeotians Candæus. Once he came to Chios (Ophiussa), and fell in love with Aero or Merope, the daughter of Cænopion by the nymph Helice. He cleared the island from wild beasts, and brought the spoils of the chase as presents to his beloved; but as Cænopion constantly deferred the marriage, Orion once when intoxicated offered violence to the maiden. Cænopion now implored the assistance of Bacchus (Dionysus), who caused Orion to be thrown into a deep sleep by satyrs, in which state Cænopion deprived him of his sight. Being informed by an oracle that he should recover his sight if he would go toward the east and expose his eye-balls to the rays of the rising sun, Orion followed the sons of a Cyclops' hammer, went to Lemnos, where Vulcan (Hephestus) gave to him Cedalion as his guide. Having recovered his sight, Orion returned to Chios to take vengeance on Cænopion; but, as the latter had been concealed by his friends, Orion was unable to find him, and then proceeded to Crete, where he lived as a hunter with Diana (Artemis). The cause of his death, which took place either in Crete or Chios, is differently stated. According to some, Eos (Aurora), who loved Orion for his beauty, carried him off, but as the gods were angry at this, Diana (Artemis) killed him with an arrow in Ortygia. According to others, he was loved by Diana (Artemis), and Apollo, jealous at his sister's affection for him, asserted that she was unable to hit with her arrow a distant point which he showed her in the sea. She thereupon took aim, and hit it, but the point was the head of Orion, who had been swimming in the sea. A third account, which Hesiod follows (Carm., ii., 4, 72), states that he attempted to violate Artemisia (Diana), and was killed by the goddess with one of her arrows. A fourth account, lastly, states that he boasted he would conquer every animal, and would clear the earth from all wild beasts; but the curse sent forth a scorpion which destroyed him. Cæculapius attempted to recall him to life, but was slain by Jupiter (Zeus) with a flash of lightning. The accounts of his parentage and birth-place vary in the different writers, for some call him a son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Euryala, and others say that he was born of the earth, or son of Cænopion. He is further called a Thiban or Tanagrean, but probably because Hyrieus his native place, sometimes belonged to Tanagra and sometimes to Thebes. After his death Orion was placed among the stars, where he appears as a giant with a girdle, sword, a lion's skin, and a club. The constellation of Orion at the commencement of November, at which time storms and rain were frequent; hence he is often called imbrifer, nimbosus, or a juvus.

ORION and ORUS (Ὀρίων and Ὀρος), names of several ancient grammarians, who are frequently confounded with each other. It appears, however, that we may distinguish three writers of these names. 1. ORION, a Theban grammarian, who taught at Cæsarea in the fifth century after Christ, and is the author of a lexicon, still extant, published by Sturz, Lips., 20.—2. ORUS, of Miletus, a grammarian, living in the second century after Christ, and was the author of the works mentioned by Suidas. 3. ORUS, an Alexandrine grammarian, who taught at Constantinople not earlier than the middle of the fourth century after Christ.

ORITÆ, HORITÆ, or ORÆ (Ὀρείται, Ὀραι), a people of Gedrosia, who inhabited a district the coast nearly two hundred miles long, abounding in wine, corn, rice, and palm-trees, modern Urboo on the coast of Beloochistan. Some of the ancient writers assert that they were of Indian origin, while others say that, although they resembled the Indians in many of their customs, they spoke a different language.

ORITHYIA (Ὀριθύϊα). 1. Daughter of Erechtheus, king of Athens, and Praxithea. Once, when he had strayed beyond the River Ilissus, she was seized by Boreas and carried off to Thracæ, where she bore to Boreas Cleopatra, Chione, and Calais.—[2. One of the Nereids, mentioned in Homer.]

ORNIUS (Ὀρνειός), son of the Thessalian sorcerer Mycale, one of the Lapithæ, slain by Theseus at the nuptials of Pirithous.]

ORMENIUM. Vid. ORMENUS.]

ORMENUS (Ὀρμενός). 1. Son of Cercaphus, son of Æolus, and father of Amyntor, was believed to have founded the town of Ormenium in Thessaly. From him Amyntor is sometimes called Ormenides, and Astydamia, his daughter, Ormenis.—[2. Name of two Trojan warriors, who were slain, the one by Teucer, the other by Polyxenes, in the Trojan war.]

ORMIUS MORA (now Derne jaisli), a range of mountains in the northeast of Bithynia, terminating in Promontorium Posidium, on the coast.]

ORPEÆ (Ὀρπεαί: Ὀρπεαίης), an ancient town of Thessaly, near the frontiers of the territory of Æolia, and one hundred and twenty stadia from Æolia. It was originally independent of Argos, but was subdued by the Argives in the Peloponnesian war, B.C. 418.

ORPHEUS (Ὀρφεύς), son of Erechtheus, father of Orpheus, and grandfather of Menæceus; from the town of Orpheæ was believed to have derived its name.

ORPHEUS (Ὀρφεύς). 1. An Arcadian hero, who led an army from Teuthis to join the Greeks at Troy, but during the stay at Aulis he quarrelled with Agamemnon, and, in consequence, led his forces back.—[2. A Tyrrhenian, son of Æneus in Italy, slain by Camilla.]

ORONDA (Ὀρόνδα: Ὀροάνδης, or -εύς, Ορόανδης), a mountain city of Pisidia, southeast of Antiochia, from which the "Oroandicus tract" obtained its name.

ORONTES (Ὀρόντης: now Tat), the largest of the minor rivers which flow into the Persian Gulf, formed the boundary between Susiana and Persia.

OROBIA (Ὀροβία), a town on the coast of Eubœa, not far from Ægeæ, with an oracle of Apollo.

OROBII, a Gallic people in Gallia Transpadana, in whose territory, according to Pliny, lay the cities Comum and Bergomum.]

ORODES (Ὀρόδης), the name of two kings of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, No. 14, 17.

OROTES (Ὀροίτης), a Persian, was made satrap of Sardis by Cyrus, which government he retained under Cambyzes. In B.C. 522 he deceived POLYCRATES into his power by specious promises, and put him to death. But being suspected of aiming at the establishment of an independent sovereignty, he was himself put to death by order of Darius.

ORONTES (Ὀρόντης). 1. (Now Nahr-el-Asy), the largest river of Syria, has two chief sources in Coele-syria, the one in the Antilibanus, the other further north, in the Libanus; flows north-east into a lake south of Emesa, and thence north past Epiphania and Apamea, till near Antioch, where it suddenly sweeps round to the southwest, and falls into the sea at the foot of Mount Pieria. According to tradition, its earlier name was Typhon (Τυφών), and it was called Orontes from the person who first built a bridge over it.—[2. A mountain on the southern side of the Caspian, between Parthia and Hyrcania.—[3. A people of Assyria, east of Gaugamela.]

ORONTES (Ὀρόντης). 1. A Lycian leader, an ally of the Trojans, accompanied Æneas after the fall of Troy, and perished by shipwreck.—[2. Related to the Persian royal family, accompanied the younger Cyrus against Artaxerxes, having been pardoned by Cyrus though he had revolted from him. He was again convicted of treason during the expedition, was tried by a court-martial, and condemned to death. His fate was never made public.—[3. A Persian, satrap of Armenia, married Rhodogune, the daughter of Artaxerxes; he commanded one of the divisions of the king's army during the retreat of the ten thousand Greeks, and was a party to the treacherous massacre of the Greek generals. He was afterward disgraced in consequence of mismanaging the war with Evagoras, and attempting to deprive Tiribazus of his command and his army. Vid. TIRIBAZUS.—[4. A descendant of Hydarnes (one of the seven conspirators against Smerdis the Magian), is mentioned by Strabo as the last Persian prince who reigned in Armenia before the division of the country by Antiochus the Great between two of his officers, Artaxias and Zariadris.]

OROPUS (Ὀρόπος: Ὀρόπιος: now Orrope), a town on the eastern frontiers of Boeotia and Attica, near the Euripus, originally belonged to the Boeotians, but was at an early time seized by the Athenians, and was long an object of contention between the two nations. At length, after being taken and retaken several times, it remained permanently in the hands of the Athenians, and is always reckoned by later writers as a town of Attica. Its sea-port was Delphinium, at the mouth of the Asopus, about one and a half miles from the town.

OROSIUS, PAULUS, a Spanish presbyter, a native of Tarragona, flourished under Arcadius and Honorius. Having conceived a warm admiration for St. Augustine, he passed over into Africa about A.D. 413. After remaining in Africa about two years, Augustine sent him into Syria, to counteract the influence of Pelagius, who had resided for some years in Palestine. Orosius found a warm friend in Jerome, but was unable to procure the condemnation of Pelagius, and was himself anathematized by John, bishop of Jerusalem, when he brought a formal charge against Pelagius. Orosius subsequently returned to Africa, and there, it is believed, died, but at what period is not known. The following works by Orosius are still extant. 1. Historiarum adversus Paganos Libri VII., dedicated to St. Augustine, at whose suggestion the task was undertaken. The pagans having been accustomed to complain that the ruin of the Roman empire must be ascribed to the wrath of the ancient deities, whose worship had been abandoned, Orosius, upon his return from Palestine, composed this history to demonstrate that from the earliest epoch the world had been the scene of calamities as great as the Roman empire was then suffering. The work, which extends from the Creation down to A.D. 417, is, with exception of the concluding portion, extracted from Justin, Eutropius, and inferior second-hand authorities. Edited by Havercamp, Lugd. Bat., 1738 and 1767. 2. Liber Apologeticus de Arbitrii Libertate, written in Palestine, A.D. 415, appended to the edition of the History by Havercamp. 3. Commonitorium ad Augustinum, the earliest of the works of Orosius, composed soon after his first arrival in Africa.

OROSKIDA or ORTOSKIDA (now Sierra del Muluco), the highest range of mountains in the centre of Spain, began in the centre of Mount Idubeda, ran first west and then south, and terminated near Calpe at the Fretum Herculeum. It contained several silver mines, whence the part in which the Bætica river was called Mount Argentarius, or the Silver Mountains.

ORPHEUS (Ὀρφεύς), a mythical personage, was regarded by the Greeks as the most celebrated of the early poets, who lived before the time of Homer. His name does not occur in the Homeric or Hesiodic poems, but it already had attained to great celebrity in the lyric period. There were numerous legends about Orpheus, but the common story ran as follows: Orpheus, the son of Œagrus and Calliope, lived in Thrace at the period of the Argonauts, whom he accompanied in their expedition. Presented with the lyre by Apollo, and instructed by the Muses in its use, he enchanted with its music not only the wild beasts, but the trees and rocks upon Olympus, so that they moved from their places to follow the sound of his golden harp. The power of his music caused the Argonauts to seek his aid, which contributed materially to the success of their expedition: at the sound of his lyre the Argo glided down into the sea; the Argonauts tore themselves away from the pleasures of Lemnos; the Symplegades, or moving rocks, which threatened to crush the ship between them, were fixed in their places; and the Colchian dragon, which guarded the golden fleece, was lulled to sleep: other legends of the same kind may be read in the Argonautica, which bears the name of Orpheus. After his return from the Argonautic expedition he took up his abode in a cave in Thrace, and employed himself in the civilization of its wild inhabitants. There is also a legend of his having visited Egypt. The legends respecting the loss and recovery of his wife, and his own death are very various. His wife was a nymph named Agriopë or Eurydice. In the older accounts the cause of her death is not referred to. The legend followed in the well-known passages of Virgil and Ovid, which ascribes the death of Eurydice to the bite of a serpent, is no doubt of high antiquity; but the introduction of Arctæus into the legend can not be traced to any writer older than Virgil himself. He followed his lost wife into the abodes of Pluto (Hades), where the charms of his lyre suspended the torments of the damned, and won back his wife from the most inexorable of all deities; but his prayer was only granted upon this condition, that he should not look back upon his restored wife till they had arrived in the upper world at the very moment when they were about to pass the fatal bounds, the anxiety of love overcame the poet; he looked round to see that Eurydice was following him, and he beheld her caught back into the infernal regions. His grief for the loss of Eurydice led him to treat with contempt the Thracian women, who, in revenge, tore him to pieces under the excitement of their Bacchanalian orgies. After his death the Muses collected the fragments of his body, and buried them at Libethra, at the foot of Olympus, where the nightingale sang sweetly over his grave. His head was thrown into the Hebrus, down which it rolled to the sea, and was borne across to Lesbos, where the grave in which it was interred was shown at Antissa. His lyre was also said to have been carried to Lesbos; and both traditions are simply poetical expressions of the historical fact that Lesbos was the first great seat of the music of the lyre: indeed, Antissa itself was the birth-place of Terpander, the earliest historical musician. The astronomers taught that the lyre of Orpheus was placed by Jupiter (Zeus) among the stars at the intercession of Apollo and the Muses. In these legends there are some points which are sufficiently clear. The invention of music, in connection with the services of Apollo and the Muses, its first great application to the worship of the gods, which Orpheus is therefore said to have introduced, its power over the passions, and the importance which the Greeks attached to the knowledge of it, as intimately allied with the very existence of all social order—are probably the chief elementary ideas of the whole legend. But then comes in one of the dark features of the Greek religion, in which the gods envy the advancement of man in knowledge and civilization, and severely punish any one who transgresses the bounds assigned to humanity. In a later age the conflict was no longer viewed as between the gods and man, but between the worshippers of different divinities; and especially between Apollo, the symbol of pure intellect, and Bacchus (Dionysus), the deity of the senses: hence Orpheus, the servant of Apollo, falls a victim to the jealous

1 Bacchus (Dionysus), and the fury of his worshippers.—Orphic Societies and Mysteries. About the time of the first development of Greek philosophy, societies were formed, consisting of persons called the followers of Orpheus (of Ὀρφεύς), who, under the pretended guidance of Orpheus, dedicated themselves to the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus). They performed the rites of a mystical worship, but instead of confirming their notions to the initiated, they published them to others, and committed them to literary works. The Bacchus (Dionysus) to whose worship the Orphic rites were annexed, was Bacchus (Dionysus) Zagreus, closely connected with Ceres (Demeter) and Cora (Proserpina). The Orphic legends and poems related a great part to this Bacchus (Dionysus), who was combined, as an infernal deity, with Pluto Hades, and upon whom the Orphic theologians founded their hopes of the purification and ultimate immortality of the soul. But their mode of celebrating this worship was very different from the popular rites of Bacchus. The Orphic worshippers of Bacchus did not indulge in unrestrained pleasure and frantic enthusiasm, but rather aimed at an ascetic purify of life and manners. All this part of the mythology of Orpheus, which connects him with Bacchus (Dionysus), must be considered as a later invention, quite irreconcilable with the original legend, in which he is the servant of Apollo and the Muses: but it is almost hopeless to explain the transition. Many poems ascribed to Orpheus were current as early as the time of the Pisistratids. Vid. ONOMACRITUS. They are often quoted by Plato, and the allusions to them in later writers are very frequent. The extant poems, which bear the name of Orpheus, are the forgeries of Christian grammarians and philosophers of the Alexandrian school; but among the fragments, which form a part of the collection, are some genuine remains of that Orphic poetry which was known to Plato, and which must be assigned to the period of Onomacritus, or perhaps a little earlier. The Orphic literature, which in this sense may be called genuine, seems to have included Hymns, a Theogony, Oracles, &c. The apocryphal productions which have come down to us are, 1. Argonautica, an epic poem in one thousand three hundred and eighty-four hexameters, giving an account of the expedition of the Argonauts. 2. Hymns, eighty-seven or eighty-eight in number, in hexameters, evidently the productions of the Neo-Platonic school. 3. Lithica (Λιθικά), treatise of properties of stones, both precious and common, and their uses in divination. 4. Fragmenta, chiefly of the Theogony. It is in this class that we find the genuine remains of the literature of the early Orphic theology, but intermingled with others of a much later date. The best edition is by Hermann, Lips.; 1806.

OSCI or OPICI (Ὀσχοί, Ὀπικοί), one of the most ancient tribes of Italy, inhabited the centre of the peninsula, from which they had driven out the Siculi. Their principal settlement was in Campania, but we also find them in parts of Latium and Samnium. They were subdued by the Sabines and Tyrrhenians, and disappeared from history at a comparatively early period. They were called in their own language Uscus. They are identified by many writers with the Ausones or Aurunci; but others think that the latter is a collective name for all the people dwelling in the plain, and that the Osci were a branch of the Ausones. The Oscan language was closely connected with the other ancient Italian dialects, out of which the Latin language was formed; and it continued to be spoken by the people of Campania long after the Oscans had disappeared as a separate people. A knowledge of it was preserved at Rome by the Fabiæ Atellanæ, which were a species of farce or comedy written in Oscan.

His Egyptian name is said to have been Hysiris, which is interpreted to mean "son of Isis," though some said that it meant "many-eyed." He is said to have been originally king of Egypt, and to have reclaimed his subjects from a barbarous life by teaching them agriculture, and enacting wise laws. He afterward travelled into foreign lands, spreading wherever he went the blessings of civilization. On his return to Egypt he was murdered by his brother Typhon, who cut his body into pieces and threw them into the Nile. After a long search Isis discovered the mangled remains of her husband, and with the assistance of her son Horus defeated Typhon, and recovered the sovereign power, which Typhon had usurped. *Vid. Its name was said to be derived from Osroes, an Arabian chieftain, who, in the time of the Seleucids, established over it a petty principality, with Edessa for its capital, which lasted till the reign of Caracalla, and respecting the history of which, *vid. OSTIA (Ostiensis: now Ostia), a town at the mouth of the River Tiber, and the harbor of Rome, from which it was distant sixteen miles by land, was situated on the left bank of the left arm of the river. It was founded by Ancus Marcius, the fourth king of Rome, was a Roman colony, and eventually became an important and flourishing town. In the civil wars it was destroyed by Marius, but it was soon rebuilt with greater splendor than before. The Emperor Claudius constructed a new and better harbor on the right arm of the Tiber, which was enlarged and improved by Trajan. This new harbor was called simply Portus Romanus or Portus Augusti, and around it there sprang up a flourishing town, also called Portus (the inhabitants Portuenses). The old town of Ostia, whose harbor had been already partly filled up by sand, now sank into insignificance, and only continued to exist through its salt-works (salina), which had been established by Ancus Marcius. The ruins of Ostia are between two and three miles from the coast, as the sea has gradually receded in consequence of the accumulation of sand deposited by the Tiber.

UTACILIUS PILITUS, L., a Roman rhetorician who opened a school at Rome B.C. 81, was originally a slave, but having exhibited talent and a love of literature, he was manumitted by his master. Cn. Pompeius Magnus was one of his pupils, and he wrote the history of Pompey and of his father likewise.

UTRANUS (Οὐράνως). 1. A Persian, son of Pharnaces, was the first who suspected the imposture of Smerdis the Magian, and took the chief part in organizing the conspiracy against the pretender (B.C. 521). After the accession of Darius Hystaspes, he was placed in command of the Persian force which invaded Samos for the purpose of placing Syloson brother of Polycrates, in the government.—3. A Persian, son of Sisamnes, succeeded Megabyzus (B.C. 506) in the command of the forces on the sea-coast, and took Byzantium, Chalcædon, Antandrus, and Lemnæum, as well as the islands of Lemnos and Imbros. He was probably the same Otanes who is mentioned as a son-in-law of Darius Hystaspes, and as a general employed against the revolted Ionians in 499.

UTRO, L. Roscius, tribune of the plebs B.C. 67, was a warm supporter of the aristocratic party. He opposed the proposal of Gabinus to bestow upon Pompey the command of the war against the pirates; and in the same year he proposed and carried the law which gave to the equites a special place at the public spectacles, in fourteen rows or seats (in quattuordecim gradibus sine ordinibus), next to the place of the senators, which was in the orchestra. This law was very unpopular; and in Cicero's consulship (63) there was such a riot occasioned by the obnoxious measure that it required all his eloquence to allay the agitation.

UTRO, SALVIA. 1. M., grandfather of the Emperor Otho, was descended from an ancient and noble family of the town of Ferentinum in Etruria. His father was a Roman eques; his mother was of low origin, perhaps even a freed-woman. Through the influence of Livia Augusta, in whose house he had been brought up, he was made a Roman senator, and eventually obtained the prætorship, but was not advanced to any higher honor.—2. L., son of the preceding, and father of the Emperor Otho, stood so high in the favor of Tiberius, and resembled this emperor so strongly in person, that it was supposed by men that he was his son. He was consul suffectus in A.D. 39: was afterward pro-consul in Africa; and in 42 was sent into Illyricum, where he restored discipline among the soldiers, who had lately rebelled against Claudius. At a later time he detected a conspiracy which had been formed against the life of Claudius.—3. L., surnamed TITIANUS, elder son of No. 2, was consul 52, and proconsul in Asia 63, when he had Agricola for his quaestor. It is related to the honor of the latter that he was not corrupted by the example of his superior officer, who indulged in every kind of rapacity. On the death of Galba in January, 69, Titianus was a second time made consul, with his brother Otho, the emperor. On the death of the latter, he was pardoned by Vitellius.—4. M., Roman emperor from January 15th to April 16th, A.D. 69, was the younger son of No. 2. He was born in the early part of 32. He was of moderate stature, ill made in the legs, and had an effeminate appearance. He was one of the companions of Nero in his debaucheries; but when the emperor took possession of his wife, the beautiful but profligate Poppæa Sabina, Otho was sent as governor to Lusitania, which he administered with credit during the last ten years of Nero's life. Otho attached himself to Galba when he revolted against Nero, in the hope of being adopted by him and succeeding to the empire. But when Galba adopted L. Piso on the 10th of January, 69, Otho formed a conspiracy against Galba, and was proclaimed emperor by the soldiers at Rome, who put Galba to death. Mean time Vitellius had been proclaimed emperor at Cologne by the German troops on the 3d of January, and his generals forthwith sent him to Italy to place their master on the throne. When these news reached Otho, he marched into the north of Italy to oppose the generals of Vitellius. The fortune of war was at first in his favor. He defeated Cæcina, the general of Vitellius, in more than one engagement; but his army was subsequently defeated in a decisive battle near Bedriacum by the united forces of Cæcina and Valens, whereupon he put an end to his own life at Brixellum, in the thirty-seventh year of his age.

UTHERYADES (Οὐθρυάδης). 1. A patronymic given to Panthous or Panthus, the Trojan priest of Apollo, as the son of Othryas.—2. A Spartan, one of the three hundred selected to fight with an equal number of Argives for the possession of Thyrea. Othryades was the only person who survived the battle, and was left for dead. He spoiled the dead bodies of the enemy, and remained at his post, while Alcenor and Chromius, the two survivors of the Argive party, hastened home with the news of victory, supposing that all their opponents had been slain. As the victory was claimed by both sides, a general battle ensued, in which the Argives were defeated. Othryades slew himself on the field, being ashamed to return to Sparta as the one survivor of her three hundred champions.

(Οὐθρυάδης) (Οὐθρυάδης), an ally of Priam, from Cabeus, was a suitor for the hand of Cassandra, Priam's daughter, and promised, in return, to drive the Greeks from before Troy; but he was slain by Idomeneus.]

OVIDIUS NASO, P., the Roman poet, was born at Sulmo, in the country of the Peligni, on the 20th of March, B.C. 43. He was descended from an ancient equestrian family, but possessing only moderate wealth. He, as well as his brother Lucius, who was exactly a year older than himself, was destined to be a pleader, and received a careful education to qualify him for that calling. He studied rhetoric under Areltius Fuscus and Porcius Latro, and attained to considerable proficiency in the art of declamation. But the bent of his genius showed itself very early. The hours which should have been spent in the study of jurisprudence were employed in cultivating his poetical talent. The older Seneca, who had heard him declaim, tells us that his oratory resembled a solutum carmen, and that any thing in the way of argument was irksome to him. His father denounced his favorite pursuit as leading to inevitable poverty; but the death of his brother, at the early age of twenty, probably served in some degree to mitigate his father's opposition, for the patrimony which would have been scanty for two might amply suffice for one. Ovid's education was completed at Athens, where he made himself thoroughly master of the Greek language. Afterward he travelled with the poet Macer in Asia and Sicily. It is a disputed point whether he ever actually practiced as an advocate after his return to Rome. The picture Ovid himself draws of his weak constitution and indolent temper prevents us from thinking that he ever followed his profession with perseverance, if indeed at all. The same causes deterred him from entering the senate, though he had put on the latus clavus when he assumed the toga virilis, as being by birth entitled to aspire to the senatorial dignity. (Trist., iv., 10, 29.) He became, however, one of the Trjmviri Capitales; and he was subsequently made one of the Centumviri, or judges who tried testamentary and even criminal causes; and in due time he was promoted to be one of the Decemviri, who assembled and presided over the court of the Centumviri. Such is all the account that can be given of Ovid's business life. He married twice in early life at the desire of his parents, but he speedily divorced each of his wives in succession. The restraint of a wife was unknown to a man like Ovid, who was devoted to gallantry and licentious life. His chief mistress in the early part of his life was the one whom he celebrates in his poems under the name of Corinna. If we may believe the testimony of Sidonius Apollinaris, Corinna was no less a personage than Julia, the accomplished but abandoned daughter of Augustus. There are several passages in Ovid's Amores which render the testimony of Sidonius highly probable. Thus it appears that his mistress was a married woman, of high rank, but prodigate morals; all which particulars will suit Julia. How long Ovid's connection with Corinna lasted there are no means of deciding; but it probably ceased before his marriage with his third wife, whom he appears to have sincerely loved. We can hardly place his third marriage later than his thirtieth year, since a daughter, Perilla, was the fruit of it (Trist., iii., 7, 8), who was grown up and married at the time of his banishment. Perilla was twice married, and had a child by each husband. Ovid was a grandfather before he lost his father at the age of ninety; soon after whose decease his mother also died. Till his fiftieth year Ovid continued to reside at Rome, where he had a house near the Capitol, occasionally taking a trip to his Pelignian farm. He not only enjoyed the friendship of a large circle of distinguished men, but the regard and favor of Augustus and the imperial family. But in A.D. 8 Ovid was suddenly commanded by an imperial edict to transport himself to Tomæ, a town on the Euxine, near the mouth of the Danube, on the very border of the empire. He underwent no trial, and the sole reason for his banishment stated in the edict was his having published his poem on the Art of Love (Ar. Amatoria). It was not, however, an exilium, but a relegatio; that is, he was not utterly cut off from all hope of return, nor did he lose his citizenship. The real cause of his banishment has long exercised the ingenuity of scholars. The publication of the Ar. Amatoria was certainly a mere pretext. The poem had been published nearly ten years previously; and moreover, whenever Ovid alludes to that, the ostensible cause, he invariably couples with it another which he mysteriously conceals. According to some writers, the real cause was his intrigue with Julia. But this is sufficiently refuted by the fact that Julia had been an exile since B.C. 2. Other writers suppose that he had been guilty of an intrigue with the younger Julia, the daughter of the elder one; and this remarkable fact that the younger Julia was banished in the same year with Ovid leads very strongly to the inference that his fate was in some way connected with hers. But Ovid excuses himself that his fault was an involuntary one and the great disparity of years between the poet and the younger Julia renders it improbable that there had been an intrigue between them. He may more probably have become acquainted with Julia's profligacy by accident and by his subsequent conduct, perhaps, for instance, by concealing it, have given offence to Livio, or Augustus, or both. Ovid draws a affecting picture of the miseries to which he was exposed in his place of exile. He—on place in the inhospitable soil, of the severity of the climate, and of the perils to which he was exposed, when the barbarians plundered the surrounding country, and insulted the very walls of Tomi. In the most abject terms he applied to Augustus to change his place of exilism, and besought his friends to use their influence in his behalf. In the midst of all his misfortunes, he sought some relief in the exercise of his poetical talents. Not only did he finish his Fæsti in his exile, besides writing the Tristia, Ex Ponto, &c., but he likewise acquired the language of the Getæ, in which he composed some poems in honor of Augustus. These he publicly recited, and they were received with tumultuous applause by the natives. With his new fellow-citizens, indeed, he succeeded in rendering himself highly popular, inasmuch that they honored him with decree, declaring him exempt from all public duties. He died at Tomi in the sixtieth year of his age, A.D. 18. The following is a list of Ovid's works, arranged, as far as possible, in chronological order: 1. Amorum Libri III., the first of the poet's works. According to the fragment prefixed, the work, as we now possess it, is a second edition, revised and abridged, the former one having consisted of five books. 2. Epistole Heroidum, twenty-one in number. 3. Ars Amatoria, or De Arte Amandi, written about B.C. 2. At the time of Ovid's banishment this poem was ejected from the public libraries by command of Augustus. 4. Remedia Amoris, in one book. 5. Nas, the elegiac comment of a nut-tree respecting the ill treatment received from wayfarers, and even from its own master. 6. Metamorphoseon Libri XV. This, the greatest of Ovid's poems in bulk and tensions, appears to have been written between the age of forty and fifty. It consists of such legends or fables as involved a transformation, from the Creation to the time of the Cæsar, the last being that emperor's unge into a star. It is thus a sort of cyclic poem, made up of distinct episodes, but connected into one narrative thread with much skill. 7. Fæstorum Libri XII., of which only the first six are extant. This work was commenced at the time of Ovid's banishment. Indeed, he had perhaps done little more than collect the materials for it; for that the fourth book was written in Pontus appears from verses thirty-eight. The Fæsti is a sort of poetical man calendar, with its appropriate festivals of mythology, and the substance was probably taken in a great measure from the old Roman calendar. The work shows a good deal of ringing, but it has been observed that Ovid has frequent mistakes in his astronomy, from understanding the books from which he took them. 8. Tristium Libri V., elegies written during the first four years of Ovid's banishment. They chiefly made up of descriptions of his affliction, condition, and petitions for mercy. The third elegy of the fourth book is valuable, as containing many particulars of Ovid's life. 9. Isotolarum ex Ponto Libri IV., are also in the same metre, and much the same in substance as the Tristia, to which they were subsequent. It must be confessed that age and misfortune seem to have stamped Ovid's genius both in this and the preceding work. Even the versification is more slovenly, and some of the lines very prosaic. 10. Ibis, a satire of between six hundred and seven hundred elegiac verses, also written in exile. The poet inveighs in it against an enemy who had traduced him. Though the variety of Ovid's imprecations displays learning and fancy, the piece leaves the impression of an impotent explosion of rage. The title and plan were borrowed from Callimachus. 11. Consolatio ad Læviam Augustam, is considered by most critics not to be genuine, though it is allowed on all hands to be not unworthy of Ovid's genius. 12. The Medicamina Faciei and Halieuticon are mere fragments, and their genuineness not altogether certain. Of his lost works, the most celebrated was his tragedy, Medea, of which only two lines remain. That Ovid possessed a great poetical genius is unquestionable, which makes it the more to be regretted that it was not always under the control of a sound judgment. He possessed great vigor of fancy, warmth of coloring, and facility of composition. Ovid has himself described how spontaneously his verses flowed; but the facility of composition possessed more charms for him than the irksome but indispensable labor of correction and retrenchment. Ovid was the first to depart from that pure and correct taste which characterizes the Greek poets, and their earlier Latin imitators. His writings abound with those false thoughts and frigid conceits which we find so frequently in the Latin poets, and in this respect he must be regarded as un-antique. The best edition of Ovid's complete works is by Barmann, Amsterdam, 1737, 4 vols. 4to. [Of the separate works, the most useful editions are, the Metamorphoses, by Gierig (cura Jahn), Leipzig, 1821-23, and by Loers, Leipzig, 1843; the Fæsti, by Merkel, Berlin, 1841, and by Keightley, London, 1848; the Tristia, by Loers, Treves, 1839; Ars Amatoria (including Heroides, &c.), by Jahn, Leipzig, 1828; the Heroides, by Loers, Cologne, 1829.]

OXIA PALUS, is first mentioned distinctly by Ammianus Marcellinus as the name of the Sea of Aral, which the ancients in general did not distinguish from the Caspian. When Ptolemy however, speaks of the OXIANA PALUS (ἡ Ὀξιάνη ἕλυσ) as a small lake in the steppes of Sogdiana, he is perhaps following some vague account of the separate existence of the Sea of Aral, and the same remark may be applied to Pliny's account that the source (instead of the termination) of the River Oxus was in a lake of the same name.

OXIANI (Ὀξιάνοι, Οἰξιάνοι), a people of Sogdiana, on the north of the Oxus.

OXII MONTES (τὰ Ὀξεία, or Οἰξεία, ὄρη: now probably Ak-tagh), a range of mountains between the Rivers Oxus and Jaxartes; the northern boundary of Sogdiana toward Scythia.

OXUS or OXUS (Ὀξός, Ὀξός: now Jihoun or Amou), a great river of Central Asia, rose, according to some of the ancient geographers, on the northern side of the Paropamisus Mountains (now Hindoo-Koosh), and, according to others, in the Emodi Mountains, and flowed northwest, forming the boundary between Sogdiana on the north, and Bactria and Margiana on the south, and then, skirting the north of Hyrcania, it fell into the Caspian. The Jihoun now flows into the southwestern corner of the Sea of Aral; but there are still distinct traces of a channel extending in a southwestern direction from the Sea of Aral to the Caspian, by which at least a portion, and probably the whole, of the waters of the Oxus found their way into the Caspian; and very probably the Sea of Aral itself was connected with the Caspian by this channel. The ancient geographers mention, as important tributaries of the Oxus, the Ochnus, the Maroua, and the Bactrus, which are now intercepted by the sands of the Desert. The Oxus is a broad and rapid river, navigable through a considerable portion of its course. It formed, in ancient times, a channel of commercial intercourse between India and Western Asia, goods being brought down it to the Caspian, and thence up the Cyrus and across Armenia into Asia Minor. It occupies also an important place in history, having been in nearly all ages the extreme boundary between the great monarchies of Southwestern Asia and the hordes which wander over the central steppes. Cyrus and Alexander both crossed it; but the former effected no permanent conquests on its northern side; and the conquests of the latter in Sogdiana, though for a time preserved under the Bactrian kings, were always regarded as lying beyond the limits of the civilized world, and were lost at the fall of the Bactrian kingdom. Herodotus does not mention the Oxus by name, but it is supposed to be the river which he calls Araxes.

[OXYARTES (Ὀξυάρτης), or OXARTES (Ὀξάρτης), a Bactrian, father of Roxana, the wife of Alexander the Great. He was one of the chiefs who accompanied Bessus into Sogdiana. After the death of Bessus, he deposited his wife and daughters for safety in a rock fortress in Sogdiana, which was deemed impregnable, but which soon fell into the hands of Alexander. After the espousal of Alexander to Roxana, Oxyartes made his submission, and was treated with distinction by the conqueror, and was appointed satrap of the province of Paropamisus, or India south of the Caucasus, which he continued to hold after the death of Alexander, and probably in the period of his own death some years subsequently.]

OXYRI, a Ligurian people on the coast of Gallia Narbonensis, west of the Alps, and between the Flumen Argenteum (now Argens) and Antipolis (now Antibes). They were neighbors of the Salluvii and Deciates.

ΟΞΥΡΑΚΑΙ (Ὀξυράκαι), a warlike people of India intra Gangem, in the Punjab, between the Rivers Hydaspes (now Jhelum) and Acesines (now Chenab), in whose capital Alexander was wounded. They called themselves descendants of Bacchus (Dionysus).

ΟΞΥΛΟΣ (Ὀξύλος), the leader of the Heraclids in their invasion of Peloponnesus, and a frequently king of Elia. Vid. p. 354, b.

[OXYNTAS (Ὀξύνας), son of Jugurtha, was led captive, together with his father, before the triumphal car of Marius, B.C. 104; but his life was spared, and he was placed in custody at Venusia, where he remained till B.C. 90, when he was adorned with the insignia of royalty, to gather around him the Numidians in the service of the Roman general L. Cæsar. The device proved successful, but the subsequent fate of Oxyntas is unknown.]

OXYRHYNCHUS (Ὀξύρυνχος: ruins at Behn sek), a city of Middle Egypt, on the western bank of the canal which runs parallel to the Nile on its western side (now Behr Yussuf). It was the capital of the Nomos Oxyrynchites, and the chief seat of the worship of the fish called oxyrynchus.

[OZYNE (Ὀζύνη, now Uzen or Ougien), in the time of Ptolemy the capital of the kingdom Larica, in India intra Gangem, and the residence of a prince who bore the title Tiascanus. It carried on an extensive traffic, exported onyx, myrrh, and fine cotton stuff, and supplied the great commercial city Barygaza with all the necessaries of life.]

OZOSARDANA, a city of Mesopotamia, on the Euphrates, the people of which preserved a lofty throne or chair of stone, which they called Tn-jan's judgment-seat.

PACATIANA. Vid. PHRYGIA.

PACCIUS or PACCUS ANTIOTCHUS, a physician about the beginning of the Christian era, who was a pupil of Philonides of Catana, and lived probably at Rome. He made a large fortune by the sale of a certain medicine of his own invention, the composition of which he kept a profound secret. At his death he left his prescription as a legacy to the Emperor Tiberius, who, in order to give it as wide a circulation as possible, ordered a copy of it to be placed in the public libraries.

PACHES (Πάχης), an Athenian general in the Peloponnesian war, took Mytilene and reduced Lesbos, B.C. 427. On his return to Athens he was brought to trial on some charge, and, perceiving his condemnation to be certain, drew his sword and stabbed himself in the presence of his judges.

PACHYMERES, GEORGIUS, an important Byzantine writer, was born about A.D. 1242 at Nicæa but spent the greater part of his life at Constantinople. He was a priest, and opposed the union of the Greek and Latin Churches. Pachymeres wrote several works, the most important of which is a Byzantine History, containing an account of the emperor Michael Palæ gus and Andronicus Palaeologus the elder, in thirteen books. The style is remarkably good and pure for the age. Edited by Possinus, Rome, 1666-1669, 2 vols. fol., and by Bekker, Bonn, 1835, 2 vols. 8vo.

PACINUS or PACINUM (now Capo Passaro), promontory at the southeastern extremity of Sicily, and one of the three promontories which form the triangular figure, the other two being Pelorum and Lilybaeum. By the side of Pachynus was a bay, which was used as a harbor, and which is called by Cicero Portus Pacyni (now Porto di Palo).

PACIANUS, bishop of Barcelona, in Spain, died A.D. 370. He was renowned for his piety, and wrote several books, especially against the Novatians. His works have been published by Tilus, Paris, 1536, and in the Biblioth. Patrum Maxima.]

PACIDIUS, two generals of the Pompeian party in Africa under Metellus Scipio, one of whom died in the battle of Tegea, B.C. 46.]

PACILIUS, the name of a family of the patrician gens, mentioned in the early history of the republic: [the most celebrated were, 1. C. PACILIUS FUSUS, consul B.C. 441 with M. C. CRASSUS, censor B.C. 435 with M. C. MACERINUS, and subsequently one of the consular tribunes in B.C. 426.—2. C. FURIUS P., of the preceding, consul B.C. 412 with Q. VIBULANUS AMBUSTUS.—3. C. FURIUS P., consul B.C. 251 with L. CÆCILIUS METELLUS in the first Punic war.]

PACOMUS, M. 1. A Roman knight, violently possessed of his property by the tribune Claudius.—2. M., a legatus of Silanus, proconsul of Asia, was one of his accusers in A.D.

PACORUS (Πάκορος), 1. Son of Orodes I., king of Parthia. His history is given under ARSACES, 14.—2. King of Parthia. Vid. ARSACES, No.

PACOLUS (Πακωλός: now Sarabat), a small celebrated river of Lydia, rose on the north-side of Mount Tmolus, and flowed north to Sardis into the Hermus, which it joined by stadia below Sardis. The golden sands of the Colchis have passed into a proverb. Lydia long the California of the ancient world, its sands forming so many gold "washings;" and the wealth of the Lydian kings, and the great origin of gold money in that country, the supply of gold was only on the surface, by the beginning of our era it was so far exhausted as not to repay the trouble of collecting it.

PACTYAS (Πακτιάς), a Lydian, who, on the death of Sardis (B.C. 546), was charged by the king with the collection of the revenue of the province. When Cyrus left Sardis on his return to Ecbatana, Pactyas induced the Lydians to revolt against Cyrus; but when an army was sent against him, he first fled to Cyme, then to Mene, and eventually to Chios. He was surrendered by the Chians to the Persians.

PACTRE (Πακτρή: now St. George), a town in Thracian Chersonesus, on the Propontis, twenty-six stadia from Cardia, to which Alcibiades retired when he was banished by the Athenians, B.C. 407.

PACTYCA (Πακτική), the country of the Pactyes (Πάκτες), in the northwest of India, west of the Indus, and in the thirteenth satrapy of the Persian empire, is most probably the north-eastern part of Afghanistan, about Jeilalabad.

[PACULLA, ANNIA or MINIA, a Campanian woman, one of the chief agents in introducing the worship of Bacchus into Rome, c. 200.]

PACUVIUS, M., one of the early Roman tragedians, was born about B.C. 220, at Brundisium, and is said to have been the son of the sister of Ennius. Pacuvius appears to have been brought up at Brundisium, but he afterward repaired to Rome. Here he devoted himself to painting and poetry, and obtained so much distinction in the former art, that a painting of his in the temple of Hercules, in the forum boarium, was regarded as only inferior to the celebrated painting of Fabius Pictor. After living many years at Rome, for he was still there in his eightieth year, he returned to Brundisium on account of the failure of his health, and died in his native town, in the ninetieth year of his age, B.C. 130. We have no further particulars of his life save that his talents gained him the friendship of Lælius, and that he lived on the most intimate terms with his younger rival Accius. Pacuvius was universally allowed by the ancient writers to have been one of the greatest of the Latin tragic poets. (Hor., Ep. ii., 1, 56.) He is especially praised for the loftiness of his thoughts, the vigor of his language, and the extent of his knowledge. Hence we find the epithet doctus frequently applied to him. He was also a favorite with the people, with whom his verses continued to be esteemed in the time of Julius Cæsar. His tragedies were taken from the great Greek writers; but he did not confine himself, like his predecessors, to a mere translation of the latter, but worked up his materials with more freedom and independent judgment. Some of the plays of Pacuvius were not based upon the Greek tragedies, but belonged to the class called Prætextata, in which the subjects were taken from Roman story. One of these was entitled Paulus, which had as its hero L. Æmilius Paulus, the conqueror of Perses, king of Macedonia. The fragments of Pacuvius are published by Bothe, Poët. Lat. Scenic. Fragm., Lips., 1834.

[PADÆI (Παδαίοι), a rude nomad tribe in Northwestern India (perhaps in the modern Multan or Ajmer), who not only ate raw flesh, but also devoured the sick and old of their own people.]

PADUS (now Po), the chief river of Italy, whose name is said to have been of Celtic origin, and to have been given it on account of the pine-trees (in Celtic padi) which grew on its banks. In the Ligurian language it was called Bodencus or Bodincus. Almost all later writers identified the Padus with the fabulous Eridanus, from which amber was obtained, and hence the Roman poets frequently give the name of Eridanus to the Padus. The reason of this identification appears to have been, that the Phœnician vessels received at the mouths of the Padus the amber which had been transported by land from the coasts of the Baltic to those of the Adriatic. The Padus rises from two springs, on the eastern side of Mount Vesuvius (now Monte Vésio) in the Alps and flows with a general easterly direction through the great plain of Cisalpine Gaul, which it divides into two parts, Gallia Cispadana and Gallia Transpadana. It receives numerous affluents, which drain the whole of this vast plain, descending from the Alps on the north and the Apennines on the south. These affluents, increased in the summer by the melting of the snow on the mountains, frequently bring down such a large body of water as to cause the Padus to overflow its banks. The whole course of the river, including its windings, is about four hundred and fifty miles. About twenty miles from the sea the river divides itself into two main branches, of which the northern one was called Padoa (now Massara, Po Grande, or Po delle Fornaci), and the southern one Olana (now Po d'Ariano); and each of these now falls into the Adriatic by several mouths. The ancient writers enumerate seven of these mouths, some of which were canals. They lay between Ravenna and Altinum, and bore the following names, according to Pliny, beginning with the southern and ending with the northern: 1. Padusa, also called Augusta Fossa, was a canal dug by Augustus, which connected Ravenna with the Po. 2. Vatrenus, also called Eridanum Ostium or Spineticum Ostium (now Po al Primaro), from the town of Spina at its mouth. 3. Ostium Caprasiz (now Porto Interio di bell' Ochio). 4. Ostium Sagis (now Porto di Magnavacca). 5. Olana or Velaro, the southern main branch of the river, mentioned above. 6. Padoa, the northern main branch, subdivided into several small branches called Ostia Carbonaria. 7. Fossa Philistinæ, connecting the river, by means of the Tartarus, with the Athesis.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν, Πᾶν or Πᾶν), that is, "the healing," is, according to Homer, the designation of the physician of the Olympian gods, who heals, for example, the wounded Mars (Ares) and Pluto (Hades). After the time of Homer and Hesiod, the word Pæan became a surname of Æsculapius, the god who had the power of healing. The same was, however, used also in the more general sense of deliverer from any evil or calamity, and was thus applied to Apollo and Thanatos, or Death, who are conceived as delivering men from the pains and sorrows of life. With regard to Apollo and Thanatos, however, the name may at the same time contain an allusion to salvus, to strike, since both are also regarded as destroyers. From Apollo himself the name Pæan was transferred to the song dedicated to him, that is, to hymns chanted to Apollo for the purpose of averting an evil, and to warlike songs, which were sung before or during a battle.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν: Πᾶν), a demus in Attica, on the eastern slope of Mount Hymettus, belonging to the tribe Pandionia. It was the demus of the orator Demosthenes.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν), the author of a translation of the history of Eutropius into Greek, whose age is uncertain, but who seems to have lived not long after Eutropius himself. The version is printed in Havercamp's and Verheyk's editions of Eutropius.]

Πᾶν, a people of German origin in Gallia Belgica.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν), a powerful Thracian people, who in early times were spread over a great part of Macedonia and Thrace. According to a legend preserved by Herodotus, they were of Teucric origin; and it is not impossible that they were a branch of the great Phrygian people, a portion of which seems to have settled in Europe. In Homer the Pæonians appear as allies of the Trojans, and are represented as having come from the River Axios. In historical times they inhabited the whole of the north of Macedonia, from the frontiers of Illyria to some little distance east of the River Strymon. Their country was called Πᾶν (Pæonia). The Pæonians were divided into several tribes, independent of each other, and governed by their own chiefs, though at a later period they appear to have owned the authority of one king. The Pæonian tribes on the lower course of the Strymon were subdued by the Persians, B.C. 513, and many of them were transplanted to Phrygia; but the tribes in the north of the country maintained their independence. They were long troublesome neighbors to the Macedonian monarchs, whose territories they frequently invaded and plundered; but they were eventually subdued by Philip, the father of Alexander the Great, who allowed them nevertheless to retain their own monarchs. They continued to be governed by their own kings till a much later period, and these kings were often virtually independent of the Macedonian monarchy. Thus we read of their king Audoleon, whose daughter Pyrrhus married. After the conquest of Macedonia by the Romans, 168, the part of Pæonia east of the Axios formed the second, and the part of Pæonia west of the Axios formed the third of the four districts into which Macedonia was divided by the Romans.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν). 1. Of Ephesus, an architect, probably lived between B.C. 420 and 360. In conjunction with Demetrius, he finally completed the great temple of Diana (Artemis) at Ephesus, which Chersiphron had begun; and, with Daphnis the Milesian, he began to build at Miletus a temple of Apollo, of the Ionic order. The latter was the famous Didymæum, or temple of Apollo Didymus, the ruins of which are still to be seen near Miletus. The former temple, in which the Branchids had an oracle of Apollo, was burned at the capture of Miletus by the army of Darius, 498. The new temple, which was on a scale only inferior to that of Diana (Artemis), was never finished. — 2. Of Mende, in Thrace, a statuary and sculptor, flourished about 435.

Πᾶν (Πᾶν), a Pæonian people on the lower course of the Strymon and the Angles, who were subdued by the Persians, and transplanted to Phrygia by order of Darius, B.C. 513. They returned to their native country with the help of Aristagoras, 500; and we find them settled north of Mount Pangeus in the expedition of Xerxes, 480.

Πᾶν or Πᾶν (Πᾶν or Πᾶν), the name of two kings of Bosphorus. 1. Son of Leucon, succeeded his brother Spartacus, B.C. 349, and reigned thirty-eight years. He continued the same friendly relations with the Pestinus Sinus. Vid. Pæstum.

Pæstus (Pestanus), called Ποσειδωνία (Posidonia: Ποσειδωνιάτης) originally, was a city acania, situated between four and five miles east of the mouth of the Silarus, and near bay which derived its name from the town ποσειδωνιάτης κόλπος, Pæstus Sinus: now / of Salerno). Its origin is uncertain, but as probably in existence before it was col-ized by the Sybarites about B.C. 534. It became a powerful and flourishing city; after its capture by the Lucanians (between 424), it gradually lost the characteristics of a Greek city, and its inhabitants at length to speak the Greek language. Its ant name of Posidonia was probably changed that of Pæstum at this time. Under the enacy of the Romans, who founded a Latin ry at Pæstum about B.C. 374, the town ally sank in importance; and in the time ugustus it is only mentioned on account of beautiful roses grown in the neighborhood.
ruins of Pæstum are striking and magnificent. They consist of the remains of walls, an amphitheatre, of two fine temples, and of her building. The two temples are in the style, and are some of the most remarkable remains of antiquity.

Pæstus (Παιστός), a town in the Troad, men-

Pæstus, P. Τυρκόβιλος, was elected consul for B.C. 65 with P. Cornelius Sulla; but he and Sulla were accused of bribery by L. Aurelius Cotta and L. Manlius Torquatus, and condemned. Their election was accordingly declared void, and their accusers were chosen consuls in their stead. Enraged at his disappointment, Pæstus conspired with Catiline to murder the consuls Cotta and Torquatus; and this design is said to have been frustrated solely by the impatience of Catiline, who gave the signal prematurely before the whole of the conspirators had assembled. Vid. Catilina. Pæstus afterward took an active part in the Catilinarian conspiracy, which broke out in Cicero's consulship, 63. After the suppression of the conspiracy Pæstus was brought to trial for the share he had had in it; he was condemned, and went into exile to Epirus, where he was living when Cicero himself went into banishment in 58. Cicero was then much alarmed lest Pæstus should make an attempt upon his life.

Pæstus, C. Καμακηνίλος, sometimes called Camakinus, consul A.D. 61, was sent by Nero in 68 to the assistance of Domitius Corbulo in Armenia. He was defeated by Vologases, king of Parthia, and purchased peace of the Parthians on the most disgraceful terms. After the accession of Vespasian he was appointed governor of Syria, and deprived Antiochus IV.
king of Commagene of his kingdom.

Pæstus or Pæstus (Παγὰι, Att. Πηγαί: Παγαι-ες, now Psatho), a town in Megaris, a colony from Megara, was situated at the eastern extremity of the Acoyonian Sea, and was the most important town in the country after Megara. It possessed a good harbor.

Pæstus, called by the Romans Πλοῖσα, ἡ (Παγασαί: now Volo), a town of Thessaly, on the coast of Magnesia, and on the bay called after it Σινὺς Παγασαῖος or ΠΑΓΑΣΙΚΟΣ (Παγ-ασιακὸς κόλπος: now Gulf of Volo). It was the port of Iolcos, and afterward of Phere, and is celebrated in mythology as the place where Jason built the ship Argo. Hence some of the ancients derived its name from πῆγνυμι; but others connected the name with the fountains (πηγαί) in the neighborhood. The adjective Pagasaus is applied to Jason on account of his building the ship Argo, and to Apollo because he had a sanctuary at Pagasæ. The adjective is also used in the general sense of Thessalian: thus Alceatis, the wife of Admetus, is called by Ovid Pagasaæ conjux.

Æneas, slain by Camilla in Italy.)

Pæstus (Πάγρος: now Pagras, Bagras, *Bar-

Mount Amanus, at the foot of the pass called by Ptolemy the Syrian Gates, on the road between Antioch and Alexandria: the scene of the battle between Alexander Balas and Demotrius Nicator, B.C. 145.

five hundred to six hundred feet high, a little north of Smyrna in Ionia. It was crowned with PALÆMON (Παλαίμων). 1. Son of Athamas and Ino, was originally called Melicertes. When his mother, who was driven mad by Juno (Hera), and thrown herself, with her boy, into the sea, both were changed into marine divinities, Ino becoming Leucothea, and Melicertes Palæmon. For details, vid. ATHAMAS. According to some, Melicertes, after his apotheosis, was called Glaucus, whereas, according to another version, Glaucus is said to have leaped into the sea from his love of Melicertes. The body of Melicertes, according to the common tradition, was washed by the waves, or carried by dolphins into the port Schœnus on the Corinthian isthmus, or to that spot on the coast where the altar of Palæmon subsequently stood. There the body was found by his uncle Sisyphus, who ordered it to be carried to Corinth, and on the command of the Nereides he instituted the Isthmian games and sacrifices of black bulls in honor of the deified Palæmon. In the island of Tenedos it is said that children were sacrificed to him, and the whole worship seems to have had something gloomy about it. The Romans identified Palæmon with their own god Portunus or Portumnus. Vid. PORTUNUS.—2. Q. REMMIUS PALÆMON, a grammarian in the reigns of Tiberius, Caligula, and Claudius. He was a native of Vicentia (now Vicenza), in the north of Italy, and was originally a slave; but having been manumitted, he opened a school at Rome, where he became the most celebrated grammarian of his time, though his moral character was infamous. He is twice mentioned by Juvenal (vi. 451; vii., 251). He was the master of Quintilian.

PALÆPHÁTUS (Παλαίφατος). 1. Of Athens, a mythical epic poet of the ante-Homeric period. The time at which he lived is uncertain, but he appears to have been usually placed after Phemonoe (vid. PHEMONOE), though some writers assigned him even an earlier date.—2. Of Paros or Priene, lived in the time of Artaxerxes. Suidas attributes to him the work "On Incredible Tales," spoken of below.—3. Of Abydus, an historian, lived in the time of Alexander the Great, and is stated to have been loved by the philosopher Aristotle.—4. An Egyptian or Athenian, and a grammarian. His most celebrated work was entitled Troica (Τρωικά), which is frequently referred to by the ancient grammarians. There is extant a small work in fifty-one sections, entitled Παλαίφατος περί ἀπίστευτων, or "Of Incredible Tales," giving a brief account of some of the most celebrated Greek legends. It is an abstract of a much larger work, which is lost. It was to the original work to which Virgil refers (Ciris, 88): "Docta Palæphatis testatur voce papyrus." It is doubtful who was the author of this work; but as he adopts the rationalistic interpretation of the myths, he must be looked upon as a disciple of Eumelus (vid. EUMELOS), and may thus have been an Alexandrine Greek, and the same person as No. 4. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi Græci, Strusswick, 1843.

PALÆUS (Παλαίρος; Παλαίρεός), a town on the coast of Acarnania, near Leuca.

PALÆSTE (now Palasa), a town of Epirus, on the coast of Chaonia, and a little south of the Acrocercaunian Mountains: here Caesar landed his forces when he crossed over to Greece to carry on the war against Pompey.

PALÆSTINA (Παλαιστίνη, ή Παλαιστίνη Στρατ.-Παλαιστινός, Palæstinus, and rarely Palæstinensis: now Palestina, or the Holy Land), is the Greek and Roman form of the Hebrew word which was used to denote the country of the Philistines, and which was extended to the whole country. In the Scriptures it is called CANAAN, from Canaan, the son of Ham, whose descendants were its first inhabitants; the LAND OF ISRAEL, the LAND OF PROMISE, the LAND OF JEHOVAH, and the HOLY LAND. The Romans usually called it JUDÆA, extending to the whole country the name of its southern part. It was regarded by the Greeks and Romans as a part of Syria. Its extent is pretty well defined by natural boundaries, namely, the Mediterranean on the west; the mountains of Lebanon on the north; the Jordan and its lakes on the east, is the original extent of the country as defined in the Old Testament, but in the wider and usual extent of the country, the Arabian Desert was its boundary on the east; and on the south and southwest, the deserts which stretch north of the head of the Red Sea as far as the Dead Sea and the Mediterranean: here it was separated from Egypt by the small stream called in Scripture the River of Egypt (probably the brook El-Arish), which fell into the Mediterranean at Rhinocolura (now El-Arish), the frontier town of Egypt. The southern boundary of the territory east of Jordan was the River Arnon (now Wady-el-Mojib). The extent of country within these limits was about eleven thousand square miles. The political boundaries varied at different periods. By the covenant of God with Abraham (Gen., xv., 18), the whole land was given to his descendants, from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates; but the Israelites never had the faith or courage to take permanent possession of this their lot; the nearest approach made to the realization of the promise was the reigns of David and Solomon, when the conquests of the former embraced a large part of Syria, and the latter built Tadmor (afterwards Palmyra) in the Syrian Desert; and, for a time, the Euphrates seems to have been the border of the kingdom on the northeast (vid. 2 Sam. viii., 3; 1 Chron., xviii., 3). On the west again, the Israelites never had full possession of the Mediterranean coast, a strip of which north of Mount Carmel, was always retained by the Phœnicians (vid. PHœNICIA); and another portion in the southwest was held by the Philistines, who were independent, except during brief intervals. On the south and east, again, portions of the land were frequently subjected by the neighboring people of Amalek, Edom, Midian, Moab, Ammon, &c. On the north, except during the reigns of David and Solomon, Palestine ceased at the southern entrance of the valley of Colesyria, and at Mount Hermon to Asitibanus. In the physical formation of Pal-time, the most remarkable feature is the depression which is formed by the valley of the Jordan and its lakes (vid. JORDANES), between which and the Mediterranean the country is intersected by mountains, chiefly connected with the Lebanon system, and running north and south. Between these ranges, and between a central range and the western coast, are some comparatively extensive plains, such as those of Esdraelon and Sharon, and several smaller valleys; in the south of the country the mountains gradually subside into the rocky deserts of Arabia Petraea. The valleys and slopes of the hills are extremely fertile, and were much more so in ancient times, when the soil on the mountain sides was preserved by races, which are now destroyed through neglect or wantonness. This division of the country has only a few small rivers (besides mountain streams), which fall into the Mediterranean: the chief of them are the Belus, just south of Idolmais (now Acre), the Kishon, flowing from Mount Tabor, through the plain of Esdraelon, and falling into the Bay of Acre north of Mount Carmel, the Choraeus, north of Caesarea, the Nahr, west of Sebastia (Samarita), the Jarkon, north of Joppa, the Esbek, near Askalon, and the Beasor, near Gaza. On the east of the Jordan, the land rises toward the rocky desert of the Hauran (the ancient Auranitis), and the hills bordering the Syrian Desert, its lower portion, watered by the river, forming rich pastures, watered by the eastern tributaries of the Jordan, the chief of which are the Hieromax, the Jabbok, the Arnon, the last flowing into the Dead Sea. The earliest inhabitants of Palestine were several tribes of Canaanites. It is unnecessary to recount in detail those events with which we are familiar through the sacred history: the divine call of Abraham from Mesopotamia to live as a stranger in the land which God promised to his descendants, and the story of him, and his son's, and his grandson's residence in it till Israel and his family removed to Egypt; their return and conquest of the land of Canaan and of the portion of territory east of the Jordan, and the partition of the whole among the twelve tribes: the contests with the surrounding nations, and the government by judges, till the establishment of the monarchy under Saul: the conquests of David, the splendid reign of Solomon, and the division of the kingdom under Rehoboam into the kingdom of Israel, including two thirds of the country west of Jordan, and all east of it, and the kingdom of Judah, including the southern portion which lay left, between the Mediterranean on the west, and the Dead Sea and a small extent of Arabia on the east: and the histories of these two monarchies down to their overthrow by the Assyrians and Babylonians respectively. The former of these conquests made an important change in the population of Palestine by the removal of the greater part of the inhabitants of the kingdom of Israel, and the settlement in their place of heathen nations from other parts of the Assyrian empire, thus restricting the country occupied by the genuine Israelites within the limits of the kingdom of Judah. Hence the names of Judaea and Jews are applied to the country and the people in their subsequent history. Between these last and the mixed people of North Palestine a deadly enmity arose; the natural dislike of the pure race of Israel to heathen foreigners being aggravated by the wrongs they suffered from them, especially at their return from the Babylonian captivity, and still more by the act of religious usurpation of which the remnant of the Northern Israelites were guilty at a later period, in setting up a temple for themselves on Mount Gerizim. Vid. SAMARIA. The date assigned to the Assyrian conquest of the kingdom of Israel is B.C. 721. The remainder of the history of the kingdom of Judah (passing over its religious history, which is most important during this period) consists of alternate contests with, and submissions to, the kings of Assyria, Egypt, and Babylon, till the conquest of the country by Nebuchadnezzar and the removal of a part of its people to Babylonia, in 588, and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple, after the rebellion of Zedekiah, in 586, when a still larger portion of the people were carried captive to Babylon, while others escaped to Egypt. In 564, during the siege of Tyre, Nebuchadnezzar sent a further portion of the Jews into captivity; but there was still a considerable remnant left in the land, and (what is very important) foreign settlers were not introduced: so that, when Cyrus, after overthrowing the Babylonian empire, issued his edict for the return of the Jews to their own land (B.C. 536), there was no great obstacle to their quiet settlement in it. They experienced some trouble from the jealousy and attacks of the Samaritans, and the changeable dispositions of the Persian court; but at length, by the efforts of Zerubbabel and Joshua, and the preaching of Haggai and Zechariah, the new temple was finished and dedicated in 516, and Jerusalem was rebuilt. Fresh bands of Jewish exiles returned under Ezra, 458, and Nehemiah, 445; and, between this time and that of the Macedonian conquest, Judaea was repopled by the Jews, and through the tolerance of the Persian kings, it was governed virtually by the high-priests. In B.C. 332, after Alexander had taken Tyre and Gaza, he visited Jerusalem, and received the quiet submission of the Jews, paying the most marked respect to their religion. Under the successors of Alexander, Palestine belonged alternately to Egypt and Syria, the contest between whose kings for its possession are too complicated to recount here; but its internal government seems to have been pretty much in the hands of the high-priests, until the tyranny of Antiochus Epiphanes provoked the successful revolt under the Maccabees or Asmonians, whose history is given under MACCABEES, and the history of the Idumean dynasty, who succeeded them, is given under ANTIPATER, HERODES, and ARCHELAUS. The later Asmonian princes had regained the whole of Palestine, including the districts of Judaea, Samaria, and Galilee (besides Idumea), west of the Jordan, and the several districts of Peraea, Batanea, Gaulonitis, Iturea, and Trachonitis or Auranitis, east of it; and this was the extent of Herod's kingdom. But, from B.C. 63, when Pompey took Jerusalem, the country was really subject to the Romans. At the death of Herod, his kingdom was divided between his some as tetrarchs, under the sanction of Augustus, Archelaus receiving Judæa, Samaria, and Idumæa, Herod Antipas Galilee and Peræa, and Philip Batanæa, Gaulonitis, and Trachonitis; all standing to the Roman empire in a relation of virtual subjection, which successive events converted into an integral union. First, A.D. 7, Archelaus was deposed by Augustus, and Judæa was placed under a Roman procurator; next, about 31, Philip died, and his government was united to the province of Syria, and was in 37 again conferred on Herod Agrippa I., with the title of king, and with the addition of Abilene, the district round Damascus. In 39, Herod Antipas was banished to Gaul, and his tetrarchy was added to the kingdom of Herod Agrippa; and two years later he received from Claudius the government of Judæa and Samaria, and thus Palestine was reunited under a nominal king. On his death in 44, Palestine again became a part of the Roman province of Syria under the name of Judæa, which was governed by a procurator. The Jews were, however, most turbulent subjects of the Roman empire, and at last they broke out into a general rebellion, which, after a most sanguinary war, was crushed by Vespasian and Titus; and the latter took and destroyed Jerusalem in A.D. 70. Under Constantine, Palestine was divided afresh into the three provinces of P. Prima in the centre, P. Secunda in the north, and P. Tertia, the south of Judæa, with Idumæa.

PALAMÉDES (Παλαμήδης). 1. Son of Nauplius and Clymene. He joined the Greeks in their expedition against Troy; but Agamemnon, Diomedes, and Ulysses, envious of his fame, caused a captive Phrygian to write to Palamedes a letter in the name of Priam, and bribed a servant of Palamedes to conceal the letter under his master's bed. They then accused Palamedes of treachery; upon searching his tent, they found the letter which they themselves had dictated, and thereupon they caused him to be stoned to death. When Palamedes was led to death, he exclaimed, "Truth, I lament thee, for thou hast lied even before me." According to some traditions, it was Ulysses alone who hated and persecuted Palamedes. The cause of this hatred is also stated differently. According to some, Ulysses hated him because he had been compelled by him to join the Greeks against Troy; according to others, because he had been severely censured by Palamedes for returning with empty hands from a foraging excursion into Thrace. The manner in which Palamedes perished is likewise related differently. Some say that Ulysses and Diomedes induced him to descend into a well, where they pretended they had discovered a treasure, and when he was below they cast stones upon him, and killed him; others state that he was drowned by them while fishing; and others, that he was killed by Paris with an arrow. The place where he was killed is either Colon in Troas, or in Tenedos, or at Germæus. The story of Palamedes, which is not mentioned by Homer, seems to have been first related in the Cypria, and was afterward developed by the tragic poets, especially by Euripides, and lastly by the sophists, who liked to look upon Palamedes as their pattern. The tragic poets and sophists describe him as a sage among the Greeks, and as a poet; as he is said to have invented light houses, measures, scales, the discus, dice, the alphabet, and the art of regulating sentinels.—2. A Greek grammarian, was a contemporary of Athenæus, who introduces him as one of the speakers at his work.

PALATIUM. Vid. ROMA.

PALE (Πάλη: Παλεις, Ion. Παλεις, Att. Πάλη, in Polyb. Παλαίς: ruins near Lerari), one of the four cities of Cephallenia, situated at a height opposite Zacynthus.

PALES, a Roman divinity of flocks and sheep herds, is described by some as a male, and by others as a female divinity. Hence some modern writers have inferred that Pales was a combination of both sexes; but such a monstrosity is altogether foreign to the religion of the Romans. Some of the rites performed at the festival of Pales, which was celebrated on the 21st of April, the birth-day of the city of Rome, would seem to indicate that the divinity was female; but, besides the express statements to the contrary, there are also other reasons for believing that Pales was a male divinity. The name seems to be connected with Palatius, the centre of all the earliest legends of Rome, and the god himself was with the Romans the embodiment of the same idea as Pan among the Greeks. Respecting the festival of the Pales vid. Dict. of Antiq., s. v.

[PALFURIUS SURA, one of the delators under Domitian, was son of a man of consular rank. He was expelled from the senate by Vespasian, and then applied himself to the study of the Stoic philosophy, and became distinguished by his eloquence. He was restored to the senate by Domitian, and became one of the informers for that emperor.]

PALICÁNUS, LOLLIVS. Vid. LOLLIVS.

[PALICE (Παλική), a city of Sicily, founded by Ducetius, southwest of Leontini, and having in its vicinity the famous lakes and the temple of the deities called Palici. It was in ruin in the time of Diodorus Siculus. Vid. PALICI.]

PALICI (Παλικοί), were Sicilian gods, twin sons of Jupiter (Zeus) and the nymph Tanais, the daughter of Vulcan (Hephestus). Sometimes they are called sons of Vulcan (Hephestus) by Ætina, the daughter of Oceanus. Tanais, from fear of Juno (Hera), prayed to be swallowed up by the earth; her prayer was granted; but in due time she sent forth from the earth two boys, who, according to the absurd etymology of the ancients, were called Παλικοί, from πάλιν katobai. They were worshipped in the neighborhood of Mount Ætna, near Palice, and in the earliest times human sacrifices were offered to them. Their sanctuary was an asylum for runaway slaves, and near it there gushed forth from the earth two sulphureous fountains, called Deilloi, or brothers of the Palici, at which solemn oaths were taken. The oaths were written on tablets, and thrown into one of the fountains; if the tablet swam on the water, the oath was considered to be true; but if it sank down, the oath was regarded as a perjury, and was believed to be punished instantaneously by blindness or death.

PALINURUM (now Cape Palmaro), a promontory

the western coast of Lucania, which was said to have derived its name from Palinurus, the son of Iasus, and pilot of the ship of Æneas, who fell into the sea, and was murdered on the coast by the natives.

[PALIURUS (Παλιούρος), a town of Africa on the borders of Cyrenaica and Marmarica, on a river of the same name.]

[PALIA (Πάλλα) or PALM (now probably Porto Palo), a city on the south coast of Corsica, at the termination of the Roman road running along its eastern coast.]

PALLAS (Παλλάς), a canal in Babylonia, cut from the Euphrates, at a point eight hundred stadia (eighty geographical miles) south of Babylon, westward to the edge of the Arabian Desert, where it lost itself in marshes.

PALLIDAS (Παλλίδας), the author of a large number of epigrams in the Greek Anthology, was a pagan and an Alexandrian grammarian. He lived at the beginning of the fifth century of the Christian era, for in one of his epigrams he speaks of Hypatia, the daughter of Theon, as still alive. Hypatia was murdered in A.D. 415.

PALLADIUM (Παλλάδιον), properly any image of Pallas Athena (Minerva), but generally applied to an ancient image of this goddess, which was kept hidden and secret, and was revered as a pledge of the safety of the town where it existed. Among these ancient images of Pallas there is more celebrated than the Trojan Palladium, concerning which there was the following tradition: Minerva (Athena) was brought up by Dion; and when his daughter Pallas and Minerva (Athena) were once wrestling together for the sake of exercise, Jupiter (Zeus) interfered in the struggle, and suddenly held the ægis before the face of Pallas. Pallas, while looking up to Jupiter (Zeus), was wounded by Minerva (Athena), and died. Minerva (Athena), in her sorrow, caused an image of the maiden to be made, round which she hung the ægis. When Electra had come as a suppliant to the Palladium, Jupiter (Zeus) hurled it down from heaven upon the earth, because it had been sullied by the hands of one who was no longer a pure maiden. The image fell upon the earth at Troy when Ilium was just beginning to build the city. Ilium erected a sanctuary to it. According to some, the image was dedicated by Electra, and according to others, it was given by Jupiter (Zeus) to Dardanus. The image itself is said to have been three cubits in height, with its legs close together, and holding in its right hand a spear, and in the left a spindle and a distaff. This Palladium remained at Troy until Ulysses and Diomedes contrived to carry it away, because the city could not be taken so long as it was in the possession of that sacred treasure. According to some accounts, Troy contained two Palladia, one of which was carried off by Ulysses and Diomedes, while the other was conveyed by Æneas to Italy, or the one taken by the Greeks was a mere imitation, while that which Æneas brought to Italy was the genuine image. But this two-fold Palladium can probably be a mere invention, to account for its existence in more than one place. Several towns both in Greece and Italy claimed the honor of possessing the genuine Trojan Palladium, as, for example, Argos and Athens, where it was believed that Demophon took it from Diomedes on his return from Troy. Vid. Demophon. This Palladium at Athens, however, was different from another image of Pallas there, which was also called Palladium, and stood on the acropolis. In Italy the cities of Rome, Lavinium, Luceria, and Siris likewise pretended to possess the Trojan Palladium.

PALLADIUS (Παλλάδιος). 1. Of Methone, a sophist or rhetorician, who lived in the reign of Constantine the Great.—2. Bishop of Helenopolis, in Bithynia, to which he was raised A.D. 400. He was ordained by Chrysostom; and on the banishment of the latter, Palladius was accused of holding the opinions of Origen, and, fearful of the violence of his enemies, he fled to Rome, 405. Shortly afterward he ventured to return to the East, but was arrested and banished to the extremity of Upper Egypt. He was afterward restored to his bishopric of Helenopolis, from which he was translated to that of Aspona or Aspuna in Galatia, perhaps about 419 or 420. Three works in Greek have come down to us under the name of Palladius, but there has been considerable dispute whether they were written by one individual or more: (1.) Historia Lausiacæ, “the Lausiac History,” so called from its being dedicated to Lausus, a chamberlain at the imperial court. This work contains internal proofs of having been written by the Bishop of Helenopolis. It gives biographical notices or characteristic anecdotes of a number of ascetics with whom Palladius was personally acquainted, or concerning whom he received information from those who had known them personally. Edited by Meursius, Lugd. Bat., 1616. (2.) The Life of Chrysostom, was probably written by a different person from the Bishop of Helenopolis. Edited by Bigotius, Paris, 1680. (3.) De Gentibus Indiae et Brachmanibus (Brahmanas). The authorship of this work is uncertain. It appears that the writer himself had visited India. Edited by Camerarius in Libri Gnomologicus, 8vo, Lipsæ, without date; and by Bisseus, London, 1665.—3. Surnamed Iatrographista, a Greek medical writer, of whose life nothing is known. He lived after Galen. We possess three works commonly attributed to him, namely, two books of commentaries on Hippocrates, and a short treatise on Fevers, all of which are taken chiefly from Galen.—4. PALLADIUS RUTILIUS TAURUS ÆMILIANUS, the author of a treatise De Re Rustica, in the form of a Farmer's Calendar, the various operations connected with agriculture and a rural life being arranged in regular order, according to the seasons in which they ought to be performed. It is comprised in fourteen books: the first is introductory; the twelve following contain the duties of the twelve months in succession, commencing with January; the last is a poem, in eighty-five elegiac couplets, upon the art of grafting (De Insitione). A considerable portion of the work is taken from Columella. The date of the author is uncertain, but it is most probable that he lived in the middle of the fourth century of the Christian era. The work was very popular in the Middle Ages. Edited in the Scriptores Rei Rusticæ by Gesner, Lipsæ, 1735, reprinted by Ernesti in 1772, and by Schneider, Lipsæ, 1794.

PALLANTIS (Pallantinus : now Palencia), the chief town of the Vaccei in the north of Hispania Tarraconensis, and on a tributary of the Durus.

PALLANTIAS and PALLANTIS, patronymics given to Aurora, the daughter of the giant Pallas.

PALLANTIUM (Παλλάντιον : Παλλαντιεύς), an ancient town of Arcadia near Tegea, said to have been founded by Pallas, the son of Lycaon. Evander is said to have come from this place, and to have called the town, which he founded on the banks of the Tiber, Pallantium (afterward Palantium and Palatium), after the Arcadian town. On the foundation of Megalopolis, most of the inhabitants of Pallantium settled in the new city ; and the town remained almost deserted, till it was restored by Antoninus Pius, and exempted from taxes on account of its supposed connection with the imperial city.

[PALLANTIUS, epithet of Evander. Vid. PALLAS, No. 4.]

PALLAS (Πάλλας). 1. One of the Titans, son of Crius and Eurybia, husband of Styx, and father of Zelus, Cratos, Bia, and Nice.—2. A giant, slain by Minerva (Athena) in the battle with the gods.—3. According to some traditions, the father of Minerva (Athena), who slew him when he attempted to violate her.—4. Son of Lycaon, and grandfather of Evander, is said to have founded the town of Pallantium in Arcadia. Hence Evander is called by the poets Pallantius heros.—5. Son of Evander, and an ally of Æneas, was slain by the Rutulian Turnus.—6. Son of the Athenian king Pandion, and father of Clytus and Butes. His two sons were sent with Cephalus to implore assistance of Æacus against Minos. Pallas was slain by Theseus. The celebrated family of the Pallantidæ at Athens traced their origin from this Pallas.

PALLAS (Πάλλας), a surname of ATHENA (Minerva). In Homer this name always appears united with that of Athena, as Παλλὰς Ἀθήνη, or Παλλὰς Ἀθηναίη ; but in later writers we also find Pallas alone instead of Athena (Minerva). Some ancient writers derive the name from πάλλειν, to brandish, in reference to the goddess brandishing the spear or ægis ; others derive it from the giant Pallas, who was slain by Athena (Minerva). But it is more probable that Pallas is the same word as πάλλας, i. e., a virgin or maiden.

PALLAS, a favorite freedman of the Emperor Claudius. In conjunction with another freedman, Narcissus, he administered the affairs of the empire. After the death of Messalina, Pallas persuaded the weak emperor to marry Agrippina ; and as Narcissus had been opposed to this marriage, he now lost his former power, and Pallas and Agrippina became the rulers of the Roman world. It was Pallas who persuaded Claudius to adopt the young Domitius (afterward the Emperor Nero), the son of Agrippina ; and it was doubtless with the assistance of Pallas that Agrippina poisoned her husband. Nero, soon after his accession, became tired of his mother's control, and, as one step toward emancipating himself from her authority, he deprived Pallas of all his public offices, and dismissed him from the palace in 56. He was suffered to live unmolested for some years, till at length his immense wealth excited the rapacity of Nero, who had him removed by poison in 68. His enormous wealth, which was acquired during the reign of Claudius, had become phenomenal, as we see from the line in Juvenal (l. 109) ego possideo plus Pallante et Licimo. The brother of Pallas was Antonius or Claudius Felix, who was appointed by Claudius procurator of Judæa. Vid. FELIX, ANTONIUS.

PALLAS IACUS. Vid. THETON.

PALLÈNE (Πάληνη). 1. (Πάληνος, Πάληνιος), the most westerly of the three peninsulas running out from Chalcidice in Macedonia. It is said to have been formerly called Phlegra (Φλέγρα), and on the narrow isthmus, which connected it with the main land, stood the important town of Potidæa.—2. (Πάλην, rarely Παλλήναιος), a demus in Attica belonging to the tribe Antiochia, was situated on one of the slopes of Pentelicus, a few miles south-west of Marathon. It possessed a temple of Minerva (Athena), surnamed Pallenis (Πάληνις) from the place ; and in its neighborhood the contest between Pisistratus and the party opposed to him took place.

PALMA (now Palma), a Roman colony on the southwest coast of the island Balears Major (now Majorca).

[PALMA, A. CORNELIUS, was consul in A.D. 99, and a second time in 109. Between his first and second consulships he was governor of Syria, and conquered the part of Arabia around Petra about A.D. 106. He was put to death by order of Hadrian on the latter's accession to the throne in 117.]

PALMARIA (now Palmaruola), a small uninhabited island off the coast of Latium and the Promontory Circeium.

[PALMUS, a Trojan warrior wounded by Menestius, who stripped him of his armor.]

PALMŪRA (Πάλμυρα : Παλμυρηνός, Παλμυρηνός ; in the Old Testament, Tadmor : Tadmor), a celebrated city of Syria, stood on an oasis of the great Syrian Desert, which had its position must have been in the earliest times a halting-place for the caravans between Syria and Mesopotamia. Here Solomon built a city, which was called in Hebrew Tadmor, that is, the city of palm-trees ; and of this name the Greek Πάλμυρα is a translation. It lies in 33° 18' north latitude, and 38° 14' east longitude, and was reckoned two hundred and thirty-seven Roman miles from the coast of Syria, one hundred and seventy-six northeast of Damascus, eighty east of Emesa, and one hundred and thirteen southeast of Apamea. With the exception of a tradition that it was destroyed by Nebuchadnezzar, we hear nothing of it till the time of the government of the East by M. Antonius, who marched to surprise it, but the inhabitants retreated with their movable property beyond the Euphrates. Under the early Roman emperors it was a free city and a great commercial emporium. Its position on the border between the Parthian and Roman dominions gave it the command of the trade of both, but also subjected it to the injuries of war. Under Hadrian and the Antonines it was highly favored and reached its greatest splendor. The history of its temporary elevation to the rank of a capital in the third century is related under ODEANATHUS and ZENOBIA. On its capture of Aurelian in 270, it was plundered and soon afterward an insurrection of its inhabitants led to its partial destruction. It was fortified by Justinian, but never recovered from its fall. In the Arabian conquest it was one of the first cities taken; but it was still inhabited by a small population, chiefly of Jews, till it was taken and plundered by Timour (Tamerlane) in 1390. It has long been entirely deserted, except when a horde of Bedouins pitch their tents among its splendid ruins. Those ruins, which were a most striking object in the midst of the desert, are of the Roman period, and decidedly inferior in the style of architecture, as well as in grandeur of effect, to those of Baalbek (vid. IKTOROLIA), the sister deserted city of Syria. The finest remains are those of the temple of the Sun; the most interesting are the square imperial towers of from three to five stories. The streets and the foundations of the houses are traceable to some extent; and there are several inscriptions in Greek and in the native Palmyrene dialect, besides one in Hebrew and one or two in Latin. The surrounding district of PALMYRENE contained the Syrian Desert from the eastern border of Cœlesyria to the Euphrates.

PANISUS (Πάνισος). 1. A southern tributary of the Peneus in Thessaly.—2. (Now Parnatza), the chief river of Messenia, rises in the eastern part of the country, forty stadia east of Ithome, flows first southwest, and then south through the Messenian plain, and falls into the Messenian Gulf.—3. A small river in Laconia, falls into the Messenian Gulf near Leuctra. It was at one time the ancient boundary between Laconia and Messenia.

PANINUS (Παννίνος). 1. A Theban general of considerable celebrity, was connected with Epaminondas by political and friendly ties. When Philip was sent as a hostage to Thebes, he was placed under the care of Paninnes. He distinguished himself in the defence and support of Megalopolis, and defeated the forces of the Persian king Ochus.—2. An Athenian rhetorician, a contemporary of Cicero, who calls him the most eloquent man in Greece. M. Brutus studied under him.]

PAMPILIA or PAMPILIUM (Παμφίλη, Πάμφιον), a village of Etolia, destroyed by the Macedonians.

PAMPILIA (Παμφίλη), a female historian of considerable reputation, who lived in the reign of Nero. She is described by some writers as a native of Epidaurus, by others as an Egyptian. Her principal work, of which Photius has given some extracts, was a kind of Historical Miscellany (entitled σμμικτων ιστορικων υπομνηστων λεγοι). It was not arranged according to subjects or according to any settled plan, but it was more like a common-place book, in which each piece of information was set down as it fell under the notice of the writer. Modern scholars are best acquainted with the name of Pamphila from a statement in her work, preserved by A. Gellius (xv., 23), by which it is ascertained the year of the birth of Hellenicus Herodotus, and Thucydides respectively.

PAMPILUS (Πάμφιλος). 1. A disciple of Plato who is only remembered by the circumstance that Epicurus, when a young man, heard him at Samos. Epicurus used to speak of him with great contempt, that he might not be thought to owe any thing to his instruction; for it was the great boast of Epicurus that he was the sole author of his own philosophy.—2. An Alexandrian grammarian, of the school of Aristarchus, and the author of a lexicon, which is supposed by some scholars to have formed the foundation of the lexicon of Hesychius. He appears to have lived in the first century of our era.—3. A philosopher or grammarian of Nicopolis, the author of a work on agriculture, of which there are considerable fragments in the Geoponica—

4. Presbyter of Cæsarea, in Palestine, saint and martyr, and celebrated for his friendship with Eusebius, who, as a memorial of this intimacy, assumed the surname of Pamphilus. Vid. EUSEBIUS. He suffered martyrdom A.D. 307. The life of Pamphilus seems to have been entirely devoted to the cause of biblical literature. He was an ardent admirer and follower of Origen. He formed, at Cæsarea, an important public library, chiefly of ecclesiastical authors. Perhaps the most valuable of the contents of this library were the Tetrapla and Hexapla of Origen, from which Pamphilus, in conjunction with Eusebius, formed a new recension of the Septuagint, numerous copies of which were put into circulation.—5. Of Amphipolis, one of the most distinguished of the Greek painters, flourished about B.C. 390–350. He was the disciple of Eupompus, the founder of the Sicyonian school of painting, for the establishment of which, however, Pamphilus seems to have done much more than even Eupompus himself. Of his own works we have most scanty accounts; but as a teacher of his art he was surpassed by none of the ancient masters. According to Pliny, he was the first artist who possessed a thorough acquaintance with all branches of knowledge, especially arithmetic and geometry, without which he used to say that the art could not be perfected. All science, therefore, which could in any way contribute to form the perfect artist, was included in his course of instruction, which extended over ten years, and for which the fee was no less than a talent. Among those who paid this price for his tuition were Apelles and Melanthius. Not only was the school of Pamphilus remarkable for the importance which the master attached to general learning, but also for the minute attention which he paid to accuracy in drawing.

PAMPHOS (Πάμφος), a mythical poet, who is placed by Pausanias later than Olen, and much earlier than Homer. His name is connected particularly with Attica.

PAMPHTILIA (Παμφύλια; Πάμφιλος, Παμφύλιος, Pamphylus), in its original and more restricted sense, was a narrow strip of the southern coast of Asia Minor, extending in a sort of arch along the SINUS PAMPHYLICUS (now Gulf of Adana), to tween Lycia on the west and Cilicia on the east, and on the north bordering on Pisidia. Its boundaries, as commonly stated, were Mount Climax on the west, the River Melas on the east, and the foot of Mount Taurus on the north; but the statements are not very exact: Strabo gives to the coast of Pamphylia a length of six hundred and forty stadia, from Olbia on the west to Ptolemais, some distance east of the Melas, and he makes its width barely two miles; and there are still other different accounts. It was a belt of mountain coast-land, intersected by rivers flowing down from the Taurus in a short course, but several of them with a considerable body of water: the chief of them, going from west to east, were the CATARRHACTES, CESTRUS, EURYMEDON, and MELAS (No. 6), all navigable for some distance from their mouths. The inhabitants were a mixture of races, whence their name Πάμφυλοι, of all races (the genuine old form, the other in -ιοι is later). Besides the aboriginal inhabitants of the Semitic (Syro-Arabian) family and Cilicians, there were very early Greek settlers and later Greek colonies in the land. Tradition ascribed the first Greek settlements to Μορσος, after the Trojan war, from whom the country was in early times called Μορσορία. It was successively a part of the Persian, Macedonian, Greco-Syrian, and Pergamene kingdoms, and passed by the will of Attalus III. to the Romans (B.C. 130), under whom it was made a province; but this province of Pamphylia included also Pisidia and Isauria, and afterward a part of Lycia. Under Constantine Pisidia was again separated from Pamphylia.

PAMPHYLUM MARE, ΠΑΜΦΥΛΙΟΣ ΣΙΝΟΣ (τὸ Πομφύλιον πέλαγος, Πάμφυλιος κόλπος: now Gulf of Adalia), the great gulf formed in the southern coast of Asia Minor by the direction of the Taurus chain and by Mount Solyma, between the Promontorium Sacrum or Chelidonium (now Cape Khelidonia), the southeastern point of Lycia, and Promontorium Anemurium (now Cape Anemour), the southern point of Cilicia. Its depth from north to south, from Promontorium Sacrum to Olbia, is reckoned by Strabo at three hundred and sixty-seven stadia (36·7 geographical miles), which is too little.

ΠΑΜΦΥΛΙΟΣ (Πάμφυλος), son of Ægimius and brother of Dymas, was king of the Dorians at the foot of Mount Pindus, and along with the Heraclides invaded Peloponnesus.

ΠΑΝ (Πάν), the great god of flocks and shepherds among the Greeks. He is usually called a son of Mercury (Hermes) by the daughter of Dryops; but he is also described as a son of Mercury (Hermes) by Callisto, by Ceneis or Thymbria, or by Penelope, whom the god visited in the shape of a ram, or as a son of Penelope by Ulysses, or by all her suitors in common. He was perfectly developed from his birth, and when his mother saw him she ran away through fear; but Mercury (Hermes) carried him to Olympus, where all the gods were delighted with him, and especially Bacchus (Dionysus). From his delighting all the gods, the Homeric hymn derives his name. He was originally only an Arcadian god, and Arcadia was always the principal seat of his worship. From this country his name and worship afterward spread over other parts of Greece, but at Athens his worship was not introduced till the time of the battle of Marathon. In Arcadia he was the god of forests, pastures, flocks, and shepherds, and dwelt in grottoes, wandered on the summits of mountains and rocks, and in valleys, either amusing himself with the chase, or leading the dances of the nymphs. As the god of flocks, both of wild and tame animals, it was his province to increase and guard them; but he was also a hunter, and hunters owed their success or failure to him. The Arcadian hunters used to scourge the statue of the god if they had been disappointed in the chase. During the heat of mid-day he used to slumber, and was very indignant when any one disturbed him. As the god of flocks, bees also were under his protection, as well as the coast where fishermen carried on their pursuit. As the god of every thing connected with pastoral life, he was fond of music, and the inventor of the syrinx or shepherd's flute, which he himself played in a masterly manner, and in which he instructed others also, such as Daphnis. He is thus said to have loved the poet Pindar, and to have sung and danced his lyric songs, in return for which Pindar erected to him a sanctuary in front of his house. Pan, like other gods who dwell in forests, was dreaded by travellers, to whom he sometimes appeared, and whom he startled with sudden awe or terror. Thus, when Phidippides, the Athenian, was sent to Sparta to solicit aid against the Persians, Pan accosted him, and promised to terrify the barbarians if the Athenians would worship him. Hence sudden fright without any visible cause was ascribed to Pan, and was called a Panic fear. He is further said to have had a terrific voice, and by it to have frightened the Titans in their fight with the gods. It seems that this feature, namely, his fondness of noise and riot, was the cause of his being considered the minister and companion of Cybele and Bacchus (Dionysus). He was, at the same time, believed to be possessed of prophetic powers, and to have even instructed Apollo in this art. While roaming in his forest he fell in love with Echo, by whom or by Pitys he became the father of Lynx. His love of the syrinx, from whom he named his flute, is well known from Ovid (Met. i., 691, seq.). Fir trees were sacred to him, since the nymph Pitys, whom he loved, had been metamorphosed into that tree; and the sacrifices offered to him consisted of cows, rams, lambs, milk, and honey. Sacrifices were also offered to him in common with Bacchus (Dionysus) and the nymphs. The various epithets which are given him by the poets refer either to his singular appearance, or are derived from the names of the places in which he was worshipped. The Romans identified with Pan their own god Inuus, and also Faunus, which name is merely another form of Pan. In works of art Pan is represented as a voluptuous and sensual being, with horns, buck-nose, and goat's feet, sometimes in the act of dancing, and sometimes playing on the syrinx.

ΠΑΝΑΓΙΑ (Πανάκεια), i. e., "the all-healing," a daughter of Æsculapius, who had a temple at Oropus.

ΠΑΝΧΑΙΟΣ ΜΩΝΕ (τὸ Πανχαϊὸν ἄρεος)

mountain in Achaia, six thousand three hundred feet high, immediately behind Patrae.

PANAKRA (Πανάκρα), a mountain in Crete, a part of Mount Ida.

PANACTUM (Πανάκτων), a town on the frontiers of Attica and Boeotia, originally belonged to Boeotia, and, after being a frequent object of contention between the Athenians and Boeotians, at length became permanently annexed to Attica.

PANAEUS (Πανάειος), a distinguished Athenian painter, who flourished B.C. 448. He was the nephew of Phidias, whom he assisted in decorating the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia. He was also the author of a series of paintings of the battle of Marathon, in the Parthenon at Athens.

PANÆTIUS (Παναιτίος). 1. Tyrant of Leonardi. He was the first who raised himself to power in that way in Sicily.—2. A native of Thurium, commanded a vessel of the Tenians in the armament of Xerxes against Greece, apparently by compulsion, for, just before the battle of Salamis, Panætius with his vessel deserted the Persians and joined the Greeks.]

PANÆTIUS (Παναιτίος), a native of Rhodes, a celebrated Stoic philosopher, studied first at Pergamum under the grammarian Crates, and subsequently at Athens under the Stoic philosophers of Babylon, and his disciple Antipater of Tarsus. He afterward went to Rome, where he became an intimate friend of Lælius and of Marcus Africanus the younger. In B.C. 144 he accompanied Scipio on the embassy which he undertook to the kings of Egypt and Asia in alliance with Rome. Panætius succeeded Antipater as head of the Stoic school, and died at Athens, at all events before 111. The principal work of Panætius was his treatise on the duty of moral obligation (περί τοῦ καθήκοντος), three books, from which Cicero took the latter part of his work De Officiis. Panætius softened down the harsh severity of the earlier Stoics, and, without giving up their fundamental definitions, had modified them so as to make them applicable to the conduct of life, and clothed them in the garb of eloquence.

PANÆTOLIUM, a mountain in Ætolia, near Armodion, in which town the Panætoliæ or general assembly of the Ætolians was held.

PANARA. Vid. PANCHÆA.]

PANCHÆA (Πανχαία), a fabled island in the eastern or Indian Ocean, which Euhemerus pretended to have discovered, and to have found its capital, Panara, a temple of the Triphylus Jupiter, containing a column inscribed with the date of the births and deaths of many of the kings. (Vid. EUBHEMERUS.) Virgil makes mention of Panchæa and its toriferæ arænae, by which evidently refers to Arabia Felix.]

PANDIA, a river in the country of the Siraci, the interior of Sarmatia Asiatica (Tac., Ann., 16).

PANDIONIDES (Πανδιόνης), son of Merops of Phrygia, is said to have stolen from the temple of Jupiter (Zeus) in Crete the golden dog which Icarus (Hephaestus) had made, and to have carried it to Tantalus. When Jupiter (Zeus) sent Mercury (Hermes) to Tantalus to claim the dog, Tantalus declared that it was not in his possession. The god, however, took the animal by force, and threw Mount Sipylus upon Tantalus. Pandareos fled to Athens, and thence to Sicily, where he perished with his wife Hamothoe. The story of Pandareos derives more interest from that of his three daughters. Andromeda, the eldest of them, was married to Zethus, the brother of Amphion, by whom she became the mother of Itylus. From envy of Amphion, who had many children, she determined to murder one of his sons, Amaleus, but in the night she mistook her own son for her nephew, and killed him. The two other daughters of Pandareos, Merope and Cleodora (according to Pausanias, Camira and Clytia), were, according to Homer, deprived of their parents by the gods, and remained as helpless orphans in the palace. Venus (Aphrodite), however, fed them with milk, honey, and wine. Juno (Hera) gave them beauty and understanding far above other women. Diana (Artemis) gave them dignity, and Minerva (Athena) skill in the arts. When Venus (Aphrodite) went up to Olympus to arrange the nuptials for her maidens, they were carried off by the Harpies.

PANDIONIS (Πανδιονος). 1. A Lycian, son of Lycaon, commanded the inhabitants of Zelea on Mount Ida in the Trojan war. He was distinguished in the Trojan army as an archer, and was said to have received his bow from Apollo. He was slain by Diomedes, or, according to others, by Sthenelus. He was afterward honored as a hero at Pinara in Lycia.—2. Son of Alcator, and twin-brother of Bitias, was one of the companions of Æneas, and was slain by Turnus.

PANDATĀRĪA (now Vendutene), a small island in the Tyrrhenian Sea off the coast of Campania, to which Julia, the daughter of Augustus was banished.

PANDĒMOS (Πανδήμος), i. e., "common to all the people," a surname of Venus (Aphrodite), used in a two-fold sense: 1. As the goddess of low, sensual pleasures, as Venus vulgaria or popularis, in opposition to Venus Urania, or the heavenly Venus (Aphrodite). 2. As the goddess uniting all the inhabitants of a country into one social or political body. Under the latter view she was worshipped at Athens along with Persephone (Persuasion), and her worship was said to have been instituted by Theseus at the time when he united the scattered townships into one great body of citizens. The sacrifices offered to her consisted of white goats.

PANDION (Πανδιών). 1. I. King of Athens, son of Erichthonius by the Naiad Pasithea, was married to Zeuxippe, by whom he became the father of Progne and Philomela, and of the twins Erechtheus and Buteas. In a war against Labdacus, king of Thebes, he called upon Tereus of Daulis in Phocis for assistance, and afterward rewarded him by giving him his daughter Progne in marriage. Vid. TEREUS. It was in his reign that Bacchus (Dionysus) and Ceres (Demeter) were said to have come to Attica.—2. II. King of Athens, son of Cecrops and Metadusa. Being expelled from Athens by the Melionides, he fled to Megara, and there married Pylia, the daughter of King Pylas. When the latter, in consequence of a murder, migrated into Peloponnesus, Pandion obtained the government of Megara. He became the father of Ægeus, Pallas, Nisus, Lycus, and a natural son, Æneus, and also of a daughter, who was married to Sciron. After his death his four sons, called the Pandionidae (Πανδονίδαι), returned from Megara to Athens, and expelled the Metionidae. Ægeus obtained Athens, Lycus the eastern coast of Attica, Nisus Megaris, and Pallas the southern coast.—[3. A Greek in the army against Troy, a companion of Teucer.]

[PANDOCUS (Πανδοκος), a Trojan, slain by Ajax before Troy.]

PANDORA (Πανδώρα), the name of the first woman on earth. When Prometheus had stolen the fire from heaven, Jupiter (Zeus), in revenge, caused Vulcan (Hephestus) to make a woman out of earth, who by her charms and beauty should bring misery upon the human race. Venus (Aphrodite) adorned her with beauty; Mercury (Hermes) bestowed upon her boldness and cunning; and the gods called her Pandora, or All-gifted, as each of the gods had given her some power by which she was to work the ruin of man. Mercury (Hermes) took her to Epimetheus, who made her his wife, forgetting the advice of his brother Prometheus, that he should not receive any gifts from Jupiter (Zeus.) In the house of Epimetheus was a closed jar, which he had been forbidden to open. But the curiosity of a woman could not resist the temptation to know its contents; and when she opened the lid, all the evils incident to man poured out. She had only time to shut down the lid, and prevent the escape of hope. Later writers relate that Pandora brought with her from heaven a box (and not a jar) containing all human ills, upon opening which all escaped and spread over the earth, Hope alone remaining. At a still later period, the box is said to have contained all the blessings of the gods, which would have been preserved for the human race had not Pandora opened the vessel, so that the winged blessings escaped.

PANDOSIA (Πανδοσία). 1. (Now Kastri), a town of Epirus in the district Theoprotia, on the River Acheron, and in the territory of the Cassopæi.—2. (Now Castel Franco!), a town in Bruttium, near the frontiers of Lucania, situated on the River Acheron, and also either upon or at the foot of three hills, was originally a residence of native Enotrian chiefs. It was here that Alexander of Epirus fell, B.C. 326, in accordance with an oracle.

PANDROSOS (Πάνδρσος), i. e., "the all-bedeewing" or "refreshing," was a daughter of Cecrops and Agraulos, and a sister of Erysichthon, Herse, and Aglauros. She was worshipped at Athens along with Thallo, and had a sanctuary there near the temple of Minerva (Athena) Polias.

PANÆAS. Vid. CMSARSA, No. 2.

PANÆUM or -IUM (Πάνειον, Πάνιον, i. e., Pan' asode), the Greek name of the cave, in a mountain at the southern extremity of the range C. Antilibanus, out of which the River Jordan takes its rise, a little above the town of Panæas or CMSARSA Philippi. The mountain, in whose southern side the cave is, was called by the same name, and the surrounding district was called Panæas.

PANÆMUS or PANÆMUS (Παννῆμος, Πάγγαμος; now Pangaea), a celebrated range of mountains in Macedonia, between the Styr and the Nestus, and in the neighborhood of Philippi, with gold and silver mines, and with splendid roses.

PANHELLANĒUS (Πανελληνιος), i. e., the god worshipped by all the Hellenes. This surname is said to have been given to Jupiter (Zeus); by Æacus, when he offered a propitiatory sacrifice on behalf of all the Greeks for the purpose of averting a famine. In Ægina there was a sanctuary of Jupiter (Zeus) Panhellenius, which was said to have been founded by Æacus; and a festival, Panhellenia, was celebrated there.

PANIŒNIUM. Vid. MYCALE; and Dict. of Ant. s. v. PANIONIA.

PANIUM (Πάνιον). 1. A town on the coast of Thrace, near Herculeæ.—[2. Vid. PANÆUM.]

PANNŒNĒA, one of the most important of the Roman provinces between the Danube and the Alps, was separated on the west from Noricum by the Mons Cælius, and from Upper Italy by the Alpes Julæ, on the south from Illyria by the Savus, on the east from Dacia by the Danube, and on the north from Germany by the same river. It thus corresponded to the eastern part of Austria, Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, the whole of Hungary between the Danube and the Sav., Slavonia, and a part of Croatia and Romania. The mountains in the south and west of the country, on the borders of Illyria, Italy, and Noricum, belonged to the Alps, and are therefore called by the general name of the Alpes Pannonicæ, of which the separate names are Ocra, Carvancas, Cælius, and Albii or Albanus Montes. The principal rivers of Pannonia, besides the Danube, were the DRAVUS (now Drave), SAVUS (now Sava), and ARRABO (now Raab), all of which flow into the Danube. The Pannonians (Pannonii), sometimes called Pannonum by the Greek writers, were probably of Illyrian origin, and were divided into numerous tribes. They were a brave and warlike people, but are described by the Roman writers as cruel, faithless, and treacherous. They maintained their independence of Rome till Augustus, after his conquest of the Illyrians (B.C. 35), turned his arms against the Pannonians, who were shortly afterward subdued by his general Vibius. In A.D. 7 the Pannonians joined the Dalmatians and the other Illyrian tribes in their revolt from Rome, and were with difficulty conquered by Tiberius, after a desperate struggle, which lasted three years (A.D. 7-9). It was after the termination of this war that Pannonia appeared to have been reduced to the form of a Roman province, and was garrisoned by several Roman legions. The dangerous mutiny of these troops after the death of Augustus (A.D. 14) was with difficulty quelled by Drusus. From this time to the end of the empire Pannonia always contained a large number of Roman troops, on account of its bordering on the Quadi and other powerful barbarous nations. We find at a later time that Pannonia was the regular quarters of seven legions. In consequence of this large number of troops always stationed in the country, several towns were founded and numerous fortresses were erected along the Danube. Pannonia originally formed only one province, but was soon divided into two provinces, called Pannonia Superior and Pannonia superior. These were separated from one another by a straight line drawn from the River Arabo south as far as the Savus, the country west of this line being P. Superior, and the part east P. Inferior. Each of the provinces was governed by a separate proprietor; but they were frequently spoken of in the plural under the name of Pannonia. In the fourth century, the part of P. Inferior between the Arabo, the Isaube, and the Dravus was formed into a separate province by Galerius, who gave it the name of Valeria in honor of his wife. But as P. Inferior had thus lost a great part of its territory, Constantine added to it a portion of P. Superior, comprising the upper part of the course of the Dravus and the Savus. P. Superior was now called Pannonia Prima, and P. Inferior Pannonia Secunda; and all three Pannonian provinces (together with the two Noric provinces and Dalmatia) belonged to the six Illyrian provinces of the Western Empire. In the middle of the fifth century Pannonia was taken possession of by the Huns. After the death of Attila it passed into the hands of the Ostrogoths, and subsequently into those of the Lombards.

ΠΑΝΟΜΦΙΛΕΥΣ (Panomphalos), i. e., the author of all signs and omens, a surname of Jupiter (Zeus), who had a sanctuary on the Hellespont between Capes Rhæteum and Sigeum.

ΠΑΙΔΩΡΑ (Παιδωρα), a nymph of the sea, daughter of Nereus and Doris.

ΠΑΙΔΩΡΕΑΣ, one of the followers of Aeneas in his voyage to Italy, distinguished at the funeral games celebrated in Sicily in honor of Anchises.

ΠΑΙΔΩΡΕΥΣ (Παιδορεύς), son of Phocus and Antæa, accompanied Amphitryon on his expedition against the Taphians or Teleboans, and took an oath not to embezzle any part of the booty; but, having broken his oath, he was punished by his son Epeus becoming unwelcome. He is also mentioned among the Calydonian hunters.

ΠΑΙΩΡΕΥΣ (Παιωρεύς, Hom.), ΠΑΙΩΡΕΙΑ (Παιωρία), or ΠΑΙΩΡΗ (Παιωρη, Thuc.; ethnic Παιωριεύς, now Agia Vlassi), an ancient town in Phocia, on the Cephissus, and near the frontiers of Boeotia, twenty stadia west of Cheronea, said to have been founded by Panopeus, son of Phocus.

ΠΑΝΟΠΙΩΝ URANIUS, was proscribed by the tyrants in B.C. 49, but was preserved by the fidelity of one of his slaves, who exchanged dresses with his master, dismissed him by the back door as the soldiers were entering the villa, then placed himself in the bed of Panopion, and allowed himself to be killed for his master.]

ΠΑΝΟΡΩΛΙΑ. Vid. ΧΕΜΜΙΑ.

ΠΑΝΟΡΤΗΣ. Vid. ΑΓΕΥΣ.

ΠΑΝΟΡΜΟΣ (Πανόρμος), that is, "All-Port," or a place always fit for landing, the name of several harbors. 1. (Πανόρμους, Panormita, Panormitanus; now Palermo), an important town on the northern coast of Sicily and at the mouth of the River Orethus, was founded by the Phœnicians, and at a later time received its Greek name from its excellent harbor. From the Phœnicians it passed into the hands of the Carthaginians, in whose power it remained for a long time, and who made it one of the chief stations for their fleet. It was taken by the Romans in the first Punic war, B.C. 254, and was subsequently made a Roman colony.—2. (Now Porto Raphti), the principal harbor on the eastern coast of Attica, near the demus Prasia, and opposite the southern extremity of Eubœa.—3. (Now Takieh), a harbor in Achaia, fifteen stadia east of the promontory Rhium.—4. A harbor in Epirus, in the middle of the Acroceraunian rocks.—5. (Ruins near Mylopotamo), a town and harbor on the northern coast of Crete.—6. The outer harbor of Ephesus, formed by the mouth of the River Gaister. Vid. p. 292. a.

PANSA, C. VIBIUS, a friend and partisan of Cæsar, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 51, and was appointed by Cæsar in 46 to the government of Cisalpine Gaul as successor to M. Brutus. Cæsar subsequently nominated him and Hirtius consuls for 43. Pansa was consul in that year along with Hirtius, and fell before Mutina in the month of April. The details are given under HIRTIVS.

ΠΑΝΤΑΪΩΣ, ΠΑΝΤΑΪΩΛ, or ΠΑΝΤΑΪΩΣ (Πανταΐως; now Fiume di Poreari), a small river on the eastern coast of Sicily, which flowed into the sea between Megara and Syracuse.

PANTÆNUS (Πάντανος), the teacher of Clement of Alexandria, and master of the catechetical school in that city about A.D. 181: in philosophy he had been in the Stoic school, and had adopted their principles, and hence was designated the Stoic. He was selected, on account of his learning and piety, to conduct a missionary enterprise to India.

ΠΑΝΤΑΛΕΩΝ (Πανταλέων). 1. Son of Omphalion, king or tyrant of Pisa in Elis at the period of the thirty-fourth Olympiad (B.C. 644), assembled an army, with which he made himself master of Olympia, and assumed by force the sole presidency of the Olympic games. The Eleans, on this account, would not reckon this as one of the regular Olympiads. Pantaleon assisted the Messenians in the second Messenian war.—2. A son of Alyattes, king of Lydia, by an Ionian woman. His claim to the throne in preference to his brother Cresus was put forward by his partisans during the lifetime of Alyattes, but that monarch decided in favor of Cresus.—3. A Macedonian of Pydæa, an officer in the service of Alexander, who was appointed by him governor of Memphis.]

PANTHÆA. Vid. ΑΒΡΑΔΑΤΑΣ.

PANTHÆUM (Πάνθειον), a celebrated temple at Rome, in the Campus Martius, which is still extant, and used as a Christian church. It is in a circular form, surmounted by a dome, and contains a noble Corinthian portico of sixteen pillars. In its general form it resembles the Colosseum in the Regent's Park. It was built by M. Agrippa in his third consulship, B.C. 27, as the inscription on the portico still testifies. All the ancient authors call it a temple, and there is no reason for supposing, as some modern writers have done, that it was originally an entrance to the public baths. The name is commonly derived from its being supposed to be sacred to all the gods; but Dion Cassius expressly states that it was dedicated to Mars and Venus. The temple of Julius Cæsar was erected by A. Ignatius in the interior of the temple, and that of Augustus in the portico. 4.

was restored by the Emperor Septimius Severus, A. D. 202. Between 608 and 610 it was consecrated as a Christian church by the pope Boniface IV., with the approbation of the Emperor Phocas. In 655 the plates of gilded bronze that covered the roof were carried to Constantinople by command of Constant II. The Pantheon is the largest circular building of antiquity, the interior diameter of the rotunda is one hundred and forty-two feet, and the height from the pavement to the summit about one hundred and forty-eight feet. The portico is one hundred and three feet wide, and the columns forty-seven feet high.

[PANTHEDAS (Πανθοιδας), a Spartan, sent out by the ephors in B.C. 403 against Clearchus, who had gone to Byzantium against orders. He was slain in battle in 377 against Pelopidas, near Tanagra.]

PANTHOS, contr. Πανθης (Πάνθος, Πάνθους), one of the elders at Troy, husband of Phrontis, and father of Euphorbus, Polydamas, and Hyperenor. Hence both Euphorbus and Polydamas are called Panthoidea. He is said to have been originally a priest of Apollo at Delphi, and to have been carried to Troy by Antenor on account of his beauty. He continued to be a priest of Apollo, and is called by Virgil (Æn., 319) Othryades, or son of Othryas.

[PANTIAS (Παντίας), of Chios, a statue of the school of Sicyon, son and pupil of Sostratus, who was the seventh in the succession of disciples from Aristocles of Cydonia.]

PANTICAPOLIS (Παντικαπολις: Παντικαπολς, Παντικαπολς, Παντικαπολς: now Kertak), a town in the Tauric Chersonesus, was situated at a hill twenty stadia in circumference on the Thracian Bosphorus, and opposite the town of Phanagoria in Asia. It derived its name from the River Panticapes. It was founded by the Milesians about B.C. 541, and from its position and excellent harbor soon became a place of great commercial importance. It was the residence of the Greek kings of the Bosphorus, and hence is sometimes called Bosphorus. Justinian caused it to be surrounded with new walls.

PANTICAPES (Παντικαπες), a river in European Sarmatia, which, according to Herodotus, rises in a lake, separates the agricultural and nomad Scythians, flows through the district Hylea, and falls into the Borysthenes. It is usually identified with the modern Somara, but without sufficient grounds.

PANYASIS (Πανυσίας). 1. A Greek epic poet, was a native of Halicarnassus, and a relation of the historian Herodotus, probably his uncle. Panyasis began to be known about B.C. 489, continued in reputation till 467, and was put to death by Lygdamis, the tyrant of Halicarnassus, about 457. The most celebrated of the poems of Panyasis was his Heracles or Heraclæas, which gave a detailed account of the exploits of Hercules. It consisted of fourteen books and nine thousand verses. Another poem of Panyasis bore the name of Ionica (Ιωνικά), and contained seven thousand verses; it related the history of Neleus, Codrus, and the Ionic colonies. In later times the works of Panyasis were extensively read and much admired; the Alexandrine grammarians ranked him with Homer, Hesiod, Pindar, and Antimachus, as one of the five principal epic poets. [The fragments are collected by Tzschirner, Panyasis Fragmenta, &c., Breslau, 1842; and by Delzer, at the end of Epici Graeci Minores, in Didot's Bibliotheca Graeca.]—2. A philosopher, also a native of Halicarnassus, who wrote two books "On Dreams" (Περὶ βελπυρ), was perhaps a grandson of the poet.

[PANYASSUS (Πανυσσος: now Spirassus), a river of Illyria Graeca, which empties south of Dyrrachium, into the Ionian Sea.]

PAPHLAGONIA (Παφλαγονία: Παφλαγόν, Πάφλαγος, Paphlago), a district on the northern side of Asia Minor, between Bithynia on the west and Pontus on the east, being separated from the former by the River Parthenius, and from the latter by the Halys; on the south it was divided by the chain of Mount Olympus (according to others by Olgassys) from Phrygia in the earlier times, but from Galatia afterward; and on the north it bordered on the Euxine. These boundaries, however, are not always exactly observed. Xenophon brings the Paphlagonians as far east as Themicyra and the Jassous promontory. It appears to have been known to the Greeks in the mythical period. The Argonautic legends mentioned Paphlagon, the son of Phineus, as the hero eponymus of the country. In the Homeric Catalogue, Pylæmenes leads the Paphlagonians, as allies of the Trojans, from the land of the Heneti, about the River Parthenius, a region famed for its mules; and from this Pylæmenes the later princes of Paphlagonia claimed their descent, and the country itself was sometimes called Pylæmonia. Herodotus twice mentions the Halys as the boundary between the Paphlagonians and the Syrians of Cappadocia; but we learn also from him and from other authorities that the Paphlagonians were of the same race as the Cappadocians (i. e., the Semitic or Syro-Arabian), and quite distinct, in their language and their customs, from their Thracian neighbors on the west. They were good soldiers, especially as cavalry, but uncivilized and superstitious. The country had also other inhabitants, probably of a different race, namely, the Heneti and the Caucones; and Greek settlements were established on the coast at an early period. The Paphlagonians were first subdued by Croesus. Under the Persian empire they belonged to the third satrapy, but their satraps made themselves independent, and assumed the regal title, maintaining themselves in this position (with a brief interruption, during which Paphlagonia was subject to Eumenes) until the conquest of the country by Mithradates, who added the eastern part of his own kingdom, and made over the western part to Nicomedes, k. g. of Bithynia, who gave it to his son Pylæmenes. After the fall of Mithradates the Romans added the north of Paphlagonia, along the coast, to Bithynia, and the interior was left to the native princes, as tributaries to Rome; but, the race of these princes becoming soon extinct, the whole of Paphlagonia was made Roman, and Augustus made it a part of the province of Galatia. It was made a separate province under Constantine; but the eastern part, from Sinope to the Halys, was assigned to Pontus, under the name of Hallespontus. Paphlagonia was a mountainous the country, being intersected from west to east by three chains of the Olympus system, namely, the Olympus itself on the southern border, Olympus in the centre, and a minor chain with no specific name nearer to the coast. The bit of land between this last chain and the sea was very fertile, and the Greek cities of Amasus and Sinope brought a considerable commerce to its shores; but the inland parts were well covered with native forests, which were celebrated as hunting grounds. The country was famed for its horses and mules, and in some parts there were extensive sheep-walks; and its rivers were particularly famous for their fish. The country was divided into nine districts, the names of which are not of enough importance to be specified here.

PAPHUS (Πάφος), son of Pygmalion by the name into which life had been breathed by Venus (Aphrodite). From him the town of Paphos is said to have derived its name; and Paphos himself is called the Paphian hero. W. Met., i., 290.)

PAPHUS (Πάφος; Πάριος), the name of two towns on the western coast of Cyprus, near each other, and called respectively "Old Paphos" (Παλαιόπαφος) and "New Paphos" (Πάριος). Old Paphos was situated near the promontory Zephyrium, on the River Bocarus, 10 stadia from the coast, where it had a good harbor; while New Paphos lay more inland, in the midst of a fertile plain, sixty stadia from the former. Old Paphos was the chief seat of the worship of Venus (Aphrodite), who is said to have landed at this place after her birth among the waves, and who is hence frequently called the Paphian goddess (Paphia). Here she had a celebrated temple, the high priest of which exercised a kind of religious superintendence over the whole island. Every year there was a grand procession from New Paphos to the temple of the goddess in the old city. There are two legends respecting the foundation of Paphos, one describing the Syrian king Cinyras as its founder, and the other the Arcadian Agamemnon on his return from Troy. These traditions are reconciled by the supposition that Cinyras was the founder of Old Paphos and Agamemnon of New Paphos. There can be no doubt of the Phœnician origin of Old Paphos, in that the worship of Venus (Aphrodite) was introduced here from the East; but an Arcadian origin can not be admitted. When Paphos is mentioned by later writers without any epithet, they usually mean the New City; but when the Old City occurs in the poets, we are generally to understand the Old City, as the poets, for the most part, speak of the place in connection with the worship of Venus (Aphrodite). Old Paphos was destroyed by an earthquake in the reign of Augustus, but was rebuilt by order of the emperor, and called Augusta. Under the name New Paphos was the capital of one of the four districts into which the island was divided. Old Paphos corresponds to the modern Pafo or Konaklia, and New Paphos to the modern Baffa.

PAPHIUS (Πάριος), an early Christian writer, is said to have been a hearer of the Apostle John, and a companion of Polycarp, was bishop of Hierapolis on the borders of Phrygia. He taught the doctrine of the Millennium, maintaining that there will be, for one thousand years after the resurrection of the dead, a bodily reign of Christ on this earth. Only fragments of his works are extant.

PAPINIUS, ÆMILIUS, a celebrated Roman jurist, was præfectus prætoric under the Emperor Septimius Severus, whom he accompanied to Britain. The emperor died at York A.D. 211, and he is said to have commended his two sons, Caracalla and Geta, to the care of Papinian. On the death of his father, Caracalla dismissed Papinian from his office, and shortly afterward put him to death. There are five hundred and ninety-five excerpts from Papinian's works in the Digest. These excerpts are from the thirty-seven books of Questiones, a work arranged according to the order of the Edict, the nineteen books of Responsæ, the two books of Definitiones, the two books De Adulteriis, a single book De Adulteriis, and a Greek work or fragment, which probably treated of the office of ædile both at Rome and in other towns. No Roman jurist had a higher reputation than Papinian. Nor is his reputation unmerited. It was not solely because of the high station that he filled, his penetration, and his knowledge, that he left an imperishable name; his excellent understanding, guided by integrity of purpose, has made him the model of a true lawyer.

PAPINIUS STATUS. Vid. STATUS.

PAPIRII GENA, patrician and plebeian. The patrician Papirii were divided into the families of Crassus, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus, and the plebeian Papirii into those of Carbo, Papus, and Turdus. Of these the families of Cicero, Cursor, Maso, and Mugillanus alone require mention.

PAPIRIANÆ FOSSÆ, a village in Etruria, on the Via Æmilia, between Luna and Pisa.

PAPIRIUS, C. or SEX., the author of a supposed collection of the Leges Regiæ, which was called Jus Papirianum or Civile Papirianum. He is said to have lived in the reign of Tarquinius Superbus.

PAPUS MUTILUS. Vid. MUTILUS.

PAPPŪA (Πάπυρα), a lofty rugged mountain on the extreme border of Numidia, perhaps the same as the Thamnes of Ptolemy, and as the mountain abounding with wild cats, near the city of Melitene, to which Diodorus Siculus refers (xx., 68), but without mentioning its name.

PAPPUUS (Πάππος), of Alexandria, one of the later Greek geometers, is said by Suidas to have lived under Theodosius (A.D. 379-395). Of the works of Pappus, the only one which has come down to us is his celebrated Mathematical Collections (Μαθηματικῶν συναγωγῶν βιβλία). This work, as we have it now in print, consists of the last six of eight books. Only portions of these books have been published in Greek. There are two Latin editions of Pappus: the first by Commandinus, Pisauri, 1588; and the second by Manolesseus, Bononiæ, 1660.

PAPREMITES (Πάπρημις), a city of Lower Egypt, capital of the Nomos Papremites, and sacred to the Egyptian god whom the Greeks identified with Mars (Ares). It is only mentioned by Herodotus, and is perhaps the same as the Phos of later times.

PAPUS EMILIUS. 1. M., dictator B.C. 321.—3 Q., twice consul, 332 and 278, and censor 275. In both his consulships and in his censorship he had as colleague C. Fabricius Luscinus.—3. L., consul 225, defeated the Cisalpine Gauls with great slaughter. He was censor 220 with C. Flaminius.

PARACHELÖITIS (Παραχελώϊτις), the name of the plain in Acarnania and Ætolia, near the mouth of the Achelous, and through which that river flows.

PARACHÖITHRAS (Παραχούθρας, τὰ Παραχούθρα: now Μονταίνας of Louristan), a part of the chain of mountains forming the eastern margin of the Tigris and Euphrates valley, was the boundary between Susiana and Media. The same name is given to an eastern branch of the chain, which formed the boundary between Parthia and the desert of Carmania. Strabo places it too far north.

ΠΑΡΕΤΙΩΝΕΣ (Παρατιανή: Παραταί, Παραταίαι, Παρεταί, Παρεταί, Παρεταίοι), the name of various mountainous regions in the Persian empire, is the Greek form of a Persian word, signifying mountainous. 1. The best known of those districts was on the borders of Media and Persia, and was inhabited by a people of Median origin, who are mentioned several times by the historians of Alexander and his successors.—2. A district between the rivers Oxus and Jaxartes, on the borders of Bactria and Sogdiana.—3. A district between Arachosia and Drangiana, also called Sacastana, from its inhabitants, the Scythian Sacæ.

ΠΑΡΕΤΩΝΙΟΝ or ΑΜΜΩΝΙΑ (Παρατόνιον, ἡ Ἀμμωνία: now El-Barton or Marsa-Labait), an important city on the northern coast of Africa, belonged to Marmarica in its widest sense, but politically to Egypt, namely, to the Nomos Libya: hence this city on the west and Pelusium on the east are called “cornua Egypti.” It stood near the Promontory Artos or Pythis (now Ras-el-Haziti), and was reckoned two hundred Roman miles west of Alexandria, between seventy and eighty miles, or, according to Strabo, nine hundred stadia (all too small) east of the Catabathmos Major, and one thousand three hundred stadia north of Ammonium in the Desert (now Sineah), which Alexander the Great visited by the way of Parætonium. The city was forty stadia in circuit. It was an important sea-port, a strong fortress, and a renowned seat of the worship of Isis. It was restored by Justinian, and continued a place of some consequence till its complete destruction by the late Pasha of Egypt, Mehmet Ali, in 1830.

ΠΑΛΑΘΟΝ ΣΤΡΥΣ (Παράγων κῆλπος: now Gulf of Oman), a gulf of the Indian Ocean, on the coast of Gedrosia, namely, the gulf formed in the northwest of the Indian Ocean by the approach of the northeastern coast of Arabia to that of Balochistan and Persia, outside of the entrance to the Persian Gulf.

ΠΑΡΑΛΙΑ (Παράλια), the sea-coast district of Attica, around the Promontory of Sunium, extending upward as far as Halæ Axonides on the western coast, and Prasæ on the eastern coast. The inhabitants of this district, the Παραλιῖται, were one of the three political parties into which Attica was divided at the time of Peisistratus, the other two being the Διακρίαι (Διακρίαι), or Highlanders, and the Πεδῆται (Πεδῆται), or inhabitants of the plain.

ΠΑΡΙΔΟΣ (Παράλος), the younger of the two legitimate sons of Pericles. He and his brother Xanthippus were educated by their father with the greatest care, but they both appear to have been of inferior capacity, which was any thing but compensated by worth of character, though Paralus seems to have been a somewhat more hopeful youth than his brother. They both fell victims to the plague, B.C. 429.

ΠΑΡΑΡΟΤΑΜΙ or ΙΑ (Παραροταμί, -αμία: now Belisi), an ancient town in Phocia, situated on a steep hill, and on the left bank of the River Cephaeus, from which it derives its name. It was near the frontiers of Boeotia, being only forty stadia from Chæronea, and sixty stadia from Orobomenus. It is probably mentioned by Homer (Il., ii., 622). It was destroyed by Xerxes, but was rebuilt, and was destroyed a second time in the Sacred war.

ΠΑΡΑΒΟΛΙΑ (Παραβουλία), a district in the south of Boeotia on both banks of the Æasopus, the inhabitants of which were called Παραβούλιοι.

ΠΑΡΑΒΟΥΛΙΑΣ (Παραβουλίως), a city of Thessaly, in the district Cetea.]

ΠΑΡΕΜ. Vid. MOIRÆ.

ΠΑΡΕΝΤΙΟΝ (now Parenso), a town in Ionia, with a good harbor, inhabited by Roman citizens, but not a Roman colony, thirty-one miles from Pola.

ΠΑΡΙΣ (Πάρις), also called ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΗΣ (Ἀλέξανδρος), was the second son of Priam and Hecuba. Before his birth Hecuba dreamed that she had brought forth a fire-brand, the flames of which spread over the whole city. Accordingly, as soon as the child was born, he was given to a shepherd, who was to expose him on Mount Ida. After the lapse of five days, the shepherd, on returning to Mount Ida, found the child still alive, and fed by a she-bear. Thereupon he carried the boy home, and brought him up along with his own child, and called him Paris. When Paris had grown up, he distinguished himself as a valiant defender of the flocks and shepherds, and hence received the name of Alexander, i. e., the defender of men. He also succeeded in discovering his real origin, and was received by Priam as his son. He now married Cénone, the daughter of the river-god Ceyx, by whom, according to some, he became the father of Corythus. But the most celebrated event in the life of Paris was his abduction of Helen. This came to pass in the following way. Once upon a time, when Peleus and Thetis solemnized their nuptials, all the gods were invited to the marriage, with the exception of Eris, a Strife. Enraged at her exclusion, the goddess threw a golden apple among the guests, with the inscription, “To the fairest.” Thereupon Juno (Hera), Venus (Aphrodite), and Minerva (Athena) each claimed the apple for herself. Jupiter (Zeus) ordered Mercury (Hermes) to take the goddesses to Mount Gargarus, a portion of Ida, to the beautiful shepherd Paris, who was there tending his flocks, and who was to decide the dispute. The goddesses accordingly appeared before him. Juno (Hera) promised him the sovereignty of Asia and great riches, Minerva (Athena) great glory and renown in war of Venus (Aphrodite) the fairest of women for a wife. Paris decided in favor of Venus (Aphrodite), and gave her the golden apple. His judgment called forth in Juno (Hera) and Minerva (Athena) fierce hatred against Troy. Under the protection of Venus (Aphrodite), Paris sailed to Greece, and was hospitably received in the palace of Menelaus at Sparta. Here he succeeded in carrying off Helen, the wife of Menelaus, who was the most beautiful woman in the world. The accounts of this rape are not the same in all writers. According to the more usual account, Helen followed her seducer willingly, owing to the influence of Venus (Aphrodite), while Menelaus was absent in Crete. Others relate that the goddess deceived Helen by giving to Paris the appearance of Menelaus; and others, again, say that Helen was carried off by Paris by force, either during festival or during the chase. On his return to Troy, Paris passed through Egypt and Phoenicia, and at length arrived at Troy with Helen and the treasures which he had treacherously taken from the hospitable house of Menelaus. In regard to this voyage the accounts again differ; for, according to some, Paris and Helen reached Troy three days after their departure; whereas, according to later traditions, Helen did not reach Troy at all, for Jupiter (Zeus) and Juno (Hera) allowed only a phantom resembling Paris to accompany Paris to Troy, while the real Helen was carried to Proteus in Egypt, and remained there until she was fetched by Menelaus. The abduction of Helen gave rise to the Trojan war. Before her marriage with Menelaus she had been wooed by the noblest chiefs of all parts of Greece. Her former suitors now rallied to revenge her abduction, and sailed against Troy. Vid. AGAMEMNON. Homer describes Paris as a handsome man, fond of the male sex and of music, and not ignorant of war, but as dilatory and cowardly, and detested by his own friends for having brought upon them his fatal war with the Greeks. He fought with Menelaus before the walls of Troy, and was defeated, but was carried off by Venus (Aphrodite). He is said to have killed Achilles, either by one of his arrows, or by treachery in the temple of the Thymbræan Apollo. Vid. ACHILLES. On the capture of Troy, Paris was wounded by Philoctetes with an arrow of Hercules, and then returned to his long-abandoned wife (Eione). But she, remembering the wrongs she had suffered, or, according to others, being prevented by her father, refused to heal the wound. He then went back to Troy and died. Eione sickly repented, and hastened after him with remedies, but came too late, and in her grief smothered herself. According to others, she threw herself from a tower, or rushed into the flames of the funeral pile on which the body of Paris was burning. Paris is represented in works of art as a beautiful youth, without a beard, with a Phrygian cap, and sometimes with an apple in his hand, in the act of presenting it to Venus (Aphrodite).

Paris, the name of two celebrated pantomimes. 1. The elder Paris lived in the reign of the Emperor Nero, with whom he was a great favorite. He was originally a slave of Domitia the aunt of the emperor, and he per-chased his freedom by paying her a large sum of money. Paris was afterward declared, by order of the emperor, to have been free-born (ingenuus), and Domitia was compelled to restore to him the sum which she had received for his freedom. When Nero attempted to be come a pantomime, he put Paris to death as a dangerous rival.—2. The younger Paris, and the more celebrated of the two, was a native of Egypt, and lived in the reign of Domitian with whom he was also a great favorite. He was put to death by Domitian because he had an intrigue with Domitia, the wife of the emperor.

PARISII. Vid. LUTETIA PARISIORUM.

PARIUM (τὸ Πάριον; Παριάνος, Παριανός; ruins at Kemer), a city of Mysia, on the northern coast of the Troad, on the Propontis, between Lampsacus and Priapus, was founded by a colony from Miletus, mingled with natives of Paros and Erythrae, and became a flourishing sea-port, having a better harbor than that of Priapus. Under Augustus it was made a Roman colony, by the name of Colonia Pariana Julia Augusta. It was a renowned seat of the worship of Cupid (Eros), Bacchus (Dionysus), and Apollo. The surrounding district was called ἡ Παριανή.

PARMA (Parmensis. now Parma), a town in Gallia Cispadana, situated on a river of the same name and on the Via Emilia, between Placentia and Mutina, was originally a town of the Boii, but was made a Roman colony B.C. 183, along with Mutina, and from that time became a place of considerable importance. It suffered some injury in the civil war after Cæsar's death, but was enlarged and embellished by Augustus, and received the name of Colonia Julia Augusta. After the fall of the Western Empire it was for a time called Chrysopolis, or the "Gold-City," but for what reason we do not know. The country around Parma was originally marshy; but the marshes were drained by the consul Scaurus, and converted into fertile land. The wool of Parma was particularly good.

PARMENIDES (Παρμενίδης), a distinguished Greek philosopher, was a native of Elea in Italy. According to Plato, Parmenides, at the age of sixty-five, came to Athens to the Panathenæa, accompanied by Zeno, then forty years old, and became acquainted with Socrates, who at that time was quite young. Supposing Socrates to have been nineteen or twenty years of age at the time, we may place the visit of Parmenides to Athens in B.C. 448, and consequently his birth in 513. Parmenides was regarded with great esteem by Plato and Aristotle; and his fellow-citizens thought so highly of him, that every year they banded their magistrates to render obedience to the laws which he had enacted for them. The philosophical opinions of Parmenides were developed in a didactic poem, in hexameter verse, entitled On Nature, of which only fragments remain. In this poem he maintained that the phenomena of sense were delusive, and that it was only by mental abstraction that a person could attain to the knowledge of the only reality, a One and All, a continuous and self-existent substance, which could not be perceived by the senses. But although we believed the phenomena of sense to be devative, nevertheless he adopted two elements, Warm and Cold, or Light and Darkness. The best edition of the fragments of Parmenides is by Karsten, in Philosophorum Græc. Veterum

Opera Reliquia, Amstelod., 1836.

PARMENION (Παρμενίων). 1. Son of Philotas, a distinguished Macedonian general in the service of Philip of Macedon and Alexander the Great. Philip held him in high esteem, and used to say of him that he had never been able to find more than one general, and that was Parmenion. In Alexander's invasion of Asia,
 Parmenion was regarded as second in command.
 At the three great battles of the Granicus, Issus, and Arbela, while the king commanded the right wing of the army, Parmenion was placed at the head of the left, and contributed essentially to the victory on all those memorable occasions.
 The confidence reposed in him by Alexander appears to have been unbounded, and he is continually spoken of as the most attached of the king's friends, and as holding, beyond all question, the second place in the state. But when Philotas, the only surviving son of Parmenion, was accused in Drangiana (B.C. 330) of being privy to the plot against the king's life, he not only confessed his own guilt when put to the torture, but involved his father also in the plot.
 Whether the king really believed in the guilt of Parmenion, or deemed his life a necessary sacrifice to policy after the execution of his son, he caused his aged friend to be assassinated in Media before he could receive the tidings of his son's death. The death of Parmenion, at the age of seventy years, will ever remain one of the darkest stains upon the character of Alexander. It is questionable whether even Philotas was really concerned in the conspiracy, and we may safely pronounce that Parmenion had no connection with it. — 2. Of Macedonia, an epigrammatic poet, whose verses were included in the collection of Philip of Thessalonica, whence it is probable that he flourished in, or shortly before, the time of Augustus.

[PARMENISCUS (Παρμενίσκος), a grammarian and commentator, of whose writings a few fragments remain.]

[PARMENON (Παρμενών), of Byzantium, a cho-liambic poet, a few of whose verses are preserved in Athenæus and the scholiasts: these fragments are collected by Meineke, Choliambica
Pœsis Græcorum, Berol., 1845.]

[PARMYS (Πάρμυς), daughter of Smerdis, the son of Cyrus. She became the wife of Darius Hystaspis, and was the mother of Ariomardos.]

PARNASSUS (Παρνασσός, Πάρνασσός, Ion. Παρ-νησσός), the name, in its widest signification, of a range of mountains, which extends from Ceta and Corax southeast through Doris and Phocis, and under the name of Cirphis (Κίρπις) terminates at the Corinthian Gulf between Cirrha and Anticyra. But in its narrower sense, Parnas-sus indicates the highest part of the range a few miles north of Delphi. Its two highest summits were called Tithorea (Τιθορέα: now Velitza), and Lycorea (Λυκορέα: now Liakura), the former being northwest and the latter northeast of Delphi; and hence Parnassus is frequently described by the poets as double-headed.
 Immediately above Delphi the mountain forms a semicircular range of lofty rocks, at the top of which the town was built. These rocks were called Phædriades (Φαιδριάδες), or the "Resplendent," from their facing the south, and thus receiving the full rays of the sun during the most brilliant part of the day. The sides of Parnassus were well wooded: at its foot grew myrtle, laurel, and olive-trees, and higher up, fir; and its summit was covered with snow during the greater part of the year. It contained numerous caves, glens, and romantic ravines. It is celebrated as one of the chief seats of Apollo and the Muses, and an inspiring source of poetry and song. On Mount Lycorea was the Corycian cave, from which the Muses are sometimes called the Corycian nymphs.

 Just above Delphi was the far-famed Castalian spring, which issued on between two cliffs, called Nauplia and Hymælia. These cliffs are frequently called by the poets the summits of Parnassus, though they are in reality only small peaks at the base of the mountain. The mountain also was sacred to Bacchus (Dionysus), and on one of its summits the Thyades held their Bacchic revels. Between Parnassus Proper and Mount Cirphis was the valley of the Pilatus, through which the sacred road ran from Delphi to Daulia and Stiris; and at the point where the road branched off to these two places (called σχιστής), Œdipus slew his father Laus.
 — 2. A town in the north of Cappadocia, on a mountain of the same name (now Pacha Dagh), probably on the River Halya, and on the route between Ancyra and Archelais.

PARNÆ (Πάρνηξ, gen. Πάρνηθος: now Omor Nasta), a mountain in the northeast of Attica, in some parts as high as four thousand feet, was a continuation of Mount Cithæra, from which it extended eastward as far as the coast at Rhamnus. It was well wooded, abounded in game, and on its lower slopes produced excellent wine. It formed part of the boundary between Bœotia and Attica; and the pass through it between these two countries was easy of access, and was therefore strongly fer-tified by the Athenians. On the summit of the mountain there was a statue of Jupiter (Zens; Parnethius), and there were likewise altars of Jupiter (Zeus) Semæleos and Jupiter (Zeus) Om-brius or Apemius.

PARNŌN (Πάρνων: now Malevo), a mountain six thousand three hundred and thirty-five feet high, forming the boundary between Lacedæ-mon and the territory of Tegea in Arcadia.

PAROPAMISADÆ (Παροπαμισάδαι) or PAROPAMIS-ADÆ, the collective name of several occasionally dwelling in the southern slopes of Mount Paropamisus (vid. next article), and of the country they inhabited, which was not known by any other name. It was divided on the north from Bactria by the Paropamisus; on the west from Aria, and on the south from Drangiana and Arachosia, by indefinite boundaries; and on the east from India by the River Indus, thus corresponding to the eastern part of Afghanistan and the strip of the Punjab west of the Indus. Under the Persian empire it was the northeasternmost district of Ariana. It was conquered by Alexander when he passed through it on his march to India; but the people soon regained their independence, though arts of the country were nominally included in the limits of the Greco-Syrian and Bactrian kingdoms. It is a rugged mountain region, intersected by branches of the Paropamisus. In the north the climate is so severe that, according to the ancient writers, confirmed by modern travellers, the snow almost buries the houses; but in the south the valleys of the lower mountain slopes yield all the products of the warmer regions of Asia. In its north was the considerable river Cophes or Κοφης (now Caspi), flowing into the Indus, and having a tributary, Choëis, Choëis, or Choaspes (No. 3). The particular tribes, included under the general name of Paropamisadae, were the Cabolizæ (Kabôlîzæ) in the north, whose name and position point to Cabool, the Παριζι (Parizoi) in the south-west, the Ambautæ (Ἀμβαυταί) in the east, on the River Choas, the Παρσώται (Parasôitai) on the south, and the Ἀριστόφωλοι, probably a dominant tribe of a different race, on the west. At the time of the Macedonian conquest the people were little civilized, but quiet and inoffensive. The chief cities were Ortospana and Alexandria, the latter founded by Alexander the Great.

PAROPAMISUS (Παροπamισός), and several other forms, of which the truest is probably Παροπάμιος; now Hindoo-Koosh), a word no doubt derived, as many other words beginning like it, from the Old Persian paru, a mountain, is the name of a part of the great mountain-chain which runs from west to east through the centre of the southern portion of the highlands of Central Asia, and divides the part of the continent, which slopes down to the Indian Ocean, from the great central table-land of Tartary and Tibet. It is a prolongation of the chain of Asi-Taurus. The name was applied to that part of the chain between the Sariphi Mountains (now Hindoo-Koosh), on the west, and Mount Imaus (now Himalaya) on the east, or from about the sources of the River Margus on the west to the point where the Indus breaks through the chain on the east. They were believed by the ancients to be among the highest mountains in the world (which they are), and to contain the sources of the Oxus and the Indus; the last statement being an error which naturally arose from confounding the cleft by which the Indus breaks through the chain with its unknown source. When Alexander the Great crossed these mountains, his followers—regarding the achievement as equivalent to what a Greek considered as the highest geographical feat, namely, the passage of the Caucasus—conferred this glory on their chief by simply applying the name of Caucasus to the mountain chain which he had thus passed; and then, for the sake of distinction, this chain was called Caucasus Indicus, and this name has come down to our times in the native form of Hindoo-Koosh, and in others also. The name Paropamisus is also applied sometimes to the great southern branch of this chain (now Soliman Mountains) which skirts the valley of the Indus on the west, and which is more specifically called ΠΑΡΕΤΙ or ΠΑΡΕΥΤΗΣ.

PAROPUS (Paropinus), a small town in the interior of Sicily, north of the Nebrodes Montes.

ΠΑΡΩΣΙΑ (Parôpsia). 1. A town in Thracæ, on the frontiers of Macedonia, whose inhabitants were the same people as the Parosæi of Pliny.—2. Or ΠΑΡΩΣΙΑ (Parôpsia), a town in the south of Arcadia, north of Megalopolis, said to have been founded by Parosæus, son of Tricolonus, and a grandson of Lycaon, the inhabitants of which took part in the building of Megalopolis.

ΠΑΡΩΣΙΑΙΩΤΑΙ (Parôpsiaîotai), the most ancient inhabitants of the mountains in Triphylia in Elis, who were expelled by the Minyæ.

PAROS (Πάρος; Pápios; now Pare), an island in the Ægean Sea, one of the larger of the Cyclades, was situated south of Delos and west of Naxos, being separated from the latter by a channel five or six miles wide. It is about thirty-six miles in circumference. It is said to have been originally colonized by Cretans, but was afterward inhabited by Ionians, and became so prosperous, even at an early period, as to send out colonies to Thasos and to Parium on the Propontis. In the first invasion of Greece by the generals of Darius, Paros submitted to the Persians; and after the battle of Marathon Miltiades attempted to reduce the island, but failed in his attempt, and received a wound, of which he died. Vid. MILTIADÆS. After the defeat of Xerxes, Paros came under the supremacy of Athens, and shared the fate of the other Cyclades. Its name rarely occurs in subsequent history. The most celebrated production of Paros was its marble, which was extensively used by the ancient sculptors. It was chiefly obtained from a mountain called Mar-pessa. The Parian figs were also highly prized. The chief town of Paros was situated on the western coast, and bore the same name as the island. The ruins of it are still to be seen at the modern Paroikia. Paros was the birth-place of the poet Archilochus. In Paros was discovered the celebrated inscription called the Parian Chronicle, which is now preserved at Oxford. The inscription is cut on a block of marble, and in its perfect state contained a chronological account of the principal events in Greek history from Cecrops, B.C. 1583, to the archonship of Diognetus, 264. [This inscription, so far as it is preserved, was reprinted in Chandler's Marmora Oxoniensia, Oxford, 1783, fol.; by Boeckh in his Corpus Inscriptionum Græcarum, vol. ii., p. 293, egg.; and by Muller in Fragm. Hist. Græc., vol. i., p. 533-590.]

ΠΑΡΡΑΣΙΑ (Parrâsia; Parrâsios), a district in the south of Arcadia, to which, according to Pausanias, the towns Lycoœura, Thœcna, Trapezus, Proœis, Acœcesium, Acontium, Macaria, and Dasea belonged. The Parrhasii are said to have been one of the most ancient of the Arcadian tribes. At the time of the Peloponnesian war they were under the supremacy of Mantinea, but were rendered independent of that city by the Lacedæmonians. Homer (Il., ii., 608) mentions a town Parrhasia, said to have been founded by Parrhasus, son of Lycaon, or by Pelasgus, son of Areator. The adjective Parrhasius is frequently used by the poets as equivalent to Arcadian.

ΠΑΡΡΑΣΙΕΥΣ (Parrâsios), one of the most celebrated Greek painters, was a native of Ephesus the son and pupil of Evenor. He practised his art chiefly at Athens, and by some writers he is called an Athenian, probably because the Athenians had bestowed upon him the right of citizenship. He flourished about B.C. 400. Parrhasius did for painting, at least in pictures of gods and heroes, what had been done for sculpture by Phidias in divine subjects, and by Polykleitos in the human figure: he established a canon of proportion, which was followed by all the artists that came after him. Several interesting observations on the principles of art which he followed are made in a dialogue with Socrates, as reported by Xenophon (Mem., iii., 10). The character of Parrhasius was marked in the highest degree by that arrogance which often accompanies the consciousness of pre-eminent ability. In epigrams inscribed on his works he not only made a boast of his luxurious habits, but he also claimed the honor of having assigned with his own hand the precise limits of the art, and fixed a boundary which never was to be transgressed. Respecting the story of his contest with Zeuxis, vid. ZEUXIS. Of the works of Parrhasius, the most celebrated seems to have been his picture of the Athenian People.

PARSI. Vid. PAROPAMISADÆ.

PARSICI MONTES (τὰ Παροικὰ ὄρη, now Bush-turd Mountains in the west of Beloochistan), a chain of mountains running northeast from the Paragon Sinus (now Gulf of Oman), and forming the boundary between Carmania and Gedrosia. At the foot of these mountains, in the west of Gedrosia, were a people called PARSI, with a capital PARSIS (now perhaps Serbah).

PARSËTÆ (Παρσηταί), a people on the borders of Arachosia and the Paropamisadæ, with a mountain of the same name, which is probably identical with the PARSËT Montes and with the Soliman Mountains.

PARTHËLIS, the chief city of the Calingæ, a tribe of the Ganges, in India intra Gangem, at the head of the Sinus Gangeticus (now Sea of Bengal).

PARTHËNIAS (Παρθενίας), also called PARTHËNIA, a small river in Elis, which flows into the Alpheus east of Olympia, not far from Harpinna.

PARTHËNIUM (Παρθένιον). 1. A town in Mysia, south of Pergamum.—2. (Now Felenk-burun), a promontory in the Chersonesus Taurica, on which stood a temple of the Tauric Diana (Artemis), from whom it derived its name. It was in this temple that human sacrifices were offered to the goddess.

PARTHËNIUM MARE (τὸ Παρθενικὸν πῆλαγος), the southeastern part of the Mediterranean, between Egypt and Cyprus.

PARTHËNIUS (Παρθένιος), of Nicæa, or, according to others, of Myrlea, a celebrated grammarian, is said by Suidas to have been taken prisoner by Cinna in the Mithradatic war, to have been manumitted on account of his learning, and to have lived to the reign of Tiberius. If this statement is true, Parthenius must have attained a great age, since there were seventy-seven years from the death of Mithradates to the accession of Tiberius. Parthenius taught Virgil Greek, and he seems to have been very popular among the distinguished Romans of his time. The Emperor Tiberius imitated his poems, and placed his works and statues in the public libraries along with the most celebrated ancient writers. Parthenius wrote many poems, but the only one of his works which has come down to us is in prose, and entitled Περὶ τῶν κῶν παθῶντων. It contains thirty-six brief love-stories, which ender in an unfortunate manner. It is dedicated to Cornelius Gallus and was compiled for his use, that he might avail himself of the materials in the composition of epic and elegiac poems. The best edition is by Westermann, in the Mythographi Græci, Brunswick, 1843.

PARTHËNIUS (Παρθένιος). 1. A mountain of the frontiers of Argolis and Arcadia, through which was an important pass leading from Argolis to Tegea. This pass is still called Partheni, but the mountain itself, which rises to the height of three thousand nine hundred and ninety-three feet, bears the name of Roïno. It was on this mountain that Telephus, the son of Hercules and Auge, was said to have been suckled by a hind; and it was here, also, that the god Pan was said to have appeared to Phidippides, the Athenian courier, shortly before the battle of Marathon.—2. (Also Παρθένης: now Chati-Su or Bertan-Su), the chief river of Paphlagonia, rises at Mount Olgaassy, and flows northwest into the Euxine ninety stadia west of Amastria, forming in the lower part of its course the boundary between Bithynia and Paphlagonia.

PARTHËNŌN (ὁ Παρθενών, i. e., the virgin's chamber), was the usual name of one of the finest, and, in its influences upon art, one of the most important edifices ever built: the temple of Minerva (Athena) Parthenos on the Acropolis of Athens. It was also called Ἑκατόμυρον (Ἑκατόμυρον) or Ἑκατόμυρος (Ἑκατόμυρος, so. veós), from its being one hundred feet in one of its chief dimensions, probably in the breadth of the top step on which the front pillars stand. It was erected, under the administration of Pericles, on the site of the older temple of Minerva (Athena), burned during the Persian invasion, and was completed by the dedication of the statue of the goddess, B.C. 438. Its architects were Ictinus and Callicrates, but all the works were under the superintendence of Phidias. It was built entirely of Pentelic marble, its dimensions were two hundred and twenty-seven English feet long, one hundred and one broad, and sixty-five high; it was fifty feet longer than the edifice which preceded it. Its architecture was of the Doric order, and of the purest kind. It consisted of an oblong central building (the cella or veós), surrounded on all sides by a peristyle of pillars, forty-six in number, eight at each end and seventeen at each side (reckoning the corner pillars twice), elevated on a platform, which was ascended by three steps all round the building. Within the porticoes, at each end, was another row of six pillars, standing on a level with the floor of the cella, and two steps higher than that of the peristyle. The cella was divided into two chambers of unequal size, the prodomos or pronaos (πρόδομος, πρόναος) and the opisthodomus (οπισθόδομος) or paucium; the former, which was the larger, contained the statue of the goddess, and was the true sanctuary, the latter being probably used as a treasury and vestry. Both these chambers had inner rows of pillars (in two stories, one over the other of sixteen in the former and four in the latter, supporting the partial roof, for the large chamber, at least, had its centre open to the sky. Technically, the temple is called peripteral octastyle hypæthral. It was adorned, within and without, with colors and gilding, and with sculptures which are regarded as the master-pieces of ancient art. The colossal chryselephantine (very and gold) statue of Minerva (Athena), which stood at the end of the prodomus, opposite the entrance, was the work of Phidias himself, and surpassed every other statue in the west world, except that of Jupiter (Zeus) at Olympia by the same artist. The other sculptures were executed under the direction of artists by different artists, as may still be seen in differences in their style; but the most important of them were doubtless from the hand of Phidias himself: (1.) The tympana of the pediments (i. e., the inner flat portion of the triangular ends of the roof above the two end-aces) were filled with groups of detached statues, those of the eastern or principal front representing the birth of Minerva (Athena), and those of the western front the contest between Minerva (Athena) and Neptune (Poseidon) for the land of Attica. (2.) In the cella of the entablature (i. e., the upper of the portions into which the surface between columns and the roof is divided), the metopes between the triglyphs (i. e., the square spaces between the projections answering to the ends of the eaves if the roof had been of wood) were filled with sculptures in high relief, ninety-two in all, fourteen on each front, and thirty-two on each side, representing subjects from the Attic mythology, among which the battle of the Athenians with the Centaurs forms the subject of fifteen metopes from the southern side, which are now in the British Museum. (3.) Along the top of the external wall of the cella, under the architrave of the peristyle, ran a frieze, sculptured as a representation of the Panathænaic procession in very low relief. A large number of fragments of this frieze were brought to England by Lord Elgin, with the fifteen metopes just mentioned, and a considerable number of other fragments, including some of the most important, mutilated, statues from the pediments; the whole collection was purchased by the British Museum in 1816, and deposited in the British Museum, where may also be seen excellent models of the ruins of the Parthenon, and of the temple as it is spectrally restored. The worst of the injury which it has suffered from war and pillage occurred in the siege of Athens by the Venetians in 1687, when a bomb exploded in the very centre of the Parthenon, and threw down much of the side walls. Its ruins are still, however, in sufficient preservation to give a clear idea of the construction of all its principal parts. Antenor (Ἀντήνορας), one of the heroes who accompanied Adrastus in his expedition against Thebes. He is sometimes said to be a son of Mars (Ares) or Milanion and Atalanta, sometimes of Meleager and Atalanta, and sometimes of Talus and Lysimachus. His son, the nymph Clytemnestra, who married Agamemnon, is called Promachus (Προμάχος), Thesimachus, or Tlesimachus.

Partholopus was killed at Thebes by Amphidamas, Amphidicus, or Periclymenus.

(Παρθένωρα (Παρθένωρα), one of the Sirens who is said to have given its early and poetic name to Neapolis. Vid. NEAPOLIS.)

Παρθένωρα (Παρθένωρα), a town in Macedonia Inferior, near the Pontus Euxinus, and between Calatis and Tomi.

PARTHIA, ΠΑΡΘΙΑ, PARTHIEN (Παρθία, Παρθία, Παρθηνή: Πάρθοι, Παρθαίοι, Παρθίαι, Παρθίαι: now Khorassan), a country of Asia, to the southeast of the Caspian. Its extent was different at different times; but, as the term was generally understood by the ancient geographers, it denoted the partly mountainous and partly desert country on the south of the mountains which hem in the Caspian on the southeast (Mons Labuta), and which divided Parthia on the north from Hyrcania. On the northeast and east, a branch of the same chain, called Masdaranus, divided it from Aria; on the south the deserts of Parthia joined those of Carmania, and further westward the Mons Parachoathrus divided Parthia from Persia and Susiana; on the west and northwest it was divided from Media by boundaries which can not be exactly marked out. Of this district only the northern part, in and below the mountains of Hyrcania, seems to have formed the proper country of the Parthians, who were a people of Scythian origin. The ancient writers tell us that the name means crises; but this is uncertain. They were a very warlike people, and especially celebrated as horse-archers. Their tactics, of which the Romans had fatal experience in their first wars with them, became so celebrated as to pass into a proverb. Their mail-clad horsemen spread like a cloud round the hostile army, and poured in a shower of darts; and then evaded any closer conflict by a rapid flight, during which they still shot their arrow backward upon the enemy. Under the Persian empire, the Parthians, with the Chorasmii, Sogdii, and Arii, formed the sixteenth satrapy: under Alexander and the Greek kings of Syria, Parthia and Hyrcania together formed a satrapy. About B.C. 250 they revolted from the Seleucids, under a chieftain named Arsaces, who founded an independent monarchy, the history of which is given under ARSACES. During the period of the downfall of the Syrian kingdom, the Parthians overran the provinces east of the Euphrates, and about B.C. 180 they overthrew the kingdom of Bactria, so that their empire extended over Asia from the Euphrates to the Indies, and from the Indian Ocean to the Paropamisus, or even to the Oxus; but on this northern frontier they had to maintain a continual conflict with the nomad tribes of Central Asia. On the west their progress was checked by Mithradates and Tigranes, till those kings fell successively before the Romans, who were thus brought into collision with the Parthians. After the memorable destruction of Crassus and his army, B.C. 53 (vid. CRASSUS), the Parthians threatened Syria and Asia Minor; but their progress was stopped by two signal defeats, which they suffered from Antony's legate Ventidius in 39 and 38. The preparations for renewing the war with Rome were rendered fruitless by the contest for the Parthian throne between Phraates IV. and Tigranes.

states, which led to an appeal to Augustus, and to the restoration of the standards of Crassus, B.C. 20; an event to which the Roman poets often allude in terms of flattery to Augustus, almost as if he had conquered the Parthian empire. It is to be observed that the poets of the Augustan age use the names Parthi, Persæ, and Medi indifferently. The Parthian empire had now begun to decline, owing to civil contests and the defection of the governors of provinces, and had ceased to be formidable to the Romans. There were, however, continual disputes between the two empires for the protectorate of the kingdom of Armenia. In consequence of one of these disputes, Trajan invaded the Parthian empire, and obtained possession for a short time of Mesopotamia; but his conquests were surrendered under Hadrian, and the Euphrates again became the boundary of the two empires. There were other wars at later periods, which resulted in favor of the Romans, who took Seleucia and Ctesiphon, and made the district of Osroëne a Roman province. The exhaustion which was the effect of these wars at length gave the Persians the opportunity of throwing off the Parthian yoke. Led by Artaxerxes (Ardashir), they put an end to the Parthian kingdom of the Arsacids, after it had lasted four hundred and seventy-six years, and established the Persian dynasty of the Sassanids, A.D. 226. Vid. ARSACES, SASSANIDS.

PARTHINI or PARTHINI (Παρθίνοι, Παρθύνοι), an Illyrian people, in the neighborhood of Dyrrachium.

PARTHICUS or PARTHIUS, a river in Dacia, probably the same as the Tibiscus. Vid. TIBISCUS.

PARTADRES (Παρτάδρης: now Kara-bel Dagh, or Kut-Tagh), a mountain chain of Western Asia, running southwest and northeast from the east of Asia Minor into the centre of Armenia, and forming the chief connecting link between the Taurus and the mountains of Armenia. It was considered as the boundary between Cappadocia (i. e., Pontus Cappadocius) and Armenia (i. e., Armenia Minor). In a wide sense the name seems sometimes to extend so far north-east as to include Mount Abus (now Ararat) in Armenia.

PARYËTI MONTES (τὰ Παρυέτιν ὄρη, from the Indian word paruta, i. e., a mountain: now Soliman Mount), the great mountain chain which runs north and south on the western side of the valley of the Indus, and forms the connecting link between the mountains which skirt the northern coast of the Persian Gulf and the Indian Ocean, and the parallel chain, further north, called the Paropamisus or Indian Caucasus; or, between the eastern extensions of the Taurus and Anti-Taurus systems, in the widest sense. This chain formed the boundary between Arabia and the Paropamisadæ: it now divides Beloochistan and Afghanistan on the west from Scinde and the Punjab on the east, and it meets the Hindoo-Koosh in the northeastern corner of Afghanistan, between Cabool and Peshawar. Its ancient inhabitants were called Paryëta (Παρυέται), and the name Paruta is found in old Persian inscriptions and in the Zendavesta (the old Persian sacred book) as that of a people.

PARYËTIS (Παρυέτις or Παρυέτις), daughter of Artaxerxes I. Longimanus, king of Persia, as given by her father in marriage to her own brother Darius, surnamed Ochus, who in B.C. 424 succeeded Xerxes II. on the throne of Persia. The feeble character of Darius threw the chief power into the hands of Paryætis, whose administration was little else than a series of murders. Four of her sons grew up to manhood. The eldest of these, Artaxerxes Maenon, was born before Darius had obtained the sovereign power, and on this pretext Paryætis sought to set aside his claims to the throne in favor of her second son Cyrus. Failing in the attempt, she nevertheless interposed after the death of Darius, 405, to prevent Artaxerxes from putting Cyrus to death, and prevailed with the king to allow him to return to his captivity in Asia Minor. After the death of Cyrus at the battle of Cunaxa (401), she did not hesitate to display her grief for the death of her favorite son by bestowing funeral honors on his mutilated remains; and she subsequently succeeded in getting into her power all the authors of the death of Cyrus, whom she put to death by the most cruel tortures. She afterward poisoned Statira, the wife of Artaxerxes. The feeble and indolent king was content to banish her to Babylon; and it was not long before he recalled her to his court, where she soon recovered all her former influence. Of this she availed herself to turn his suspicions against Tissaphernes, whom she had long hated as having been the first to discover the designs of Cyrus to his brother, and who was now put to death by Artaxerxes at her instigation, 368. She appears to have died soon afterward.

PASARGADA or -M (Πασαργάδα, Πασαργάδα), the older of the two capitals of Persia (the other and later being Persepolis), is said to have been founded by Cyrus the Great on the spot where he gained his great victory over Astyages. The tomb of Cyrus stood here in the midst of a beautiful park. The exact site is doubtful. Strabo describes it as lying in the hollow part of Persia, on the River Cyrus, southeast of Persepolis, and near the borders of Carmania. Most modern geographers identify it with Murghab, northeast of Persepolis, where there are the remains of a great sepulchral monument of the ancient Persians. Others place it at Parsa or at Darab-gherd, both southeast of Persepolis, but not answering Strabo's description in other respects so well as Murghab. Others identify it with Persepolis, which is almost certainly in error.

PASARGADÆ (Πασαργάδαί), the most noble of the three chief tribes of the ancient Persians, the other two being the Maraphii and Maspii. The royal house of the Achæmenidæ were of the race of the Pasargadæ. They had their residence chiefly in and about the city of Pasargada.

PASIAS (Πασίας), father of the Sicyonian tyrant Abantides; after the death of his son he made himself tyrant, but was soon after slain by Nicocles.]

PASIAS, a Greek painter, belonged to the Sicyonian school, and flourished about B.C. 220.

PASION (Πάσιον). [1. A Megarian, in the service of Cyrus the younger when he besieged Miletus; he afterward joined him with seven hundred men at Sardis in his expedition against his brother Artaxerxes. Having taken offence at Cyrus's allowing Clearchus to retain the soldiers who had deserted from him at Tarsus, Pasion himself abandoned the cause of Cyrus, and sailed away from Myriandrus for Greece with his most valuable effects. He was not pursued, and Cyrus did not even detain his wife and children, who were in his power at Tralles.]

—2. A wealthy banker at Athens, was originally a slave of Antisthenes and Archestratus, who were also bankers. In their service he displayed great fidelity as well as aptitude for business, and was manumitted as a reward. He afterward set up a banking concern on his own account, by which, together with a shield-manufactory, he greatly enriched himself, while he continued all along to preserve his old character of integrity, and his credit stood high throughout Greece. He did not, however, escape an accusation of fraudulently keeping back some money which had been intrusted to him by a signer from the Euxine. The plaintiff's case stated in an oration of Isocrates (γραψεῖν ἰσχύς), all extant. Pasion did good service to Athens with his money on several occasions. He was rewarded with the freedom of the city, and was enrolled in the demos of Acharnæ. He died at Athens in B.C. 370, after a lingering illness, accompanied with failure of sight. Toward the end of his life his affairs were administered to great extent by his freedman Phormion, to whom he let his banking shop and shield-manufactory, and settled in his will that he should bury his widow Archippe, with a handsome dowry, and undertake the guardianship of his younger son Pasicles. His elder son, Apollonius, grievously diminished his patrimony by extravagance and law-suits.

PASIPHÆ (Πασίφαι), daughter of Helios (the Sun) and Perseis, and a sister of Circe and Calypso, was the wife of Minos, by whom she became the mother of Androgeos, Orestes, Deukalion, Glaucus, Acalles, Xenodice, Ariadne, and Phædra. Hence Phædra is called Pasiphaia (Met., xv., 500). Respecting the passion Pasiphaë for the beautiful bull, and the birth of the Minotaurus, vid. p. 517, b.

ΠΑΣΙΤΕΛΗΣ (Πασιτέλης). 1. A statuary, who flourished about B.C. 468, and was the teacher of Polotes, the contemporary of Phidias.—2. A painter, sculptor, and silver-chaser, of the highest distinction, was a native of Magna Græcia.

—3. Obtained the Roman franchise with his countrymen in B.C. 90. He flourished at Rome from about 60 to 30. Pasiteles also wrote a treatise in five books upon celebrated works of art and chasing.

ΠΑΣΙΤΕΙΑ (Πασίτεια). 1. One of the Charites, Graces, also called Aglaia.—2. One of the Erases.

ΠΑΣΙΤΥΓΓΗΣ (Πασιτύγγης or Πασιτύγγες; now called [Shat-el-Arab]), a considerable river of Asia, rising in the mountains east of Mesopotamia, on the confines of Media and Persia, and running first west by north to Mount Zagros (Arachotāras, then, breaking through this range, it turns to the south, and flows through Persia into the head of the Persian Gulf, after giving the Eulæus on its western side. Some geographers make the Pasitigris a tributary of the Tigris.

PASSINON (Πασσίον; near Stramisius, south-west of Joannina, a town of Epirus in Molossia, and the ancient capital of the Molossian kings. It was destroyed by the Romans, together with seventy other towns of Epirus, after the conquest of Macedonia, B.C. 166.

ΠΑΤΑΡΑ (τὰ Πάραπα: Παπαρός; ruins at Patara), one of the chief cities of Lycia, was a flourishing sea-port, on a promontory of the same name (τὸ Παράπον ἄκρα), sixty stadia (six geographical miles) east of the mouth of the Xanthus. It was early colonized by Dorians from Crete, and became a chief seat of the worship of Apollo, who had here a very celebrated oracle, which uttered responses in the winter only, and from whose son Patarus the name of the city was mythically derived. It was restored and enlarged by Ptolemy Philadelphus, who called it Arsinoë, but it remained better known by its old name.

[PATARCHEMIS (Παράρχημις), one of the principal officers of Apries, king of Egypt, having been sent to arrest and bring to him Amasis, but having failed in so doing, was shamefully mutilated by the king; this conduct caused a revolt of the Egyptians.]

PATAVIUM (Patavinus; now Padova or Padua), an ancient town of the Veneti in the north of Italy, on the Medoacus Minor, and on the road from Mutina to Altinum, was said to have been founded by the Trojan Antenor. It became a flourishing and important town in early times, and was powerful enough in B.C. 302 to drive back the Spartan king Cleomenes with great loss when he attempted to plunder the surrounding country. Under the Romans Patavium was the most important city in the north of Italy, and, by its commerce and manufactures (of which its woollen stuffs were the most celebrated), it attained great opulence. According to Strabo, it possessed five hundred citizens, whose fortune entitled them to the equestrian rank. It was plundered by Attila; and, in consequence of a revolt of its citizens, it was subsequently destroyed by Agilolf, king of the Langobards, and razed to the ground; hence the modern town contains few remains of antiquity. Patavium is celebrated as the birth-place of the historian Livy. In its neighborhood were the Aqua Patavinæ, also called Aponi Fons, respecting which, vid. p. 78, b.

PATERCULUS, C. VELLEIUS, a Roman historian, was probably born about B.C. 19, and was descended from a distinguished Campanian family. He adopted the profession of arms; and, soon after he had entered the army, he accompanied C. Cæsar in his expedition to the East, and was present with the latter at his interview with the Parthian king in A.D. 2. Two years afterward, A.D. 4, he served under Tiberius in Germany, succeeding his father in the rank of sextus equum, having previously filled the offices of tribune of the soldiers and tribune of the camp. For the next eight years Paternulus served under Tiberius, either as præfectus or legatus, in the various campaigns of the latter in Germany, Pannonia, and Dalmatia, and, by his activity and ability, gained the favor of the future emperor. He was quaestor A.D. 7, but he continued to serve as legatus under Tiberius. He accompanied his commander on his return to Rome in 12, and took a prominent part in the triumphal procession of Tiberius, along with his brother Magnus Celer. The two brothers were prætors in 15. Paternulus was alive in 30, as he drew up his history in that year for the use of M. Vinicius, who was then cæsar; and it is conjectured, with much probability, that he perished in the following year (31), along with the other friends of Sejanus. The favorable manner in which he had so recently spoken in his history of this powerful minister would be sufficient to insure his condemnation on the fall of the latter. The work of Paternulus, which has come down to us, is a brief historical compendium in two books, and bears the title C. Vellei Paternuli Historia Romana ad M. Vinicium Cæs. Libri II. The beginning of the work is wanting, and there is also a portion lost after the eighth chapter of the first book. The object of this compendium was to give a brief view of universal history, but more especially of the events connected with Rome, the history of which occupies the main portion of the book. It commenced apparently with the destruction of Troy, and ended with the year 30. In the execution of his work, Velleius has shown great skill and judgment. He does not attempt to give a consecutive account of all the events of history; he seizes upon a few only of the more prominent facts, which he describes at sufficient length to leave them impressed upon the recollection of his readers. His style, which is a close imitation of Sallust's, is characterized by clearness, conciseness, and energy. In his estimate of the characters of the leading actors in Roman history, he generally exhibits both discrimination and judgment; but he lavishes the most indiscriminate praises, as might have been expected, upon his patron Tiberius. Only one manuscript of Paternulus has come down to us; and as this manuscript abounds with errors, the text is in a very corrupt state. The best editions are by Ruhken, Lugd. Bat., 1789; by Orelli, Lips., 1835; by Bothe, Turici, 1837; [and by Kritz, Lips., 1840.]

PATERNUS, TARRUNTENUS, a jurist, is probably the same person who was præfectus prætorio under Commodus, and was put to death by the emperor on a charge of treason. He was the author of a work in four books, entitled De Re Militari or Militarium, from which there are two excerpts in the Digest.

ΠΑΤΡΟΣ (Πάτρος; now Patmo), one of the islands called Sporades, in the Icarian Sea, at about equal distances south of Samos and west of the Promontorium Posidium on the coast of Caria, celebrated as the place to which the Apostle John was banished, and in which he wrote the Apocalypse. The natives still affect to show the cave where St. John saw the apocalyptic visions (τὸ σπήλαιον τῆς ἀποκαλύψεως). On the eastern side of the island was a city with a harbor.

ΠΑΤΡΑΣ (Πάτρας, Πατρίας, Herod.: Πατραί; now Patras), one of the twelve cities of Achaia was situated west of Rhium, near the opening of the Corinthian Gulf. It is said to have been originally called Aroe (Ἀρόα), and to have been founded by the autochthon Eumelus; and after the expulsion of the Ionians, to have been taken possession of by Patreus, from whom it derived its name. The town is rarely mentioned in early Greek history, and was chiefly of importance as the place from which the Peloponnesians directed their attacks against the opposite coast of Ætolia. Patre was one of the four towns which took the leading part in founding the second Achaean league. In consequence of assisting the Ætoliens against the Gauls in B.C. 279, Patre became so weakened that most of the inhabitants deserted the town and took up their abodes in the neighboring villages. Under the Romans it continued to be an insignificant place till the time of Augustus, who rebuilt the town after the battle of Actium, again collected its inhabitants, and added to them those of Rhipe. Augustus further gave Patre dominion over the neighboring towns, and even over Locria, and also bestowed upon it the privileges of a Roman colony; hence we find it called on coins Colonia Augusta Aroe Patrensis. Strabo describes Patre in his time as a flourishing and populous town, with a good harbor, and it was frequently the place at which persons landed sailing from Italy to Greece. The modern Patras is still an important place, but contains few remains of antiquity.

ΠΑΤΡΟΚΛΗΣ (Πατροκλῆς), a Macedonian general in the service of Seleucus I. and Antiochus I., kings of Syria. Patrocles held, both under Seleucus and Antiochus, an important government over some of the eastern provinces of the Syrian empire. During the period of his holding this position, he collected accurate geographical information, which he afterward published to the world; but, though he is frequently cited by Strabo, who placed the utmost reliance on his accuracy, neither the title nor exact subject of his work is mentioned. It seems clear, however, that it included a general account of India, as well as of the countries on the banks of the Oxus and the Caspian Sea. Patrocles regarded the Caspian Sea as a gulf or inlet of the ocean, and maintained the possibility of sailing thither by sea from the Indian Ocean.

ΠΑΤΡΟΚΛΗ ΝΗΣΟΣ (Πατροκλῆος νῆσος; now Gaidaronessi or Gaidronisi), a small island of the southwestern coast of Attica, near Sanium.

ΠΑΤΡΟΚΛΟΣ (Πάτροκλος or Πατροκλῆς), the celebrated friend of Achilles, was son of Menestheus of Opus, and grandson of Actor and Egeus, whence he is called Actorides. His mother is commonly called Sthenela, but some mention her under the name of Peripis or Polyneke. Egeus, the grandfather of Achilles, was a brother of Menestheus, so that Achilles and Patroclus were kinsmen as well as friends. While still a boy, Patroclus involuntarily slew Clytemnestra, son of Amphidamas. In consequence of the accident, he was taken by his father to Peleus at Phthia, where he was educated together with Achilles. He is said to have taken part in the expedition against Troy on account of his attachment to Achilles. He fought bravely against the Trojans, until his friend withdrew from the scene of action, when Patroclus followed his example. But when the Greeks were hard pressed, he begged Achilles to allow him to put on his armor, and with his men to hasten to the assistance of the Greeks. Achilles granted the request, and Patroclus succeeded in driving back the Trojans and extinguishing the fire which was raging among the ships. He slew many enemies, and thrice made an assault upon the walls of Troy; but on a sudden he was struck by Apollo, and became senseless. In this state Euphorbus ran him through with his lance from behind, and Hector gave him the last and fatal blow. Hector also took possession of his armor. A long struggle now ensued between the Greeks and Trojans for the body of Patroclus; but the former obtained possession of it, and brought it to Achilles, who was deeply grieved, and vowed to avenge the death of his friend. Thetis protected the body with ambrosia against decomposition, until Achilles had leisure solemnly to burn it with funeral sacrifices. His ashes were collected in a golden urn which Bacchus (Dionysus) had once given to Thetis, and were deposited under a mound, where the remains of Achilles were subsequently buried. Funeral games were celebrated in his honor. Achilles and Patroclus met again in the lower world; or, according to others, they continued after their death to live together in the island of Leuca.

[PATRON, an Arcadian, mentioned by Virgil as one of those engaged in the games celebrated by Theseus in Sicily in honor of his father.]

PATRON. [1. A native of Phocis, commander of the Greek mercenaries who accompanied Xerxes after the battle of Gaugamela. When Xerxes and his accomplices were conspiring against Darius, Patron with his Greeks remained faithful to him.]—2. An Epicurean philosopher, lived for some time in Rome, where he became acquainted with Cicero and others. From Rome he removed to Athens, and there succeeded Phaedrus as president of the Epicurean school, B.C. 55.

PATTALA. Vid. PATTALENE.

PATTALÈNE or PATALÈNE (Πατταλινή, Παταλή: now Lower Scinde), the name of the great city formed by the two principal arms by which the Indus falls into the sea. At the apex of the city stood the city PATTALA or PATALA (now probably Hyderabad). The name is probably a native Indian word, namely, the Sanscrit patāla, which means the western country, and is applied to the western part of Northern India about the delta, in contradistinction to the eastern part east the Ganges.

PATULOS, a surname of Janus. Vid. JANUS. PATRUS (Πάτριος: in the Old Testament, shown: probably near Hebacya or Belbeis), an Egyptian city in the Arabian Desert, on the eastern margin of the Delta, near Bubastis, and near the commencement of Necho's Canal from the Nile to the Red Sea; built by the Israelites during their captivity (Exod. i. 11).

PAULINA or PAULLINA. 1. LULLIA. Vid. LULLIA.—2. POMPEIA, wife of Seneca the philosopher, and probably the daughter of Pompeius Paulinus, who commanded in Germany in the reign of Nero. When her husband was condemned to death, she opened her veins along with him. After the blood had flowed some time, Nero commanded her veins to be bound up; she lived a few years longer, but with a paleness which testified how near she had been to death.

PAULINUS. . . POMPEIUS, commanded in Germany along with L. Antistius Vetus in A.D. 58, and completed the dam to restrain the inundation of the Rhine, which Drusus had commenced sixty-three years before. Seneca dedicated to him his treatise De Brevitate Vitæ; and the Pompeia Paulina, whom the philosopher married, was probably the daughter of this Paulinus.—2. SUETONIUS, prætor in Mauretania, in the reign of the Emperor Claudius, A.D. 42, when he conquered the Moors who had revolted, and advanced as far as Mount Atlas. He had the command of Britain in the reign of Nero, from 59 to 62. For the first two years all his undertakings were successful; but during his absence on an expedition against the island of Mona (now Anglesey), the Britons rose in rebellion under Boadicea (61). They at first met with great success, but were conquered by Suetonius on his return from Mona. Vid. BOADICEA. In 66 he was consul; and, after the death of Nero in 68, he was one of Otho's generals in the war against Vitellius. It was against his advice that Otho fought the battle at Bedriacum. He was pardoned by Vitellius after Otho's death.—3. OF MILAN (Mediolanensis), was the secretary of St. Ambrose, after whose death he became a deacon, and repaired to Africa, where, at the request of St. Augustine, he composed a biography of his former patron. This biography, and two other small works by Paulinus, are still extant.—4. MEXORIUS PONTIUS AMICIUS PAULINUS, bishop of Nola, and hence generally designated Paulinus Nolanus, was born at Bourdeaux, or at a neighboring town, which he calls Embromagum, about A.D. 363. His parents were wealthy and illustrious, and he received a careful education, enjoying in particular the instructions of the poet Ausonius. After many years spent in worldly honors, he withdrew from the world, and was eventually chosen bishop of Nola in 409. He died in 431. The works of Paulinus are still extant, and consist of Epistola (fifty-one in number), Carmina (thirty-two in number, composed in a great variety of metres), and a short tract entitled Passio S. Gensii Arelatensis. Edited by Le Brun, 4to, Paris, 1685, reprinted at Veron., 1736.

PAULUS or PAULS, a Roman cognomen in many gentes, but best known as the name of a family of the Æmilia gens. The name was originally written with a double l, but subsequently with only one l.

PAULUS (Παῦλος), Greek writers. 1. ÆGINETA, a celebrated medical writer, of whose personal history nothing is known except that he was born in Ægina, and that he travelled a good deal, visiting, among other places, Alexandria. He probably lived in the latter half of the seventh century after Christ. He wrote several medical works in Greek, of which the principal one is still extant, with no exact title, but commonly called De Re Medica Libri Septem. This work is chiefly a compilation from former writers. The Greek text has been twice published, Venet., 1523, and Basil., 1538. There is an exsedent Eng.-sh translation by Adams, London, 1834, seq.—2. Of ALEXANDREA, wrote, in A.D. 578, an Introduction to Astrology (Ἐισαγωγή εἰς τὴν ἀποτελεσματικὴν), which has come down to us, edited by Schatus or Schato, Wittenberg, 1586.—3. Of SAMOSATA, a celebrated heresiarch of the third century, was made bishop of Antioch about A.D. 260. He was condemned and deposed by a council held in 269. Paulus denied the distinct personality of the Son of God, and maintained that the Word came and dwelt in the man Jesus.—4. SILENTIARIUS, so called, because he was chief of the silentiarii, or secretaries of the Emperor Justinian. He wrote various poems, of which the following are extant: (1.) A Description of the Church of St. Sophia (Ἐκφρασις τοῦ ναοῦ τῆς δylας Σοφίας), consisting of one thousand and twenty-nine verses, of which the first one hundred and thirty-four are iambic, the rest hexameter. This poem gives a clear and graphic description of the superb structure which forms its subject, and was recited by its author at the second dedication of the church (A.D. 562), after the restoration of the dome, which had fallen in. Edited by Græfe, Lips., 1822, and by Bekker, Bonn, 1837, in the Bonn edition of the Byzantine historians. (2.) A Description of the Pulpit (Ἐκφρασις τοῦ ὑψευός), consisting of three hundred and four verses, is a supplement to the former poem. It is printed in the editions mentioned above. (3.) Epigrams, eighty-three in all, given in the Anthologia. Among these is a poem On the Pythian Baths, (Εἰς τὰ ἐν Πυθίῳ ὅρμα).

PAULUS, ÆMILIUS. 1. M., consul B.C. 303, and magister equitum to the dictator Q. Fabius Maximus Rullianus, 301.—2. M., consul 255 with Ser. Fulvius Ratinus Nobilior, about the middle of the first Punic war. Vid. NOBILIOR, No. 1.—3. L., son of No. 2, consul 219, when he conquered Demetrius off the island of Pharos in the Adriatic, and compelled him to fly for refuge to Philip, king of Macedonia. He was consul a second time in 216 with C. Terentius Varro. This was the year of the memorable defeat at Cannæ. Vid. HANNIBAL. The battle was fought against the advice of Paulus; and he was one of the many distinguished Romans who perished in the engagement, refusing to fly from the field when a tribune of the soldiers offered him his horse. Hence we find in Horace (Carm., l. 12), “animæque magnæ prodigum Paulum, superante Pæno.” Paulus was a staunch adherent of the aristocracy, and was raised to the consulship by the latter party to counterbalance the influence of the plebeian Terentius Varro.—4. L., afterward surnamed MACEDONICUS, son of No. 3, was born about 230 or 229, since at the time of his second consulship, 168, he was upward of sixty years of age. He was one of the best specimens of the high Roman nobles. He would not condescend to flatter the people for the offices of the state, maintained with strictness severe discipline in the army, was deeply skilled in the law of the augurs, to whose college he belonged, and maintained throughout life a pure and unspotted character. He was elected curule ædile 192; was prætor 191, and obtained Further Spain as his province, where he carried on war with the Lusitani; and was consul 181 when he conquered the Ingauni, a Ligurian people. For the next thirteen years he lived quietly at Rome, devoting most of his time to the education of his children. He was consul a second time in 168, and brought the war against Perseus to a conclusion by the defeat of the Macedonian monarch, near Pydna, on the 22d of June. Perseus shortly afterward surrendered himself to Paulus. Vid. PERSEUS. Paulus remained in Macedonia during the greater part of the following year as proconsul, and arranged the affairs of Macedonia, in conjunction with ten Roman commissioners, whom the senate had dispatched for the purpose. Before leaving Greece he marched into Epirus, where, in accordance with a cruel command of the senate, he gave to his soldiers seventy towns to be pillaged because they had been in alliance with Perseus. The triumph of Paulus, which was celebrated at the end of November, 167, was the most splendid that Rome had yet seen. It lasted three days. Before the triumphal car of Æmilius walked the captive monarch of Macedonia and his children, and behind it were his two illustrious sons, Q. Fabius Maximus and P. Scipio Africanus the younger, both of whom had been adopted into other families. But the glory of the conqueror was clouded by family misfortune. At this very time he lost his two younger sons; one, twelve years of age, died only five days before his triumph, and the other, fourteen years of age, only three days after his triumph. The loss was all the severer, since he had no son left to carry his name down to posterity. In 164 Paulus was censor with Q. Marcius Philippus, and died in 160, after a long and tedious illness. The fortune he left behind him was so small as scarcely to be sufficient to pay his wife's dowry. The Adelphi of Terence was brought out at the funeral games exhibited in his honor. Æmilius Paulus was married twice. By his first wife, Papiria, the daughter of C. Papirius Mæso, consul 231, he had four children, two sons, one of whom was adopted by Fabius Maximus and the other by P. Scipio, and two daughters, one of whom was married to Q. Ælius Tubero, and the other to M. Cato, son of Cato the censor. He afterward divorced Papiria; and by his second wife, whose name is not mentioned, he had two sons, whose death has been mentioned above, and a daughter, who was a child at the time that her father was elected to his second consulship.

PAULUS, JULIUS, one of the most distinguished of the Roman jurists, has been supposed, without any good reason, to be of Greek origin. He was in the auditorium of Papinian, and, consequently, was acting as a jurist in the reign of Septimius Severus. He was exiled by Elagabalus, but he was recalled by Alexander Severus when the latter became emperor, and was made a member of his consilium. Paulus also held the office of præfectus prætorio: he survived his contemporary Ulpian. Paulus was perhaps the most fertile of all the Roman law writers, and there is more excerpted from him in the Digest than from any other jurist except Ulpian. Upward of seventy separate works by Paulus are quoted in the Digest. Of these, his greatest work was Ad Edictum, in eight books.

PAULUS, PASSIENUS, a contemporary and friend of the younger Pliny, was a distinguished Roman eques, and was celebrated for his elegiac and lyric poems. He belonged to the same gens (Mevania in Umbria) as Propertius, whom he numbered among his ancestors.

ΠΑΥΣΑΝΙΑΣ (Παυσανίας). 1. A Spartan of the old branch of the royal family, the son of Cleombrotus and nephew of Leonidas. Several writers incorrectly call him king; but he only succeeded his father Cleombrotus in the guardianship of his cousin Plistarchus, the son of Alcidas, for whom he exercised the functions of royalty from B.C. 479 to the period of his death. In 479, when the Athenians called upon the Lacedæmonians for aid against the Persians, the Spartans sent a body of five thousand Spartans, each attended by seven Helots, under the command of Pausanias. At the Isthmus Pausanias was joined by the other Peloponnesian allies, and at Eleusis by the Athenians, and forthwith took the command of the combined forces, the other Greek generals forming a sort of council of war. The allied forces amounted to nearly one hundred and ten thousand men. Near Platæa in Bœotia, Pausanias defeated the Persian army under the command of Mardonius. This decisive victory secured the independence of Greece. Pausanias received as his reward a tenth of the Persian spoils. In 477 the confederate Greeks sent out a fleet, under the command of Pausanias, to follow up their success by driving the Persians completely out of Europe and the islands. Cyprus was first attacked, and the greater part of it subdued. From Cyprus Pausanias sailed to Byzantium, and captured the city. The capture of this city afforded Pausanias an opportunity for commencing the execution of the design which he had apparently formed even before leaving Greece. Decealed by his success and reputation, his station as a Spartan citizen had become too restricted for his ambition. His position as regent was one which must terminate when the king became of age. He therefore aimed at becoming tyrant over the whole of Greece, with the assistance of the Persian king. Among the prisoners taken at Byzantium were some Persians connected with the royal family. These he sent to the king, with a letter, in which he offered to bring Sparta and the rest of Greece under his power, and proposed to marry his daughter. His offers were gladly accepted, and whatever amount of troops and money he required for accomplishing his designs. Pausanias now set no bounds to his arrogant and domineering temper. The allies were so disgusted by his conduct, that they all, except the Peloponnesians and Æginetans, voluntarily offered to transfer to the Athenians that pre-eminence of rank which Sparta had hitherto enjoyed. In this way the Athenian confederacy first took its rise. Reports of the conduct and designs of Pausanias reached Sparta, and he was recalled and put upon his trial; but the evidence respecting his meditated treachery was not yet thought sufficiently strong. Shortly afterward he returned to Byzantium, without the orders of the ephors, and renewed his treasonable intrigues. He was again recalled to Sparta, was again put on his trial, and again acquitted. But ever after this second escape he still continued to carry on his intrigues with Persia. At length a man, who was charged with a letter to Persia, having his suspicions awakened by noticing that none of those sent previously on similar errands had returned, counterfeited the seal of Pausanias and opened the letter, in which he found directions for his own death. He carried the letter to the ephors, who prepared to arrest Pausanias; but he took refuge in the temple of Athena (Minerva) Chalceicus. The ephors stripped off the roof of the temple and built up the door; the aged mother of Pausanias is said to have been among the first who laid a stone for this purpose. When he was on the point of expiring, the ephors took him out lest his death should pollute the sanctuary. He died as soon as he got outside, B.C. 470. He left three sons behind him, Plistonax, afterward king, Cleomenes, and Aristocles.—2. Son of Plistonax, and grandson of the preceding, was king of Sparta from B.C. 408 to 394. In 403 he was sent with an army into Attica and secretly favored the cause of Thrasylus and the Athenian exiles, in order to counteract the plans of Lysander. In 395 Pausanias was sent with an army against the Thebans; but in consequence of the death of Lysander, who was slain under the walls of Haliartus on the day before Pausanias reached the spot, the king agreed to withdraw his forces from Bœotia. On his return to Sparta he was impeached, and, seeing that a fair trial was not to be hoped for, went into voluntary exile, and was condemned to death. He was living at Tegea in 385, when Mantinea was besieged by his son Agesipolis, who succeeded him on the throne.—3. King of Macedonia, the son and successor of Aeropus. He was assassinated in the year of his accession by Amyntas II., 394.—4. A pretender to the throne of Macedonia, made his appearance in 267, after Alexander II. had been assassinated by Ptolemæus. Eurydice, the mother of Alexander, sent to request the aid of the Athenian general Iphicrates, who expelled Pausanias from the kingdom.—5. A Macedonian youth of distinguished family, from the province of Orestia. Having been shamefully treated by Attalus, he complained of the outrage to Philip; but, as Philip took no notice of his complaints, he directed his vengeance against the king himself. He shortly afterward murdered Philip at the festival held at Ægæ, 336, but was slain on the spot by some officers of the king's guard. Suspicion rested on Olympias and Alexander of having been privy to the deed; but with regard to Alexander, at any rate, the suspicion is probably totally unfounded. There was a story that Pausanias, while meditating revenge, having asked the sophist Hermocrates which was the shortest way to fame, the latter replied that it was by killing the man who had performed the greatest achievements.—6. The traveler and geographer, was perhaps a native of Lydia. He lived under Antoninus Pius and M. Aurelius and wrote his celebrated work in the reign of the latter emperor. This work, entitled Ἑλλάδος Περιήγησις, a Periægesis or Itinerary of Greece, is in ten books, and contains a description of Attica and Megaris (i.), Corinthia, Sicily, Peloponnesus, and Argolis (ii.), Laconia (iii.);

Messenia (iv.), Elis (v., vi.), Achæa (vii.), Arcadia (viii.), Boeotia (ix.), Phocia (x.). The work shows that Pausanias visited most of the places in these divisions of Greece, a fact which is clearly demonstrated by the minuteness and particularity of his description. The work is merely an itinerary. Pausanias gives no general description of a country or even of a place, but he describes the things as he comes to them. His account is minute; but it mainly refers to objects of antiquity and works of art, such as buildings, temples, statues, and pictures. He also mentions mountains, rivers, and fountains, and the mythological stories connected with them, which, indeed, are his chief inducements to speak of them. His religious feeling was strong, and his belief sure, for he tells many old legends in true good faith and seriousness. His style has been much condemned by modern critics; but if we except some corrupt passages, and if we allow that his order of words is not that of the best Greek writers, there is hardly much obscurity to a person who is competently acquainted with Greek, except that obscurity which sometimes is owing to the matter. With the exception of Herodotus, there is no writer of antiquity, and perhaps none of modern times, who has comprehended so many valuable facts in a small volume. The best editions are by Siebelis, Lips., 1822-1828, 5 vols. 8vo; by Schubart and Walz, Lips., 1838-40, 3 vols. 8vo; [and by L. Dindorf, Paris, 1846, 8vo.]

PAUSIAS (Παυσίας), one of the most distinguished Greek painters, was a contemporary of Aristides, Melanthius, and Apelles (about B.C. 360-330), and a disciple of Pamphilus. He had previously been instructed by his father Brietea, who lived at Sicyon, where also Pausias passed his life. The department of the art which Pausias most practiced was painting in encaustic with the castrum. His favorite subjects were small panel-pictures, chiefly of boys. One of his most celebrated pictures was the portrait of Glycera, a flower-girl of his native city, of whom he was enamored when a young man. Most of his paintings were probably transported to Rome, with the other treasures of Sicyonian art, in the edulship of Scourus, when the state of Sicyon was compelled to sell all the pictures which were public property in order to pay its debts.

PAUSIOI (Παυσίοι), a people of the Persian empire, classed under the eleventh general division, dwelling between the Oxus and Jaxartes.]

PAUSILYTRUM (τὸ Πανόλυτρον), that is, the "grief-assuaging," was the name of a splendid villa near Neapolis in Campania, which Vedius Pollio bequeathed to Augustus. The name was transferred to the celebrated grotto (now Panlippa) between Naples and Puzzuoli, which was formed by a tunnel cut through the rock by the architect Cocceius, by command of Agrippa. At its entrance the tomb of Virgil is still shown.

PAUSIAS (Παυσίας) or PAUSIAS (Παύσιος), son of Amyrteus, the rebel satrap of Egypt. Vid. AMYRTEUS. Notwithstanding his father's revolt, he was appointed by the Persian king to the satrapy of Egypt.]

PAUSON (Παύσον), a Greek painter, who appears, from the description of Aristotle (Poet., ii., § 3), to have lived somewhat earlier than the time of this philosopher.

PAUSŪLA (Pausulāus: now Monte dell' Olmo), a town in the interior of Picenum, between Urina Salvia and Asculum.

PAVOR. Vid. PALLOR.

PAX, the goddess of Peace, called Ἥρα by the Greeks. Vid. IRUNA.

PAX JŪLIA or PAX AUGUSTA (now Beja), a Roman colony in Lusitania, and the seat of a conventus juridicus, north of Julia Myrtis.

PAXI (now Pazo and Antipazo), the name of two small islands off the western coast of Greece, between Corcyra and Leucas.

ΠΕΔΕΙΟΝ or ΠΕΔΕΙΟΣ (Πήδαϊον, accus., Hom. Il., xiii., 172), a town of the Troad.

[Πήδαϊος (Πήδαϊος), son of Antenor, slain by Mege in the Trojan war.]

ΠΕΔΑΛΙΟΝ (Πηδάλιον). 1. (Now Cape Ghinasi), a promontory of Caria, on the western side of the Sinus Glaucus, called also Artemisium, from a temple of Artemis upon it.—2. (Now Cape della Greca), a promontory on the eastern side of Cyprus.

[ΠΕΔΑΝΙΟΣ, T. 1. The first centurion of the principes, was distinguished for his bravery in the second Punic war, B.C. 212.—2. ΠΕΔΑΝΙΟΣ ΣΚΟΥΡΟΥ, præfectus urbi in the reign of Nero, was killed by one of his own slaves.]

ΠΕΔΑΣΑ (Πήδασα: Πηδαζεύς, Plur. Πηδαζεύς, Herod.), a very ancient city of Caria, was originally a chief abode of the Leleges. Alexander assigned it to Halicarnassus. At the time of the Roman empire it had entirely vanished, though its name was preserved in that of the district around its site, namely, Παδαζία (Πηδαζία). Its locality is only known thus far, that it must have stood somewhere in the triangle formed by Miletus, Halicarnassus, and Stratonicea.

ΠΕΔΑΪΕΥΣ (Πήδαζεύς). 1. A town of Mysia, on the Sathion, mentioned several times by Herod. It was destroyed by the time of Strabo, who says that it was a settlement of the Leleges on ἡδὲ Ἰδα.—[2. A city of Messenia, mentioned by Herod., which subsequent writers sought to identify with Methone or Corone.]

[ΠΕΔΑΣΕΥΣ (Πήδαζεύς), son of Bucolius, and the nymph Abarbarea, and brother of Ἐστιάς, slain by Euryalus under the walls of Troy.]

ΠΕΔΑΪΙΟΥΣ, Accusivus. Vid. Accusivus.

[ΠΑΔΙΣΙΑ (Πεδίδια: now probably the ruins of Pala-Fra), a place in Phocia, near the Cephallenæ, between Neon and Tritæa.]

PEDIUS. 1. Q., the great-nephew of the dictator C. Julius Cæsar, being the grandson of Julia, Cæsar's eldest sister. He served under Cæsar in Gaul as his legatus, B.C. 57. In 56 he was a candidate for the curule edulship with Cn. Plancius and others, but he lost his election. In the civil war he fought on Cæsar's side. He was prætor in 48, and in that year he defeated and slew Milo in the neighborhood of Thuri. In 46 he served against the Pompeian party in Spain. In Cæsar's will, Pedius was named one of his heirs along with his two other great-nephews, C. Octavianus and L. Pinarius, Octavianus obtaining three fourths of the property, and the remaining one fourth being divided between Pinarius and Pedius: the latter received his share of the inheritance in 40 ab eo. Ab eo the fall of the consuls Hirtius and Pansa, at the battle of Mutina, in April, 43, Octavianus marched upon Rome at the head of an army, and in the month of August he was elected consul along with Pedius. The latter forthwith proposed a law, known by the name of the Lex Pedis, by which all the murderers of Julius Cæsar were punished with aqua et ignis interdictio. Pedius was left in charge of the city, while Octavianus marched into the north of Italy. He died toward the end of the year, shortly after the news of the proscription had reached Rome.—[A. Q., grandson of No. 1, was dumb from his birth. He was instructed in painting by the direction of his kinsman Messala, with the sanction of Augustus, and attained to considerable excellence in the art, but died while still a youth].—3. SEXTUS, a Roman jurist, frequently cited by Paulus and Ulpian, lived before the time of Hadrian.

ΠΕΔΗΛΙΣΣΟΣ (Pedēlissos), a city in the interior of Pisidia, and apparently on the Eurymedea, above Apendus and Selge. It formed an independent state, but was almost constantly at war with Selge. Mr. Fellows supposes its site to be marked by the ruins of the Roman period near Bolka-Koi, on the eastern bank of the Eurymedea.

PEDOCUS, SEX. 1. Proprietor in Sicily, B.C. 71 and 76, in the latter of which years Cicero served under him as quaestor.—2. Son of the preceding, and an intimate friend of Atticus and Cicero. In the civil war Pedocus sided with Cæsar, by whom he was appointed in 48 to the government of Sardinia. In 89 he was proprietor in Spain.

PEDESIS (Pēgadis), i. e., sprung from Pegasus, was applied to the fountain Hippocrene, which was called forth by the hoof of Pegasus. The Muses are also called Pegadisæ, because the fountain Hippocrene was sacred to them.

PEDESIS (Pēgadis). 1. The celebrated winged horse, whose origin is thus related: When Perseus struck off the head of Medusa, with whom Neptune (Poseidon) had had intercourse in the form of a horse or a bird, there sprang from her Charybdis and the horse Pegasus. The latter received this name because he was believed to have made his appearance near the sources (πηγαι) of Oceanus. He ascended to the seats of the immortals, and afterward lived in the palace of Jupiter (Zeus), for whom he carried thunder and lightning. According to this view, which is apparently the most ancient, Pegasus was the thundering horse of Jupiter (Zeus); but later writers describe him as the horse of Eos (Aurora), and place him among the stars. Pegasus also acts a prominent part in the combat of Bellerophon against the Chimæra. In order to kill the Chimæra, it was necessary for Bellerophon to obtain possession of Pegasus. For this purpose the soothsayer Polyidus at Corinth advised him to spend a night in the temple of Minerva (Athena). As Bellerophon was sleeping in the temple, the goddess appeared to him in a dream commanding him to sacrifice to Neptune (Poseidon), and gave him a golden bridle. When he awoke he found the bridle, offered the sacrifice, and caught Pegasus while he was drinking at the well Piræne. According to some, Minerva (Athena) herself tamed and bridled Pegasus, and surrendered him to Bellerophon. After he had conquered the Chimæra he endeavored to rise up to heaven upon his winged horse, but fell down upon the earth. Vid. BELLEROPHON. Pegasus was also regarded as the horse of the Muses, and in this connection is more celebrated in modern times than in antiquity; for with the ancients he had no connection with the Muses, except producing with his hoof the inspiring fountain Hippocrene. The story about this fountain runs as follows: When the nine Muses engaged in a contest with the nine daughters of Pierus on Mount Helicon, all became darkness when the daughters of Pierus began to sing; whereas, during the song of the Muses, heaven, the sea, and all the rivers stood still to listen, and Helicon rose heavenward with delight, until Pegasus, on the advice of Neptune (Poseidon), stopped its ascent by kicking it with his hoof. From this kick there arose Hippocrene, the inspiring well of the Muses, on Mount Helicon, which, for this reason, Persius calls fons caballinus. Others, again, relate that Pegasus caused the well to gush forth because he was thirsty. Pegasus is often seen represented in ancient works of art along with Minerva (Athena) and Bellerophon.—2. A Roman jurist, one of the followers or pupils of Proculus, and prefectus urbi under Domitian (Juv., iv., 76). The Senatusconsultum Pegasianum, which was passed in the time of Vespasian, when Pegasus was consul suffectus with Pusio, probably took its name from him.

PEISO LACUS. Vid. PÆLO LACUS.

PELAGIUS, probably a native of Britain, celebrated as the propagator of those heretical opinions which have derived their name from him, and which were opposed with great energy by his contemporaries, Augustine and Jerome. He first appears in history about the beginning of the fifth century, when we find him residing at Rome. In the year 409 or 410, when Alaric was threatening the metropolis, Pelagius, accompanied by his disciple and ardent admirer Cælestius, passed over to Sicily, from thence proceeded to Africa, and, leaving Cælestius at Carthage, sailed for Palestine. The fame of his sanctity had preceded him, for upon his arrival he was received with great warmth by Jerome and many other distinguished fathers of the Church. Soon afterward the opinions of Pelagius were denounced as heretical; and, in A.D. 417, Pelagius and Cælestius were anathematized by Pope Innocentius. A very few only of the numerous treatises of Pelagius have descended to us. They are printed with the works of Jerome.

[ΠΕΛΑΓΩΝ (Pelagōn). 1. A Pylian warrior, served in the Trojan war under Nestor.—2. A Lycian warrior in the train of Sarpedon.—3. A Phocian, son of Amphidamas: from him Cadmus bought the cow which guided him to Thebes.]

ΠΕΛΑΓΟΝΙΑ (Pelagōnia: Πελαγονία, pl.). 1. A district in Macedonia. The Pelagones were as ancient people, probably of Pelasgic origin, and seem originally to have inhabited the Valley of the Axios, since Homer calls Pelagon a son of Axios. The Pelagones afterward migrated westward to the Erigon, the country around which received the name of Pelagonia, which thus lay south of Pæonia. The chief town of this district was also called Pelagonia (now Vitelia or Monastir), which was under the Romans the capital of the fourth division of Macedonia. It was situated on the Via Egnatia, not far from the narrow passes leading into Illyria.—2. A district in Thessaly, called the Pelagonian Tripolis, because it consisted of the three towns of Azōrus, Pythium, and Doliche. It was situated west of Olympus, in the upper valley of the Titaresius, and belonged to Perrhæbia, whence these three towns are sometimes called the Perrhæbian Tripolis. Some of the Macedonian Pelagonians, who had been driven out of their homes by the Pæonians, migrated into this part of Thessaly, which was originally inhabited by Dorians.

[PELARGE (Πελαργή), daughter of Potneus, wife of Isthmiades, was instrumental in establishing the Cabiri-worship in Bæotia, and hence became herself an object of worship.]

PELASGOS (Πελαγός), the earliest inhabitants of Greece, who established the worship of the Dodonæan Zeus (Jupiter), Hephæstus (Vulcan), the Cabiri, and other divinities that belong to the earliest inhabitants of the country. They claimed descent from a mythical hero, Pelasgus, of whom we have different accounts in the different parts of Greece inhabited by Pelasgians. The nation was widely spread over Greece and the islands of the Grecian archipelago, and the name of Pelasgia was given at one time to Greece. One of the most ancient traditions represented Pelasgus as a descendant of Phoroneus, king of Argos; and it seems to have been generally believed by the Greeks that the Pelasgi spread from Argos to the other countries of Greece. Arcadia, Attica, Epirus, and Thessaly were, in addition to Argos, some of the principal seats of the Pelasgi. They were also found on the coasts of Asia Minor, and, according to some writers, in Italy as well. Of the language, habits, and civilization of this people, we possess no certain knowledge. Herodotus says they spoke a barbarous language, that is, a language not Greek; but from the facility with which the Greek and Pelasgic languages coalesced in all parts of Greece, and from the fact that the Athenians and Arcadians are said to have been of pure Pelasgic origin, it is probable that the two languages had a close affinity. The Pelasgi are further said to have been an agricultural people, and to have possessed a considerable knowledge of the useful arts. The most ancient architectural remains of Greece, such as the treasury or tomb of Atreus at Mycenæ, are ascribed to the Pelasgians, and are cited as specimens of Pelasgian architecture, though there is no positive authority for these statements.

PELASGIA (Πελαγία), an ancient name of the islands of Delos and Lesbos, referring, of course, to their having been early seats of the Pelasgians.

PELASGOTIA (Πελαγός όρος), a district in Thessaly, between Hestiotis and Magnæa. Th Thessalia.

PELETHRONIUM (Πελεθρόνιον), a mountainous district in Thessaly, part of Mount Pelion, where the Lapithæ dwelt, and which is said to have derived its name from Pelethronius, king of the Lapithæ, who invented the use of the bridle and the saddle.

PELEUS (Πηλεΐς), son of Æacus and Endeia, was king of the Myrmidons at Phthia in Thessaly. He was a brother of Telamon, and step-brother of Phocus, the son of Æacus, by the Nereid Psamathe. Peleus and Telamon resolved to get rid of Phocus, because he excelled them in their military games, and Telamon, or, according to others, Peleus, murdered their step-brother. The two brothers concealed their crime by removing the body of Phocus, but were nevertheless found out, and expelled by Æacus from Ægina. Peleus went to Phthia in Thessaly, where he was purified from the murder by Eurytion, the son of Actor, married his daughter Antigone, and received with her a third of Eurytion's kingdom. Others relate that he went to Coëx at Trachis; and, as he had come to Thessaly without companions, he prayed to Jupiter (Zeus) for an army; and the god, to please Peleus, metamorphosed the ants (μόρμικες) into men, who were accordingly called Myrmidons. Peleus accompanied Eurytion to the Calydonian hunt, and involuntarily killed him with his spear, in consequence of which he fled from Phthia to Iolcus, where he was again purified by Acastus, the king of the place. While residing at Iolcus, Astydamia, the wife of Acastus, fell in love with him; but, as her proposals were rejected by Peleus, she accused him to her husband of having attempted her virtue. Acastus, unwilling to stain his hand with the blood of the man whom he had hospitably received, and whom he had purified from his guilt, took him to Mount Pelion, where they hunted wild beasts; and when Peleus, overcome with fatigue, had fallen asleep, Acastus left him alone, and concealed his sword, that he might be destroyed by the wild beasts. When Peleus awoke and sought his sword, he was attacked by the Centaurs, but was saved by Chiron, who also restored to him his sword. There are some modifications of this account in other writers: instead of Astydamia, some mention Hippolyte, the daughter of Cretheus; and others relate that after Acastus had concealed the sword of Peleus, Chiron or Mercury (Hermes) brought him another, which had been made by Vulcan (Hephæstus). While on Mount Pelion Peleus married the Nereid Thetis, by whom he became the father of Achilles, though some regarded this Thetis as different from the marine divinity, and called her a daughter of Chiron. The gods took part in the marriage solemnity; Chiron presented Peleus with a lance, Neptune (Poseidon) with the immortal horses, Balaus and Xanthus, and the other gods with arms. Eris or Strife was the only goddess who was not invited to the nuptials, and she avenged herself by throwing an apple among the guests.

with the description "To the fairest." Vid. PAR.—Homer mentions Achilles as the only son of Peleus and Thetis, but later writers state that she had already destroyed by fire six children, of whom she was the mother by Peleus, and that, as she attempted to make away with Achilles, her seventh child, she was prevented by Peleus. After this, Peleus, who is also mentioned among the Argonauts, in conjunction with Jason and the Dioscuri, besieged Acastus and Iolcus, slew Astrydamia, and over the scattered limbs of her body led his warriors into the city. The flocks of Peleus were at one time worried by a wolf, which Psamathe had sent to avenge the murder of her son Phocus, but she herself afterward, on the request of Thetis, turned the animal into stone. Peleus, who had in former times joined Hercules in his expedition against Troy, was too old to accompany his son Achilles against that city: he remained at home, and survived the death of his son.

Pelias (Πελίας). 1. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Tyro, a daughter of Salmoneus. Neptune (Poseidon) once visited Tyro in the form of the mer-god Enipeus, with whom she was in love, and he became by him the mother of Pelias and Neleus. To conceal her shame, their mother exposed the two boys, but they were found and reared by some countrymen. They subsequently learned their parentage; and, after the death of Cretheus, king of Iolcos, who had married his mother, they seized the throne of Iolcos, the exclusion of Æson, the son of Cretheus and Tyro. Pelias soon afterward expelled his brother Neleus, and thus became sole ruler of Iolcos. After Pelias had long reigned over Iolcos, Jason, the son of Æson, came to Iolcos and claimed the kingdom as his right. In order to get rid of him, Pelias sent him to Colchis to fetch the golden fleece. Hence arose the celebrated expedition of the Argonauts. After the return of Jason, Pelias was cut to pieces and killed by his own daughters (the Peliades), who had been told by Medea that in this manner they might restore their father to vigor and youth. Jason Acastus held funeral games in his honor at Iolcos, and expelled Jason and Medea from the country. For details, vid. JASON, MÆDÆA, ARGONAUTÆ. The names of several of the daughters of Pelias are recorded. The most celebrated of them was Alceas, the wife of Æneas, who is therefore called by Ovid Peliæides.—[2. A Trojan, wounded by Ulysses in the Trojan war; he survived the destruction of the city, and accompanied Æneas to Italy.] Pelias (Πηλείδης, Πηλείων), a patronymic name of Peleus, generally given to his son Achilles, or rarely to his grandson Neoptolemus.

Peliones, a brave and warlike people of Sabine origin in central Italy, bounded southeast by the Adriatic, north by the Marrucini, south by Samnites and the Frentani, and east by the Frentani likewise. The climate of their country was cold. Hor., Carm., iii., 19, 8; but it produced a considerable quantity of fax, and was celebrated for its honey. The Peligni, like the Peliones, the Marsi, were regarded as magicians. Their principal towns were Cosvinum and Sulmo. They offered a brave resistance to the Romans, but concluded a peace with the republic along with their neighbors the Marsi, Marrucini, and Frentani, in B.C. 304. They took an active part in the Social war (90, 89), and their chief town Corfinium was destined by the allies to be the new capital of Italy in place of Rome. They were subdued by Pompeius Strabo, after which time they are rarely mentioned.

Pelionæ Mons (τὸ Πελίναϊον ὄρος, or Πηλλήναϊον: now Mount Elias), the highest mountain of the island of Chios, a little north of the city of Chios, with a celebrated temple of Ζεὺς Πηλλήναϊος.

PELINNA, or more commonly PELINNÆUM (Πήλιννα, Πηλινναῖον: now Gardiki), a town of Thessaly in Hestizotis, on the left bank of the Peneus, was taken by the Romans in their war with Antiochus.

Pelion, more rarely Pēlios (τὸ Πήλιος ὄρος: now Plessidi or Zagora), a lofty range of mountains in Thessaly, in the district of Magnesia, was situated between the Lake Bœbéis and the Pagasan Gulf, and formed the promontories of Septias and Æantium. Its sides were covered with wood, and on its summit was a temple of Jupiter (Zeus) Actæus, where the cold was so severe that the persons who went in procession to this temple once a year wore thick skins to protect themselves. Mount Pelion was celebrated in mythology. The giants in their war with the gods are said to have attempted to heap Ossa and Olympus on Pelion, or Pelion and Ossa on Olympus, in order to scale heaven. Near the summit of this mountain was the cave of the Centaur Chiron, whose residence was probably placed here on account of the number of the medicinal plants which grew upon the mountain, since he was celebrated for his skill in medicine. On Pelion also the timber was felled with which the ship Argo was built, whence Ovid applies the term Pelias arbor to this ship.

PELLA (Πέλλα: Πηλλαιοί, Pellæns). 1. (Now Alakiri), an ancient town of Macedonia, in the district Bottia, was situated upon a hill, and upon a lake formed by the River Lydias, one hundred and twenty stadia from its mouth. It continued to be a place of small importance till the time of Philip, who made it his residence and the capital of the Macedonian monarchy, and adorned it with many public buildings. It is frequently mentioned by subsequent writers on account of its being the birth-place of Alexander the Great. It was the capital of one of the four districts into which the Romans divided Macedonia (vid. p. 464, a), and was subsequently made a Roman colony under the name of Col. Jul. Aug. Pella.—2. (Now El-Bujeh?), the southernmost of the ten cities which composed the Decapolis in Perma, that is, in Palestine east of the Jordan, stood five Roman miles southeast of Soythopolis, and was also called Βούτις. It was taken by Antiochus the Great in the wars between Syria and Egypt, and was held by a Macedonian colony till it was destroyed by Alexander Jannæus on account of the refusal of its inhabitants to embrace the Jewish religion. It was restored and given back to its old inhabitants by Pompey. It was the place of refuge of the Christians who fled from Jerusalem before its capture by the Romans. The exact site of Pella is very uncertain.—3. A city of Syria on the Orontes, formerly called Ipharnax, was named Pella by the Macedonians, and afterward APAMEA (No. 1).—4. In Phrygia. Vid. PELTÆ.

PELLÆUS PAGUS was the name given by Alexander, after Pella in Macedonia, to the district of Susiana about the mouths of the Tigris; in which he built the city of Alexandria, afterward called Charax.

PELLĒNĒ (Πελλήνη, Dor. Πελλάνα; Πελλην-ερός). 1. A city in Achaia, bordering on Sicyonia, the most easterly of the twelve Achaean cities, was situated on a hill sixty stadia from the city, and was strongly fortified. Its port-town was Aristonauæ. The ancients derived its name from the giant Pallas, or from the Argive Pellen, the son of Phorbas. It is mentioned in Homer; and the inhabitants of Scione, in the peninsula of Pallene, in Macedonia, professed to be descended from the Pellenians in Achaia, who were shipwrecked on the Macedonian coast on their return from Troy. In the Peloponnesian war Pellene sided with Sparta. In the later wars of Greece between the Achæan and Ætolian leagues, the town was several times taken by the contending parties. Between Pellene and Æge there was a smaller town of the same name, where the celebrated Pellenian cloaks (Παλληνιακαὶ χλαῖναι) were made, which were given as prizes to the victors in the games at this place.—2. Usually called PELLANA, a town in Laconia, on the Eurotas, about fifty stadia northwest of Sparta, belonging to the Spartan Tripolia.

Πελοπόννησος (Πηλώδης λιμήν, in App. Παλόρς; now Armiro), a port-town belonging to Buthrotum in Epirus, and on a bay which probably bore the same name.

PELOPĒA or PELOPĒA (Πελοπεία), daughter of Thyestes, dwelt at Sicyon, where her father offered her violence, without knowing that she was his daughter. While pregnant by her father, she married her uncle Atreus. Shortly afterward she bore a son Ægisthus, who eventually murdered Atreus. For details, vid. ÆGIS-THUS.

{PELOPIDÆ (Πελοπίδαι), descendants of Pelops, c. g., Theseus (Plut.), Tantalus, Atreus (Pelopæus, Ovid), Thyestes, Agamemnon (Propert.), Hermione and Iphigenia (Pelopæa virgo, Ovid), Orestes (Lucan.).}

Πελοπίδας (Πελοπίδης), the Theban general and statesman, son of Hippoclus, was descended from a noble family, and inherited a large estate, of which he made a liberal use. He lived always in the closest friendship with Epaminondas, to whose simple frugality, as he could not persuade him to share his riches, he is said to have assimilated his own mode of life. He took a leading part in expelling the Spartans from Thebes, B.C. 379; and from this time until his death there was not a year in which he was not intrusted with some important command. In 371 he was one of the Theban commanders at the battle of Leuctra, so fatal to the Lacedæmonians, and joined Epaminondas in urging the expediency of immediate action. In 369 he was also one of the generals in the first invasion of Peloponnesus by the Thebans. Respecting his accusation on his return from the campaign, vid. p. 281, b. In 368 Pelopidas was sent again into Thessaly, on two separate occasions, in consequence of complaints against Alexander of Pheræ. On his first expedition Alexander of Pheræ sought safety in flight; and Pelopidas advanced into Macedonia to arrange between Alexander II. and Ptolemy of Aloræ. Among the hostages whom he took with him from Macedonia was the famous Philip, the father of Alexander the Great. On his second visit to Thessaly, Pelopidas went simply as an ambassador, not expecting any opposition, and unprovided with a military force. He was seized by Alexander of Pheræ, and was kept in confinement at Pheræ till his liberation in 367 by the Theban force under Epaminondas. In the same year in which he was released he was sent as ambassador to Sumæ, to counteract the Lacedæmonian and Athenian negotiations at the Persian court. In 364 the Thessalian towns again applied to Thebes for protection against Alexander, and Pelopidas was appointed to aid them. His forces, however, were dismayed by an eclipse of the sun (June 13), and, therefore, leaving them behind, he took with him into Thessaly only three hundred horse. On his arrival at Pharsalus he collected a force which he deemed sufficient, and marched against Alexander, treating lightly the great disparity of numbers, and remarking that it was better as it was, since there would be more for him to conquer. At Cynoscephalæ a battle ensued, in which Pelopidas drove the enemy from their ground, but he himself was slain as, burning with resentment, he pressed rashly forward to attack Alexander in person. The Thebans and Thessalians made great lamentations for his death, and the latter, having earnestly requested leave to bury him, celebrated his funeral with extraordinary splendor.

{PELOPIS ÎNSULÆ, nine islands on the coast of Argolis, eastward of Methana, between Ægina and Calauria.}

PELOPONNĒSUS (ἡ Πελοπόννησος; now Moræ), the southern part of Greece or the peninsula, which was connected with Hellas proper by the Isthmus of Corinth. It is said to have derived its name Peloponnesus, or the "Island of Pelops," from the mythical Pelops. Vid. PELIUS. This name does not occur in Homer. In his time the peninsula was sometimes called Apia, from Apis, son of Phoroneus, king of Argos, and sometimes Argos; which names were given to it on account of Argos being the chief power in Peloponnesus at that period. Peloponnesus was bounded on the north by the Corinthian Gulf, on the west by the Ionian or Sicilian Sea, on the south by the Libyan, and on the west by the Cretan and Myrtoean seas. On the east and south there are three great gulfs, the Argolic, Laconian, and Messenian. The ancients compared the shape of the country to the leaf of a plane-tree; and its modern name, the Moræ (ἡ Μορφή), which first occurs in the twelfth century of the Christian era, was given to it on account of its resemblance to a mulberry-leaf. Peloponnesus was divided into various provinces, all of which were bounded no res, with the exception of ARCADIA, which was in the centre of the country. These provinces, besides ARCADIA, were ACHÆA in the north, ELIS in the west, MESSÈNIA in the west and south, LACONIA in the south and east, [ARGOLIA in the east,] and CORINTHIA in the east and north. An account of the geography of the peninsula is given under these names. The sea of Peloponnesus is computed to be seven thousand seven hundred and seventy-nine English miles, and it probably contained a population of upward of a million in the flourishing epoch of Greek history. Peloponnesus was originally inhabited by Pelasgians. Subsequently the Achæans, who belonged to the Eolicæ, settled in the eastern and southern parts of the peninsula, in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia; and the Ionians in the northern part, in Ithaca; while the remains of the original inhabitants of the country, the Pelasgians, collected chiefly in the central part, in Arcadia. Eighty years after the Trojan war, according to mythical chronology, the Dorians, under the conduct of the Heracidae, invaded and conquered Peloponnesus, and established Doric states in Argolis, Laconia, and Messenia, from whence they extended their power over Corinth, Sicyon, and Megara. Part of the Achæan population remained in these provinces as tributary subjects to the Dorians, under the name of Perioeci, while others of the Achæans passed over to the north of Peloponnesus, expelled the Ionians, and settled in this part of the country, which was called after them Achæia. The Achæians, who had invaded Peloponnesus along with the Dorians, settled in Elis and became intermingled with the original inhabitants. The peninsula remained under Doric influence during the most important period of Greek history, and opposed to the great Ionic city of Athens. After the conquest of Messenia by the Spartans, was under the supremacy of Sparta till the enhance of the power of the latter by the Achæans at the battle of Leuctra, B.C. 371.

Pelops (Πήλοψ), grandson of Jupiter (Zeus), son of Tantalus and Dione, the daughter of Ixion. Some writers call his mother Euryanassa. Cytherea. He was married to Hippodamia, by whom he became the father of Atreus, Thyestes, Dias, Cynosurus, Corinthius, Hippalmus, Hippalmus or Hippalcimus, Hippasus, Cleon, Pylus, Alcathous, Elius, Pittheus, Træsen, Cypus, and Lysidice. By Axioche or the nymph Danaë he is said to have been the father of Chrysippus. Pelops was king of Pisa in Elis, and from him the great southern peninsula of Greece was believed to have derived its name Peloponnesus. According to a tradition, which came very general in later times, Pelops was Phrygian, who was expelled by Ilius from Myra (hence called by Ovid, Met., viii., 623, lapis eryx), and thereupon migrated with his vast wealth to Pisa. Others describe him as a Paphlagonian, and call the Paphlagonians themselves Πηλοποννησίοι. Others, again, represent him as a native of Greece; and there can be little doubt that in the earliest traditions Pelops is described as a native of Greece and not as foreign immigrant; and in them he is called tamer of horses and the favorite of Neptune (Ποσειδών). The legends about Pelops consist mainly of the story of his being put to pieces and boiled, of his contest with Ctenomachus and Hippodamia, and of his relation to his sons; to which we may add the honors paid to his remains. 1. Pelops cut to pieces and boiled (Κτενομαχία Πήλοπος). Tantalus, the favorite of the gods, once invited them to a repast, and on that occasion killed his own son, and having boiled him, set the flesh before them that they might eat it. But the immortal gods, knowing what it was, did not touch it; Ceres (Demeter) alone, being absorbed by grief for her lost daughter, consumed the shoulder of Pelops. Hereupon the gods ordered Mercury (Hermes) to put the limbs of Pelops into a caldron, and thereby restore him to life. When the process was over, Clotho took him out of the caldron, and as the shoulder consumed by Ceres (Demeter) was wanting, the goddess supplied its place by one made of ivory; his descendants (the Pelopidae), as a mark of their origin, were believed to have one shoulder as white as ivory.—2. Contest with Ctenomachus and Hippodamia. As an oracle had declared to Ctenomachus that he should be killed by his son-in-law, he refused giving his fair daughter Hippodamia in marriage to any one. But since many suitors appeared, Ctenomachus declared that he would bestow her hand upon the man who should conquer him in the chariot-race, but that he should kill all who were defeated by him. Among other suitors Pelops also presented himself, but when he saw the heads of his conquered predecessors stuck up above the door of Ctenomachus, he was seized with fear, and endeavored to gain the favor of Myrtilus, the charioteer of Ctenomachus, promising him half the kingdom if he would assist him in conquering his master. Myrtilus agreed, and left out the linch-pins of the chariot of Ctenomachus. In the race the chariot of Ctenomachus broke down, and he was thrown out and killed. Thus Hippodamia became the wife of Pelops. But as Pelops had now gained his object, he was unwilling to keep faith with Myrtilus; and accordingly, as they were driving along a cliff, he threw Myrtilus into the sea. As Myrtilus sank, he cursed Pelops and his whole race. Pelops returned with Hippodamia to Pisa in Elis, and soon also made himself master of Olympia, where he restored the Olympian games with greater splendor than they had ever been celebrated before.—3. The sons of Pelops. Chrysippus was the favorite of his father, and was, in consequence, envied by his brothers. The two eldest among them, Atreus and Thyestes, with the connivance of Hippodamia, accordingly murdered Chrysippus, and threw his body into a well. Pelops, who suspected his sons of the murder, expelled them from the country. Hippodamia, dreading the anger of her husband, fled to Midea in Argolis, from whence her remains were afterward conveyed by Pelops to Olympia. Pelops, after his death, was honored at Olympia above all other heroes. His tomb, with an iron sarcophagus, existed on the banks of the Alphæus, not far from the temple of Diana (Artemis), near Pisa. The spot on which his sanctuary (Πηλοποιον) stood in the Altis was said to have been dedicated by Hercules, who also offered to him the first sacrifice. The magistrates of the Eleians likewise offered to him there an annual anal sacrifice, consisting of a black ram, with special ceremonies. The name of Pelops was so celebrated that it was constantly used by the poets in connection with his descendants and the cities they inhabited. Hence we find Atreus, the son of Pelops, called Pelopius Atreus, and Agamemnon, the grandson or great-grandson of Atreus, called Pelopius Agamemnon. In the same way, Iphigenia, the daughter of Agamemnon, and Hermione, the wife of Menelaus, are both called by Ovid Pelopiea virgo. Virgil (Æn., ii., 193) uses the phrase Pelopæa mania to signify the cities in Peloponnesus which Pelops and his descendants ruled over; and, in like manner, Mycenæ is called by Ovid Pelopiadæ Mycenæ.

PELORIS, PELORIAS, or PELORUS (Πελορίς, Πελορίας, Πελορος; now Cape Faro), the northeastern point of Sicily, was northeast of Messana, on the Fretum Siculum, and one of the three promontories which formed the triangular figure of the island. According to the usual story, it derived its name from Pelorus, the pilot of Hannibal's ship, who was buried here after being killed by Hannibal in a fit of anger; but the name was more ancient than Hannibal's time, being mentioned by Thucydides. On the promontory there was a temple of Neptune (Poseidon), and a tower, probably a light-house, from which the modern name of the Cape (Faro) appears to have come.

PELORUS (Πελορος; now probably Lori or Luri), a river of Iberia in Asia, appears to have been a southern tributary of the Cyrus (now Kour).

PELISO or PEISO (now Plattensee), a great lake in Pannonia, the waters of which were conducted into the Danube by the Emperor Galerius, who thus gained a great quantity of fertile land for his newly-formed province of Valeria.

PELUSÆ (Πέλαι: Πελωνός), an ancient and flourishing city of Asia Minor, in the north of Phrygia, ten parasangs from Celæna (Xenoph.), and no doubt the same place as the PELLA of the Roman writers, twenty-six Roman miles north or northeast of Apamea Cibotus, to the conventus of which it belonged. The surrounding district is called by Strabo τὸ Πελωνίον πεδῖον. Its site is uncertain. Some identify it with the ruins eight miles south of Sandakli; others, with those near Iskeki.

PELTUINUM (Peltuinæ -ātis; now Monte Belio), a town of the Vestin in Central Italy.

PELUSIUM (Πηλούσιον; Egypt. Peremoun or Peromi; in the Old Testament, Sin: all these names are derived from nouns meaning mud: Πηλούσιος; Pelusida: ruins at Tinck), also called ABAKIS in early times, a celebrated city of Lower Egypt, stood on the eastern side of the easternmost mouth of the Nile, which was called after it the Pelusiac mouth, twenty stadia (two geographical miles) from the sea, in the midst of morasses, from which it obtained its name. As the key of Egypt on the northeast, and the frontier city toward Syria and Arabia, it was strongly fortified, and was the scene of many battles and sieges in the wars of Egypt with Assyria, Persia, Syria, and Rome, from the descent of Sennacherib near it by Sethon down to its capture by Octavianus after the battle of Actium. In later times it was the capital of the district of Augustamnica. It was the name place of the geographer Claudius Ptolemaeus.

PENATES, the household gods of the Romans, both those of a private family and of the state as the great family of citizens. Hence we have to distinguish between private and public Penates. The name is connected with penus, and the images of those gods were kept in the pen-tralis, or the central part of the house. The Lares were included among the Penates; but names, in fact, are often used synonymously. The Lares, however, though included in the Penates, were not the only Penates; for each family had usually no more than one Lar, whereas the Penates are always spoken of in the plural. Since Jupiter and Juno were regarded as the protectors of happiness and peace in the family, these divinities were worshipped as Penates. Vesta was also reckoned among the Penates; for each hearth, being the symbol of domestic union, had its Vesta. All other Penates, both public and private, seem to have consisted of certain sacred relics connected with indefinite divinities, and hence Varro says that the number and names of the Penates were indefinite. Most ancient writers believe that the Penates of the state were brought by Æneas from Troy into Italy, and were preserved first at Lavinium, afterward at Alba Longa, and finally at Rome. At Rome they had a chapel near the centre of the city, in a place called sub Vela. As the public Lares were worshipped in the central part of the city and at the public hearth, so the private Penates had their place at the hearth of every house, and the table also was sacred to them. On the hearth a perpetual fire was kept up in their honor, and the table always contained the salt-cellar and the firstlings of fruit for these divinities. Every meal that was taken in the house thus resembled a sacrifice offered to the Penates, beginning with purification and ending with a libation, which was poured either on the table or upon the hearth. After every absence from the hearth the Penates were saluted like the living inhabitants of the house; and whoever went abroad prayed to the Penates and Lares for a happy return, and when he came back to his house, he hung up his armor, staff, and the like, by the side of their images.

PENATE, that is, Daphne, daughter of the mer-god Peneus.

PENELEUS (Πηνελεύς), son of Hippalcimus and Asterope, and one of the Argonauts. He was the father of Opbeltes, and is also mentioned among the suitors of Helen. He was one of the leaders of the Boeotians in the war against Troy, where he slew Hioneus and Lycos, and was wounded by Polydamas. He is said to have been slain by Eurypius, the son of Telephus.

Πηνελόπη (Πηνελόπη, Πηνελόπη, Πηνελόπη), daughter of Icarus and Periocha of Sparta, married Ulysses, king of Ithaca. (Respecting his marriage, vid. ICARIUS, No. 2.) By Ulysses she had an only child, Telemachus, who was an infant when her husband sailed against Troy. During the long absence of Ulysses she was beleaguered by numerous and importunate suitors whom she deceived by concealing that she was finishing a large robe which she was making for Laertes, her aged father-in-law, before she could make up her mind. During the daytime she accordingly worked at the robe, and in the night he undid the work of the day. By this means he succeeded in putting off the suitors. But at length her stratagem was betrayed by her errand; and when, in consequence, the faithful Penelope was pressed more and more by the importunate suitors, Ulysses at length arrived in thea, after an absence of twenty years. Having recognized her husband by several signs, he heartily welcomed him, and the days of her grief and sorrow were at an end. Vid. Ulysses. While Homer describes Penelope as a most chaste and faithful wife, some later writers charge her with the very opposite vice, and state that by Mercury (Hermes) or by all the suitors together she became the mother of Pan. They add that Ulysses, on his return, repudiated her, whereupon she went to Sparta, and thence to Mantinea, where her tomb was shown in after times. According to another tradition, she married "Elegonius, after he had killed his father Ulysses."

PENESTÆ (Πενέστας), according to Stephanus of Byzantium, a Thessalian tribe, but according to Livy, a warlike race of Grecian Illyria, in the district Penestia or Penestiana terra, on the borders of Thessaly and Macedonia.]

PENIUS (Πηνειός). 1. (Now Salambría or Salmoria), the chief river of Thessaly, and one of the most important in all Greece, rises near Alalomena in Mount Lacom, a branch of Mount Pindus, flows first southeast and then northeast, and after receiving many affluents, of which the most important were the Enipeus, the Lethæus, and the Titaresius, forces its way through the Vale of Tempe between Mounts Ossa and Olympus into the sea. Vid. TEMPE. As a god, Peneus was called a son of Oceanus and Tethys. By the Naiad Creusa he became the father of Hypseus, Stilbe, and Daphne. Cyrene also is called by some his wife, and by others his daughter, and hence Peneus is described as the progenitor of Ariadneus.—2. (Now Gastuni), a river in Elis, which rises on the frontiers of Arcadia, flows by the town of Elis, and falls into the sea between the promontories Chelonatas and Iobthysa.

PENIUS, a little river of Pontus, falling into the Euxine. (Ovid, Ex Ponto, iv., 10.)

PENINUS ALPES. Vid. ALPES.

PENINUS, JUNIUS M. 1. Prætor B.C. 173, and obtained Nearer Spain for his province. He was consul B.C. 167, with Q. Ælius Pætus, and obtained Pisæ as his province.—2. M. JUNIUS, son of the preceding, was tribune of the plebs B.C. 186, in which year he brought forward a law for expelling all strangers or foreigners (peregrini) from Rome. This law was opposed by C. Gracchus, but was carried. Pœnus was afterward elected to the edileship, but died before obtaining any higher honor in the state.]

PENTAPOLIS (Πεντάπολις), the name for any association of five cities, was applied specifically to, 1. The five chief cities of Cyrenaica in Northern Africa, Cyrene, Berenice, Arsinoë, Ptolemais, and Apollonia, from which, under the Ptolemies, Cyrenaica received the name of Pentaporia, or Pentapolis Libyæ, or, in the Roman writers, Pentapoliensis Regio. When the same occurs alone, this is its meaning; the other applications of it are but rare.—2. The five cities of the Philistines in the southwest of Palestine, namely, Gaza, Ashdod (Azotus), Ascalon, Gath, and Ekron.—3. In the apocryphal Book of the Wisdom of Solomon (x., 6), the name is applied to the five "cities of the plain" of the southern Jordan, Sodom, Gomorrah, Adama, Zeboim, and Zoar, all of which (except the last, which was spared at the intercession of Lot) were overthrown by fire from heaven, and the valley in which they stood was buried beneath the waters of the Dead Sea.

PENTELIUM (Πεντέλειον), a fortified place in the north of Arcadia, near Pheneus.

PENTELICUS MONS (τὸ Πεντελικὸν ὄρος: now Penteli), a mountain in Attica, celebrated for its marble, which derived its name from the demus of Pentèle (Πεντέλη), lying on its southern slope. It is a branch of Mount Parnes, from which it runs in a southeasterly direction between Athens and Marathon to the coast. It is probably the same as the mountain called Brileseus (Βριλεσσός) by Thucydides and others.

PENTHESILEIA (Πενθεσίλεια), daughter of Mars (Ares) and Otrera, and queen of the Amazons. After the death of Hector she came to the assistance of the Trojans, but was slain by Achilles, who mourned over the dying queen on account of her beauty, youth, and valor. Thersites ridiculed the grief of Achilles, and was, in consequence, killed by the hero. Thereupon Diomedes, a relative of Thersites, threw the body of Penthesisleia into the River Scamander; but, according to others, Achilles himself buried it on the banks of the Xanthus.

PENTHEUS (Πενθείς), son of Echion and Agave, the daughter of Cadmus. He succeeded Cadmus as king of Thebes; and having resisted the introduction of the worship of Bacchus (Dionysus) into his kingdom, he was driven mad by the god, his palace was hurled to the ground, and he himself was torn to pieces by his own mother and her two sisters, Ino and Autonoe, who, in their Bacchic phrensy, believed him to be a wild beast. The place where Pentheus suffered death is said to have been Mount Cithæron or Mount Parnassus. It is related that Pentheus got upon a tree for the purpose of witnessing in secret the revelry of the Bacchic women, but on being discovered by them was torn to pieces. According to a Corinthian tradition, the women were afterward commanded by an oracle to discover that tree, and to worship it like the god Bacchus (Dionysus); and, accordingly, out of the tree two carved images of the god were made. The tragic fate of Pentheus forms the subject of the Bacchæ of Euripides.

[PENTHILIDÆ (Πενθιλίδαι), a noble family at Mytilene in Lesbos, who derived their origin from Penthilus, the son of Orestes, who was said to have led a colony to Lesbos.]

PENTHILUS (Πενθίλος), son of Orestes and Erigone, is said to have led a colony of Æolians to Thrace. He was the father of Echelatus and Damasias.

PENTII, one of the most important of the tribes in Samnium, were conquered by the Romans along with the other Samnites, and were the only one of the Samnite tribes who remained faithful to the Romans when the rest of the nation revolted to Hannibal in the second Punic war. Their chief town was BUTIANUM.

ΠΕΡΑ, a mountain of Palestine, in the land of Moab, only mentioned in the Pentateuch. It was probably one of the summits of the mountains called Abarim, which ran north and south through Moabitis, along the eastern side of the valley of the southern Jordan and the Dead Sea.

ΠΕΡΟΣ ΑΡΤΕΜΙΔΟΣ (Πέρος), probably corrupted from Σπερος, cave, Ἀρτεμίδος: ruins at Beni Hassan, a city of the Heptanomis, or Middle Egypt, on the eastern bank of the Nile, nearly opposite to Hermopolis the Great, on the western bank. It is remarkable as the site of the most extensive man-made catacombs in all Egypt, the walls of which are covered with sculptures and paintings of the greatest importance for elucidating Egyptian antiquities.

ΠΕΡΑΕΨΘΟΣ (Περάηθος; Πεκαρήθιος; now Piperi), a small island in the Aegean Sea, off the coast of Thessaly, and east of Halonesus, with a town of the same name upon it, and two other small places. It produced a considerable quantity of wine. It is mentioned in connection with Halonesus in the war between Philip and the Athenians. VID. HALONESUS.

[ΠΕΡΗΝΟΣ (Πέρινος)]. 1. A city on the west coast of Laconia, twenty stadia from Thalamæ. In front of it lay, 2. A small island of the same name, where, according to tradition, the Dioscuri were born.]

ΠΕΡΗΕΔΟ (Περεηδό). VID. GRÆCÆ

ΠΕΡΙΨΑ (Πέριψα): ruins near Beah-Shehr, a city in the west of Phrygia, of some note in ecclesiastical history.

ΠΕΡΜΑ (ἡ Περμα, sc. γῆ or χώρα, the country on the opposite side), a general name for any district belonging to or closely connected with a country, from the main part of which it was separated by a sea or river, was used specifically for, 1. The part of Palestine east of the Jordan in general, but usually, in a more restricted sense, for a part of that region, namely, the district between the Rivers Hieromax on the north, and Arnon on the south. Respecting its political connections with the rest of the country, VID. PALÆSTINA.—2. ΠΕΡΜΑ ΡΗΟΔΙΟΝ (ἡ περμα τῶν Ροδίων), also called the Rhodian Chersonese, a district in the south of Caria, opposite to the island of Rhodes, from Mount Phoenix on the west, to the frontier of Lycia on the east. This strip of coast, which was reckoned fifteen hundred stadia in length (by sea), and was regarded as one of the finest spots on the earth, was colonized by the Rhodians at an early period, and was always in close political connection with Rhodes even under the successive rulers of Caria; and, after the victory of the Romans over Antiochus the Great, B.C. 190, it was assigned, with the whole of Carian Doris, to the independent republic of the Rhodians. VID. RHODUS.—3. Π. ΤΕΝΕΔΙΟΝ (περμα Τενεδίων), a strip of the western coast of Mysia, opposite to the island of Tenedos, between Cape Sigæum on the north, and Alexandria Troas on the south.—4. A city on the western coast of Mysia, near Adramyttium, one of the colonies of the Mytilenæans, and not improbably preserving in its name that of a district once called Perma Mytilenæorum; for the people of Mytilene are known to have had many settlements on this coast.

[ΠΕΡΕΚΡΕΤΗΣ], a common soldier, was the ring leader in the formidable mutiny of the Pæonian legions, which broke out at the beginning of the reign of Titus, A.D. 14. He was killed by order of Drusus.]

ΠΕΡΚΟΤΕ (Περκότις), formerly Περκότις, according to Strabo: now Borgas or Burgas, Turk and Percale, Grk., a very ancient city of Mysia between Abydos and Lampacæ, near the Hellespont, on a river called PERCATE, in a beautiful situation. It is mentioned by Homer.

ΠΕΡΔΙΚΚΑΣ (Περδικκας). 1. I. The founder of the Macedonian monarchy, according to Herodotus, though later writers represent Caranus as the first king of Macedonia, and make Perdiccas only the fourth. VID. CARANUS. According to Herodotus, Perdiccas and his two brothers, Ganæus and Aëropus, were Argives of the race of Temenus, who settled near Mount Bermia, from whence they subdued the rest of Macedonia (Herod., viii., 137, 138.). It is clear, however, that the dominions of Perdiccas and his immediate successors comprised but a very small part of the country subsequently known under that name. Perdiccas was succeeded by his son Argæus.—2. II. King of Macedonia from about B.C. 454 to 413, was the son and successor of Alexander I. Shortly before the commencement of the Peloponnesian war Perdiccas was at war with the Athenians, who sent a force to support his brother Philip, and Derdas, a Macedonian chieftain, against the king, while the latter espoused the cause of Potidea, which had shaken off the Athenian yoke, B.C. 452. In the following year peace was concluded between Perdiccas and the Athenians, but it did not last long, and he was during the greater part of his reign on hostile terms with the Athenians. In 429 his dominions were invaded by Sitalces, king of the powerful Thracian tribe of the Odrysians, but the enemy was compelled by want of provisions, to return home. It was in great part at his instigation that Brasidas in 424 set out on his celebrated expedition to Macedonia and Thrace. In the following year (423), however, a misunderstanding arose between him and Brasidas; in consequence of which he abandoned the Spartan alliance, and concluded peace with Athens. Subsequently we find him at one time in alliance with the Spartans, and at another time with the Athenians; and it is evident that he joined one or other of the belligerent parties according to the dictates of his own interest at the moment.—3. III. King of Macedonia B.C. 364–359, was the second son of Amyntas II. by his wife Eurydice. On the assassination of his brother Alexander II. by Ptolemy of Aloræ, 367, the crown of Macedonia devolved upon him by hereditary right, but Ptolemy virtually enjoyed the sovereign power as guardian of Perdiccas till 364, when the latter caused Ptolemy to be put to death, and took the government into his own hands. Of the reign of Perdiccas we have very little information. We learn only that he was at one time engaged in hostilities with Athens on account of Amphipolis, and that he was distinguished for his patronage of men of letters. He fell in battle against the Illyrians, 359.—4. Son of Orontes, a Macedonian of the province of Orestæ, was one of the most distinguished of the generals of Alexander the Great. He accompanied Alex ever throughout his campaigns in Asia; and the king on his death-bed is said to have taken the royal signet-ring from his finger and given it to Perdicas. After the death of the king (333), Perdicas had the chief authority intrusted to him under the command of the new king Arrhidæus, who was a mere puppet in his hands, and he still further strengthened his power by the assassination of his rival Meleager. Vid. MELEAGER. The other generals of Alexander regarded him with fear and suspicion; and at length his ambitious schemes induced Antipater, Craterus, and Ptolemy to unite in a league and declare open war against Perdicas. Thus assailed on all sides, Perdicas determined to leave Eumenes in Asia Minor, to make head against their common enemies in that quarter, while he himself marched into Egypt against Ptolemy. He advanced without opposition as far as Pelusium, but found the banks of the Nile strongly fortified and guarded by Ptolemy, and was repulsed in repeated attempts to force the passage of the river; in the last of which, near Memphis, he lost great numbers of men. Thereupon his troops, who had long been discontented with Perdicas, rose in mutiny, and put him to death in his own tent.

PERDIX (Πέρδιξ), the sister of Dædalus, and mother of Talos, or, according to others, the latter's son of Dædalus, figu es in the mythological period of Greek art, as the inventor of various implements, chiefly for working in wood. Perdix is sometimes confounded with Talos or Calos, and it is best to regard the various legends respecting Perdix, Talos, and Calos as referring to one and the same person, namely, according to the mythographers, a nephew of Dædalus. The inventions ascribed to him are, the saw, the idea of which is said to have been suggested to him by the back-bone of a fish, or the teeth of a serpent; the chisel; the compasses; the potter's wheel. His skill excited the jealousy of Dædalus, who threw him headlong from the temple of Minerva (Athena) on the Acropolis, but the goddess caught him in his fall, and changed him into the bird which was named after him, perdix, the partridge.

PEREGRINUS PATRUS, a cynic philosopher, born at Parium, on the Hellespont, flourished in the reign of the Antonines. After a youth spent in debauchery and crimes, he visited Palestine, where he turned Christian, and by dint of hypocrisy attained to some authority in the Church. He next assumed the cynic garb, and returned to his native town, where, to obliterate the memory of his crimes, he divided his inheritance among the populace. He again set out on his travels, and after visiting many places, and adopting every method to make himself conspicuous, he at length resolved on publicly burning himself at the Olympic games; and carried his resolution into effect in the two hundred and thirty-sixth Olympiad, A.D. 165. Lucian, who knew Peregrinus, and who was present at his strange self-immolation, has left us an account of his life.

PERENNIA, ANNA. Vid. ANNA.

PERENNIS, succeeded Paternus in A.D. 183, as sole prefect of the prætorians, and, Commodus being completely sunk in debauchery and lethargy, virtually ruled the empire. Having however, rendered himself obnoxious to the soldiery, he was put to death by them in 186 or 187. Dion Cassius represents Perennia as a man of a pure and upright life; but the other historians charge him with having encouraged the emperor in all his excesses, and urged him on in his career of profligacy.

[PEREUS (Περεὺς), son of Elatus and Laodice, brother of Symphalus, and father of Nemea.]

PERGA (Πέργη: Περγᾶτος: ruins at Muriana), an ancient and important city of Pamphylia, lay a little inland, northeast of Attalia, between the Rivers Catarrhactes and Cestrus, sixty stadia (six geographical miles) from the mouth of the former. It was a celebrated seat of the worship of Diana (Artemis). On an eminence near the city stood a very ancient and renowned temple of the goddess, at which a yearly festival was celebrated; and the coins of Perga bear images of the goddess and her temple. Under the later Roman empire, it was the capital of Pamphylia Secunda. It was the first place in Asia Minor visited by the Apostle Paul on his first missionary journey (Acts, xiii., 13; vid. also xiv., 25). Splendid ruins of the city are still visible about sixteen miles northeast of Adalia.

PERGAMA and PERGAMIA. Vid. PERGAMON, No. 1.

PERGAMON or -UM, PERGAMUS or -US (τὸ Πέργαμον, ἢ Πέργαμος: the former by far the most usual form in the classical writers, though the latter is more common in English, probably on account of its use in our version of the Bible Rev., ii., 13; in Latin it seldom occurs in the nominative, but, when used, the form is Pergamum: Περγαμηνός, Pergaménus. The word is significant, connected with πύργος, a tower; it is used in the plural form, πέργαμα, as a common noun by Æschylus, Prom., 956; Euripides, Phæn., 1098, 1176). 1. The citadel of Troy, and used poetically for Troy itself: the poets also use the forms Περσάμια (τὸ Πέργαμα) and Περσάμια (ἢ Περγᾶμια, sc. πόλις): the king of Troy, Laomedon, is called Περγαμίδης, and the Romans are spoken of by Silius Italicus as "sanguis Pergameus."—2. (Ruins at Bergama or Pergamo), a celebrated city of Asia Minor, the capital of the kingdom of Pergamus, and afterward of the Roman province of Asia, was situated in the district of Southern Mysia called Teuthrania, in one of the most beautiful and fertile valleys in the world. It stood on the northern bank of the River Caicus, at a spot where that river receives the united waters of two small tributaries, the Selinus, which flowed through the city, and the Cetius, which washed its walls. The navigable river Caicus connected it with the sea at the Ælæic Gulf, from which its distance was somewhat less than twenty miles. It was built at the foot, and on the lowest slopes, of two steep hills, on one of which the ruins of the acropolis are still visible, and in the plain below are the remains of the Aselepeum and other temples, of the stadium, the theatre, and the amphitheatre, and of other buildings. The origin of the city is lost in mythical traditions, which ascribed its foundation to a colony from Arcadia under the Heraclid Telephus, and its name to Pergamus, a son of Pyrrhus and Andromache, who made himself king of Teuthrania by killing the king Arius in single combat

There is also a tradition that a colony of Episcourians settled here under Æsculapius (Asclepius). At all events, it was already, in the time of Xenophon, a very ancient city, with a mixed population of Teuthranians and Greeks; but it was not a place of much importance until the time of the successors of Alexander. After the defeat of Antigonus at Ipsus in 301, the northwestern part of Asia Minor was united to the Thracian kingdom of Lysimachus, who enlarged and beautified the city of Pergamus, and used it as a treasury on account of its strength as a fortress. The command of the fortress was intrusted to PHILETÆRUS, who, toward the end of the reign of Lysimachus, revolted to Seleucus, king of Syria, retaining, however, the fortress of Pergamus in his own hands; and, upon the death of Seleucus in 280, Philetærus established himself as an independent ruler. This is the date of the commencement of the kingdom of Pergamus, though the royal title was only assumed by the second successor of Philetærus, ATTALUS I., after his great victory over the Gauls. The successive kings of Pergamus were PHILETÆRUS, 280-263; EUMENES I., 263-241; ATTALUS I., 241-197; EUMENES II., 197-159; ATTALUS II. PHILADELPHUS, 159-138; ATTALUS III. PHILOMETOR, 138-133. For the outline of their history, vid. the articles. The kingdom reached its greatest extent after the defeat of Antiochus the Great by the Romans in B.C. 190, when the Romans bestowed upon Eumenes II. the whole of Mysia, Lydia, both Phrygiæ, Lycæonia, Pisidia, and Pamphylia. It was under the same king that Pergamus reached the height of its splendor, and that the celebrated library was founded, which for a long time rivalled that of Alexandria, and the formation of which occasioned the invention of parchment, charta Pergamena. This library was afterward united to that of Alexandria, having been presented by Antony to Cleopatra. During its existence at Pergamus, it formed the centre of a great school of literature, which rivalled that of Alexandria. On the death of Attalus III. in B.C. 133, the kingdom, by a bequest in his will, passed to the Romans, who took possession of it in 130 after a contest with the usurper Aristonicus, and erected it into the province of Asia, with the city of Pergamus for its capital, which continued in such prosperity that Pliny calls it "longe clarissimum Asiæ." The city was an early seat of Christianity, and is one of the Seven Churches of Asia, to whom the apocalyptic epistles are addressed. St. John describes it as the scene of a persecution of Christianity, and the seat of gross idolatry, which had even infected the Church. The expression "where Satan's seat is" is thought by some to refer to the worship of the serpent, as the symbol of Æsculapius (Asclepius), the patron god of the city. Under the Byzantine emperors, the capital of the province of Asia was transferred to Ephesus, and Pergamus lost much of its importance. Among the celebrated natives of the city were the rhetorician Apollonius and the physician Galen.—3. A very ancient city of Crete, the foundation of which was ascribed to the Trojans who survived their city. The legislator Lycurgus was said to have died here, and his grave was shown. The site of the city is doubtful. Some place it at Peram others at Platania.

PERIANDER (Περικλῆς). 1 Son of Cypselus whom he succeeded as tyrant of Corinth, B.C. 625, and reigned forty years, to B.C. 585. His rule was mild and beneficent at first, but afterward became oppressive. According to the common story, this change was owing to the advice of Thrasylbulus, tyrant of Miletus, whom Periander had consulted on the best mode of maintaining his power, and who is said to have taken the messenger through a corn-field, cutting off as he went the tallest ears, and then to have dismissed him without committing himself to a verbal answer. The action, however, was rightly interpreted by Periander, who proceeded to rid himself of the most powerful nobles in the state. He made his power respected abroad as well as at home; and besides his conquest of Epidaurus, mentioned below, he kept Corcyra in subjection. He was, like many of the other Greek tyrants, a patron of literature and philosophy, and Arion and Anacharsis were in favor at his court. He was very commonly reckoned among the Seven Sages, though by some he was excluded from their number, and Myson of Chene in Laconia was substituted in his room. The private life of Periander was marked by misfortune and cruelty. He married Melissa daughter of Procles, tyrant of Epidaurus. She bore him two sons, Cypselus and Lycophron, and was passionately beloved by him; but he is said to have killed her by a blow during her pregnancy, having been roused to a fit of anger by a false accusation brought against her. His wife's death embittered the remainder of his days, partly through the remorse which he felt for the deed, partly through the alienation of his younger son Lycophron, inexorably exasperated by his mother's fate. The young man's anger had been chiefly excited by Procles, and Periander, in revenge, attacked Epidaurus, and, having reduced it, took his father-in-law prisoner. Periander sent Lycophron to Corcyra; but when he was himself advanced in years, he summoned Lycophron back to Corinth to succeed to the tyranny, seeing that Cypselus, his elder son, was unfit to hold it, from deficiency of understanding. Lycophron refused to return to Corinth as long as his father was there; thereupon Periander offered to withdraw to Corcyra if Lycophron would come home and take the government. To this he assented; but the Corcyreans, not wishing to have Periander among them, put Lycophron to death. Periander shortly afterward died of despondency, at the age of eighty, and after a reign of forty years, according to Diogenes Laertius. He was succeeded by a relative, Psammethicus, son of Gordias.—2 Tyrant of Ambracia, was contemporary with his more famous namesake of Corinth, to whom he was also related, being the son of Gorgus, who was son or brother to Cypselus. Periander was deposed by the people probably after the death of the Corinthian tyrant (365).

PERIBŒA (Περιβόη). 1. Wife of Icarius, and mother of Penelope. Vid. ICARIUS, No. 2.—2. Daughter of Alcathous, and wife of Telamon, by whom she became the mother of Ajax and Teucer. Some writers call her Eribœa.—3. Daughter of Hipponous, and wife of Cénous, by whom she became the mother of Tydeus. Vid. CÉNŒUS.—4. Wife of King Polybus of Corinth.—[5. Daughter of Acesamenus, mother by Axius of Pelagon.—6. Daughter of Eurymedon, mother of Nausithous by Neptune (Poseidon).]

PERICLES (Περικλῆς). 1. The greatest of Athenian statesmen, was the son of Xanthippus and Agariste, both of whom belonged to the noblest families of Athens. The fortune of his parents procured for him a careful education, which his extraordinary abilities and diligence turned to the best account. He received instruction from Damon, Zeno of Elea, and Anaxagoras. With Anaxagoras he lived on terms of the most intimate friendship, till the philosopher was compelled to retire from Athens. From this great and original thinker Pericles was believed to have derived not only the cast of his mind, but the character of his eloquence, which, in the elevation of its sentiments, and the purity and loftiness of its style, was the fitting expression of the force and dignity of his character and the grandeur of his conceptions. Of the oratory of Pericles no specimens remain to us, but it is described by ancient writers as characterized by singular force and energy. He was described as thundering and lightening when he spoke, and as carrying the weapons of Jupiter (Zeus) upon his tongue. In B.C. 469, Pericles began to take part in public affairs, forty years before his death, and was soon regarded as the head of the more democratical part in the state, in opposition to Cimon. He gained the favor of the people by the laws which he got passed for their benefit. Thus it was enacted through his means that the citizens should receive from the public treasury the price of their admittance to the theatre, amounting to two oboli apiece; that those who served in the courts of the Heliea should be paid for their attendance; and that those citizens who served as soldiers should likewise be paid. It was at his instigation that his friend Ephialtes proposed, in 461, the measure by which the Areopagus was deprived of those functions which rendered it formidable as an antagonist to the democratical party. This success was followed by the ostracism of Cimon, who was charged with Lacedæmonism, and Pericles was thus placed at the head of public affairs at Athens. Pericles was distinguished as a general as well as a statesman, and frequently commanded the Athenian armies in their wars with the neighboring states. In 454 he commanded the Athenians in their campaigns against the Sicyonians and Acarnanians; in 448 he led the army which assisted the Phocians in the Sacred war; and in 445 he rendered the most signal service to the state by recovering the island of Eubœa, which had revolted from Athens. Cimon had been previously recalled from exile, without any opposition from Pericles, but had died in 449. On his death the aristocratical party was headed by Thucydides, the son of Melesias; : at on the ostracism of the latter in 444, the organized opposition of the aristocratical party was broken up, and Pericles was left without a rival. Throughout the remainder of his political course no one appeared to contest his supremacy; but the boundless influence which he possessed was never perverted by him to minister or unworthy purposes. So far from being a mere selfish demagogue, he neither indulged nor courted the multitude. The next important event in which Pericles was engaged was the war against Samos, which had revolted from Athens, and which he subdued after an arduous campaign, 440. The poet Sophocles was one of the generals who fought with Pericles against Samos. For the next ten years till the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, the Athenians were not engaged in any considerable military operations. During this period Pericles devoted especial attention to the Athenian navy, as her supremacy rested on her maritime superiority, and he adopted various judicious means for consolidating and strengthening her empire over the islands of the Ægean. The funds derived from the tribute of the allies and from other sources were, to a large extent, devoted by him to the erection of those magnificent temples and public buildings which rendered Athens the wonder and admiration of Greece. Under his administration the Propylæa, and the Parthenon, and the Odeum were erected, as well as numerous other temples and public buildings. With the stimulus afforded by these works, architecture and sculpture reached their highest perfection, and some of the greatest artists of antiquity were employed in erecting or adorning the buildings. The chief direction and oversight of the public edifices was intrusted to Phidias. Vid. PHIDIAS. These works calling into activity almost every branch of industry and commerce at Athens, diffused universal prosperity while they proceeded, and thus contributed in this, as well as in other ways, to maintain the popularity and influence of Pericles. But he still had many enemies, who were not slow to impute to him base and unworthy motives. From the comic poets Pericles had to sustain numerous attacks. They exaggerated his power, spoke of his party as Pisistratida, and called upon him to swear that he was not about to assume the tyranny. His high character and strict probity, however, rendered all these attacks harmless. But as his enemies were unable to ruin his reputation by these means, they attacked him through his friends. His friends Phidias and Anaxagoras, and his mistress Aspasia, were all accused before the people. Phidias was condemned and cast into prison (vid. PHIDIAS); Anaxagoras was also sentenced to pay a fine and quit Athens (vid. ANAXAGORAS); and Aspasia was only acquitted through the entreaties and tears of Pericles. The Peloponnesian war has been falsely ascribed to the ambitious schemes of Pericles. It is true that he counselled the Athenians not to yield to the demands of the Lacedæmonians, and he pointed out the immense advantages which the Athenians possessed in carrying on the war; but he did this because he saw that war was inevitable; and that, as long as Athens retained the great power which she then possessed

Sparta would never rest contented. On the outbreak of the war in 431, a Peloponnesian army under Archidamus invaded Attica, and upon his advice the Athenians conveyed their movable property into the city, and their cattle and beasts of burden to Eubœa, and allowed the Peloponnesians to desolate Attica without opposition. The next year (430), when the Peloponnesians again invaded Attica, Pericles pursued the same policy as before. In this summer the plague made its appearance in Athens. The Athenians, being exposed to the devastation of the war and the plague at the same time, began to turn their thoughts to peace, and looked upon Pericles as the author of all their distresses, inasmuch as he had persuaded them to go to war. Pericles attempted to calm the public ferment; but such was the irritation against him that he was sentenced to pay a fine. The ill feeling of the people having found this vent, Pericles soon resumed his accustomed sway, and was again elected one of the generals for the ensuing year (429). Meantime Pericles had suffered in common with his fellow-citizens. The plague carried off most of his near connections. His son Xanthippus, a profligate and undutiful youth, his sister, and most of his intimate friends, died of it. Still he maintained unmoved his calm bearing and philosophic composure. At last his only surviving legitimate son, Paralus, a youth of greater promise than his brother, fell a victim. The firmness of Pericles then at last gave way: as he placed the funeral garland on the head of the lifeless youth, he burst into tears and sobbed aloud. He had one son remaining, his child by Aspasia, and he was allowed to enrol this son in his own tribe and give him his own name. In the autumn of 429, Pericles himself died of a lingering sickness. When at the point of death, as his friends were gathered round his bed, recalling his virtues and enumerating his triumphs, Pericles, overhearing their remarks, said that they had forgotten his greatest praise: that no Athenian through his means had been made to put on mourning. He survived the commencement of the war two years and six months. The name of the wife of Pericles is not mentioned. She had been the wife of Hipponicus, by whom she was the mother of Callias. She bore two sons to Pericles, Xanthippus and Paralus. She lived unhappily with Pericles, and a divorce took place by mutual consent, when Pericles connected himself with Aspasia. Of his strict probity he left the decisive proof in the fact that at his death he was found not to have added a single drachma to his hereditary property.—2. Son of the preceding, by Aspasia, was one of the generals at the battle of Arginusæ, and was put to death by the Athenians with the other generals, 406.

PERIOLEUS (Περικλῆς). 1. One of the Argonauts, was son of Neleus and Chloris, and brother of Nestor. Neptune (Poseidon) gave him the power of changing himself into different forms, and conferred upon him great strength, but he was nevertheless slain by Hercules at the capture of Pylos.—2. Son of Neptune (Poseidon) and Chloris, the daughter of Tiresias of Thebes. In the war of the Seven against Thebes he was believed to have killed Parthenopæus; and when he pursued Amphiaræus, the latter, by the command of Jupiter (Zeus), was swallowed up by the earth.

PERILLUS (Περύλλος), a statuary, was the maker of the bronze bull of the tyrant Phalaris, respecting which, vid. further under PHALARIS. Like the makers of other instruments of death, Perillus is said to have become one of the victims of his own handiwork.

PERINTHUS (Πέρινθος: Περνίθος: now Eski Erzeli), an important town in Thrace, on the Propontis, was founded by the Samians about B.C. 559. It was situated twenty-two miles west of Selymbria, on a small peninsula, and was built on the slope of a hill with rows of houses rising above each other like seats in an amphitheatre. It is celebrated for the obstinate resistance which it offered to Philip of Macedon, at which time it was a more powerful place than Byzantium. Under the Romans it still continued to be a flourishing town, being the point at which most of the roads met leading to Byzantium. The commercial importance of the town is attested by its numerous coins, which are still extant. At a later time, but not earlier than the fourth century of the Christian era, we find it called Heraclea, which occurs sometimes alone without any addition, and sometimes in the form of Heraclea Thracia or Heraclea Perinthia.

PERIPHAS (Περίφας). 1. An Attic autochthon, previous to the time of Cecrops, was a great of Apollo, and, on account of his virtues, was made king of the country. In consequence of the honors paid to him, Jupiter (Zeus) wished to destroy him; but, at the request of Apollo, he was metamorphosed by Jupiter (Zeus) into an Homer places the Perrhæbi in the neighborhood of the Thessalian Dodona and the River Titare- sius; and at a later time the name of Perrhæbia was applied to the district bounded by Macedo- nia and the Cambunian Mountains on the north, by Pindus on the west, by the Peneus on the south and southeast, and by the Peneus and Ossa on the east. The Perrhæbi were mem- bers of the Amphictyonic league. At an early period they were subdued by the Lapithæ; at the time of the Peloponnesian war they were subject to the Thessalians, and subsequently to Philip of Macedon; but at the time of the Ro- man wars in Greece they appear independent of Macedonia.

PERSEUS (Περσῆος), a Stoic philosopher, was a native of Cittium in Crete, and a disciple of Zeno. He lived for some years at the court of Antigonus Gonatas, with whom he seems to have been in high favor. Antigonus appointed him to the chief command in Corinth, where he was slain when the city was taken by Aratus, B.C. 243.

PERSEË (Πέρση), daughter of Oceanus, and wife of Helios (the Sun), by whom she became the mother of Æetes and Circe. She is further called the mother of Pasiphaë and Persees. Ho- mer and Apollonius Rhodius call her Perseë while others call her Perseis or Persea.

PERSEÏS, a name given to Hecate, as the daughter of Perseus by Asteria.

ΠΕΡΣΕΦΩΝΗ (Περσεφόνη), called PROSERPINA by the Romans, the daughter of Zeus (Jupiter; and Demeter (Ceres). In Homer she is called Persephonia (Περσεφόνη); the form Persephone first occurs in Hesiod. But, besides these forms of the name, we also find Persephassa, Perse- phassa, Persephatta, Phersephatta, Pherrephassa, Pherephatta, and Phersephonia, for which various etymologies have been proposed. The Latin Proserpina is probably only a corruption of the Greek. In Attica she was worshipped under the name of Cora (Κόρη, Ion. Κούρη), that is, the Daughter, namely, of Demeter (Ceres); and the two were frequently called The Mother and the Daughter (ἡ Μῆτηρ καὶ ἡ Κόρη).

Being the infernal goddess of death, she is also called a daughter of Zeus (Jupiter) and Styx. In Ar- cadia she was worshipped under the name of

Despœna, and was called a daughter of Posei- don (Neptune) Hippius and Demeter (Ceres), and said to have been brought up by the Titan

Anytus. Homer describes her as the wife of Hades (Pluto), and the formidable, venerable and majestic queen of the Shades, who rules over the souls of the dead, along with her hus- band. Hence she is called by later writers Juno

Inferna, Averna, and Stygia; and the Erinnyes are said to have been her daughters by Pluto.

Arjves sacred to her are placed by Homer in the western extremity of the earth, on the frontiers of the lower world, which is itself called the house of Persephone (Proserpina). The story of her being carried off by Hades or Pluto against her will is not mentioned by Homer, who simply describes her as the wife and queen of Hades. Her abduction is first mentioned by Hesiod. The account of her abduction, which is the most celebrated part of her story, and the wanderings of her mother in search of her, and the worship of the two goddesses in Attica at the festival of the Eleusinia, are related under DEMETER. In the mystical theories of the Orphics, Persephone (Proserpina) is described as the all-pervading goddess of nature, who both produces and destroys every thing; and she is therefore mentioned along, or identified with, other mystic divinities, such as Isis, Rhea, Ge (Terra), Hestia, Pandora, Artemis (Diana), Hecate. This mystic Persephone is further said to have become by Zeus (Jupiter) the mother of Dionysus (Bacchus), Iacchus, Zagreus or Sabazius. Persephone (Proserpina) frequently appears in works of art. She is represented either with the grave and severe character of an infernal Juno, or as a mystical divinity with a sceptre and a little box, in the act of being carried off by Pluto.

Περσέπολις (Περσέπολις, Περσείπολις: in the Middle Ages, Istakhar: now Takht-i-Jemshid, i. e., Throne of Jemshid, or Chil-Minar, i. e., Forty Pillars: large ruins), is the Greek name, probably translated from the Persian name, which is not recorded, of the great city which succeeded Pasargada as the capital of Persis and of the Persian empire. From the circumstance, however, of the conquest of the Babylonian empire taking place about the time when Persepolis attained this dignity, it appears to have been seldom used as the royal residence. Neither Herodotus, Xenophon, Ctesias, nor the sacred writers during the Persian period, mention it at all, though they often speak of Babylon, Susa, and Ecbatana as the capitals of the empire. It is only from the Greek writers after the Macedonian conquest that we learn its rank in the empire, which appears to have consisted chiefly in its being one of the two burial places of the kings (the other being Pasargada), and also a royal treasury; for Alexander found in the palace immense riches, which were said to have accumulated from the time of Cyrus. Its foundation is sometimes ascribed to Cyrus the Great, but more generally to his son Cambyses. It was greatly enlarged and adorned by Darius I. and Xerxes, and preserved its splendor till after the Macedonian conquest, when it was burned; Alexander, as the story goes, setting fire to the palace with his own hand at the end of a revel, by the instigation of the courtesan Thais, B.C. 331. It was not, however, so entirely destroyed as some historians represent. It appears frequently in subsequent history, both ancient and medieval. It is now deserted, but its ruins are considerable, though too dilapidated to give any good notion of Persian architecture, and they are rich in cuneiform inscriptions. It was situated in the heart of Persis, in the part called Hollow Persis (κοιλὴ Πέρσις), not far from the border of the Carmian Desert, in a beautiful and healthy valley, watered by the River Araxes (ἡ ὡρὸς Ἐννέη, and its tributaries the Medus and the Cyrus). The city stood on the northern side of the Araxes, and had a citadel (the ruins of which are still seen) built on the levelled surface of a rock and inclosed by triple walls rising one above the other to the heights of sixteen, forty-eight, and sixty cubits, within which was the palace, with its royal sepulchres and treasures.

Περσεύς (Πέρσης). 1. Son of the Titan Cronos and Eurybia, and husband of Asteria, by whom he became the father of Hecate.—2. Son of Perseus and Andromeda, described by the Greeks as the founder of the Persian nation.—3. Son of Helios (the Sun) and Perse, and brother of Æetes and Circe.

Περσεύς (Περσεύς), the famous Argive hero was a son of Jupiter (Zeus) and Danaë, and grandson of Acrisius. An oracle had told Acrisius that he was doomed to perish by the hands of Danaë's son, and he therefore shut up his daughter in an apartment made of brass or stone. But Jupiter (Zeus) having metamorphosed himself into a shower of gold, came down through the roof of the prison, and became by her the father of Perseus. From this circumstance Perseus is sometimes called aurigena. As soon as Acrisius discovered that Danaë had given birth to a son, he put both mother and son into a chest, and threw them into the sea; but Jupiter (Zeus) caused the chest to land in the island of Seriphos, one of the Cyclades, where Dictys, a fisherman, found them, and carried them to Polydectes, the king of the country. They were treated with kindness by Polydectes; but the latter having afterward fallen in love with Danaë, and finding it impossible to gratify his desires in consequence of the presence of Perseus, who had meantime grown up to manhood, he sent Perseus away to fetch the head of Medusa, one of the Gorgons. Guided by Mercury (Hermes) and Minerva (Athena), Perseus first went to the Grææ, the sisters of the Gorgons, took from them their one tooth and then an eye, and would not restore them until they showed him the way to the nymphs who possessed the winged sandals, the magic wallet, and the helmet of Pluto (Hades), which rendered the wearer invisible. Having received from the nymphs these invaluable presents, from Mercury (Hermes) a sickle, and from Minerva (Athena) a mirror, he mounted into the air, and arrived at the Gorgons, who dwelt near Tartarus on the coast of the ocean, whose heads were covered, like those of serpents, with scales, and who had large tusks like boars, brazen hands, and golden wings. He found them asleep, and cut off the head of Medusa, looking at her figure through the mirror, for a sight of the monster herself would have changed him into stone. Perseus put her head into the wallet which he carried on his back, and as he went away he was pursued by two other Gorgons; but his helmet, which rendered him invisible, enabled him to escape in safety. Perseus then proceeded to Æthiopia, where he saved and married Andromeda. VID. ANDROMEDA. Perseus is also said to have come to the Hyperboreans, by whom he was hospitably received, and to Atlas, whom he changed into the mountains of the same name by the Gorgon's head. On his return to

 was also the last. The new consul, L. Æmilius Paulus, defeated Perseus with great loss in a decisive battle fought near Pydna, on June 22, 168. Perseus took refuge in the island of Samothrace, where he shortly afterward surrendered with his children to the prætor Cn. Octavius.
 When brought before Æmilius, he is said to have degraded himself by the most abject sup-plications; but he was treated with kindness by the Roman general. The following year he was carried to Italy, where he was compelled to adorn the splendid triumph of his conqueror (November 30, 167), and afterward cast into a dungeon, from whence, however, the intercession of Æmilius procured his release, and he was permitted to end his days in an honorable captivity at Alba. He survived his removal thither a few years, and died, according to some accounts, by voluntary starvation, while others, fortunately with less probability, represent him as falling a victim to the cruelty of his guards, who deprived him of sleep. Perseus had been twice married; the name of his first wife, whom he is said to have killed with his own hand in a fit of passion, is not recorded; his second, Laodice, was the daughter of Seleucus IV. Philopator. He left two children: a son, Alexander and a daughter, both apparently by his second marriage, as they were mere children when carried to Rome. Besides these, he had adopted his younger brother Philip, who appears to have been regarded by him as the heir to his throne, and became the partner of his captivity.

PERSEIUS SINUS, PERSEIUM MARE (ὁ Περσικὸς κόλπος, ἡ Περσικὴ θάλασσα, and other forms:
the Persian Gulf), is the name given by the later geographers to the great gulf of the Mare Erythræum (now Indian Ocean), extending in a southeastern direction from the mouth of the Tigris, between the northeastern coast of Arabia and the opposite coast of Susiana, Persia, and Carmania, to the narrow strait formed by the long tongue of land which projects from the northern side of Oman in Arabia, by which strait it is connected with the more open gulf of the Indian Ocean called Paragon Sinus (now Gulf of Oman). The earlier Greek writers know nothing of it. Herodotus does not distinguish it from the Erythræan Sea. The voyage of Alexander's admiral Nearchus from the Indus to the Tigris made it better known, but still the ancient geographers in general give very inaccurate statements of its size and form.

PERSIENS (Περσίδης, Περσιῶδης), a patronym io given to the descendants of Perseus.

PERSIS, and very rarely PERSEA (ἡ Περσίς, ἡ Περσική, sc. γῆ, the fem. adjectives, the masc.
 being Περσικός), from the ethnic noun Πέρσης, pl.
 Πέρσαι, fem. Περσίδες, Latin Persa and Persæ, pl. Persæ: in modern Persian and Arabic, Pers or Farsistan, i. e., stan, land of, Fars = Old Persian pars, horse or horseman: Eng. Persia), originally a small mountainous district of Western

Asia, lying on the northeastern side of the Persian Gulf, and surrounded on the other sides by mountains and deserts. On the northwest and north it was separated from Susiana, Media, and Parthia by the little river Oroatis or Orontes, and by Mons Parachoathras; and on the east from Carmania by no definite boundaries in the Desert. The only level part of the country was the strip of sea-coast called PERSIA PARALIA; the rest was intersected with branches of Mons Parachoathras, the valleys between which were watered by several rivers, the chief of which were the ARAXES, CYRUS, and MEDUS: in this part of the country, which was called KOLOS PERSIA, stood the capital cities PASARGADA and PERSEPOLIS. The country has a remarkable variety of climate and of products; the northern mountainous regions being comparatively cold, but with good pastures, especially for camels; the middle slopes having a temperate climate, and producing abundance of fruit and wine; and the southern strip of coast being intensely hot and sandy, with little vegetation except the palm-tree. The inhabitants were a collection of nomad tribes of the Indo-European stock, who called themselves by a name which is given in Greek as ARTAI (Ἀπραιοί), and which, like the kindred Median name of APRI (Ἀπριοί), signifies noble or honorable, and is applied especially to the true worshippers of Ormuzd and followers of Zoroaster: it was, in fact, rather a title of honor than a proper name; the true collective name of the people seems to have been PARACA. According to Herodotus, they were divided into three classes or castes: first, the nobles or warriors, containing the three tribes of the PASARGADA, who were the most noble, and to whom the royal family of the Achæmenids belonged, the Marpii, and the Maspii; secondly, the agricultural and other settled tribes, namely, the Panthialæi, Derusæi, and Germanii; thirdly, the tribes which remained nomadic, namely, the Dæ, Mardi, Dropici, and Sagartii, names common to other parts of Western and Central Asia. The Persians had a close ethnical affinity to the Medes, and followed the same customs and religion. Vid. MACI, ZOROASTER. The simple and warlike habits which they cultivated in their native mountains preserved them from the corrupting influences which enervated their Median brethren; so that from being, as we find them at the beginning of their recorded history, the subject member of the Medo-Persian kingdom, they obtained the supremacy under CYRUS, the founder of the great Persian empire, B.C. 559. Of the Persian history before this date we know but little: the native poetical annalists of a later period are perfectly untrustworthy: the additional light lately obtained from the Persian inscriptions is, so far as it goes, confirmatory of the Greek writers, from whom, and from some small portions of Scripture, all our knowledge of ancient Persian history is derived. According to these accounts, the Persians were first subjected by the Medes under Phraortes, about B.C. 688, at the time of the formation of the great Median empire; but they continued to be governed by their own princes, the Achæmenids. An account of the revolution, by which the supremacy was transferred to the Persians, is given under CYRUS. At this time there existed in Western Asia two other great kingdoms, the Lydian, which comprised nearly the whole of Asia Minor, west of the River Halys, which separated it from the Medo-Persian territories, and the Babylonian, which, besides the Tigris and Euphrates valley, embraced Syria and Palestine. By the successive conquest of these kingdoms, the dominions of CYRUS were extended on the west as far as the coasts of the Euxine, the Ægean, and the Mediterranean sea to the frontier of Egypt. Turning his arms in the opposite direction, he subdued Bactria, and effected some conquests beyond the Oxus, but fell in battle with the Massagetsæ. Vid. CYRUS. His son Cambyses added Egypt to the empire. Vid. CAMBYES. Upon his death the Magian priesthood made an effort to restore the supremacy to the Medes (vid. MACI, SMERDES), which was defeated by the conspiracy of the seven Persian chieftains, whose success conferred the crown upon Darius, the son of Hystaspes. This king was at first occupied with crushing rebellions in every part of the empire, and with the two expeditions against Scythia and Cyrenæa, of which the former entirely failed, and the latter was only partially successful. He conquered Thrace, and on the east he added the valley of the Indus to the kingdom; but in this quarter the power of Persia seems never to have been much more than nominal. The Persian empire had now reached its greatest extent from Thrace and Cyrenæa on the west to the Indus on the east, and from the Euxine, the Caucasus (or, rather, a little below it), the Caspian, and the Oxus and Jaxartes on the north to Æthiopia, Arabia, and the Erythrean Sea on the south, and it embraced, in Europe, Thrace and some of the Greek cities north of the Euxine; in Africa, Egypt and Cyrenæa; in Asia on the west, Palestine, Phœnicia, Syria, the several districts of Asia Minor, Armenia, Mesopotamia, Assyria, Babylonia, Susiana, Atropatene, Great Media; on the north, Hyrcania, Margiana, Bactriana, and Sogdiana; on the east, the Paropamisus, Arachosia, and India (i. e. part of the Punjab and Scinde); on the south, Persia, Carmania, and Gedrosia; and in the centre of the eastern part, Parthia, Aria, and Drangiana. The capital cities of the empire were Babylon, Susa, Ecbatana in Media, and, though these were seldom, if ever, used as residences, Pasargada and Persepolis in Persia. (Vid. the several articles.) Of this vast empire Darius undertook the organization, and divided it into twenty satrapies, of which a full account is given by Herodotus. For the other details of his reign, and especially the commencement of the wars with Greece, vid. DARIUS. Of the remaining period of the ancient Persian history till the Macedonian conquest, a sufficient abstract will be found under the names of the several kings, a list of whom is now subjoined: (1.) CYRUS, B.C. 559-529; (2.) CAMBYES, 529-522; (3.) Usurpation of the pseudo-SMERDES, seven months, 522-521; (4.) DARIUS I., son of Hystaspes, 521-485; (5.) XERXES I., 485-465; (6.) both to ease and license under Commodus, were disgusted with the discipline which he attempt-

PERUSIA (Perusinus: now Perugia), an ancient city in the eastern part of Etruria, between the Lake Trasimenus and the Tiber, and one of the twelve cities of the Etruscan confederacy. It was situated on a hill, and was strongly fortified by nature and by art. In conjunction with the other cities of Etruria, it long resisted the power of the Romans, and at a later period it was made a Roman colony. It is memorable in the civil wars as the place in which L. Antonius, the brother of the triumvir, took refuge when he was no longer able to oppose Octavianus in the field, and where he was kept closely blockaded by Octavianus for some months, from the end of B.C. 41 to the spring of 40. Famine compelled it to surrender; but one of its citizens having set fire to his own house, the flames spread, and the whole city was burned to the ground. The war between L. Antonius and Octavianus is known from the long siege of this town by the name of the Bellum Perusinum. It was rebuilt and colonized anew by Augustus, from whom it received the surname of Augusta.
In the later time of the empire it was the most important city in all Etruria, and long resisted the Goths. Part of the walls and some of the gates of Perusia still remain. The best preserved of the gates is now called Arco d' Au-gusto, from the inscription AVGVSTA PERVSIÆ over the arch; the whole structure is at least sixty or seventy feet high. Several interesting tombs, with valuable remains of Etruscan art, have been discovered in the neighborhood of the city.

PERSEINUS or PERSINUS (Περσεινός, Περσινός; Περσεινοῦντις, fem. Περσεινοῦντις: ruins at Bala Hisar), a city of Asia Minor, in the southwestern corner of Galatia, on the southern slope of Mount Dindymus or Agdistis, was celebrated as a chief seat of the worship of Cybele, under the surname of Agdistis, whose temple, crowded with riches, stood on a hill outside the city. In this temple was a wooden (Livy says stone) image of the goddess, which was removed to Rome, to satisfy an oracle in the Sibylline books.
Under Constantine the city was made the capital of the province of Galatia Salutaris, but gradually declined until the sixth century, after which it is no more mentioned.

PETALIA or PETALIA (now Petalus), an uninhabited and rocky island off the southwestern coast of Eubœa, at the entrance into the Eurippus.

PETALIA or PETILIA (Πεταλία: Petelinus: now Strongoli), an ancient Greek town on the eastern coast of Bruttium, founded, according to medition, by Philoctetes. (Virg., Æn., iii., 402.) It was situated north of Croton, to whose territory it originally belonged, but it was afterward conquered by the Lucanians. It remained faithful to the Romans, when the other cities of Brutium revolted to Hannibal, and it was not till after a long and desperate resistance that it was taken by one of Hannibal's generals. It was recaptured by Hannibal with Brutians; but the Romans subsequently collected the remains of the former population, and put them again in possession of the town.

PETEÏON (Πετεῖον; Πετεῖσιος), a small town in Bœotia, of uncertain site, dependent upon Haliartus according to some, and upon Thebes according to others.

PETEÏOS (Πετεῖος), son of Orneus, and father of Menestheus, was expelled from Athens by Ægeus, and went to Phocis, where he founded Stiris.

PETOSINIS (Πετοσίσις), an Egyptian priest and astrologer, generally named along with Nechepers, an Egyptian king. The two are said to be the founders of astrology. Some works on astrology were extant under his name. Like our own Lilly, Petosiris became the common name for an astrologer. (Juv., vi., 580.)

PETOVIO or PASTOVIO (now Petta), a town in Pannonia Superior, on the frontiers of Noricum, and on the Dravus (now Drave), was a Roman colony with the surname Ulpia, having been probably enlarged and made a colony by Trajan or Hadrian. It was one of the chief towns of Pannonia, had an imperial palace, and was the head-quarters of a Roman legion. The ancient town was probably on the right bank of the Drave, opposite the modern Petta, as it is only on the former spot that inscriptions, coins, and other antiquities have been found.

PETRA (ἡ Πέτρα; Πετραῖος, Petræus, later Petrensis), the name of several cities built on rocks or in rocky places. 1. A small place in the Corinthian territory, probably on the coast, near the borders of Argolis.—2. A place in Elis, not far from the city of Elis, of which some suppose it to have been the acropolis. The sepulchral monument of the philosopher Pyrrho was shown here.—3. (Now Casa della Pietra), also called PETRAIA and PETRINA (the people Πετρίοι and Petrinai), an inland town of Sicily, on the road from Agrigentum to Panormus.—4. A town on the coast of Illyricum, with a bad harbor.—5. A city of Pieria in Macedonia.—6. A fortress of the Mædi in Thrace.—7. (Pl. nov.), a place in Dacia, on one of the three great roads which crossed the Danube.—8. In Pontus, a fortress built by Justinian, on a precipice on the sea-coast, between the rivers Buthys and Acinasis.—9. In Sogdiana, near the Oxus (Q. Curt., vii., 11).—10. By far the most celebrated of all the places of this name was PETRA or PETRÆ (now Wady-Musa), in Arabia Petrea, the capital first of the Idumæans, and afterward of the Nabathæans. It is probably the same place which is called Selah (which means, like πέτρα, a rock) and Jokbeel is the Old Testament. It lies in the midst of the mountains of Seir, at the foot of Mount Her, just half way between the Dead Sea and the head of the Ælanitic Gulf of the Red Sea, in a valley, or rather ravine, surrounded by almost inaccessible precipices, which is entered by a narrow gorge on the east, the rocky walls of which approach so closely as sometimes hardly to permit two horsemen to ride abreast. On the banks of the river which runs through the ravine stood the city itself, a mile in length and half a mile in breadth, between the sides of the valley, and some fine ruins of its public buildings still remain. But this is not all: the rocks which surround, not only the main valley, but all its lateral ravines, are completely honey-combed with excavations, some of which were tombs, some temples, and some private houses, at the entrances to which the surface of the rock is sculptured into magnificent architectural facades and other figures, whose details are often so well preserved as to appear but just chiselled, while the effect is wonderfully heightened by the brilliant variegated colors of the rock, where red, purple, yellow, sky-blue, black, and white are seen in distinct layers. These ruins are chiefly of the Roman period, when Petra had become an important city as a centre of the caravan traffic of the Nabathæans. At the time of Augustus, as Strabo learned from a friend who had resided there, it contained many Romans and other foreigners, and was governed by a native prince. It had maintained its independence against the Greek kings of Syria, and retained it under the Romans till the time of Trajan, by whom it was taken. It was the chief city of the whole country of Arabia Petrea, which probably derived its name from Petra; and under the later empire it was the capital of Palæstina Tertia.

PETREUS, M., a man of great military experience, is first mentioned in B.C. 63, when he served as legatus to the proconsul C. Antonius and commanded the army in the battle in which Catiline perished. He belonged to the aristocratic party; and in 56 he was sent into Spain along with L. Afranius as legatus of Pompey, to whom the provinces of the two Spains had been granted. Soon after the commencement of the civil war in 49, Cæsar defeated Afranius and Petreus in Spain, whereupon the latter joined Pompey in Greece. After the loss of the battle of Pharsalia (48), Petreus crossed over to Africa, and took an active part in the campaign of 46, which was brought to an end by the decisive defeat of the Pompeian army at the battle of Thapsus. Petreus then fled with Julia, despairing of safety, they fell by each other's hands.

PETRINUS (now Rocca di monti Ragusa), mountain near Sinuessa, on the confines of Latium and Campania, on which good wine was grown.

PETROÏÏTH, a people in Gallia Aquitania, the modern Perigord. Their country contained iron mines, and their chief town was Vesunni (now Perigueux).

PEUCE (Πεῦκη: now Piccina), an island in Mæsia Inferior, formed by the two southern mouths of the Danube, of which the most southernly was also called Peuce, but more commonly the Sacred Mouth. This island is of a triangular form, and is said by the ancients to be as large as Rhodes. It was inhabited by the Peucini, who were a tribe of the Bastarnæ, and took their name from the island.

PEUCESTAS (Πευκέστας), a Macedonian, and a distinguished officer of Alexander the Great. He had the chief share in saving the life of Alexander in the assault on the city of the Malli in India, and was afterward appointed by the king to the satrapy of Persia. In the division of the provinces after the death of Alexander (B.C. 323), he obtained the renewal of his government of Persia. He fought on the side of Eumenes against Antigonus (317–316), but displayed both arrogance and insubordination in these campaigns. Upon the surrender of Eumenes by the Argyraspids, Peucestas fell into the hands of Antigonus, who deprived him of his satrapy.

They are described by Homer as a people fond of the feast, the lyre, and the dance, and hence their name passed into a proverb to indicate persons of luxurious and sensual habits. Thus a glutton is called Phæax by Horace (Ep., i., 15, 24). The ancients identified the Homeric Scheria with Corcyra, whence the latter is called by the poets Phæacia tellus; but there is no sound argument in favor of the identity of the two islands, and it is better to regard Scheria as altogether fabulous.

PHÆAX (Φαῖας), an Athenian orator and statesman, and a contemporary of Nicias and Alcibiades. Some critics maintain that the extra speech against Alcibiades, commonly attributed to Andocides, was written by Phæax.

PHÆDON (Φαίδων), a Greek philosopher, was a native of Elis, and of high birth, but was taken prisoner, probably about B.C. 400, and was brought to Athens. It is said that he ran away from his master to Socrates, and was ransomed by one of the friends of the latter. Phædon was present at the death of Socrates, while he was still quite a youth. He appears to have lived in Athens some time after the death of Socrates, and then returned to Elis, where he became the founder of a school of philosophy. He was succeeded by Plistanus, after whom the Elean school was merged in the Eretrian. The dialogue of Plato, which contains an account of the death of Socrates, bears the name of Phædon.

PHÆDRA (Φαίdra), daughter of Minos by Pasiphaë or Crete, and the wife of Theseus. She was the step-mother of Hippolytus, the son of Theseus, with whom she fell in love; but having been repulsed by Hippolytus, she accused him to Theseus of having attempted her dishonor. After the death of Hippolytus, his innocence became known to his father, and Phædra made away with herself. For details, vid. Hippolytus.

PHÆDRUS (Φαίδρος). 1. An Epicurean philosopher, and the president of the Epicurean school during Cicero's residence in Athens, B.C. 80. He died in 70, and was succeeded by Patron. He was the author of a work on the gods (Περὶ Θεῶν), of which an interesting fragment was discovered at Herculaneum in 1806, and published by Petersen, Hamb., 1833. Cicero was largely indebted to this work for the materials of the first book of the De Natura Deorum.—2. The Latin fabulist, of whom we know nothing but what is collected or inferred from his fables. He was originally a slave, and was brought from Thrace or Macedonia to Rome, where he learned the Latin language. As the title of his work is Phædri Aug. Liberti Fabula Æsopia, we must conclude that he had belonged to Augustus, who manumitted him. Under Tiberius he appears to have undergone some persecution from Sejanus. The fables extant under the name of Phædrus are ninety-seven in number, written in iambic verse, and distributed into five books. Most of the fables are transfusions of the Æsopian fables, or those which pass as such, into Latin verse. The expression is generally clear and concise, and the language, with some few exceptions, as pure and correct as we should expect from a Roman writer of the Augustan age. But Phædrus has not escaped censure when he has deviated from his Greek model, and much of the censure is just. The best fables are those in which he has kept the closest to his original. Many of the fables, however, are not Æsopian, as the matter clearly shows, for they refer to historical events of a much later period (v., 1, 8; iii., 10); and Phædrus himself in the prologue to the fifth book, intimates that he had often used the name of Æsop only to recommend his verses. There is also another collection of thirty-two fables attributed to Æsop, and entitled Epitome Fabularum, which was first published at Naples in 1809, by Casati. Opinions are much divided as to the genuineness of this collection. The probability is that the Epitome is founded on genuine Roman fables, which, in the process of transcription during many centuries, have undergone considerable changes. The last and only critical edition of Phædrus is by Orelli, Zürich, 1831.

PHÆSTOS (Φαιστός; Φαιστίας). 1. A town in the south of Crete, near Gortyna, twenty stadia from the sea, with a port-town, Matala or Matalia, said to have been built by the Heracleid Phæstus, who came from Sicyon to Crete. The town is mentioned by Homer, but was destroyed at an early period by Gortyna. It was the birth-place of Epimenides, and its inhabitants were celebrated for their wit and sarcasm.—2. A town of Thessaly, in the district Thessalota.

PHÆSTON (Φαίστων), that is, "the shining," occurs in Homer as an epithet or surname of Helios (the Sun), and is used by later writers as a proper name for Helios; but it is more commonly known as the name of a son of Helios by the Oceanid Clymene, the wife of Merops. The genealogy of Phæstion, however, is not the same in all writers, for some call him a son of Clymene, the son of Helios by Merops, or a son of Helios by Prote, or, lastly, a son of Helios by the nymph Rhode or Rhodus. He received the significant name of Phæstion from his father, and was afterward presumptuous and ambitious enough to request his father to allow him one day to drive the chariot of the sun across the heavens. Helios was induced by the entreaties of his son and of Clymene to yield, but the youth being too weak to check the horses, they rushed out of their usual track, and came so near the earth as almost to set it on fire. Thereupon Jupiter (Zeus) killed him with a flash of lightning, and hurled him down into the river Eridanus. His sisters, the Heliades or Phæaceliades, who had yoked the horses to the chariot, were metamorphosed into poplars, and their tears into amber. Vid. HELIADÆ.

ανθος), son of Aracus, was an Ionian Partheniæ, or the offspring of disparagement, of the first Meesian wars, but he was permitted.

(Vid. Dict. Epigr.) As the Partheniæ son by their fellow-citizens, a conspiracy under Phalanthus sent. Their design having failed, he went to Italy under the name of Phalanthus, and founded the city B.C. 708. Phalanthus was from Tarentum by a sedition at Brundisium.

), ruler of Agrigentum in a proverbial celebrity as a tyrant; but we have scarcely of his life and history. He reigned about B.C. 570, and lived sixteen years. He was a tyrant, and appears to have low-citizens to some high which he afterward availed a despotic authority. He sent wars with his neighbors power and dominion on the frequently by stratagem perished by a sudden outburst, in which it appears an ancestor of Theron, must have taken part. No circumstance Phalaris is more celebrated in which he is said to have been the victim of his cruelty, old that he made the first inventor Perillus. Thus the air of an invention of one of this celebrated engraving associated with the name of Phalaris as early as the time of Pindar. (Pind., Pyth., i., 185.) That poet also speaks of Phalaris himself in terms which clearly prove that his reputation as a barbarous tyrant was then already fully established, and all subsequent writers, until a very late period, allude to him in terms of similar import. But in the later ages of Greek literature, there appears to have existed or arisen a totally different tradition concerning Phalaris, which represented him as a man of a naturally mild and humane disposition, and only forced into acts of severity or occasional cruelty by the pressure of circumstances and the machinations of his enemies. Still more strange is it that he appears at the same time as an admirer of literature and philosophy, and the patron of men of letters. Such is the aspect under which his character is presented to us in two declamations commonly ascribed to Lucian, and still more strikingly in the well-known epistles which bear the name of Phalaris himself. These epistles are now remembered chiefly on account of the literary controversy to which they gave rise, and the masterly dissertation in which Bentley exposed their spuriousness. They are evidently the composition of some sophist, though the period at which the forgery was composed can not now be determined. The first author who refers to them is Stobæus. The best edition is by Schæfer, Lips., 1823.

PHALARIUM (φαλάριον), a fortress named after Phalaris, near the southern coast of Sicily, situated on a hill forty stadia east of the River Himera.

PHALASARNA (ῥα φαλαίαρνα), a town on the northwestern coast of Crete.

[PHALCES (φάλκης), a Trojan warrior, slain before Troy by Antilochus.]

PHALÆRUM (φάλαρον : φαλῆρον), the most easterly of the harbors of Attica, and the one chiefly used by the Athenians before the time of the Persian wars. Phalerum is usually described as the most easterly of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus; but this appears to be incorrect. The names of the three harbors in the peninsula were Piræus, Zea, and Munychia; while Phalerum lay southeast of these three, nearer the city, at Hagios Georgios. After the establishment by Themistocles of the three harbors in the peninsula of Piræus, Phalerum was not much used; but it was connected with the city by means of a wall called the Phalerian Wall (φαληρικὸν τεῖχος). Phaleron or Phalerus was also an Attic demus, containing temples of Jupiter (Zeus), Ceres (Demeter), and other deities.

[PHALINUS (φαλίνος), a Zacynthian, in the service of Tissaphernes; after the battle of Cunaxa, B.C. 401, he accompanied the Persian heralds sent to the army of the ten thousand to require them to lay down their arms: he returned unsuccessful, having been unable to get any satisfactory answer from Clearchus.]

PHALÖRIA (φαλώρια), a fortified town of Thesaly in Hestiotis, north of Tricca, on the left bank of the Peneus.

PHANÆ (φάνα, ἡ φαναία ἄκρα : now Cape Martico), the southern point of the island of Chios, celebrated for its temple of Apollo and for its excellent wine.

PHANAGORIA (Φαναγόρεια, and other forms: ruins at Phanagori, near Taman, on the eastern side of the Straits of Kaffa), a Greek city, founded by a colony of Teians under Phanagoras, on the Asiatic coast of the Cimmerian Bosphorus. It became the great emporium for all the traffic between the coasts of the Palus Mæotis and the countries on the southern side of the Caucasus, and was chosen by the kings of Bosphorus as their capital in Asia. It had a temple of Venus (Aphrodite) Apaturos, and its neighborhood was rich in olive-yards. In the sixth century A.D. it was destroyed by the surrounding barbarians.

PHANAGŒA (Φαναγοῖα), a great plain of Pontus in Asia Minor, inclosed by the mountain chains of Paryadres on the east, and Lithrus and Ophlinitus on the west, was the most fertile part of Pontus.

[PHANES (Φάνης), a Greek of Halicarnassus, in the service of Amasis, king of Egypt, whom he deserted, and went over to Cambyses, king of Persia.]

PHANIAS or PHENIAS (Φάνιας, Φαινίας), of Eresos in Lesbos, a distinguished Peripatetic philosopher, the immediate disciple of Aristotle, and the contemporary, fellow-citizen, and friend of Theophrastus. He flourished about B.C. 336. Phantias does not seem to have founded a distinct school of his own, but he was a most diligent writer upon every department of philosophy, as it was studied by the Peripatetics, especially logic, physics, history, and literature. His works, all of which are lost, are frequently quoted by later writers. One of his works most frequently cited was a sort of chronicle of his native city, bearing the title of Πρωτάνεις Ἐπέσιαι.

PHANOCLES (Φανокλῆς), one of the best of the later Greek elegiac poets, probably lived in the time of Philip and Alexander the Great. He seems only to have written one poem, which was entitled Ἐρωτες ἃ Καλολ. The work was upon pederastia; but the subject was so treated as to exhibit the retribution which fell upon those who addicted themselves to the practice. We still possess a considerable fragment from the opening of the poem, which describes the love of Orpheus for Calais, and the vengeance taken upon him by the Thracian women. The fragments of Phanocles are edited by Bach, Philæte, Hermesianactis, atque Phanoclis Reliquia, Halle, 1829; and by Schneidewin, Delectus Poës. Græc., p. 168.

PHANODĒMUS (Φανόδημος), the author of one of those works on the legends and antiquities of Attica, known under the name of Attides. His age and birth-place are uncertain, but we know that he lived before the time of Augustus, as he is cited by Dionysius of Halicarnassus. [The last edition of the fragments is in Müller's Hist. Græc. Fragm., p. 366-370.]

[PHANOSTHENES (Φανοστῆνης), an Andrian, was intrusted by the Athenians in B.C. 407 with the command of four ships, and was sent to Andros to succeed Conon on that station. On his way he fell in with two Thurian galleys, under the command of Dorieus, and captured them with their crews.]
